21. Upon Candlemas-day I ſaid Maſs, we had been now four Months at Sea, were

In 18 Degrees of North Latitude, and had left Cabo Verde astern; we had not sight of it, nor of Cape S. Antony. Our course was n. n. w. for we could not lie closer to the North. We had a new repetition of the King of France his designs against New Spain, and they said the River of Plate was but weakly defended by us, and must be first secur'd. The Hugonot took a Ship there some Years before, and after that another at the Island Santo Domingo, with only 25 Men and a Boat; he himself said it was a shame they suffer'd themselves to be taken.

22. On the 7th of February we found our selves without the Tropick of Cancer; the Wind came about to East, and we stood three days due North: Our true Course was N. N. E. and so we wanted another Wind. We sail'd on in melancholy manner; Job calls our Life, A Warfare upon Earth; and we may properly call it, A Voyage upon Sea. The World is call'd a Sea in Holy Writ, and with good cause; in it we see the furious Winds of several Vices which assault Man, Dangers, Rocks, on which great Vessels shipwrack daily, &c. This makes Man a Ship, and his Life a Voyage. This is so easily made out, it is needless to spend time about it.

23. During the remaining part of our Voyage we had sundry Winds, Rain, troublefom Seas, and cold enough; the Seamen fell sick every day, Provisions fell short, we did not take a Fish in a month. The Hugonot supply'd me, and all the sick, with every thing he had: This I was much edify'd at, and observ'd that others who were able did it not, tho they had so good an Example shown them. I divided among the Seamen the allowance of Brandy they gave me, and took care of their Souls, which was the main Point. It hap'n'd more than once that two Men held me fast whilst I administred the Sacrament of Extreme Unction, and yet I could scarce stand to do my Duty, the motion of the Ship was so violent. In 15 days time we came out of Summer into sharp Winter; we ran into 46 Degrees of Latitude, and then fell again into 43; we steer'd directly East, the North-wind came up very furious, and held us eight days in the same place: We reck'ned our selves within Cape Finisterre, and expected in a day more to reach Bordeaux; but the Weather continuing, and Men dying, it was resolv'd to put into Corunna. Having stood about, and sail'd half a day, about Night-fall we discover'd Cape Finisterre a League from us. It was resolv'd to pass on to Lisbon, the Wind was large, and we ran along the Coast very pleasantly. Next day an odd Accident well worth writing hap'n'd: One that had been Purser was sick aboard, he had ben put of that Employment for his dishonesty, and conceiv'd such hatred against the Captain and Steward, that he said he would not forgive them. He was often advis'd at Madagascar, and by the way thence, to lay aside that Rancour; he would not. The Captain and Steward sent to let him know they bore him no ill-will, that he might relent; this avail'd nothing. I desir'd too ingenious Frenchmen to discourse him upon that Business, and advise him to confess himself, because his sickness was dangerous, all to no purpose. I, with the little French I had, said all I thought convenient. He answer'd, when he came to France he would do it. I told him, it was doubtful whether he would ever reach thither; he took no notice of it. One day they call'd me on a sudden, telling me that young Man was dying. I came as he was giving up the Ghost, he dy'd; and on a sudden the Wind chang'd and rose so high, that we had not seen the like all the Voyage; the Sea flew up to the Clouds, such a Wave broke upon the Ship as frighted us all. They threw the Body into the Sea as fast as they could, and it was strange that the Wind began to fall immediately, and came about to the same Point where it was before. There was a very remarkable alteration when the Heretick Director dy'd betimes in the Morning on this side the Cape of Good Hope, I took particular notice of it. I had before told him my mind, offer'd him my service, he would not give ear, and went away to Hell. The Devils, it is likely rejoyced, which made that alteration we were sensible of. I rather took this Man for an Atheist, than a Heretick; he liv'd like a Beast, and drank like a Madman; one Night he got up to drink, and instead of the Wine laid hold of the Ink-bottle, and drank a good deal; it is likely it hurt his Stomach, and he was ill of it before.

24. Eleven, or thirteen Seamen dy'd as I remember; they had receiv'd all the Sacraments, God be prais'd, which was my greatest comfort, and they dy'd well. On the 18th of March we anchor'd at Cascaes, some went ashore presently, and return'd at midnight with fresh Bread, Wine and Fruit. I came to Lisbon on S. Joseph's Day, having said a Month before I would be satisfy'd to land that day.

C H A P. XXVIII.

My Stay in Lisbon, and Journey to Rome.

1. I Am satisfied I have forgot several Particulars, which must be among such variety of Accidents, and in the course of so many Years. I omitted one remarkable thing concerning the Island Ceylon, which is a vast high Mountain, the Portugueses and others call Pico de Adam, or Adam's Clift; it ends above in a Point sharp to appearance, whither they say our first Parent ascended; this is grounded on that Opinion which maintains that Paradise is there. The Beauty, Fruitfulness, and Pleasantness of the Place makes for it. They have left to show for it who placed it in the Island Zibu, or that of the Name of Jesus, which is one of the Philippine Islands; and I wonder some Authors have not placed it in China, where what is written concerning that most delightful place is more easily verifys'd.

2. I writ nothing concerning Cambaya, a Kingdom subject to the Mogol, because I came not into it. The Agate-stone is found there, and there is so much of it, so cheap, and so curiously wrought, sold at Suratte, that it is wonderful.

3. At length I reach'd Europe, after almost fifteen months sailing from China. I gave a larger turn about the World than Magellan, for he was neither at Coromandel, Suratte, nor Madagascar; he return'd not to Europe, as I have done, God be prais'd. I have been in all four parts of the World, for Madagascar, S. Helena, and Ascension, are parts of Africk. I have gone through such diversity of Climates, and tasted such variety of Fruit, and other Food, that I believe few Men can match me. It appears what Seas I have seen; and now, lastly, going to Rome, and returning, I have travers'd the Mediterranean. One said, that the greatest Miracle God had wrought in a small thing, was the variety of Faces: I have seen such total diversity of this sort, as I believe no Man besides me has. In America, besides the Chichupines, which are those that go over from Spain, I have seen these several sorts of People, call'd Criollos, Mestizos, Castizos, Indians, Mulattoes, Cambabijos, Tornautros, and Tenteenelagre. In the Philippine Islands there are still more mixtures, besides Foreign Nations. Afterwards I saw Chineses, Tartars, Japoneses, Tunquines, Cochinchineses, Cambod-

ans, Siamites, Corians, Laos, Maldives, Mindanaos, Joloes, Zamboangas, Camucones, Javans, Sumatrans, Macassars, Solors, Borneans, Nicobars, Ceylonites, Narfangans, Malabares, Bengalans, Golcondars, Mogols, Persians, Armenians and Turks. In Europe, Spaniards, French, Italians, English, Dutch, Flemings, Germans, Suissers, and Natives of Malta and Oran, and many others; and yet among them all never found two exactly alike.

4. At Suratte there was an Ambassador from the Great Turk to the Mogol, a handsom and brave Youth; he and his Men did Wonders when Subagi attack'd that City, but neither he nor the rest could prevent the plundering of that City by the Enemy.

5. Since it pleas'd God to bring me safe off the Sea, and set me ashore in Europe, let us conclude the Voyage. The River up to the City of Lisbon, and higher, is one of the finest in the World; and were it as pleasant as that of God, all others must yield to it. The Palace is good, I was told it was built by Philip the Second, and so the Citadel. There I heard many things, which I think should lie bury'd in Oblivion, that future Ages may not have cause to condemn or rail at this. The City is very handsom, the Buildings low, Provisions plenty, the People courteous; but all that have not been abroad imagine there is nothing in the World so good as in their Country; a great Absurdity, which some are so far led away with, as to conceit there is no good Wine in Spain. Our Monastery of S. Dominick is very fine, and in it a stately Tomb of the incomparable in Learning and Piety, F. Luis de Granada; it would take up a particular Volume to particularize with what Love, Kindness and Zeal those good Fathers entertain'd me: The most R. F. Peter de Magallanes, President of the Inquisition, was wonderful kind to me. I visited the Count de Umanes then Ambassador there, saw his splendid Entry, and he bountifully assisted me toward my Journey to Madrid. At that time there were some Rumour about a War with Spain; the Nobility were for it, saying, they should get their Bread that way. The People oppose it, and the Religious Orders more than the rest; Sermons were preach'd in several Parts against those restless Spirits. I heard the same in the Monastery of S. Dominick; and the Professor Surcro the King's Preacher said, The Angels will fight against us, because there is no Pretence to justify this War. They told me the reason that convinced them; Father, the Controversy was, Whether Portugal belong'd to Castile, or not? No Man in this Kingdom ever said or imagin'd that Castile belong'd to Portugal; then what Pretence or Reason is there to commence this War?

6. I was told several Expressions Preachers had us'd in the Pulpits whilst the Wars lasted, and had before read some in a certain Author's printed Sermons. One of ours took too much liberty once in this particular; our Provincial held a Chapter that Night, and said, It is allowable we should wish to have a King of our own for several Reasons; but it is unreasonable that any of us who have receiv'd such signal Favours from the Kings of Castile, should speak ill of them; and therefore I am so far from allowing of, that I will punish it severely. For this Reason the Dominicans were suspected, because they did not rail; but they easily clear'd themselves.

7. I spent the Holy Week at Lisbon, and lik'd it well; visited the Sepulchers, which are very fine, that of the Dominicans is noble; I was at the celebrating the Feast of S. Peter Martyr, which was perform'd with magnificence, and the Inquisitor General Duke of Aveiro was present. About the middle of May I set out for Madrid, was in all the Monasteries of the Order by the way, and charitably entertain'd. I admir'd the Fort of Elvas, and how the Work daily advanc'd; and was no less astonish'd that nothing was done at Badajoz. By the way I heard many Stories which made against us Spaniards.

8. I reach'd Madrid, the Court of our Kings, in eleven Days, 26 Years, and three Months, after I left Valladolid. I dislik'd many things, but the World being changeable, Worldlings are so too. The World lieth in Wickedness, saith the beloved Disciple. S. Augustin says, He that knows thee not, loves thee; but he that knows thee, hates thee. S. Thomas upon Rom. 8. mentions the same others have writ concerning this Monster, The World is not clean because it defiles; how then can he be clean who is in the World? It is a great Perfection, and ought to be our Endeavour to live clean and unspoil'd in the foul World. The same Doctor expounding the Words of S. Jude, Hating it, &c. Nava- expresses it thus, It is perfect Religion to preserve ones self untainted in the midst of those that are defil'd. rette.

9. My business belonging to the Court of Rome, I presently began to dispose my Affairs to that end. I saw Letters at Lisbon and Madrid from Cardinal Barbaryn, in which he desir'd some Information for the Holy Congregation concerning the Mission of China. I gave a short account of the most material Points, reserving the rest till my arrival at the Court of Rome. I set out in September following, with Letters from some great Men. At Carthagena I had the good fortune to wait upon the Dutchess of Osuna. Our Voyage was tedious and troublesome, we stay'd 29 or 30 days at Cadiz. D. Pagano, D. Oria, who commanded the Galleys for his Nephew, dy'd there; he was a worthy Gentleman, I assisted him at his death. The Dutchess gave a very good Example that Voyage in praying and bestowing Alms. The Lady Elizabeth Formento was with her; the Great Cabin was like a Chappel, Prayers almost continual, and much frequenting of the Sacraments.

10. We struck across the Bay with fair Weather, and were nobly receiv'd at Final by the Duke, who there expected his Wife and Niece. I went on to Genoa in one of the Galleys, without setting foot ashore. A few days after I went to Leghorn with good Company, cold and foul Weather; I came thither sick, was taken care of in the Hospital of S. John of God, where I was look'd to with great assiduoufness and charity. I came to Rome with much difficulty on the Day of the Epiphany 1673. Soon after there came to my hands a considerable Alms sent me by Bill from Milan by the Duke of Osuna. I began to treat about my Affairs, kiss'd his Holiness's Foot twice; he entertain'd me with wonderful Goodness: I was much edify'd at his great Humility, and the Poverty I saw in this little Room. I convers'd with some Cardinals, particularly Ottoboni, Bona, Maximis, Porto Carero; and lastly Cardinal Casinate. Cardinal Borromeus dy'd presently after my arrival, which troubled me much for the miss I had of him. I spent sixteen Months in approving the Propositions I deliver'd to the Congregation de Propaganda Fide; gave in several Informations, presented Manuscripts, translated Chinese Books by order of the Congregation: They refer'd the Matter to the In-

Nava-rette. quilitors, they to the Consultors and Qualificators. In fine, in March 1674, by direction from the Holy Congregation, the Cardinals Bona and Casanate, met with the most R. F. F. Laurea, and F. Cajetan Mirabold, they debated the Points, and what the two most Reverend Fathers had decreed, which they approv'd and confirm'd, which set at ease and satisfy'd me, after I had gone through some Particulars, which I reserve for a proper time.

11. I had before urg'd strong Arguments and Reasons for the making one of my Order, who is a Native of China, Bishop, since the Bishops Missioners who were at Siam could not get into China. All the Holy Congregation agreed to it. I also press'd the confirming the Bull of Urban the Eighth, which empowers Missioners to go to Japan and China from all Parts, and all Ways: The Resident of Portugal oppos'd it, alledging that all those Kingdoms belong to the Portuguese Conquests. Much may be said to this Point, and they will not be convinc'd that Japan falls within the Limits assign'd to the West-Indies, which is beyond all dispute. In the next place, that since till this time they never made any Conquest there, they can never do it for the time to come. 3. That if once they are inform'd in those Parts that such a thing is mention'd, they will not leave one European alive there. 4. That from Sinapura Eastward, no part is or can be call'd India, as I have heard the Portuguese themselves own; otherwise the Chineses, Japoneses, and other Nations, would all be Indians, which is not so. But the Designs and Motives they have being of another nature, there is no talking of it, as they themselves own. In short, Urban the Eighth, Alexander the Seventh, and Clement the Tenth, who now governs the Church, order'd it should be so, and lay heavy Censures upon those that shall obstruct it. But the best of it is, that I relid'd some time at Lisbon in view of all that Court, was known to be a Missioner of China, had several questions put to me concerning that Country, particularly by the Inquilitor General Duke of Aveiro, and yet no body ever thought of mentioning this Point to me; and yet when I came to Rome, the Resident quarrel'd with me on account that we Spaniards go by the way of Manila into China, a thing ridiculous in it self; I have said before this proceeded from other grounds. Cardinal Ottoboni several times told me, it was convenient I should return to China as Bishop of that Mission. I declar'd my opinion concerning it, he threatned to have it forc'd upon me; which I dreaded, but prevail'd with him to desist.

12. At my departure from Rome, they search'd my Portmantua, found 3000 Medals given me by the Holy Congregation, and Cardinal Portocarero; they told me, I must pay so much Duty for them. This provok'd and anger'd me; I answer'd, they were given me for Charity, as in truth they were, that I would pay nothing, they might take them if they pleas'd, and I would go complain to Cardinal Nepos: With that they let me pass. I was told there, that searching the Wallets of a Religious Man of the Order of S. John of God, they found in them a new pair of Shoos; and because all new things pay, they made him pay Duty for them; he went out again within a few days, without having worn the Shoos; they found them, and made him pay the Duty over again. Were this known in China, the Mogol's Country, or other of those Parts, they would say we were the worst People in the World. I had Company with me, the Boat-men did not fail of playing us Pranks, and we had bad Weather. We came first to Civita Vecchia, thence to Leghorn, and very leasurely to Genoa, where we waited eight days for Shipping. We were there on the Feast of Corpus Christi; I admir'd that the Cross of every Brotherhood had its Mark of Distinction; that of the Bakers had Loaves; that of the Fishermen, Fishes; that of the Pastry-Cooks, Saucidges, &c. I saw the Church of Annunciata, a beautiful Piece; but he who has seen S. Peter's at Rome, and the rest of the Churches of that City, admires at none: Every time I went into S. Peter's Church, which was often, I was amaz'd at its Beauty and Greatness, and my Heart rejoyc'd in me. I visited the Seven Churches, saw the Holy Places, variety of Relicks, the Vatican, some Palaces, Cavalcatas, and other things needless to repeat.

13. After 8 days stay at Genoa, I went aboard an English Pink with some other Spaniards. I agreed for my Diet, and a place in the great Cabin at an easy Rate. I liv'd well enough, the Master and the Mate were very civil, they had no more Officers. We sail'd upon our Broad-side five days, the Wind being at North-East; my Companions were wonderful Sea-sick, I have been free from it for some Years. In the Afternoon the Seamen had such ridiculous Sports as made us almost burst with laughing. The eighth day we landed at Alicant; some of us took up in certain Waggon, in which we came leisurely, and indifferent easy. I was amaz'd to see so much Desert-Country, and so bare of Food, we could scarce great Bread. At Albacete I paid a Duty for my Portmantua, which was the first time I had done it in all my Travels. I came to Madrid upon Midsummer-day, in the Year 1674, and there I paid a quarter of a Piece of Eight, and they would have had more, tho I had nothing but Papers, Medals, and two old dirty Shirts. Good God! what People they are, and yet they say the Chineses are covetous; they who are strangers to our Proceedings may say so, not they that are acquainted with them.

14. Soon after at Madrid I heard News from China, by Letters from thence, and from the Philippine Islands. I understood that the Missioners were restor'd to their Churches, but upon condition they should not preach the Word of God; and the Natives were forbid to imbrace it, which is a great trouble, but it may mend by degrees, on account of the Mathematics, but I could wish it were upon some better Motive. I was also inform'd that the English have settled a Factory in the Island Hermosa, and that the Chinese that is Lord of it design'd to have made War upon Manila, but desisted at the perswasion of his Mother. The Cause that mov'd him to have thoughts of War, was, that at Manila they apprehended a Captain of his, whom they took in the Act of Sodomy. The Chinese being inform'd of it, writ to the Governor, and sent a Present, desiring he would send him the Criminal, and he would punish him. The Governor answer'd, That it was an Affair which the Court of Justice took cognisance of, and he had nothing to do with, and return'd no Present, which the other highly resented. The Dutch offer'd the Governor thirty Ships to assist him against the Chinese, and what else he wanted, but he accepted of nothing. He afterwards sent D. Francis Enriquez de Losada his Ambassador to the Island Hermosa, and they were made Friends. From thence D. Francis, who is my particular Friend, went over to Macao: Among other News he carry'd from thence to Manila, one piece was, that some Religious Men of the Order of S. Francis coming to that City in order to pass over into China, certain Churchmen hindered them; to that purpose shov'd their Captain-Gen-

ral a Letter of King Philip the Second, ordering it so to be done. However the Captain-General would neither see nor hear, and they went over; so that the Laity does not obstruct the Missioners, and Clergymen do. The Letters I receiv'd this Year say, those Religious Men did not get into China. Nava-rette.

15. Granting it be true that Philip the Second gave such Orders, since three Popes have afterwards commanded the contrary, what signifies that Letter to Macao, which is not now under our Government?

16. D. Francis in another Letter of his from Siam, among other things has these words: The King did me the favour to show me the white Elephant, and I did not imagine he would have appear'd in such rich Trappings; before him went above 600 Men as his Guard, all with several Weapons; after them the white Elephant under a Canopy of Crimson-Velvet, the Rods that held it up all cover'd with Plates of Gold; the Elephant had all about his Body Diamonds, Pearls, Rubies and Emrauds, they seem'd to be well worth two Millions. He is one of the haughtiest and mightiest Kings, not only in this Archipelago, but in the whole World. He calls himself God, none of his Subjects must see, or look at him, upon pain of Death. None that does not see, can believe with how great Pomp he goes abroad. Your Reverence is acquainted with these Affairs, but those who are strangers to them will believe it false.

17. For my part I believe it all. As for the Embassy, D. Francis affirms he stood it out, and would not deliver his Message barefoot, as all Nations in Europe have done; he went in shod, so that it remains as a Precedent for the Spaniards. Formerly it was a Token of Reverence and Servitude to go barefoot, says A Lipide in 3 Exod. v. 5. For all this King's Pride, we see that for his private Interest and Advantage, he submits to pay an Acknowledgment to the Emperor of China, which is very base and mean.

18. He calls himself a God, which is not rare among the Kings in those parts, there are many Nebuchadnezzars. The King of Candia, who is Lord of Ceylon, and who has not the 20th part of the Greatness of him of Siam, has most lofty Titles and Epithets. But he that outdoes all the rest in this particular, is the great Mogol, King of Kings, Lord of Heaven and Earth, Almighty, and many other Titles he assumes; and all their Pains, Dis-

*Nava-*ceive them, as they did vain-glorious An- rette. tiocbus, nor even Death which they see ~ has taken off their Predecessors. But how can the Understanding be free from dismal Darkeness, when it wants the supernatural Light? The Chinese ever was, and is more modest and humble, tho his Subjects extol him above the Moon.

C H A P. XXIX.

A more particular Account of the Tartars Irruption into China.

I Have been perswaded by some Persons to enlarge upon the manner of the Tartar's breaking into and possessing himself of China, they not thinking what I writ concerning it in the First Book sufficient, considering how much others have made of it. Their Advice being friendly, I resolv'd to take this trouble upon me, and will add something concerning the Chinese of Cabello, who took the Island Hermosa from the Dutch, and threatned Manila, which will compleat the whole Work. Under the Reign of the Emperor of China, Vuan Lie the 13th Emperor of the Family Chu, of that Stock call'd Ta Ming, that is, great Light and Brightness, which lasted 270 Years; the Tartars began to try their Valour against the Delights of China, with various Success. But being always in Arms, they gave some Apprehensions to the Chinese.
 Hostilities ceased in the Reign of the Emperor Pung Ching, but their Minds were nevertheless estranged.

Pung
Ching.

2. During that time of Peace abroad, War broke out at home. Eight Armies of Robbers were raised, every one of them promis'd himself the Crown and Scepter, confiding in the Discord there was among the Great ones and Manda- rines. The words of Christ are infallible, Every Kingdom that is divided in it self, shall be destroy'd. The Emperor's extraordinary Covetousness, and continual keeping within his Palace, which the Chi- neses have always been blam'd for, for-forwarded his ruin. That happen'd which I gave an account of concerning Leao
Tung, after which the eight Armies fought among themselves, six of them were destroy'd, and only two remain'd victorious. These betook themselves to several Provinces: That Commander who went to Zu Chuen, whose Name was Chang Hien Chung, was doubtless more cruel than Nero, or all the Tyrants that ever were; the number of those he caus'd to be butcher'd could never be ascertain'd. He converted some whole Cities without any Provocation given; slew

Chang
Hien
Chung.

Children and Women, without sparing his own; destroy'd Bonzes, the Learned Sect, Physicians, Eunuchs, without exempting Sex or Age. He was an Emblem of Hell, bearing down all that stood before him with devouring Flames.

3. The other, whose Name was Li
Kung Zu, came to the Imperial City, where he had many private Friends and Souldiers. This made his Entrance into the City easy, which happen'd one Morning in April 1644, at the dawn of the Day. Who can express the Confusion, Noise, Tumult and Slaughter there ensu'd? In the midst of that Hurliburly, the Rebel trampling upon dead Bodys, through Streets running with Blood, came to the Palace, where the Emperor lay asleep wholly ignorant of that Disaster. Unhappy and wretched Emperor, Do you sleep and rest when the Enemy is at your Gate? Where are your Sentinels? where your Guards? where your Ministers and Counsellors? Some say he in a fury and distraction got a Horseback, and rode about the Gardens, seeking which way to make his escape: Others, that he writ a Paper with his own Blood, in which he call'd the great Men Traitors, declar'd the Commonalty Innocent, and begg'd of the Rebel to punish the Heads. Some affirm, that he himself with his Scimiter slew a Maiden Daughter he had, that she might not fall into the Enemies Hands; and afterwards with his Garters hang'd himself on a stately Palm-Tree. What I writ in the first Book was told me in the Imperial City; it is no easy matter to have all Particulars true.
 This was the end of that Emperor's Greatness, Majesty, Pleasures, Delicacy and Riches; when Subjects are disloyal, all the rest avails but little or nothing.
 A faithful Counsellor, some Concubines, Ladys and Eunuchs follow'd their Emperor's Example; so that those delightful Gardens were converted into dismal mournful Groves. What a Spectacle was it to see those Trees loaded with the Carcasses of despairing Wretches? A bad fight, and miserable Catastrophe of the State, Glory and Honour of so many Great Persons. This dismal accident being nois'd about the City, a great number of Men and Women hang'd themselves, others cast themselves into Lakes, and others poison'd themselves, that they might not fall into the hands of the mighty and treacherous Enemy Li Kung Zu.

4. The Traytor enter'd the Palace in Triumph, took upon him the name of Emperor, sat in the Imperial Throne, seiz'd the Government, ordering the dead Body to be cut into small bits. Horrid Barbarity! and two little Sons he had to be put to death. The first vanish'd, and has never yet been heard of, perhaps he cast himself into the River, or into some Lake or Well. He beheaded many Mandarines, and order'd his Soldiers to plunder that Populous City. The Cruelties, Barbarities and Obscenities there committed, no Pen can write.

5. Among the rest of the Prisoners he made, one was a Venerable Old Man of the name of Vu. His Son Vu San Kuei, was General of the mighty Army the Emperor kept against the Tartars. He forced the Old Man to write to his Son to submit and join his Army to his Forces. He threatned to kill him, if he did not write immediately; he did it, being forced to it by his threats; but the Son, who valued his Loyalty and Fidelity to his Emperor and Country, above the life of any single Man, tho it were his own Father, would not consent, but contriv'd how he might destroy the common Enemy of all the Empire. His design was good, but the method he chose prov'd the utter ruin of all he endeavour'd to retrieve. The intention was good, but the means bad. How much Men are deceiv'd for want of due consideration, or of good Counsellors? True it is, God to punish their sins, sometimes blinds them, and confounds their devices. *Job 12. He lea-deth the Counsellors away spoiled, and ma-keth the Judges fools. He looseth the bond of Kings, and girdeth their loins with a Girdle,

6. Vu San Kuei ill advis'd, sent away an Embassy to the Tartar, offering him considerable Advantages, if he would bring an Army to join his, by which means he thought he might easily destroy the Rebel. The Tartar who desir'd no better an opportunity to put his designs in execution, came immediately with 80000 Men, most of them Horse. The Tartar perswaded the Chinese General, to put his Army into the Tartar Garb, the more to terrify the Enemy, that his Army might appear the greater, marching all in a body to the Imperial City. The Usurper had timely notice, and immediately order'd the Treasure which Sixteen Emperors had laid up, to be brought out. Some say they were three, but others with more probability say, eight Days and Nights carrying out Riches upon Camels, Horses, Mules, and on the Backs of an infinite number of People, and yet a great deal remain'd. The Rebel made away with part of his Army, and fled to the Province of Xen Si, but the Tartar and Chinese overtook, fought, and overthrew him. The Tartars slew vast numbers, and recover'd the Treasure. The Usurper escap'd, because he had past the Yellow River.

7. Vu San Kuei thank'd the Tartar for the favour he had done him, perform'd all he had promis'd, and desir'd him to return to his Country; but he delay'd, using deceitful reasons, and pretended necessity, as that the Enemy was still alive, and favour'd by some Provinces, and therefore it was not fit he should withdraw and leave the Empire in danger. In the mean while innumerable Tartars, not only of one, but of several Nations, flock'd in daily, even from as far as that they call Ju Pi, which lies North of Japan. They are call'd by that name, which signifies Fish-skin, because their Armour is made of them.

8. The Tartars carry'd along with them Xun Chi, a Child of six years of age, Son to Zung Te, King of the said Tartars, who dy'd a natural death at his first coming into China. I was told in the Imperial City Pe King, that the Tartar was desirous to see it, and as he was travelling in order to it, the Mandarines came out to meet him. As he was carry'd in his Chair talking with them, he said, may not I be Emperor? They all answer'd, Yes, Sir. For they were all full of fear and dread. He entred the City without the least opposition, went directly to the Palace, where having secur'd all things they declar'd Xun Chi Emperor. An Uncle of his govern'd for him some time, and the Nephew some years after apprehended and put him to death, upon some jealousy that he design'd to set up for himself.

9. They gave Vu San Kuei the Title of King, but Tributary to them, and bestow'd great Rewards on him; he finding himself weak, accepted of all and held his peace. The Tartar has ever been jealous of him, and he has ever shunn'd coming to Court lest he should be wholly in the Enemies power. In my time they made his Son King, his Father resigning that Dignity, but he excus'd himself from going to Court, whither he was call'd.

10. The news of the new Emperor was soon brought to Nan King the Southern Court; as soon as it was confirm'd, they presently crown'd a Cousin-german to the deceas'd Chinese Emperor. He took upon him the Government, and considering himself unable to withstand the Power of the Tartar, he sent an Embassy to desire him to rest satisfy'd with the Northern Provinces, and they would be Friends and Allies. The Tartar lik'd not the Proposal, but haughtily answer'd, He would have all or none. Being thus resolv'd, he advanced to that Noble City, where he found means to maintain Intelligence with a Chinese Traytor, who murder'd the General, and put the new Emperor into the power of the Tartar. The City and Southern Court being taken, they carry'd the new Emperor to Pe King, where they hang'd him over the Battlements, an honourable death in that Country. He had not reign'd a Year. Then follow'd the reducing of other Cities and Provinces; those that submitted were most courteously treated, but all that held out were inevitably devour'd by Fire and Sword. The Jews did so, read Deut. 20. This struck such a terror into the Chineses, that their Hearts fail'd them, if they heard but the name of the Tartar; and strong Cities surrendred at the sight of ten or a dozen Soldiers.

11. What had hapned at Nan King being nois'd abroad, the Great Men who had retir'd to Hang Cheu, the Metropolis of Che Kiang, crown'd Lo Vuang, who was of the Blood Royal. He was satisfy'd with the Title of King, and kept it but three Days. The Tartar besieg'd him, and he taking compassion of so many thousands of Souls as were in that City, did an action that was never parallel'd in the World: He went upon the Wall, and kneeling down in sight of the Tartar Commander, said to him, Brave and fortunate General, hear the Prayer and Request of a compassionate and humble King; I beseech you not to exercise your fury and anger on this beautiful Metropolis, nor to let your Sword prey on these innocent Subjects; if you are provok'd, it is I alone that am in fault, let me suffer for it, and not the Subjects who have not offend'd. As soon as he had spoke these words, he deliver'd himself up to the Tartar. This King in a great measure imitated Codrus, but with different success. What an opportunity this was for the Tartar to have shown a Noble Soul! How well would the King and his Subjects have come off, had he met with an Alexander or a Cesar. He lighted among barbarous and cruel People, who were not satisfy'd with destroying the King, but butcher'd all his Army. Those who fled, which were very numerous, were drown'd in the River that washes the Walls, only the unarm'd Multitude was spar'd.

12. The Chineses had a Year's breathing, because the Tartars found themselves too weak to cross the River of Hang Cheu, we mention'd. During this time the Chineses set up two Persons, one took the Title of King; another at Fo Kien, call'd himself Emperor, but both of them dy'd without doing any thing worth notice. 'Tis impossible to write the Revolts and Calamities of that vast Kingdom. At Kuang Tung they set up another Emperor of the Blood Royal. His Wife was a Christian, her name Helen, and her Sons name Constantine. Many Stories were rais'd and spread abroad about these Persons, and look'd upon as half Revelations, all tending to the establishment of the Church in those parts. Whilst Jung Lie's Fortune was favourable, his Wife and Son Constantine had some to assist them; his Lot alter'd, and they were forsaken. After various Accidents Jung Lie came to the Province of Jun Nan, where he gather'd an Army of 200000 Men (what signify'd the number, if they were not Soldiers?) and 600 Elephants. Here was an Army to conquer the World. The Tartars fought, and utter destroy'd it, the Elephants doing more mischief on their own than the Enemy's side. This was in the Year 1659, when I was in China. Jung Lie escap'd. This unhappy Prince travell'd through several Kingdoms, without finding any to assist him; it is said, he went into the Kingdom of Pegu, well known in India, and lying betwixt Bengala and Siam, there the Tartar reach'd him, bribing that King. He was carry'd to China, and there strangled in the Year 1662. Notice of it was given to all the Empire, tho I heard Chineses say, it was a fiction of the Tartar, to take away from the People all hopes of being ever restor'd to their own Princes, and so to settle their minds. This Man's Son Constantine is said to be about Siam, to have sent an Embassy to beg Aid of that King, and to live like a Christian. The Embassadors spoke with some Milli-

Missioners, I wonder these did not advise them to have recourse to the Europeans, no more than they did him that was set up at Fo Kien. I fancy it was out of an ill policy, they would not advise them to make use of Manila, where these Princes might be supported and live in quiet and hope. Europeans cannot see into these things, because they are unacquainted with them. Perhaps God may preserve Constantine for his greater Glory; for, Nothing that is violent is lasting; no body ever long held a violent Command, that which is moderate is lasting.

C H A P. XXX.

An Account of Nicholas Kuon, and his Son Kue Sing.

1. THESE two Chineses having been so famous in that part of the World, it will be very convenient to give some account of them. They were both Prodigies of human Fortune, and great examples of its Mutability. She rais'd them from the dirt to a vast height, and cast them down into a most miserable and unhappy condition. Cicero said, Fortune was blind, and they are so who will be rul'd by her.

his 2. Nicholas was born in a little Fishing Town, near the Port call'd Ngan Hai. Being very poor, he resolv'd to try his Fortune, went over to Macao, and was there baptiz'd by the name of Nicholas. Thence he sail'd to Manila, and in both places follow'd very mean Employments. A desire of rising carry'd him away to Japan, where he had an Uncle who was indifferent wealthy. The Uncle perceiving his Nephew was sharp and ingenious, intrusted him with the management of his Trade, and marry'd him to an Infidel Japonefe Woman, by whom he had some Children; the Eldest of them is he that is before mention'd, of whom we shall treat hereafter. Nicholas gave a good account of all he was intrusted with, which made his Uncle trust him with a Boat loaded with much Plate, and rich Commodities, to go trade in China. He finding himself possess'd of so much Wealth, without the least remorse or scruple of Conscience, kept all to himself, and turn'd Pirate. He throve so vastly in this wicked Employment, that he was the terror of all China, and the Chinese Emperor Zung Ching was forced to take him into his Service, making him his Admiral, and pardoning many heinous Crimes he was guilty of. He accepted of the Employ, and fixing himself in the Port call'd Ngan Hai, he settled a Trade with all the Kingdoms in that Archipelago, as Tunquin, Cochinchina, Champa, Camboja, Siam, Macassar, with us at Manila, with the Portugueses at

Macao, and with the Dutch at Jacatra, and the Island Hermosa, to which effect he was Master of above 3000 Champanes, (so the Spaniards call the Chinese Vessels, and those of Japan, Somas; they carry the Burden of a good Pink) thus he grew so vastly rich, that he is said to have outdone the Emperor in Wealth.

3. He attain'd to have 500 Catholick Blacks for his Guard, for he would not trust others; whenever he engag'd, he encourag'd his Blacks, calling upon S. James the Apostle, which it is likely he learn'd at Manila. When the Tartar came down to Fo Kien, he would fain have got him into his power, and often invited him, but he had always his Blacks who never lost sight of him: those Blacks were very terrible to the Tartars, who at last deceiv'd and got him to Court; and had he been more cautious and betaken himself to his Island, the Tartar had never been settled in the Government, or entred Fo Kien, if Nicholas had oppos'd it. I was told by one of my Order, who then liv'd near the Metropolis, that all Men blam'd Nicholas, but he having rose so high, and by such unjust means, must of necessity have a fall, and be made sensible of the inconstancy of Fortune.

4. He was mistaken in going to Court, and tho it was not long before he found his error and repented, it could not be retrieved. Repentance, says S. Chrysostom, does not avail in any worldly misfortune, but only against sin. He had his liberty for some time, but liv'd very uneasy, because his Son Kue Sing (a Noble Sirname given him by that Emperor, who was proclaim'd at Fo Kien) immediately taking up Arms against the Tartar, the Emperor was afraid Nicholas should make his escape, and join his Son, so that he would send for Nicholas by day and by night to be assured he was still about the Court. The Emperor was of a mild temper, and would not offer any violence to him, unless he were found guilty of some Crime. Therefore the Fathers residing at the Court us'd to say, that had not the Emperor dy'd, Nicholas had certainly liv'd; He that preserv'd him dy'd, and they that govern'd for the Infant-heir, put him to death. The Fathers were with him before, and gave him good advice, but to no purpose, and so at one stroke he lost the life of body and soul. This was the miserable end of Nicholas.

3. Kue Sing was inform'd how the Tartars had treated his Father, and betook himself to Sea with one single Champan, and only 1000 Ducats. Fortune favour'd him as much, or more than she had done his Father, for he became the Terror of the Tartars, and of all those Seas. He came to have an Army of above 100000 Men, and upwards of 20000 great and lesser Vessels, recovering all his Father's Trade. In the Year 1659, the Emperor Jun Lie sent a solemn Embassy to him to his Island Hia Muen, which is not above two Musket-shots from the Continent of China. God has there made a safe Harbour, capable of containing all the Shipping in the World. This Man was resolute, strong, revengeful and cruel, as being half a Japonesse. He was expert to a Miracle at all sorts of Weapons; so brave and bold, that he was always the first who charg'd the Enemy. No part of his Body was free from Scars of Cuts and Shot, his Friends and Officers afterwards curb'd his forwardness. He gain'd great Victories over the Tartars, had ever the better of them, except at the Assault he made upon the Southern Court in the Year 1659. Almost 100000 of his Men were kill'd, for he had then a prodigious Army. He was routed and fled, which was no small misfortune. This was the reason that mov'd the Tartar to draw the People from the Coast to the Inland, as I mention'd in the first Book; a costly but efficacious remedy. Kue Sing finding himself banish'd China, resolv'd to make War upon the Dutch in the Island Hermosa, which he did, and prov'd successful, a notable action. Some he put to death, cut off the Noses of others, and possess'd himself of that Noble Fortrefs, and the rich Ware-houses in it, valu'd at three Millions. The Dutch are blam'd for two things, the one that they went out of the Fort to fight, the other that they abandon'd a Hill which commanded the Fort and all about it.

4. During fifteen years that he held the Government, he put to death above 500000 Persons, and some for very small faults. He was so cruel that he sent from the Island Hermosa to have his own Son put to death, because he had to do with the Nurse of the fourth Son. He also condemn'd his first Wife to death, but she made her escape by the help of some Christian Blacks; the Son too escap'd his Father's fury.

5. Turning a Promontory in the Province of Che Kiang, a terrible Storm rose, in which he lost 600 Champanes, and in them five Sons, and several Wives. A horrible loss! When the news was brought to Pe King, that Kue Sing was at Nan King, the Tartars were in such a Consternation, that the Emperor was about flying into his own Country. There is no doubt but if Kue Sing would have been advis'd, and had proceeded with deliberation, he had made himself Master of all China; he was proud, and that was enough to make him rash in his Undertakings. Upon the rout of the Enemy the Tartar recover'd, and took all measures to get rid of him, made up a Fleet of 800 Champanes, and attack'd the Enemy, who had 1200. At first the Tartar had the best, but the Wind favouring the Enemy, they came on with such fury, that the whole Tartar Fleet perish'd. Of the Tartars that engag'd ashore not one escap'd; yet afterwards the Tartar being assisted by the Dutch, whom he rewarded very ill, fought again, routed Kue Sing, drove him to the Island Hermosa, and brought all China under his Dominion. Afterwards when Kue Sing aspir'd to the Sovereignty of Manila, he sent a Religious Man of our Order with a Letter to the Governour, to this effect:

6. "It has been the practice of all Antiquity, and is so still, that any off-spring of a Foreign Nation pay Tribute and Acknowledgment to renowned Princes chosen by Heaven. The foolish Hollanders not understanding the Decrees and Ordinances of Heaven, behav'd themselves without fear or shame, wronging and tyrannizing over my Subjects, and robbing my trading Champanes; for which reason I had long since design'd to put out a Fleet to punish their Crimes; but Heaven and Earth having endu'd me with a wonderful Forbearance and Generosity, I continually sent them Friendly advice and admonitions, hoping they would repent for their sins, and mend their faults; but they growing more hardned, more unruly and perverse, took no notice. I being therefore highly provok'd in the Year

 “ in the fourth Moon, the fury of my “ anger swelling, set out a Fleet to chast“ tize their Crimes, and coming to their “ Forts slew innumerable multitudes of “ them [ this is false, for only 600 Dutch “ were kill'd, and they destroy'd 8000 Chine- “ ses ] the Hollanders having no way left “ to fly, or get off, and naked, humbly
 “ beg'd they might be our Subjects.
 “ Their Cities, Forts, Lakes, Ware“ houses, and what they had been many “ Years gathering, in a short time be“ came mine [ how proudly he talks of “ Cities, and there was never a one there ] “ and had they, being sensible of their “ Faults, come sooner, humbly bowing “ their Foreheads to pay Tribute to me, “ perhaps I had been pleas'd, and “ they would not be now so misera“ ble.

“ 7. Now your little, or mean King“ dom, has wrong'd and oppress'd my “ Subjects, and my trading Champanes, “ not much unlike to the Hollanders, “ provoking Discord, and encouraging “ Revenge, by your present Tyranny.
 “ The Affairs of the island Hermosa, “ are all settled to my mind ; I have “ hundreds of thousands of able Soul-“ diers, abundance of Ships of War, “ and abundance of Champanes of this “ Island. The way to your Kingdom by “ Water is very short, so that setting “ out in the Morning we may come to it “ at Night. I thought to have gone to “ rights in Person with my Fleet to pu“ nish your Crimes and Presumption “ [ God put a stop to him, or he had done “ much mischief ] but I remember, that “ tho your little Kingdom gave the first “ Provocation, it having afterwards ex-“ press'd some repentance, giving me ad“ vice concerning the first Article of this “ Affair, I resolv'd to pardon it. My “ Fleet being now in the Island Hermo- “ sa, I send before only the Father
 “ [ it was F. Victorio Riccio a Florentin, “ that went over in the same Vessel with “ me, a Man of extraordinary Parts and “ Worth ] and by him friendly Advice, “ that your small Kingdom may submit “ to the will of Heaven and acknowledg
 “ its Faults, and come yearly in humble “ manner to my Court to pay homage “ to me. In case you do so, I order the “ Father to return to me with the An“ swer, and I shall give intire credit to “ him. I will deal fairly, pardon your “ past Faults, assisting and giving you “ employments in your Royal Town,
 “ and will order the Merchants to go

“ trade there. And in case you suffer “ your selves to be deceiv'd, and are not “ sensible of your own good, my Fleet “ shall be upon you immediately, and shall “ burn and destroy your Forts, Lakes, “ Cities, Warehouses, and all other “ things ; and then tho you beg to be ad“ mitted to pay Tribute, it shall not be “ granted you. If so, the Father need “ not return. Good and Evil, Loss and “ Gain, are now in the Ballance ; your “ little Kingdom must resolve spee“ dily, and not delay repentance till it “ is too late ; I only advise, and admo“ nish you friendly. In the 13th Year
 “ of Jun Lie [ that is 1662 ] the 7th
 “ pril. ]

8. This Message caus'd much disorder among the Chineses that were then at Manila, they mutiny'd and basely murder'd a Religious Man of our Order.
 All things being pacify'd (an account of the rest shall be given in another place) it was resolv'd F. Victorio should return with the Answer. His Life was expos'd to that merciless Tyrant, and it is certain, that had not God taken him off, he had cruelly tortur'd the poor Religious Man. D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara governed the Island at that time very worthily, and answer'd the Letter that has been insert'd above, in this manner.

9. D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara, Knight of the Order of Calatrava, one of the Council of his Catholick Majesty our Sovereign Lord King Philip the 4th the Great Monarch of Spain, and of the East and West-Indies, Islands and Continent of the Ocean Sea, his Governour and Captain General in the Philippine Islands, and President of the Royal Court, and Chancery, where he presides
 &c.

10. To Kue Sing, who rules and governs the Sea Coasts of the Kingdom of China. [ He honour'd him too much ] “ No Nation in the World is ignorant, “ that the Spaniards obey none but their “ King, confessing and adoring Almighty “ God, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, “ Cause of all Causes, without beginning, “ middle, or end ; and that they live
 “ in his Holy Law, and die for the de“ fence of it, and that their dealings are “ fair, just, and always the same, as “ has appear'd by those they have had “ for several Years with the Chineses, “ who have brought Commodities worth “ many thousands, and have been en-“ rich'd and got vast Treasures by their

Nav

returns. They have found Faith in our promises, and had our love and assistance, whilst they have professed themselves Friends; and you having continued the same correspondence, since China was divided by the Wars, we have continued in amity, protecting your Vessels, supplying you bountifully with Commodities and Provisions you wanted, without any let, wishing you well, and to know whether you wanted any help or comfort in the Variety of Fortune that has attended you; refusing on the Tartars account to expel the Chineses that were among us of your Province, or Party. You were thankful for this, gratefully declaring you would continue your Friendship, and be unalterable as the incorruptible
 Stone. You sent your Embassador, who was receiv'd, entertain'd, and dismiss'd with all kindness imaginable.
 And yet now contrary to your promise, and to that publick Faith you ought to observe, pretending wrongs, you demand Homage and Tribute, without considering the mischiefs may accrue, nor the inestimable Benefit you at present receive: for tho you should obtain the Dominion of these Islands, which is not easy but rather impossible, you would only lord it over your self, destroying the Trade, without leaving your self a possibility of gathering such Treasure any other way as you yearly transport from hence, enriching you, your Allies, and all your Nation and Kingdom of China, no other Nation about us having such Conveniences as you have hence.
 Look upon the Gods you adore, made of the Metal you carry from hence; reflect before you make your Adoration and Submission, and you will find that this Country is under the Dominion, Jurisdiction and Power of our Lord the King; you will be sensible he is a Sovereign upon all accounts; and yet when you should seek your own Preservation, you threaten War, boasting of your Power. Be it as it will, I have caused all the Sangleys (that is Chineses) that were in these Islands at their ease, and driving their Trades, to depart freely with their Goods and Vessels, that you may have the more to bring you over; without taking notice of the mutiny rais'd by some who were jealous they might lose their Lives for the extravagancy of your Letter, which they imputed to want of sense and understanding; but I us'd Mercy towards them, because we would not draw our Swords upon an inconsiderable number, nor discredit the Valour God has endu'd us with, which is such, that tho your Power were double and treble what you boast of, yet we think it but little enough to exercise our Courage upon.
 Therefore we answer, that it is not in your power to make Kingdoms larger or smaller, because your Life and Duration is but short and insignificant; for you were born as it were yesterday, and must die as to morrow, without leaving the least memory of your Name in the World; for you know no other World but China: in these Parts the Air is different, the influences of Heaven not the same, and Colours near at hand vary from what they appear at a distance. All the Ports and Passages are stop't to admit of no body from you, unless you repent and sue for Peace, with all necessary Precaution for preserving the Honour of the Arms of Spain, and for the greater Glory of our Lord God. And if you persevere, you shall be receiv'd as an Enemy, you shall be answerable for the Lives that are lost, and the dangers that threaten you; and we will stand resolutely upon our defence, and defend the universal rights of Nations: and if you are unwilling to take so much pains, let us know it, and the Spaniards shall come to you, tho you will find enough to do with the Tartars, and even with those that follow and hate you, and with the Hollanders, who find you employment, retrieving their reputation as they well know how to do it. So that you will have no place of safety; we still expecting the good success we shall meet with from the hand of God, for the Sea, the Winds, the Fire, the Earth, and all the whole Creation will conspire against you; the Cross we bear in our Colours, as the mark of our Redemption, obtaining the Triumph that is due to it. And that you may not doubt of the Answer, F. Victorio Riccio your Embassador and mine carries it, that you may receive him as such, and cause the Libertics and Immuni-ties of Embassadors, us'd among Princes and Sovereigns, to be inviolably kept in his Person. God give you that true Knowledg we wish you, and that good Neighbourhood we ob-

" observe. Manila, July 10. 1662.

11. They were satisfy'd at Manila that Kue Sing would sail thither the next Year with all his Power; therefore the Governor D. Sabinianno Manrique took care to repair and add new Fortifications. He was so intent upon giving a good Example, that he put his hands to the Work; so much was done in a Year, that F. Victorio writ to us in China, that when he return'd thither in the Year 1663, he did not know Manila.

12. The Governor having commanded the Chineses to depart Manila; the first Champanes that went out carried the news to Kue Sing of the Resolution he had taken, adding Lies, as that he had caus'd a great number of Chineses to be put to death. That barbarous proud Mungrel in a rage blasphem'd Heaven, and was ready to tear himself in pieces through mere Passion; thus in a few days he ended his wretched Life. F. Victorio writ us word, that his Body remain'd so deform'd that no body could endure to look at it, and therefore they presently put it into a Coffin. Other Chineses who came afterwards, gave an account how F. Victorio had assisted and favour'd them in the Tumult at Manila, which made the said Father be well receiv'd, not by Kue Sing, whom he did not see even dead, but with his Kindred, with whom he treated about a Peace; which he concluded to the Satisfaction of all the Islands. Kue Sing's eldest Son, whom, as has been said, he had order'd to be put to death, succeeded him; he is ill-natur'd, and not so resolute or wise as his Father; therefore I question his making himself Master of any Provinces in China, as was reported this Year 1675. The Letters from Manila of 1674 inform me, that a Governor of four Provinces in China has revolted, and has many Followers; the Letters of 1673 from China make no mention of it, which makes me doubt it; nor do I know of any Governor of four Provinces there is, unless it be Vu San Kuei; and if he has revolted, the Tartar is in danger. (We find since that all this either was not at all, or came to nothing.)

13. F. Victorio found many Christians in the Island Hermosa; and perceiving they were not tainted with the Heresy of the Hollanders, he inquir'd how it came about; and they told him, That when the Dutch took our Fort (for which D. Sebastian de Corcuera was to blame) some of them, in the presence of the Indians, went into our Church, where one drawing his Sword, hack'd the Crucifix that stood upon the High Altar; and then in the sight of all the Christians, the Heretic turn'd about, and fell down dead. This strange Accident convinced the Christians that those were wicked People, and therefore they would never give ear to what they said. A wonderful Prodigy our Lord was pleas'd to show, to retain those poor Converts in the Purity of the Faith.

14. Kue Sing wanted all the Qualities and Perfections a ruling Prince ought to be adorn'd with, therefore it is no wonder God should punish him with so wretched an End. 1. High Place, Dignity, and Power, is to be dreaded, and not coveted, as S. Thomas proves, Lib. 1. cap. 1. de Erudit. Princ. Kue Sing did not only cover, but tyrannically usurp'd that Greatness he had. 2. For a Man to secure and establish himself in the Government, he stands in need of true Wisdom, as the Saint teaches, chap. 2. and of Goodness of Life, attended by solid and not vain Nobility, as he teaches in the following Chapters; all which that Man was void of. How then could he avoid the Precipice? And if Humility preserves Crowns, and Pride destroys them, as was mention'd in the Second Book, and S. Thomas writes cap. 6. Who was more proud and haughty than Kue Sing? A Prince ought to be merciful and mild, not vain, covetous, or addicted to worldly Pleasures, as the Saint proves at large and incomparably well throughout all that Book. Kue Sing having been of a quite contrary disposition, he in vain usurp'd all those Titles he made use of.

15. And if we consider the superior Qualifications that ought to adorn the Regal Power, such as the Theological Virtues, fear of God, and others the holy Doctor mentions Lib. 2. we shall find that haughty Chinese neither had, nor so much as knew any of them. And tho it be true that the Emperors of that Nation were defective as to these as well as he, yet many of them, as has been shown, did the Duty of their Office through the means of the natural Virtues they possess, and which Kue Sing wanted.

16. Let us see whether he had those S. Cyprian sets down in Lib. de Duodec. Abusio. Saculi. S. Thomas mentions them Lib. 2. cap. 13. de Erudit. Princ. above quoted. 1. That the King must oppress or hurt no Man wrongfully. 2. That he must give equal Judgment, without being sway'd by Love or Hate. 3. That he must be a Defender of Orphans, Widows, and Strangers. 4. That he must suppress Robberies, and punish Adultery. 5. Not bestow high Places on wicked Men, not encourage Players, and banish impious Persons. 6. Not pardon Murderers; defend the Church, and maintain the Poor. 7. Make good and just Men Governours, and take antient, wise, and frugal Men for his Counsellors. 8. Let his Anger and Passion go over, defend his Dominions manfully, not be puff'd up with Prosperity, and bear all Adversities with resolution. 9. Have great confidence in God, and be observant in the Catholick Religion. 10. Breed up his Children holily, and have certain hours for Prayer, and not eat but at regular Hours. These things make a Kingdom happy for the present, and carry a King to Heaven. Then S. Thomas quotes what S. Augustin and S. Gregory writ upon the same Subject, whereof something has been said in the Second and Third Books. And tho it be true that Kue Sing can plead Ignorance, as to what relates to God and his Holy Religion, yet he cannot in the other Particulars, for as much as all that has been here mention'd out of these Saints, may be found in their Books, as may appear by what has been writ in other places. In short, he neither observ'd the natural Rules a Prince ought to follow, nor the supernatural. It were well for us that they who have been born under greater Ties than that Chinefe, who rais'd himself so high from so mean a Fortune, would practise and observe them. If to what is written already we should add the rest S. Thomas mentions in his Opusc. which they ought always to carry with them whom God has entrusted with Government, it would be enough not only to make a King good and virtuous, but even holy, and a great Saint if he observed it. In Lib. 6. cap. 7. the Saint has admirable words, and something concerning those whom Kings ought to have about them. Those that are very near, says he, must be very holy; the next very wise; the first must answer to the Seraphims, who are most familiar with God; the next to the Cherubims.

C H A P. XXXI.

1. AFTER putting an end to my Travels, I have remembred some Passages that will suffice to make up another Chapter; and I doubt not but if I would give my self time to reflect upon what I have seen, I might find matter to dilate further upon.

2. In the first and last Books I spoke something of the Civility, Modesty, and good Behaviour of the Chinefe Soldiery; and considering the Experience I had of it, I might well have enlarg'd upon the Subject. Methinks the Chinefes observe what the Emperor Aurelianus writ to one of his Lieutenants, Vopiscus in Aurel. sets it down; Friend, says he, if you would be a good Commander, and desire to live, keep your Soldiers within bounds: I will not have the Country-man complain, that a Chicken or a Bunch of Grapes is forcibly taken from him; I will call them to account for a Grain of Salt, or drop of Oil, they have unjustly made use of. I will have my Soldiers grow rich with the Spoils of their Enemies, not with the Tears and Sweat of my Subjects. I will have them wear their Riches on their Backs, not lavish them in Taverns; I will have them chaff in their Quarters, and no Complaints come against them. S. Lewis King of France could not have given better Instructions to those that serv'd in his Armies. No body will have cause to admire what Marcus Scaurus writes, that he saw numbers of Soldiers lying under a great Tree loaded with Fruit, and none of them stretch'd out his hand to gather an Apple. Nor will that be thought strange which Lampridius writes of Alexander Severus, that the Soldiers, <sup>Soldier.</sup> march'd to the Persian War as if they had been Senators, and that the Country people lov'd them as if they had been their Brothers, and honour'd the Emperor as a God. All this I saw in effect practis'd in China; when five, or six, or more Companies came into a Town, it is no otherwise than if half a dozen honest known Guests were coming; no Man is disturb'd, no body is in a Consternation, or hides, as we see they do in other parts where they are under greater Ties. Many Men seem to perswade themselves, that the Day they are list'd and appear in Arms, they are to lay aside all Christianity;

nity, this we daily see there is no denying of it.

3. That brave and renowned General Belisarius behav'd himself much better, as Procopius de Bello Vand. writes: He order'd two Soldiers to be impal'd for some Crimes; and being inform'd that the rest mutter'd, he said to them, Know that I am come to fight with the Arms of Religion and Justice, without which no Victory or Happiness is to be expected. I will have my Souldiers keep their hands clean to kill the Enemy. I will never suffer that Man in my Army whose fingers are stain'd with Blood, tho he be a Mars in War. Force without Justice and Equity, is Cowardice not Valour. Read what Oleaster observes in Deut. 2. You shall buy Meat of them for Mony. All Catholicks who serve, especially Officers, ought to have these words engrav'd on their Arms. Punishment is very material, every Man trembles when he knows for certain there is no Pardon. The Chinese make good use of this Method. Complaint was made at Fo Ngan, that some Soldiers had stole a Hen; the Captain who liv'd near the Church, inquir'd into the Matter, and gave the Signal that he would sit to try it. I presently went up into a Garret, the Window whereof overlook'd all the Court-yard, and part of the Room where he sate in Judgment; I stood a while to observe what was done, tho somewhat back that I might not be seen: There was no hearing what they said, but the result of it was, that they stretch'd out a Soldier upon his Face in the Court-yard, and laying his Thighs bare, began to bastinado him with thick Cudgels, that I wonder they did not kill him: It made my Heart ake, and I observ'd that after one Blow was given, till the other fell, that Wretches flesh shook so that it was terrible to behold. I went down immediately, having no Heart to see that cruel Execution. Who will dare to offend, seeing such Punishments? But the other was more severe, when as I writ before, a Soldier was beheaded for paying a Half-penny short. S. Thomas writes much to this purpose in Opusc. de Erudit. Princip. And in his sixth Book he makes a special Chapter of the Mischiefs of War.

4. It is usual about the beginning of August to have a terrible storm of East-Winds on the Coast of China, which the Portugueses and others call Tufon, a corruption of the Chinese name Tung Fung, that is, Easterly Wind. The Seamen dread it, and almost endeavour to get into Harbour before it comes. It sometimes reaches as far as Manila, the Indians call it Bagio: I have felt it, and indeed it is terrible, and does much hurt among Buildings, Sugar-Canes, and other Product of the Earth. I have read that of late Years they have declin'd, but they know nothing of it in those parts; for I have discours'd Spaniards and Portugueses about these Tufons, and could never find there was any alteration in them. There is no necessity of multiplying Miracles, or attributing them to any body to no purpose.

5. The Kingdom of Cochinchina lies Cochin- lies betwixt Tunquin and Champa; the china.
Country is good, and abounds in Silk; they trade from thence to Manila, whether they carry Curiosities from Japan, those People having a Trade there. They have also sail'd thither from Manila; sometimes they have made good Returns, and other times through the private Fancies of some Men have lost all. The Souldiery of this Kingdom is the best in all those Parts, is well-disciplin'd, and most days the King keeps 40000 Men at Court to shoot at a Mark, and those that aim best are rewarded with pieces of Silk. I have several times heard Spaniards and Portugueses say, they are all excellent Marks-men; and that the words of Judges 20. 16. cannot be better applyed to any People in the World than to those of Cochinchina. This is the Reason they have always the better in their continual Wars with the King of Tunquin, tho this last exceeds the other in all respects, not only in number of Men, but in Wealth, and the multitude of Elephants he carrys to War. They have also many light Galleys, with which they do Wonders in the great River that runs up to the Court. There is no doubt but the Europeans heve furnish'd that and other powerful Kingdoms, having provided them Fire-Arms, Cannon and Gunners. There is at present in Cochinchina, a half-Black of Portuguese Breed, who in my time was made Knight of the Order of Christ; he is an able Officer, an excellent Founder, and very curious at making Chain-Bullets, and other warlike Instruments.

more to the South in the Latitude of Manila, and therefore the People are not so warlike as Authors write; and Experience teaches, they have but little Blood, and are afraid to lose it. That King is not so well guarded as others. Manila has always had a Trade with that Country, which has excellent Timber for Shipping. Some years since the People of Manila built one there which was famous, and the memory of the Ship of Camboxa lasts to this day. Another was built in my time, but perish'd unfortunately. It has often been argued at Manila, whether it be more advantageous to build Shipping in our Islands, or in Foreign Kingdoms, Camboxa, Siam, &c. I have heard Arguments on both sides, and read printed Memorials upon the Subject at Madrid: It is not easy to decide. Those that are for building abroad favour the Indians, tho some will not have it so; certain it is, they that do not groan under the Labour, do not like it; I do not delign to concern my self with these Affairs, but it can be no harm to repeat what others say. I often heard it said, by a Person of Judgment and well-meaning, that the best way was to buy Ships of the English or Portugueses of those Countries, who build good ones and so strong, that they sail them into Europe. I must confess I saw an English Frigate of 40 Guns at Malaca, and was a good while aboard it with some Portugueses; it might appear with credit any where, and the Captain did assure me it did not cost full 8000 Pieces of Eight. The Ship, which in the Year 1665 was forced from Macao to Manila, and so much commended by all Men at the Port of Cavite because of its goodness, was taken by the Governor D. John de Salcedo to sail to Acapulco, had been built at Goa, and cost not 7000 Pieces of Eight; I sail'd in it four months, which is enough to know whether it was good: And if every Ship were to cost Manila ten or twelve thousand Pieces of Eight, it were too cheap. I did not mention Camboxa to this purpose, tho I am not sorry it came into my mind; my design was to give an account, that sixty Leagues up the River beyond the Court, there are certain beautiful Buildings, with the most curious Workmanship imaginable; the Relation of their Excellency and Perfection which was brought to Goa, astonish'd all Men. I sent that which I had from D. Francis Enriquez de Lofada into Spain as a Rarity, there is no inserting of it in this place. The Work some say is Mosaick, others Roman: Some will have it to be the Work of Alexander the Great, who they say went so far, and order'd that it should be built as a Memorial of his being there. It consists of Courts and Cloisters, as they are now on at present, but no part is without fine Mouldings and Carvings, it is the King's Pleasure-House. When D. James de Lofada went over thither to build the Ship I said was cast away, the King was taking his Pleasure, and therefore the Spaniards went up thither and saw this Wonder. Above it is the large Kingdom of the Laos, a Country abounding in Musk, Civit, Frankincense, Benjamin and Storax, which Commodities they carry to Manila, and thence they are sent into New Spain. The Country swarms with People; on the West it borders upon Siam, on the North it draws near to the Kingdom of Tibet; North-west of it is Bengala, and then it stretches a little up to the Mogol's Dominions; lower is Narvinga, but at a considerable distance.

7. I have writ something concerning the Kingdom of Siam; it is certainly very great and powerful, and crossing it by Land you come to Tanassary, a famous Port of great Trade; they that take this way need not come within many Leagues of Malaca or Sincapura, the way is shorter and saves much Sea. They travel in Carts about twenty days Journey, and go in Caravans, but seldom lie in any Town. At night they enclose themselves with their Carts and Blankets, to keep off the many Elephants there are about the Fields. And tho that Defence would avail but little should any Elephant attack it, yet it serves to scare them so that they do not gather near it; thus Men and Beasts lie in safety. At Tenasarim there are always Vessels to go over to Coromandel, Bengala, and other Parts; this is a convenient way for those that have not much Baggage. The chief thing the Moors deal in from that part is Elephants, they are cheaper than those of Ceylon, but not so noble.

8. F. Letona, cap. 2. n. 26. speaking of the Gulph of Sincapura, in his Description of the Philippine Islands, says, it is the way to the Gulph of Goa, the Court of India: A very improper expression, for there is no such thing as a Gulph of Goa; Gulphs of Bengala and Ceylon there are. That City is seated almost in the midst of the Coast of Malabar, which stretches out North and South from Cape Comori to Suratte. North-west of Suratte is the Kingdom of Cambaya, Tributary to the Mogol, where there is abundance of Agate; abundance of it is wrought at Suratte, and very cheap, as I observ'd before. At Macassar I read in a Spanish Book call'd Prado Espiritual, written by F. Santoro, that the first Velvet ever was seen in in Europe, came from this Kingdom. In the time of the Roman Power that King sent a Present, and among other things some Pieces of Velvet up the Gulph of Persia, and thence by Land, which was easy enough, the way is well known.

9. As to Philip the Second of Spain's Letter, which I said was shewn to the Captain General of Macao, forbidding any from the Philippine Islands to pass that way into China; I say they cannot make use of it, for as much as Pope Urban the Eighth publish'd his Bull some Years since at Macao, forbidding any Person under heavy Censures to hinder Missioners from going into China and other Parts, what way soever they could find out. This Bull if Obligatory takes off all dependance on that Letter, if not we must have recourse to the Supreme Judg. I did so, and Clement the Tenth, who now governs the Church, confirm'd the said Bull in all its Parts; if this be not enough, we must bear our Neighbours Misfortunes with patience. And to take away all colour of Authority from that Letter, I will here insert what Philip the Fourth in his Councils of Portugal and India decreed, in January 1632.

1. That in regard the Right and Duty of preaching and dilating the Gospel is common to all the Faithful, and particularly recommended to religious Men; therefore the Missions of Japan and China are not to be confin'd to the Fathers of the Society alone, but that all Orders have liberty to go thither, and get in the best they can, particularly those who have been allow'd to go over to the West-Indies and have Monasteries there. 2. That they go not only by way of the East, but of the West-Indies, within whose Limits Japan and the Philippine Islands are, and which is the most convenient Passage for the Religious of Castile. There follow nine other Heads, which in effect Pope Urban mentions in his Bull of 1633. So that the prohibition of any others going to Japan but the Jesuits, and that by way of the East-Indies, is taken off by the Pope, the King and Council of Portugal. The same for China and other Kingdoms.

10. There are some things to be observ'd in the Description of Manila, and other Islands in that Sea, written by F. Letona, whom I knew and convers'd with at Manila. Tho this Father was curious in observing and enquiring, yet he never going farther than Manila, could not be an Eye-witness of what he says, nor be exact in all things.

Vol. I.

11. He made no mention of the Island Amboyna, which abounds in Cloves; nor of that of Bima which is near it, and considerable; and so of others towards Solor and Timor. The Dutch are strong at Amboyna, and have engross'd to themselves all the Trade of Cloves, it falls on the back of Macassar. Not long before my coming to Macassar, the Sumbane and Prince Carroro had been with 40000 Men to ruin the Dutch at Amboyna. The Secretary Francis Mendez Knight of the Order of Christ, a good Christian, and akin to the Sumbane, assur'd me, he had made so great a progress, that the Dutch had abandon'd their Works, and betaken themselves to their Vessels to go off: But that the Mahometans at the last Attack falling to drinking, the Dutch took heart, return'd to their Works, and being encourag'd by the Enemies Folly, got the better of them, they returning with shame to Macassar when they had been at an incredible Charge. The Secretary much lamented the Defeat of that Expedition, which had been very advantageous to the Mahometan, and perhaps had prevented his falling into the hands of the Dutch, as he did in the Year 1670.

12. F. Letona, n. 5. writes, that within the Archbishoprick of Manila, there were certain Heathen Blacks, Natives of the Island, unconquer'd, call'd Zambales, and very barbarous. I said something of them before, they are most expert Archers; but they deceiv'd him who said they were the same as the Zambales, for these Zambales are mortal Enemies to the Blacks, and much dreaded of them. There are very good Christians among them; their Towns are on the Skirts of the Mountains, to hinder the Blacks from coming at the Towns of the Indians. For these and other Reasons, the Zambales are exempt from Contributions and personal Duty; they pay their Taxes in Silver, not in specie. The Blacks have friz'd Hair like the Cafres, the Zambales have not. The Blacks are not conquer'd, nor is it possible to subdue them, tho 100000 Men were gather'd to that purpose. 1. Because the Mountains are inaccessible, and so thick wooded, that unless the Shelter be destroy'd, neither Spaniards nor Indians can advance a step, and the Blacks run in and out at every hole like Hares. 2. Because they standing behind the Trees with their Arrows, shoot as many as they please without being seen; by reason their Colour cannot be distinguish'd from that of the Tree.

If

~~~~~ If the Indians and Zambales go into the Nava- Mountains, they have generally the worst ret. of it, and therefore they endeavour to catch the Blacks in open Fields, but it is no easie matter. I knew them sometimes at Peace, and sometimes at War with the Indians; when they were at Peace, whole Troops of them would come down to the Towns, we gave them Tobacco, Rags and Wine, which pleas'd them very much, and some of them help'd the principal Indians in their Tillage. We admir'd to see them so fat, tall and strong, whereas they eat nothing but wild Mountain Roots, some Fruit and raw Flesh, without any Clothing but their Skin, or any other Bed but the Ground.

13. Every one of them has certainly his Bow and Arrows, the Bow is as long as he that uses it, they make them of a Palm-tree as hard as Iron; the String is made of the Barks of Trees, so strong that nothing can out-do them. Besides the Bow they use another little Iron Weapon, broader than ones hand, a quarter of a Yard long, the handle very fine; they said they made it of burnt Oysters and Snails; it look'd like delicate Marble. This Weapon serves them near at hand, with it they cut off a Man's Head at the mouth very cleverly. All the People along those Mountains, as far as New Segovia, value a Scull mightily to drink out of, so that he who has most Sculls is the bravest and noblest among them; and they go out to cut off Heads only for this honour, without any other prospect. In some places they make use of the Teeth of those Heads they cut off, stringing and making Garlands of them to wear on their Heads; he that has most is best look'd upon. There are a great many People on the Mountains of Orion, upon the Bay of Manila, but they are peaceable; all the time I was there, they never did the least hurt. I saw some Companies, and particularly an Old Man, whom I made much of rather out of fear than love; I laid my Hand on his Back, and it felt like an Afs, it was so rough and hairy.

14. N. 12. F. Letona makes the Mouth of the Bay at the Island call'd Marivuez, four Leagues wide, it has two Mouths, but neither of them a League over. The little Mouth is widest, because the Land lying low the Water spreads, but it has not much depth. The great one is very deep, but not above half a League over. All Men complain that a Fort has not been built on that Island, to secure the two Channels against the attempts of Enemies; if Cannon were planted there, no Ship could escape through without being hit. Those Channels lie open to any Invader to possess himself of Pampanga, and other Provinces, without the least let from Cabite, or Manila; and thence they may cross the Lake, ravage the whole Island, and seize all Provisions. I ask'd a Major, why a thing of that consequence was not minded? He made me the usual answer, that it was because they took no care of the Publick Good.

15. Among some reflections made upon a Memorial presented at Madrid some years since, I saw a Note made by some one who had been in the Islands; and having nothing to answer or object to one point, he says, Religious Men think they do nothing, unless they intrude themselves to govern all. This is an excellent method to discredit all they write or propose; and yet who could be more plain and unbiass'd than they in proposing to his Majesty what is for the good of his Subjects? A great Plague has fallen upon the Indians, which is, that no notice is taken of what their Spiritual Fathers advise for their good; and no sooner is any thing writ against Religious Men, but it is presently credited, or at least care is taken to enquire whether it be true or not. It hapned in my time at Manila, that a Governour was accus'd, and heinous things laid to his charge; however it was resolv'd he should govern out his time, and be accountable when he gave an account of his Office. Complaint was made, I know not for what, of a grave Religious Man of a certain Order, and immediately they sent and seiz'd all he had, took him out of the Monastery, and carry'd him fifty Leagues off; I do not argue whether the Crime objected was great or not; but supposing it to be such, had that Frier no Superiors? The Secular Power presently took it in hand, without granting him a hearing, or finding any Politick Excuse to delay the matter, as they did about the Governour, because this they look upon as doing the King good service. So they put a good Clergyman, for whom D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara had a great respect, into Irons, and banish'd him the Islands, in the sight of many Infidels. What Opinions can those Heathens have of a Priest so banish'd by the Laity? I will say no more of it here, because I will not pretend to govern; but I could justly complain of one, who writ scandalously against F. Vittorio Riccio, to whom those Islands are more beholden than to all that that are or have been there.

16. F. Letona, N. 14. makes a distinction betwixt the going out to Sea at Marivelez for New Spain, and that for Terranate, N. 17. but I can see no reason for it; the season is different, but nothing else. For that reason the Ships that go to New Spain, stand out to see towards the Island Luban, in order to sail away thence with the Trade-wind to the Anchoring-place. This could not be done in going to Terranate, because the Winds at that time come off the Land, and therefore they coasted hard upon a Bowling along the shore of Balagan, that they might not fall away to Leeward. Nor is Luban seventeen Leagues from Marivelez, as he says; in my opinion it is not above twelve, for I sail'd it in December between Sun-rising and Three in the Afternoon.

17. He mentions other things which happen'd some time after the said Father was gone from Manila. He is much in the right as to what he says concerning D. Sabiniano Manrique de Lara, and more might have been added. I am of opinion that Noble Gentleman's great respect to the Church and his Ministers was the cause why God bless'd him there, and sent him home safe to his Country. He gave an excellent example in these and many other Particulars.

18. It is to be observ'd, as I have been inform'd from credible Persons, that ever since D. Sabiniano landed at Cavite, no other Ship from New Spain till this time ever could come to an Anchor in that place, which is a great damage to the Indians. Who can assign a reason for it? yet certain it is that with regard to God nothing happens by chance, but he permits second Causes to work his designs without interrupting their order. When D. John de Leon went Governour, his Ship was left much batter'd near Palapa, because he undertook to Pilot it, who ought not to have done it, and perhaps out of covetousness. The whole Cargo was carry'd to Manila upon the Backs of Indians. I am assur'd by those who were aboard, that above 1000 Indians dy'd through the hard labour; and had his Majesty's return, which was but 40000 Ducats, been more, more had dy'd. Let those observe this, who believe the Remittances to Manila are very considerable. Before him D. John de Salcedo arriv'd at New Segovia, and the same Person told me that above 2000 Indians dy'd carrying the Goods. Can any thing be more deplorable? Formerly Ships seldom fail'd arriving safe at Cavite, so that all was sav'd without oppressing the Natives, unless the apprehension of meeting Enemies hapned to cause any alteration. D. James Fajardo was put into New Segovia. Nava-

19. God may remedy this if we use our endeavours. All Men agree that if the Ships sail from Acapulco any time in February or beginning of March, they will come in good time to put into Cavite. The reason is plain, because the South-west Winds, which are contrary, do not fix till after Midsummer; and tho they should start up sooner, they are not lasting, and may be endur'd at Sea either lying by, or tacking as many do, and I saw it practis'd at the Cape of Good Hope, where are the greatest Storms in the World. There we were 28 days struggling against the Wind and Waves, sometimes lying up our Head to the Wind, and sometimes traversing from North to South. But in order that they may set out of Acapulco at that time, the Ships must sail from Manila at Midsummer, or sooner; so they sail with fair Weather to S. Bernardine, where they take in Wood, Water and Refreshment; and as soon as the South-west starts up, they set out upon their Voyage. Pilots vary in their Opinions as to the Latitude they are to keep to; doubtless every Man follows his own, for they are Men that will not submit to another, as in time of Peace they may safely do, as has been said. A good course of life is very conducing to a good Voyage. I have sail'd with several People of Europe, and to say the truth, they are much beyond us. Winds.

20. I have receiv'd information concerning the Supplies sent to Manila from well-meaning and conscientious Persons; they have found in me an openness of heart and impartiality fit to make it known, it may be want of Interest or Prudence in them to conceal it. The Supply that goes from Mexico for the Philippine Islands, is sometimes considerable, but is much clipt before it comes thither. The King's Officers belonging to Manila, not those of Mexico, must give the true estimate of those Supplies. What follows seems incredible. At Acapulco they make a sort of Hut or Arbour of Boughs between the Sea and the Governour's door, for the People and Commodities that are to be ship'd. I saw it when there, it consists of a dozen Poles stuck in the Ground, others across them at top, and over all Boughs, Hay, and Leaves of Palm-tree for a covering. Now for this work some years they have placed to his Majesty's

rette.

Majesty's account 8000 pieces of eight expence, and this defray'd out of the Supply sent to the Philippine Islands. Can this be parallel'd in the World? There is a Boat they call Chata, which serves to carry Goods and People aboard; when this is mended, they reckon 800 or 1000 Pieces of Eight for a few Nails, Tar, Hemp, and such things; and so in other things, which an honest Minister of State that fears God and is zealous for his King's good may easily compute. Besides, they send the value of many Ducats in Commodities, some of which at Manila are superfluous, and others of no Value.

21. An accident very remarkable hapned at Manila some Years since, which I have not seen in writing, and think convenient to insert in this place. There was such abundance of Pilchards in the Bay, and so many taken, that it was wonderful; all the Poor and common sort liv'd upon them, and sometimes the great ones eat them as a Dainty; but being extraordinary cheap, they were a great relief to many People. The time came when they banish'd the Bishop, and from that moment they went off and totally vanish'd. This was much taken notice of, and is so to this Day. Another strange passage fell out, which is still fresh in the memory of all Men, which was, that when the good Archbishop was without the Gate of the store Houses where they ship'd him, he shook the dust off his Shoes, and cast some Stones at the City, one of which reach'd D. Peter de Corcuera the Governour's Nephew, and hit him on the Shin; and tho the stroke and hurt was most inconsiderable, it fester'd and he dy'd of it. The Judge Zapata dy'd suddenly. Tenorio was beheaded. The Archdeacon of the Cathedral dy'd in a small time; these were all Enemies to the Archbishop. But the strangest of all in my poor opinion was, that a Souldier being commanded to lay hold of the Archbishop, who then had the Ciborium with the blessed Sacrament in his Hands, or at least lean'd upon the Altar where it was, thinking it an execrable action, excus'd himself and said, I will rather die than do it, and laying his Hand to his Sword, drew it out and fell upon it. God was pleas'd to save his Life, as a reward of the Holy zeal he express'd.

22. Much has been said, and many Arguments have been made about the Royal Chappel D. Sebastian de Corcuera built at Manila; I would willingly dilate upon it, and write the Opinion of the People of those Islands, but will confine my self for some reasons I have. Certain it is we must not always condemn the demolishing, or commend the erecting of Churches; for, as we see in the time of D. James Faxardo, some noted Churches were demolish'd that the Dutch might not fortify themselves in them, and annoy the Islands. Under D. Sabiniano de Lara others were thrown down, to prevent the Chineses doing the like, and that the Cannon might play freely. This demolishing cannot be condemn'd, no more than the same done in other Places by order of pious Princes. So in case of erecting of Churches, something may occur or intervene that may make it an ill action either in a Moral or Civil sense; because a thing is good when so in all respects, and bad through any one defect. King Philip and his Council were not offended at the building the House of the poor Clares at Macao, because it was a Nunnery or a Church, for both those things are good; but because the place was not convenient for it, being in a Country of Infidels. When a Church is founded or erected, as David did, 1 Chron. 22. Behold I in my Poverty am preparing the expence of the House of the Lord, this was very praiseworthy. But any Man is much to be blam'd who would raise such Structures out of what belongs to others, and is ill gotten; nor would it please God if one should erect Churches out of that which he ought to apply to the maintenance of the Poor. S. Chrysostom, Hom. 45. in Matth. says thus: For behold those that adorn Churches seem to do a good work, if the Poor enjoy part of their Goods, who build for the Glory of God. Would you build the House of God? give a living to the faithful Poor, and you will build the House of God. There are two Churches, one of living Stones, which are the Poor, another of dead hewn Stones; it is not lawful, nor convenient to forsake the former for the latter. Read what S. Thomas in Cat. Aur. Matth. 23. out of S. Chrysostom, writes concerning the Structures of the Pharisees, which is excellent to this purpose.

23. In the 2d place that Chappel is no way necessary at Manila, 1. Because it would imply a neglect in so many good Governours as preceded him. 2. Because they have a Cathedral just by, and other Churches where they may hear a few Sermons in Lent.

24. Besides, that Gentleman spent not a Cross of his own in building that Chappel, but did it out of the Souldiers pay, and that is what maintains it to this day. No Man is said to be generous who spends out of anothers Purse. Moreover there are above 8000 pieces of eight yearly spent in that Chappel to defray 12 Chaplains, Musicians, Sacristans, Wax and Wine for the Masses; and there are Frauds enough practis'd about the Wax; and at present there are Souldiers at Manila, who go barefoot, and without Swords, and several reform'd Captains and Ensigns who starve. Where then is the good of that Chappel?

25. But allowing there must be a Chappel, why must there be 12 Chaplains, and the Dean have 1000 peices of eight allow'd him, and the Souldiers go naked and starving? Allow four Chaplains, let their Stipends be lessened, and those 8000 pieces of eight be divided among them and the Souldiers, or poor Officers. There is no private Interest I know of in this, but only proposing what is for the publick good.

26. But allowing the erecting of it good in all respects, for so we must judg of the intention, yet the condition of those Islands at present is nothing like what it was then; then they were rich now poor, then there were rich Men who reliev'd many, at present no Man has enough for himself; the Trade was then great, and has ever since decay'd; no wonder then if there be reason to alter those things, tho they were then convenient.

27. The case is fairly stated, if they please there should still be a Chappel and Chappels, be it so in the Name of God; yet the erecting of that cannot be justifi'd upon the opinion of one Man, against the general consent of all the Islands. Another thing very prejudicial to the Kings Revenue is practis'd in those Islands, which is that the Governors who receive the Taxes, sink a great part for their own use. Thus it is, a Governour, for example, receives some thousands in Tributes, he makes up his Accounts to his own mind, and says, So much for my Salary due from his Majesty, so much expended, so much for Fees, so much is due to me; he deducts according to his own reckoning, and if he receiv'd a thousand, sets down 600, which he delivers after paying himself. The ill consequences of this Practice are visible. A considerable Man us'd to say it were better the King should pay these Men their whole allowance, because they being judges of their own Services and Merits, pay themselves much more than they deserve.

28. A particular thing hapned not long since near the Town call'd Lilco, which is upon the Lake of Bai; they sow much Corn in those Parts at present (many thousands of Ducats had been sav'd if it had been sow'd sooner) an Indian had sow'd a considerable spot of Corn. The Government sent to view what every Man hath sow'd, and accordingly to allot what he was to pay Contribution. They judg'd by eye there might be 50 Bushels upon that spot, so they enter'd it, and directed the Indian to carry the said quantity to Manila. The Indian urg'd there could not be so much Corn upon the Ground, demanded an abatement, but was not allow'd it. He reap'd, and the Corn falling short, bought some Bushels at above 6 Pieces of Eight the Bushel, to make up 50, which he deliver'd, and had not a grain left, and only his Labour for his Pains. This is truth, and I see nothing unlikely in it; no more than in believing that 1000 Indians thereabouts run away to the Mountains, perhaps because they saw such practices; God grant no worse follows. Some Indians fly unto the Mountains, others die under their Burdens, others depart Manila, as I observ'd before; and I am inform'd of late, there are above 300 at Yacatra; how should there be any left? And it were no small comfort, had they any hopes of relief.

29. I have heard notable Circumstances from creditable Persons concerning the Imprisonment of D. John de Salzedo; I will not argue its Legality, for it does not belong to me, but it is reported that a Governour of those Islands us'd to say, In Spain a Man does not know what he is going about, and as soon as he comes to the Islands, he finds he is King and Pope. To speak as it really is he should have said, He is much greater than King or Pope. This is really so, and the ill consequence among many others is, that unless the fear of God checks them from giving way to all their Passions, there is no curbing them, nor do the Laity or Clergy dare open their Mouths, or if they do it costs them dear; and what some Men act in the Devils name, they take as Service done the King, and under that Cloke execute all their wicked designs. We have too many examples of it in those Islands, Peru, New Spain, and other parts. A Loyal Subject of the King's

rette.

Nava-rette. King's was wont to say, Father, a Man's Wickedness may be of that nature, so evident and so prejudicial to the Publick, that it may be a good Service done to God and the King, to put a stop to it the best that may be, without waiting for Orders from above, for that may require four Years, and three is too long, for the Illands may be ruin'd in less time. It is only requisite in such cases that the Fact be well examin'd, and then many would be rewarded for having had a hand in it, and not punish'd. A few Years since they carry'd a Viceroy in custody out of India into Portugal, whose Crimes were not so great as those committed such a Year at Manila. The Business was examin'd, the People accounted good Subjects, and the Viceroy condemn'd. I shrug'd my Shoulders because I had not seen what was done, and all Men ought to be heard before we pass Judgment upon them. This may serve to give the Reader some Light into the Affairs of those Parts, which are nothing like to what we see among us. After I had writ this, I read the Copy of the Archbishop of Manila, D. Michael de Poblete, his Letter to his Majesty's Confessor, wherein are many heinous things concerning that Gentleman.

C H A P. XXXII.

A Short Supplement to what has been handled in these Books.

1. AFTER I had finish'd this Work, I accidentally met with the R. F. Francis Colin's History of the Progress, Conversions, and Labours of those of the Holy Society of Jesus in the Philippine Islands; and being, when I liv'd there, particularly acquainted with this Great Man, and his extraordinary Parts, which I do not extol for fear my Pen should fall short, as Tacitus said of his Agricola; It were a wrong to his other Virtues to mention so great a Man's Integrity and Abstinence; I could not forbear, tho hastily looking over what he had publish'd; and finding his Authority makes good much of what I say, I cannot forbear making my Advantage of it to confirm what I have writ. In other Particulars he gives some hints at things, to which I must speak my mind, tho I incur some censure for it, to avoid greater Inconveniences; which is the same Chrysippus, mention'd by Stobæus, urg'd, Serm. 43. For if a Man governs ill, he will displease the Gods; if well, Men. But since the Reader is to be guided by Reason, and not by Passion or Affection, there is no danger of being shipwrack'd in a calm Sea.

2. Lib. 1. p. 2. he endeavours to prove out of Ptolomy, that the Philippine Islands are the Maniola, because of the likeness of that Name and Manila; but the ground is so weak, that there is no shadow of Truth in it. If Manila had ever been the name of that, or any other Island in those Seas, the Opinion were more tolerable; but it being plain that the Name is deriv'd from the situation of the City, because it is for the most part on a Morafs, which the Tagates call Mainila, as I observ'd in the First Book, Chap. 1. it follows that nothing to this purpose can be made out by that Name. So that as Cavit is the name of the Port of Cavite, because of its shape like a Hook; and Malat, the name of what we call Malate, which signifies a Land of Salt-Peter; so Mainila is only the name of the Place the City Manila stands upon, which the Author ought to have known, as having been Pastor of those People call'd Tagates, which he mentions in his History, where he sets down the Pater-Noster and Ave-Maria in that Language.

3. Nor does he make out his Assertion when he says, That in the Islands they build all their Vessels with wooden Pins because of the Loadstone; and that when out of the Water they set them upon Stocks: First, because he himself owns that is done for want of Iron, and they are set upon the Stocks to keep them from the great damp of the Country, as also because of the Worms. In the next place, because it is not the custom of those Islands alone to make use of Pins, but of all parts within those Seas. The People of Borneo, Mindanas, Macassar, and others use it: And I saw large Vessels at Macassar built in that nature, so neat and strong that I could not but admire them; so that if the Philippine Islands had been the Maniola because of their using wooden Pins, those we have mention'd, and many more, would be so too. Nor did I ever hear that was done, because the Loadstone staid the Vessels that had Iron Pins; for tho there there be much of it in some parts, yet it is not all about those Seas, where they sail from one Island to another, sometimes crossing over 20 or 30 Leagues, sometimes coasting 50 or 60. And if any quantity of that Stone be found in any River, it is well known that the Indians generally go upon Rivers in Vessels all of one piece, some whereof are so big they can carry twenty or thirty Men, and these need neither wooden nor iron Pins.

4. Cap. 2. p. 6. he says, They travel over the Desarts and Sands of Lybia and Tartary in Carts, with Rigging like Ships. In my First Book I mention'd that some had writ this was us'd in China, which is not so; in great Plains such a thing perhaps might be practicable, where the Ground is hard and dry, but it seems difficult in Sands where the Wheels must sink every moment: Nor can I conceive how those Carts are to be guided, for no Rudder will alter its motion in the Sand. But since I never was in Lybia or Tartary, I will leave the matter to be try'd by its own probability; but there is no fixing any such thing upon China.

5. Chap. 4. p. 16. he treats of the first Planters and Peoplers of those Islands, and says, It was Tharfis the Son of Javan, and Ophir, and Hevilath of India, whereof Gen. 10. makes mention. He assigns that Country very antient Inhabitants: I make no doubt but those Islands might be peopled with great ease, because some of them are very near the Continent. It is well known the Strait of Sinapura, which divides the Continent from Sumatra, is not a Musket-shot over. When I pass'd that way I observ'd it, and judg'd those Islands were all formerly contiguous as far as Bantam, Java, and Sumatra, as is reported of Sicily, and others, and that the Sea wore out those Passages betwixt them. So of consequence when the Land of Malaca and Java was peopled, these Islands follow'd; and from thence it is easy to go over to Ambayna, Bima, Solor, Timor, and other Southern Parts; and then Northward to Borneo, then to Zamboanga, Oton, and others as far as Manila. It is no easy matter to decide who were the first Planters.

6. Pag. 19. he says, The Chineses in former times went over and conquer'd the Philippine Islands, and were Masters of all those Seas. According to Barros they were the first that peopled Java (it is more likely they were so of Manila) to confirm his Opinion he urges, that at

Vol. I.

Ilocos and Cagaian, there were found the Graves of Men larger than the Indians, with Chinese and Japonesse Arms and Accoutrements, who for the sake of the Gold conquer'd and peopled these Countrys.

7. I writ my Opinion as to this Particular in the First Book, and can find no reason to alter my Opinion; and when any can be shown, no Man is oblig'd in Honour to be obstinate. Seneca, lib. 4. de Benef. cap. 8. says thus, It is not lightness to quit a known and condemn'd Error, it is no shame to alter ones Opinion. It is very unlikely they were the first that peopled Java; for Java, Bantam, Sumatra, &c. lying so near to Malaca and Jor which is the Continent, what occasion was there for the Chineses undertaking so dangerous a Voyage, and so very long to them? And if it were as the Author will have it, how comes it to pass they left not the least footsteps of their Language in those parts? There is no doubt they sail'd to Manila, and that some of them might die at Ilocos and Cagaian, and consequently some of their Graves and Accoutrements might be found, but that does not make out the other. When I sail'd to Macassar, and we were drove from our Course near a great Island not far distant from Borneo, we found in a small Isle 40 great Skulls of Men and Women, and much broken China Ware, besides other small things; must we therefore conclude the Chineses went thither? It is absolutely impossible, they would have been lost forty times before they reach'd it. We must give it for granted, that the Chineses neither take the Meridian Altitude, nor know the Latitude, nor have the Instruments to this purpose; how then should they sail where the best Spanish and Portuguese Pilots are daily lost? At present they go to Manila as a great Voyage, and because they have learn'd much experience. In going to Siam and Cambodia they only coast along the Shore. In short, they hit right by chance, for they have no skill.

8. Chap. 13. p. 37. he speaks of the People call'd Tagales, whom he makes so Tagale courteous and well-bred, that they never use the word Thou to one another, but always speak in the third Person; How does my Lord? Whence comes my Master? &c. I was Minister of the Tagales, whose Language, tho I have been from thence eighteen Years, I have not forgot. I exercis'd the Mission among them, heard thousands of Confessions, and preach'd some hundreds of times. I do not say but

but several of them, and particularly the Nava-belle. the best sort, use that manner of speaking the Author mentions; yet I cannot grant it to be universal, they use a thousand Thou's, and be Thou's to the Fathers that assist them. They have learn'd some breeding of the Spaniards they converse with, and therefore those about Manila are more civil than the rest. Discourting upon this Point upon a time with some Africans, one of the chief of them then present said, If the Spaniards had not come to our Country we had been all mere Brutes, the Light of the Gospel, Religion and Conversation has made us Men. He spoke the Truth, and show'd himself a Man of Sense and Reason; by which it appears the Tagals are not of themselves so courteous and well-bred as some will make them.

9. Chap. 15 and 16. He sets down the multitude of Idols those People had, that they ador'd the Sun; Moon, Rainbow, Beasts, Trees, Stones, Crocodils; had Idols of the Sea, Mountains, plow'd Lands; ador'd their Ancestors, those that were kill'd by Lightning, and others. I look upon all this to be very likely, and that they were infected with these Errors from the Continent of Malaca: But there is no doubt they own'd the Immortality of the rational Soul, which they had been ignorant of, if their first Progenitors had been Chineses. Nor had these carry'd them such a multitude of Idols, since they, in the beginning, and before the Sect of Foe came thither out of India, did not use so many Images, tho they ever ador'd the Sun, Moon, Stars, and Heaven.

Chap. 17. pag. 79. he speaks of the Nests I call of Swallows. The Author calls that Bird Salangan; it is less than our Swallows, in all other respects they do not differ, and therefore at Manila they generally call them Swallows-Nests. He is in the right in saying, that when boil'd they look like large Macaroni. He tells us they are sold for their weight in Gold in China, but is much deceiv'd in this particular, and no less in saying that the Portugueses of Macao using them in their Entertainments, are ignorant of their Value; they know it very well, and therefore sell them to the Chineses, tho some now and then eat them as a Dainty.

He talks in this place of the Bird called Herrero (Woodpecker) which with its Beak bores Trees to build its Nest in them, and makes it as big as a Hens Nest. I saw that Bird at Acapulco, it is as big as an ordinary Chicken; every day toward night-fall it furiously peck'd a Palm Tree, which was within the Inclosure of the House where I liv'd; I observ'd it carefully, intending to stop up the entrance of the Nest with a Plate of Iron, to try whether it could break it with the Herb they say it knows which has this virtue, and endeavour to discover that Herb; I was there alone, and omitted doing it for want of a Ladder, and help, which I was afterwards sorry for.

Pag. 78. he writes, that the great Bats Bats. of which I have seen and heard great numbers, are good Meat, and their Dung good for Salt-peter. Captain D. John de Montemayor, a good Souldier and better Christian, presented Memorials in my time to D. Sabiniano, for leave to go to the Island Siao near Terranate, where there are deep Dens these Birds shelter in, to gather a great quantity of their Dung, for the Intent above-mention'd: The Project was good, but the Captain very poor, and could not be at the Charge, so it came to nothing.

10. Pag. 79. He assigns Peacocks to the Island Calamianes. I have already said, there are abundance in several parts thereof. I have seen them at Nar-singa, Golconda, Siam, Malaca, and even in Madagafcar; and before observ'd, that it is the Custom in several Kingdoms to make Plumes of them, which the English Fans. and Dutch have made their advantage of, sticking the Quills in Silver, or other Matter plated or wash'd, and the Servants hold them to drive away the Flies when they are at Dinner, or in Company; they are very lightly. Others make them like large round Fans, after the manner of those carry'd at Rome, when his Holiness goes abroad in Pontificalibus; and I think in Latin either of them is call'd Flabellum, which was a Fan made of Peacock's Wings, and a very fine Web, with which the Deacon drove the Flies from the Altar, during the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass. The Greeks use this Ceremony; which is very mysterious, as may be seen in our Ximenez his Ecclesiastical Lexicon, Verb. Flabellum. In some parts of New Spain it is usual for the Acolite to fan the Gnats away, whilst Mass is saying, which is very necessary; for there were no saying Mass without it, the Gnats are so numerous and cruel troublesome, as I observ'd above.

11. Pag. 8. §. 2. He treats of the Fish Muller, and of the Virtue there is in its Teeth and Bones to stop Bleeding. I have writ something of it, and a strange accident

dent that befel an Indian with this Fish. I heard much at Manila of the strange Virtue there is in those Bones to stop Bleeding, but the Rump-bone is that they say is most valu'd.

What he writes Pag. 83. concerning the Crocodile, that it voids no Excrement, nor has any passage for it, I had not heard before, nor did it come into my mind to be satisfy'd in it, but I look upon it to be true as the Author says. I writ before, that Skulls, Bones and Pebbles were found in its Belly, and was told it swallows the Pebbles to ballast it self; I saw, and the Author affirms it has four Eyes. I allow as the general Opinion that it has no Tongue; and I have read that the Egyptians us'd the Figure of a Crocodile, to represent after their manner the ineffable Greatness of God, which was to denote, that as that Creature had no Tongue, so no Tongue was sufficient to express that Supreme and Infinite Greatness; it might be consider'd and reflected on, but no Tongue in the Universe could give an account of it.

I writ before that the Female Crocodile devours all her young she can; the difference betwixt us is, that the Author says, she swallows them as they come into the water; I said it was down the current, as I was told several times, and it may be reconcil'd by allowing her to lay the Eggs upon Land near the Current; so the main substance be the same, it matters not if there be some difference, as to any particular accident. I also said, that two Bags of pure Musk had been found where the two short Forelegs join to the Body, the Author says under the Gills. Neither is this very material. He adds, that the Female only goes out upon Land, and not the Male; but I never came near enough to examine whether they were Males, or Females.

12. Num. 143. the Author speaks of the manner how, and from whence Buffaloes, Horses, and Goats were carry'd into those Islands. I had been really very glad he had set down what became of Leitona's Ass, that was carry'd from New Spain to cover Mares, for it would be no small diversion to the Reader. I will not insert it in this place, because I am not well satisfy'd in all its circumstances.

P. 8. He sets down the manner how the Indians catch Monkeys, whereof there are vast multitudes in those Islands, and close by Manila; it is a thing not to be question'd.

In the following Pages he writes of the Fruit call'd Nanca, I writ the same Nava the Author does. He also treats of the rette. Tree call'd Amiot, in the Trunk whereof most excellent Water is found, which is Amior. a great refreshment to Passengers. To me that is more wonderful which drops from the Bejuco, some are large and twine about the Trees, the end hangs downwards, some of them higher, some lower; the Traveller cuts off the Nib, and presently a spout of Water runs from it, as clear as Crystal, enough and to spare for six or eight Men. I have drank to my satisfaction of it, found it cool and sweet, and would drink it as often as it were in my way. It must be allow'd to be a Juice and not natural water, but I believe any Man would lick his Lips after it. This is the common relief of the Herdsmen when they are looking for the Cattel about the Mountains; when they are thirsty they lay hold of the Bejuco, as they sit a Horse-back, and drink their fill.

13. Pag. 95. He speaks of the Plantan; whether it differ from the Plane, I am satisfy'd there is no resemblance between them; I have said what I knew to this matter. Certain it is they are near Rivers and running Waters, this agrees with those we call Plantans, and not with the Planes which are vast large Trees.

Pag. 96. He urges from Brocardus and Sclorgus, that the forbidden Fruit our first Parents eat in Paradise was the Plantan, which the Portugueses to this day call a Fig, the Natives of Manila, Saguin, and other Nations by several Names. I should easily agree to it, if it were not said, Gen. 3. 6. to be Beautiful to the eyes, and pleasant to the sight; which if apply'd to the Fruit, does not agree with that of the Plantan, but futes much better with several other sorts, and particularly the Chiqueyes of China. If these words be meant of the Tree, because it is said before, The Woman saw that the Tree was good, &c. it can fit no Plant in the world better than the Plantan, tho in strictness Plantan. it cannot be call'd a Tree, the colour of it is Leaves, its stateliness and beauty is the greatest in the World, when stir'd by a little Wind, it is very agreeable. Nor is there any Plant so convenient for Adam and Eve to clothe themselves with the Leaves. Only two Leaves sew'd together will make a Frock to cover a tall Man from the Neck to near the Ankles. Every Man may give his Opinion touching this point, without incurring any Church-censure.

14. Pag. 97. He speaks of the Camo-tis, Vuis, Tuguis, Gaves, and Xicamas; there is abundance of them all, and very much Guiger. There are Xicamas in China, but I have not seen them in any other part; they are good raw, boil'd, preserv'd, or any way; no Cardoon is like them with Oil and Vinegar. There are many things in those Countries, which are a relief to the Poor, and we want. Then he treats of several Medicinal Plants and Herbs, it affords all sorts, and God has furnish'd Man with all things according to every Climate and Country.

Chap. 18. p. 107. He speaks of Batichina, and supposes the Chineses subdu'd it. I spoke my mind about it in the first Book.

Cloves.

Then he talks of Cauripa and other small Kingdoms, these are adjoining to Macasar. Concerning the Cloves he says, p. 113. It attracts moisture to it very much, suffers no Grass to grow near it, but allows of Trees, as I my self saw with my eyes, tho some will deny it. The Author says, I have often heard it told, that Sailers lying upon Chests or Bales of Cloves insensibly dry'd away so fast, that they would doubtless have perish'd, had they not chang'd their Bed. So strongly does it draw the moisture of any thing that is near it, which plainly appears when it is sold, for they sprinkle it with water to make it weigh the heavier, and the Cheat cannot be perceiv'd.

15. In his second Book he gives an account how F. Alonso Sanchez went to Macao, to endeavour to bring that City under our King's Obedience, and he compass'd it.

In my time Manila sent another Father to that City upon the same account, who succeeded not. When I went afterwards, Clergy and Laymen told me, Such a one did his own business very well, and gather'd abundance of good things, but took no care of the main thing he came about; for had he gone about it, he had certainly compass'd it: such a one should have come and not he, who only minded his private Interest. I inquir'd into the whole matter, and concluded that Man was pitch'd upon to do nothing; yet I believe they design'd well who sent him. It is necessary upon such occasions to make use of one, that does not study his own or his Family's Interest; for if it be inconsistent with the publick business he has in hand, he leaves this last, and only minds his own affair. The more a Man has of avarice and selfishness, the less will he stir in the Publick Service. S. Jerome observes that when Nebuchadnezzar would have Divine Worship given to his Golden Statue, the first he sent for were the Greatest Men of his Kingdom, Dan. 3.2. The Saint assigns the reason thus: The Princes are call'd to adore the Statue, because powerful men fearing to want the riches they possess, are more easily supplanted. That wicked King understood it, and made a good observation for compassing his design. They, who ought to have been the first in opposing that abomination, were the first that submitted for Interest. It is not so with him that has no private Interest to mind: He speaks boldly, opposes what is ill, pleads for what is good, and breaks his rest to attend the Publick. The wicked King Achab, 3 Reg. 18. 17. complain'd against Holy Elias, sends for and says to him, It is you that trouble Israel. How usual a thing is it in the World, and particularly in India, to say and write that blameless Prelates disturb the Peace, and make uproars in Kingdoms and Provinces, and this because they reprove the Crimes they see publickly committed without any shame? And they that are concern'd seeking at any rate to satisfy their own avarice, they find ways and means, as was done against Christ, to represent things as they please, so that they seem credible to those who through a criminal negligence do not dive to the bottom of those affairs. It is you Elias that disturb my Kingdom and Subjects; I know not how to deal with you, nor can I live in peace and quiet. Elias answer'd, Not I but you, and your Father's house. It is not I but your ill Government and Ministers that breed this disturbance. How many might this answer be given to at present? Abulensis admires at the Prophet's answer, and says, He a man of great resolution, is not afraid to speak harshly to the King. He valued no private Interest, had nothing to lose, and therefore spoke his mind freely. So ought all good Ministers to do; but where shall we find such? I mention'd no small number among the Chineses in my former Books. Who think ye, is the faithful and prudent servant? saith Christ, Mat. 24. Hugo and Albertus say that, Who, signifies the rarity; that there are few in the World. S. Thomas, And if there be few faithful, there are fewer prudent. I understand it, that there are but few prudent and wise for the publick good, but they are all sharp and sagacious for their own affairs, and that to excess, they leave no stone unturn'd for their benefit; they shroud their own busibusiness under the Cloak of the King's Service, the honour of his Crown, the good of his Subjects; they give it one name to day, and another to morrow, and at last it all ends in private Interest, and for the most part with prejudice to others. The Children of this world are wiser than the children of light. F. Alonso Sanchez like a worthy Religious Man as he was, only regarded the Service of his King, he desir'd nothing for himself, and therefore manag'd that business with zeal, and came off with honour. Had the other follow'd his example, he might have done the same; he minded private affairs, and therefore must of necessity fail in the publick.

16. Pag. 179. The Author owns that the Portugueses in China are look'd upon as Subjects of that Kingdom. In the third Chapter of this second Book, he says the same, wherein he agrees with what I writ, Chap. 17.

Chap. 4. p. 186. he says, The Chineses are mistrustful, as being Cowards, but not the Tartars, who are not jealous of Foreign Nations.

F. Colin is much deceiv'd, he went not over into China, nor saw the violent Storm rais'd there against all Europeans, nor the Practices against Macao, they are more fearful and jealous than the Chineses themselves; they care for no Strangers, nor do they desire to know there are any in the World. They turn'd out the Dutch, and forbid those of Macao trading by Sea; wherein then consists their Security of Mind?

Chap. 5. p. 190. he says, The first that brought the Faith into China, were the Fathers Matthew Riccius and Pantoja. I have prov'd it was not so in the second Tome: I will here briefly set down what I observ'd and took notice of in China, and I think it deserves some Reflection. I heard F. Gouvea, who was Superior of his Mission, and the eldest of it, affirm, That Portugal when united to our Crown, would never permit any Spanish Priest to pass that way, either to Japan, China, or any other Mission; and that there were extraordinary Difficulties made about F. Pantoja of Toledo, who was the only one that pass'd: So that they gave free passage to Germans, Flemings, French, Savoyards, Romans, Genoeses, Neapolitans, Sicilians, and yet none to Spaniards; and we are so good that we suffer Portugueses and other Nations to go over to America and the Philippine Islands without any need, tho we have found inconveniences from those People (I am not certain whether any French Religious Men have gone over, but of all the rest I am) I said without any need, because our Kings have enough Ministers of the Gospel to serve all their Kingdoms. One of good experience in these affairs was wont to say, that he lik'd it well, and thought it a holy thing, that as well Religious Men, as others of the Clergy should employ themselves in Preaching the Gospel, teaching and gaining Souls to God, which is the end for which God came into the World; but that he thought it convenient every one should attend that which lay next to him, the Poles to Tartary and Muscovy, the Germans to abundance of Hereticks there are in the Empire, and Schismatics near it; the Flemings, French, and others have enough to do at home; the Italians in Turky. The Spaniards who have no work in their own Country, because it is clear, through the Goodness of God, may go over to America, and since there are enough of them, discover new Colonies in Asia and other parts. But he could not conceive why the German who has so much work at home, should go to find out that in China, through so many difficulties, and at so great an expence.

17. Chap. 9. pag. 206. he writes, that the Chineses are suspicious of Manila and the Spaniards, because of the ill example of Mexico, and their talking of Conquests.

In this particular the good Father Colin agrees with F. Alonso Sanchez Morales, and the rest of their Society. I have writ much to this point, and in my opinion made out that it is false. F. Alonso Sanchez his experience in the affairs of China, tho he made two Voyages thither, is no way convincing; for he that knows not the Language, and reads not their Books, nor converses with those People, cannot be well acquainted with Particulars. I have already prov'd that the Chineses do not look upon us as Conquerors, or People that talk of such matters; it is enough in this place to say that the Quarrel the Chineses and Tartars have is against Macao, not against Manila. None of the Persecutions those of the Society have suffer'd, has been caus'd by Manila. It is their Reverences that talk of Conquests, those of the Society have carry'd Fire-Arms, cast Great Guns, and been Mandarines of the Warlike Stores. All this and much more I plainly make out in my second Tome, and something was said concerning it in the foregoing 15. and 16. Chapters.

18. Chap. 11. p. 211. he inserts F. Alonso Sanchez. his excellent Doctrine, which is this: By Natural Right, and the Law of Nations, any People may go to strange and new Countries, and make use of all that is common, as Seas, Rivers, Coasts, Food, Wood, Game, and other things which are not peculiar and appropriated; and take Lands, build Houses, Towns and Forts for their defence; and they may give and sell what they carry, and receive and buy what they have, and oblige the Heads and Princes to permit their Subjects to trade and converse with their Guells. The Author adds, And this may be better done by Divine Right, if those that go will preach and teach them the Laws and Custom of the Christian Faith.

I now admit of the Doctrine, and do not dispute it, but only observe that it is not very proper for China, or cannot be apply'd, for as much as in all that vast extent of Land, there is not a foot of Land but what is appropriated to some particular Person; and consequently no Stranger can raise House, Town, or Fort in any part of it, because none can build upon another Man's Ground, especially when the Owner opposes it.

Nor do I conceive that any King has right to come to the Coast of Andaluzia, or any other, and there build Towns and Forts; for if he has a natural Right according to the Laws of Nations, it will follow that the King of Spain opposing him, breaks those two Laws which are the Bands that tie up the hands of Princes to keep within their own Kingdoms, and live in Peace with others, which would be of very ill consequence.

But leaving the Decision of these Difficulties to abler Pens, from the Doctrine above I infer, a fortiori, that all religious and secular Churchmen may go to all Missions in Pagan Countries, tho there be other Missioners there; and that if these obstruct the coming of the others, or their erecting Churches, or Preaching, they will transgress the Divine and Natural Law. I am of opinion this is a good Inference, and if so we may freely practise it; and if the first there oppose it, as they do now at Macao, they doubtless commit a grievous Sin.

19. Chap. 13. he treats at large of Preaching with Arms and Soldiers, and goes on upon the same; Chap. 14. This is a weighty Point, has been several times disputed, and our good Bishop Casas some Years since argu'd it at Valladolid; his Propositions and the Answers of Doctor

Sepulveda, are preserv'd in the Archives of the College of S. Gregory; I read part of them in my younger Years. I here admit many things, and will only add what I have seen and observ'd. The Author corroborates his Opinion with the ill success of those four hundred who went with the Lord Casas to the Indies, who were slain by that barbarous People. In his sixth Reason, Chap. 14. to F. John Bolante, p. 229. he says, That neither in Brazil, Peru, Mexico, Florida, the Philippine and Maluco Islands, there has been any conversion or propagating of Christianity, without the assistance of the secular Power. Pag. 305. he repeats, That no advance has been made any where without Force of Arms; and before that says, that even those of the contrary Opinion have of late follow'd his, which doubtless is meant of ours of Manila, who went with Soldiers to the Conversion of Ititi. All that has been said seems to make out his Opinion, which S. Francis Xavierius held, and those of his Institute in China said; and therefore they told it in my presence, that the Saint us'd to say, That there would be no good Christians till they were under Command, which seems to be prov'd by the Event, since we see all the Missions that great Apostle of India founded and labour'd in, are all lost.

20. My opinion is, that it is no easy matter to convince all Men, and a very difficult matter to dissuade any Man from that which he has fix'd in his Mind as Truth. But if we must be led by Examples, I believe we don't want some to evince the contrary Opinion. I pass by the Method Christ took in preaching, was follow'd by his Disciples, and left us in the Gospel; there is no doubt but he that follows it is far enough from any danger of erring; for it is a Presumption, if not a Crime to say, that our Saviour did not leave general Rules for all Men to preach in all parts, as one answer'd discoursing of this Subject. Let us come to later Examples; The Conversion of England under S. Gregory was perform'd, and continu'd without Force of Arms. Thirty Kingdoms, Histories tell us, were converted by the Sons of S. Benedict, but were no way kept in awe by Catholick Arms. Those of Poland, and others later, were perform'd by the Mendicant Orders after the same manner. But you'll say, many for want of a Power have fail'd, which might have been supported by it. I answer in the first place, that we neither can nor ought to judg of future future Contingences according to our Fancy. 2ly. That if Christianity ceas'd there, it was perhaps because the number of the Predelstinate there was compleat; and if not, as his Divine Majesty order'd and dispos'd the planting of the Faith there, without the noise of Arms, he will cause it to be restor'd by the same means, sending Millions thither like to those antient ones who founded those Millions.

21. Nor is it altogether true, that no Conversion has been made of late Ages; without the assistance of Arms we know ours have converted at Vera paz, and they continue to this day. And now at this very time F. Francis of the Rosary of my Order has entred the great Paititi, where he has thousands of Christians, without any protection or assistance but God's; and the Natives beg that Dominican Friars may be sent them, but no Soldiers. I am well inform'd of this particular, and of the goodness of that Country, which is fruitful, populous, and pleasant. Persons of Credit assure me, that there are above three thousand of the Trade in the Goldsmiths Street at the Court. So in Japan there was a great increase of Christianity without Force of Arms; and if it fell to nothing, it was not for want of Soldiers, but by reason of other things that might have been well avoided. The two great and general Persecutions in China, proceeded from other causes. I find there is something amiss every where. The Fathers of the Society carrying Soldiers into Ethiopia, were expell'd without hopes of ever returning. In Tanquin, Cochinchina, and China, they were look'd upon as Spies, this is not so bad as the other.

22. Nor does our going from Manila to Itui with Soldiers make out any thing; it was the particular Opinion of one Man, disapprov'd by others, and the ill success foretold. Whilst there were only three Fathers in that Province they made some Advance, and preach'd in Peace and Quietness: as soon as ever the Soldiers came, the Natives were alarm'd, ran to Arms, burnt, kill'd and wounded, and all was lost. What happen'd in the Islands call'd Marianas is well known, so that there is no ascertaining any thing in this Matter.

23. Another Difficulty occurs to me, which is, that if Missions must be carry'd on under the protection of arm'd Force, there will be very few; therefore they must either be left off, or continu'd in the same manner the Apostles follow'd them. For whence shall we have a Force to shelter those that preach in China, Nava-Japan, and the Mogol's Country? I only mention these, without speaking of many other vast Kingdoms. Now if all the Soldiers in the Church will not suffice for three Places, how must we relieve the rest? I am perswaded one Christian converted and instructed peaceably, is worth twenty made with the shew of Force. They who here talk of the protection of Christian Forces, will imagine the Soldiers will do nothing but aid and protect; they will do more mischief with their Lewdness in one Day, than 20 religious Men can repair in a Year. But if there be no Soldiers, they will kill the religious Men before they have done any good. Let them kill, Christ himself and his Apostles were kill'd; and it is enough done to sprinkle that Country with Blood, that it may afterwards yield a more plentiful Harvest. He says, no Miracles are wrought now-adays, and therefore the Method must be chang'd. I say, S. Francis Xaverius wrought many in the East and South, and S. Lewis Bertrandus in the West-Indies; the Author mentions many in his History, and those of his Society speak of others. In the next place I say, as F. Lubeli of the Society was wont to inculcate to me, Let us preach as we ought to do, and God will work Miracles; but how should there be Miracles whilst we preach so and so? I have also given an Account, that the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fidei has condemn'd the Method of spreading the Gospel by force of Arms.

24. F. Colin, Chap. 13. writes, That Jesuits, those of his Society live very poor and Apostolically in China upon the Alms sent them from Europe, and the Labour of their Hands and Ingenuity, as S. Paul did; and yet the Conversion does not go forwards, nor does it take such root as it should do. Experience, he says, has shew'd it in Japan, where so great an addition as was made to Christendom, fell off for want of being supported by Arms. With respect to so great a Man, I say he is deceiv'd in these Points, some body sent him such Intelligence from China. If what has been said above were true, I doubt not but Heaven would grant a more plentiful Harvest, as F. Lubeli and others of his Brethren said in my hearing, bewailing the Abuses that are crept into that Mission, whereof I treat at large in my second Tome, where the curious Reader may see it. I answer'd above to what relates to Japan, and have done done it more copiously in the 2d Tome. Nava- It is requisite in such Missions to proceed rette. with Caution and Discretion, any security is blameable; and for that very reason if religious Men are alone without any Force to protect them, they are to be the more provident and cautious, forbearing all that the Infidels may think amiss in us, as the building of great Churches and stately Palaces, which did us much harm in China, in the opinion of the same Fathers. How can this agree with what the Author says, that they live in a poor and Apostolical manner, and on the work of their Hands, as S. Paul did? Some things are so false they are unsufferable. My last Letters from China inform me, that the Fathers Enriquez and Grimaldo spent 400 Ducats Plate in their Journey from Canton to the Imperial City, whither they went as Mathematicians, tho they are none; now what Poverty is this? They by word of Mouth in Writing maintain, that it is convenient they should behave themselves with State and Gravity, wear Silk Clothes, make great Presents, go in Sedans or Palankines on Mens Shoulders, attended by Servants, &c. this they say the Country requires. Then another writes that they live poorly like the Apostles, on the labour of their Hands, as S. Paul did. To what purpose is this? F. Augeri tells us we must behave ourselves as if we were Marquisses. F. James Fabre is carry'd in an open Palankine by four Men. F. Verbieft dislikes his Brethrens proceedings, how shall we reconcile these matters?

25. Pag. 235. n. 97. he writes thus. F. Alonso Sanchez intending to put F. John Bolante by his design of going into China, us'd this Argument. Which way would your Reverence go? Through Chincheo? no, for the Cbineses have never permitted it. Nor through Macao, because the Portugueses will not allow of it, nor the Religious there much less. This he enlarges upon, deducting in his opinion mighty Inferences. I answer in short, that those of our Order, and the Franciscans have gone several times by the way of Chincheo. I went through Macao, and others might have done the same, had not some Men obstructed it, as still they do: when God does not obstruct our ways, it is not fit Men should restrain his Providence. The Franciscans, Augustinians and Dominicans of Macao never went about to preach the Gospel in China; would to God they had, and that the Kingdom being sufficiently stock'd, there were no room for Spaniards. Those religious Men I have nam'd never design'd to hinder the Spaniards, the Laity much less; so that neither the Infidels of Chincheo, nor Christians of Macao have obstructed the Spaniards. The mischief sprung from another place; so that it may well be said, Death in the Pot, Reg. 4. v. 40. for where the Missioners ought to have found assistance and protection, there they have met with Troubles, Ruin, and Persecution. Death sprung from the place where Life was expected; the words of the Canticles sute well in this place, The Children of my Mother fought against me, &c.

26. Pag. 249. §. 10. he writes that religious Men, who go to other Countries without Orders for it, disturb and scandalize them, being look'd upon as Spies, which makes the Infidels fortify themselves, as has hapned in China; and that disorder is the cause our Holy Faith is slighted.

Let us ask the Author, what he means by going to other Countries without Orders? I would know further, who it was that scandaliz'd Japan, and disturb'd China? The Reader will find it in my second Tome, where I have it at large. In that particular of being taken for Spies, we are all alike, tho in truth those of the Society outdo us, for only they and no others have been esteem'd such in Ethiopia, Tunquin, and Cochinchina. The Infidels fortify, as they have done in China. The worst of it is, that Religious Men serve as Engineers for raising of Walls and Fortifications, and as such serve the Infidels, and furnish them with Cannon. In China they have been fortified by those of Macao and others, not by those of Manila, or the Spaniards. The contempt of our Holy Faith proceeds chiefly from other Monstrous proceedings. These disorders, tho those that cause them go with Orders to the Mission, cause much mischief. I would know further by what Order the Apostles went among the Gentiles? The same of S. Francis Xavierius, and those that went into Ethiopia.

27. Pag. 250. he with good reason blames the false accounts sent into Europe, of the Conversion of China and other Kingdoms. This I agree to, it sutes with what F. John Adamus was wont to say. I have set down abundance of Chimeras that have been writ into Europe concerning China and other parts. I have many more in my second Tome, where the Reader may see them, and may receive light, not to be deluded by such accounts.

28. Chap. 25. p. 315. he shows at large, how God at several times has made use of several means for the Conversion of Souls. At the first beginning of the Church, he made choice of the Apostles, whom he endow'd with several Graces, and granted them many Privileges. Now in these times, God does not make choice of them, nor give them such a great Power, nor the gift of Tongues, nor working of Miracles. That at first all civiliz'd Nations admitted Preachers without any opposition, &c.

Here the Author hints at several Particulars, to which I cannot now speak so fully as I would; but think what I have in my second Tome may suffice. My opinion is, that the Method of Christ and his Apostles us'd in Preaching is still in the Gospel. Matth. 10. v. 9, 10. leg. Sylveira hic, & Tom. 6. cap. 10. q. 1, 2. n. 8. & q. 3. And there is no doubt it was left there for others to imitate it. I find not any other in Holy Writ, and this is it which the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide has confirm'd and propos'd to its Millioners, for them to follow and observe, as appears by the Instructions pro Missionariis, printed at Rome Anno 1669. If several Methods have been taken, it has been because the Millioners have taken them up of their own accord, forsaking that way which the Author of it instituted and follow'd. Nor must we imagine the Divine Providence can forsake its Ministers in all that shall be requisite, unless they render themselves unworthy of its protection. S. Vincent Ferrerius, S. Antony of Padua, S. Francis Xavierius, and S. Luis Bertrandus wrought wonderful Prodigies, as I said before. Nor is the World at present destitute of some that endeavour to imitate them; one poor French Clergyman alone, and destitute of all human help, baptiz'd 60 Persons in one day in the Kingdom of Camboxa, Anno 1668. what can be a greater wonder? He shin'd among those Infidels by means of his holy Life, like the Sun among the Stars. Great Miracles are told of the Bishop of Beritus, who is now at Siam; and his Life being such as I know it to be, I look upon them to be very likely. Let us preach as we ought to do, said F. Lubeli, and God will work Miracles.

These following words are in the dedication of the Instructions before mention'd to Pope Clement IX. Very grave Au- thors, and chiefly Joseph Acosta (in libris de procuranda Indorum salute, Lib. 1. Nava- c. 11, 12. lib. 2. c. 1. & sequentibus, lib. 4. c. 4, 15. lib. 6. c. 2.) plainly make it appear, that the ruin of the most flourishing, or at least very hopeful Missions proceeded, either from the not altogether commendable manners of some of the Labourers, or from the manner of propagating the Gospel, which was contrary to the Gospel it self, &c. It is certain then the form and method for Preachers continues to this day; and if they follow any other, it is invented by themselves, not by Christ.
Vol. I.

Chap. 3. art. 3. he mentions, how the holy Congregation de propaganda fide condemns the method of planting the Faith by force of Arms, as was done in America, which is enough to condemn the opinion of the Author and his Followers. They also oppose what some say, and I have often heard, that China is a different Nation from others, and the People singular, and therefore it is requisite the manner of preaching to them be different from that us'd to other Nations. This I say is nothing but self-love, and our own Fancy. F. Emanuel George was wont to say to me; Father, when I see my self finely clad in Silk, and that a Mandarine pays me great respect in the presence of many People, it pleases me and I rejoice; but there is nothing in it that tends to God, it is all human and worldly, these things stick to our Body. This I look upon to be all true, and would those Fathers, if they were poorly clad, and liv'd upon the labour of their Hands, be visited with Mandarines? I may be allow'd to speak of these things, because I have seen, and had sufficient experience of them.

26. Pag. 315. n. 166. and in those following, he endeavours to prove by examples how necessary Force is towards converting. I have writ my opinion upon it, and it will be proper to consider what great inconveniencies have, and do still follow such courses, and how much other Nations abhor them. Much has been said upon the Subject, the business is of weight and moment. C. Mamartin, in Gratiar. Att. pro Consul. ad Julian. August. cap. 4. But the mending of Manners, and correcting of Judgments, is a difficult strife, and a business full of danger. When the End is so sublime and divine, the Means must also of necessity not be human or earthly, but sublime; they must be sutable, and tend to the erecting of the heavenly Jerusalem, to unite the Souls to the living Foundation-stone of this Structure, which is Christ: Why then do we use methods that tend only to separate and destroy all that Preachers with much Labour and Sweat erect? These things ought to be conceiv'd by Ideas lifted up far above all that is Clay and Earth, and not be adapted to our own fancies, which perhaps flow from our private satisfaction, tho' shrowded under the outward pretences of God's Glory, and the good of Souls. Read S. Thomas in 10 Matth. upon the words, like Sheep, &c. which answers my design, and is contrary to the Author's.

27. Lib. 3. c. 6. p. 354. n. 35. the Author owns his Society obtain'd a Bull of his Holiness Gregory the 13th, forbidding religious Men of other Orders going to Japan. Neither I nor others doubted of this matter, therefore I was surpriz'd, and admir'd that F. Joseph Morales in his Treatises should defend, that the said Bull was not granted at the request of the Society; which he endeavours to make out several ways. But the Author plainly and ingenuously owns the truth in the place above mention'd, which he so wise, so antient, and so well read a Man could not be ignorant of. I have already taken notice how that Prohibition ceas'd by virtue of a special Bull of Pope Urban the 8th, Anno 1633, which was confirm'd again in the Year 1674 by his Holiness Clement the 10th; so that any Churchman either Religious or Secular may freely at present go to those Missions, which way he shall think fit. It appears by the Bull, which shall be insert'd at the end of this Volume. The reasons which mov'd the Society to procure that Bull are set down in the second Tome.

Pag. 357. n. 40. he speaks of the Tempests and Storms the Devil by means of the Infidels rais'd against the tender Plants of the Church of Japan, and its Labourers. I refer to what I have writ in my second Tome.

In the Year 1594, he says, his Society had in Japan 200000 Christians, 200 Churches, and 130 Religious Men. Would to God those Labourers had converted those Islands, that we might all bless God, and extol the Labour of his Ministers! What I have to say now, is that the number he speaks of, does not agree with that I heard from F. Gouvea in China. I have writ how much they vary in this particular.

28. Pag. 358. he speaks of the prudence of his Society in Japan, in corresponding with his Majesty and Holiness, and receiving their Bulls and Orders to hinder other Orders at that time from going to Japan. Time has made it appear; God grant it may give them some Caution for China, Tartary, the Mogols Country and other civiliz'd Nations of Asia. They are all the Author's own words.

Since the Society had with so much prudence procur'd that Bull, as has been mention'd, I do not find it was any thing praiseworthy in them to accept it, with the King's Letter to the same purpose: there is little merit in Obedience, where we comply with those things we are pleas'd with and desire; Obedience is perfect, when it has nothing of our selves, and the more difficult the thing is that is commanded. S. Thomas opusc. 2. c. 227. says, Obedience is so much the more commendable, by how much those things are more difficult which a Man obeys. See Sylveira to this point, Tom. 6. p. 119. n. 4. verb. obedientia. We very well know, that when in the Year 1648 the Decree of Innocent the 10th was made known to the Missioners in China, they took no notice of, nor thought themselves oblig'd to observe it, which the Author was not ignorant of. This was a time for Prudence and Obedience to appear, submitting the understanding to the command of the Head of the Church. S. Bernard de præcep. & dispens. cap. 12. says thus; Whatever Man commands in the Name of God, so it be not certainly displeasing to God, must be receiv'd no otherwise, than if God himself gave command. And afterwards; We must therefore hear him, whom we have in the place of God, as we would God in those things which are not directly against God. Time, says he, has shown it. He that shew'd it me in all its minute circumstances, was Francis Caron, General Director of the French East-India Company at Surat, Anno 1671. as I have set it down in my Controversies. God grant he goes on, this may give them some caution for China, &c. The Missioners of China might have taken warning by the example of Japan, those of Tunquin, Cochinchina, and Ethiopia, and even by that of China it self at this time, and in the Year 1618, besides many others they have had, that might suffice to make an impression even upon Stone and Bricks. When the Persecution in China began, some talk'd of altering those things that had caus'd Troubles and Calamities. I forwarded it, but was soon convinced it would come to nothing. Men use to take warning by other Men, which is certainly tainly very good and holy, Felix quem faciunt aliena pericula cautum. Hugo in Pfal. 49. But even brute Beasts grow cautious by their own sufferings. He who stumbles in a place, takes care the next time he comes that way; which makes me wonder at what I have been a witness to. The effects are sutable, tho some pretend to mend them. An exact account of every thing is given in the second Tome.

29. Pag. 359. He says, that in the Year 1597. there was a Persecution in Japan, because a Ship of Manila was put in there; and the Emperor said, it went to conquer the Country, as they had done Mexico, and that the Franciscan Friars were Spies.

I answer that nothing can be made out or urg'd either pro or con, upon a mere accident and casualty, and there is no doubt but the Emperor must be void of reason in supposing one single Ship went to conquer that Island. It was also unreasonable that he should look upon the Franciscans as Spies, only upon that account. And supposing it were so, I have already writ what hapned to the Fathers of the Society in Ethiopia, which their Historian Tellez mentions, and what befel to them in Tunquin and Cochinchina; and it were fit that some of them making their advantage of so many examples, should look at home, and not neglecting this altogether, bend their whole thoughts upon things at a distance, and mere possibilities. Tacit. in vit. Agric. Beginning by himself and his, he first order'd his own House, which is no less difficult to most men, than to govern a Province. Cassiodorus lib. 10. Var. Epist. 5. We will begin to shew good Government in our Family, that the rest may be asham'd to do amiss, when it is known we allow not our own People the liberty of transgressing. Nor do I like the Ministers of the Gospel should entertain so many fears, since it is a thing so lespicable in a worthy Soldier. We ought to proceed with more liberty and assurance; and since the business we have in hand is so immediately God's, and tending to his Glory, it is not reasonable we should be faint hearted, or believe we can want his special Protection and Providence over us. Fear is a token of Infidelity, says S. Basil of Seleucia, Orat. 22. I have often consider'd who he or they were that made it known in Japan and China that the Catholick King had conquer'd China, and what their design could be in so doing. As to my self, I believe I am not out in my judgment, I think there needs not much better Grounds to speak it out; I only require Nava- some little pious affection in the Reader, rette. to be satisfy'd in all he shall find in my Controversies.

30. Pag. 360. He speaks of the Martyrdom of the Religious Men of the Order of our Father S. Francis and others. We know that Pope Urban the Eighth declar'd them Martyrs, so that there is no room left for Catholicks to make a doubt of it. Therefore I always look'd upon what a Clergy-man said publicly at Macao as a presumption, to wit, that they dy'd Excommunicate. Others have said the same upon no other Ground, but because they will have it they went to Japan contrary to the command of Pope Gregory the 13th. Something might be said to this point; let it suffice to know, that notwithstanding that came to the Ears of his Holiness Urban the Eighth, and the Sacred Congregation of Rites, yet those Religious Men were solemnly declar'd Martyrs. This being so, it was a great impudence to utter such words, when the Feast of their Martyrdom had been celebrated in several places, to the honour and glory of God.

31. F. Michael de Cardenas, who approv'd this History, gives it for granted that the Apostle S. Thomas never went to China, Japan, or the Philippine Islands, which confirms my opinion set down in the first Book, and I find it favour'd by F. Silveira Tom. 6. in Evang. lib. 9. cap. 10. p. 796. v. 58. He speaks of America, Brazil, and Angola, where he says, no footsteps of Christian Religion was found. And when I thought this point was clear'd and agreed upon, I see new difficulties start up. F. Cyprian de Herrera, in the Life of that worthy Archbishop of Lima, Toribio Alfonso Mograbexo, about whose Beatification some measures are now taken at Rome, Chap. 22. says, that in the Province of the Chachapoyas, some tokens were found of the Holy Apostle's having been in that Country, and that the Holy Archbishop own'd and worship'd him as such. Portugueses write that the same footsteps have been found in Brazil, to which they add Traditions of the Natives. If this be so, it is likely he went along from Coromandel through all those Kingdoms between it and China, whence he might go over to Japan, and so to all the Islands in that Sea, visit the Mogol's and Malabar's Country, cross over to the Cape of Good Hope, and other Kingdoms thereabouts; for all these Countries lying nearer the holy Apostle, it is not likely he should forsake them, and go to others so remote as America. And if any Man shall say he was first in Brasil and Peru, and thence went over into India, I answer, I am of opinion the Saint would not have left that New World cut off from the rest to go away into Asia, and those Countries contiguous to Persia, and nearer to us. Every Man may believe what he pleases, but I am apt to suspect that if the Terra Australis Incognita be discover'd, there will presently be other footsteps of St. Thomas found there, and there will not want reasons and probabilities to make it out. Thus I will put an end to what I design in this Supplement.

32. But because it is China that all my thoughts are bent upon, I cannot chuse but return to it, tho at present it shall be very briefly. I think what is said of the Land of Promise in Deut. 8. 7. may with good reason be apply'd to that Kingdom. For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good Land, a Land of Brooks of Water, of Fountains, and depths that spring out of Valleys and Hills: A Land of Wheat, and Barley, and Vines, and Fig-trees, and Pomgranates, a Land of Oil and Honey: A Land wherein thou shalt eat Bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it, a Land whose stones are iron, and out of whose Hills thou mayst dig Brass, &c.

Vineyards.
Olive-Trees.

That Country has much more than all this, and tho it have neither Olive-trees nor Vineyards, it abounds in several sorts of Oil, and has plenty of Grapes, and thousands of things we do not know among us; innumerable Rivers, Brooks, and Fountains, Corn, Rice, Honey, Fruit, Metals, &c. Where is there any Country that can match it?

Sacrifices.

I writ in another place, what notable care those People take in preparing and disposing themselves to sacrifice to their Dead, and be present at these Sacrifices. They fast three days, Marry'd Men are separated from their Wives seven days; they all retire upon the Eve, keep silence, make themselves clean outwardly, wash themselves to go into the Temple, and all this only in order to recollect themselves inwardly, and assist devoutly and decently at those Sacrilegious Ceremonies; and this not once in their Life, but several times in a year. If we Catholics took example by those Heathens against saying Mass, and receiving the Blessed Sacrament, we should receive much more benefit by it. S. Basil of Seleucia, Orat. 19. says, Be a Disciple of the Gentiles; that you may believe follow the Unbelievers. Much liberty is taken among

Marry'd Men about receiving, some Rules have been assign'd in Canons touching this matter, which is only by way of advice, but no precept. B. Humbertus de Romanis, lib. 4. de Erudit. Religios. cap. 13. reflecting on the death of Oza for touching the Ark, 2 Reg. 6. says, The Hebrews say the cause of it was, because he had lain the foregoing night with his own Wife; if God so punish'd that presumption, what punishment are they worthy of who come to receive the Lord's Body without respect? &c. Achimeleck's answer to David, 1 Reg. 21. 4. is to the purpose, I have no Lay-Loaves at hand, but only holy Bread, if the young men are clean, particularly from Women. David answer'd, If you talk of Women, we have abstain'd yesterday and the day before. Certain it is he who was represented exceeds the Figure, or Representative. The Ark and that Holy Bread were Types of the Eucharist; and if those requir'd so much reverence, more is requisite for him that was represented. Oleast. in 19 Exod. explicating these words, Sanctifie them, &c. says thus, You see what purity is requir'd to converse with God, much more to deal familiarly with him. S. Thomas has the same, Opusc. 58. cap. 16. And no doubt it requires a Purity infinitely greater to receive him every day. This Doctor a little lower speaks more to the purpose upon the words, Do not approach to your Wives, he says thus, There are in these times many (I wish it be not only in name) holy marry'd men, who rarely or never abstain from their Wives Bed and Embraces, and yet frequently communicate, and often presume to be familiar with God, believing Conjugal Embraces to be no obstruction to Piety; to whom this Place should be often inculcated, that they might learn to treat the most holy things with more reverence, and might know that even corporal Uncleanness is offensive to the Divine Purity, and understand that not only the Heart, but the Body, Clothes, and all things are to be made clean, when we are to approach to God. Whence I suppose the custom came among the Jews of washing their Hands and Garments, when they went to Prayer, &c. and tho the Lord in the New Law require rather an inward than outward Cleanness, yet he does not altogether neglect the corporal. Read Corn. à Lap. and S. Thom. 3. p. q. 83. art. 4. and cap. 15, & 16. Opusc. 58. and S. Basil Interrog. 23. Reg. Brev. And if S. Paul, 1 Cor. 7. advises marry'd People to abstain only to pray, something more is requir'd for receiving the Supreme Majesty of God. S. Thomas quotes the 3. Chap. of

of the Holy Ghost to the same purpose as S. Paul, There is a time of embracing, and a time of removing far from embraces. These words can be no way so well apply'd as to the Holy Communion; for no case so positively requires such a disposition. This has been said, and the Opinions of Grave Doctors, has brought up the custom in the Philippine Islands, China, and other parts of the East, for Marry'd People to part Beds the night before they receive, which they strictly observe. Read S. Thomas, Opusc. ut sup. cap. 16. where he speaks to this purpose. Nor is this condemning the frequenting the Sacrament, but blaming them that do not approach to it with due reverence, decency and other dispositions. Nor is it enough, as some Men urge, that Man is in a state of Grace, to justify the receiving as every Man fancies. It is well known that tho a Man be in a state of Grace, he may commit so many indecencies, and irreverences, as may be an obstacle to the due honour due to, and consequently the effect of that august Sacrament. Many examples might be brought here, but I omit them because the matter is plain, tho I shall give some hints, when I speak of Converts, and those newly Baptiz'd.

I always dislik'd one thing in Penitents, which is, when they will needs receive, contrary to their Confessor's advice and opinion; I believe such Persons rather displease than please God. What Patient does not follow his Physician's prescription? He knows what may do good and harm, and a good Medicine without a proper disposition may be hurtful. To this read S. Thomas, Opusc. 58. c. 18. where he has very plain instances. On the contrary I like those, who even when ask'd, Whether they dare receive our Lord, submit themselves to the direction of their Confessor; for this shows humility, knowledg of their unworthiness and fear, which is a good disposition. The Doctrine of S. Augustin, quoted by Cajetan, 3. p. q. 38. is good and proper for all Men, Live so, that you may daily deserve to receive. If a Man feeds on the best and thrives not, it is a sign there is some defect in the natural heat. If a Plant be cultivated and water'd, and yet grows not, it shows there is something amiss in the Root; so if a Man often feeds on the Bread of Angels, and finds no change of Life, and increase of Virtue, it is most certain the fault is on his side, and that we do not eat it with the due Preparation. Nor is it allow'd in those parts, that the Penitent as soon as he rises from the Feet of his Confessor go immediately to receive the Communion; they are instructed to perform the Sacramental Satisfaction first, if they can, and if not that they give God thanks for the benefit receiv'd, and dispose themselves anew for a greater; for those two Sacraments being distinct, the dispositions ought to be so, and Man ought to stir up devotion, and much love in himself, &c.

33. I have writ several Sentences us'd by those Gentiles, and could add more in this place, but that I would not tire the Reader. I have set down one which I afterwards found to a Letter in S. Chrysologus, Serm. 3. de Fil. Prod. Love sees no faults. And another in Tertul. c. 14. in Apolog. A word of Piety is more grateful than a word of Compassion. It would be too tedious to translate all the Documents of that Nation, which are much admir'd by Europeans; but that which S. Jerome writes lib. 2. comm. in 13. Mat. is infallibly true, thus it is, The preaching of the Gospel is the least of all Doctrines. Compare it with the instructions of Philosophers, and their Books, the splendor of their Eloquence, and regularity of speech, and you will see how much the Seed of the Gospel is less than other Seeds. But these when they grow up, have nothing that is sharp, sprightly and lively, but is all fading, soft and flaggy, growing up to Weeds and Grass, which soon withers and falls. But this preaching which at first seem'd little, or when it came into the soul of the Believer, &c. grows up to a Tree, so that the fowls of Heaven come and build nests on its boughs. Christians daily own this truth, and show it by their change of life, whereas Infidels draw no profit from their Doctrines, which we see produce no other fruit but pride, vanity and hypocrisy.

34. The Tartar, as has been writ, possess'd himself of all that Empire, and laid a foundation to perpetuate himself in it, doing by the Imperial Family as Zambri and Jehu did by those of Baasa, and Achab, 3 Reg. c. 16. v. 11. & 4 Reg. c. 10. v. 10. He left not one of it to piss against a wall, &c. True, it is that precaution settled not Zambri above seven days, Tyranny is never lasting. What may avail the Tartar, is his great caution and circumspection in managing the Government, and his extraordinary care in cutting off Heads, without regarding the Popular hatred, according to the Doctrine of Seneca in Oedipus, Odia qui ninium times regnare nescit. He knows not how how to rule who is too much afraid of being hated. But he ought to observe the words of Iustus Lipsius, 3 Polit. There is often the greatest danger, where it is least fear'd. I have writ much concerning that Million in my Controversies; I hope in the Divine Goodness, that if God opens a way for the Bishops his Holiness has sent to get in, that Church will daily increase, tho it meet with never so many Oppositions, especially by ordaining Priests of the Natives, as the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide ordains. Had this Method been us'd 40 Years ago, no doubt that Million had been better advanced.

I put those who write in mind of Cicero's words, Tuscul. 3. It is a folly to see the Vices of others, and forget our own. And what Seneca writes, Lib. 1. de Morib. For nothing is baser, than to object to another that which may be objected to a Man's own self. S. Augustine says it, cap. 10. de Confess. A curious sort of People, to pry into other mens Lives, slothful to mend their own. Seneca too, if I forget not, said, The way is short by Example, tedious by Words.

The Misfortune of it lies in our miserable State, our Self-love and Passions. S. Chrysostom Homil. 3. sup. cap. 1. 1 ad Cor. That there is nothing at all so holy, and so well ordain'd, which human Malice cannot abuse to its own ruin. It finds Faults in all things; If we preach in a poor manner, the Method is not proper; if we wear mean Clothes, they are not decent for such Men; if we discover Christ Crucify'd, it is indiscretion; if we do not visit Mandarines, and present them, we cannot secure Christianity; if we teach the Mathematicks, they banish us; if we teach none, there is no admittance. Good God, how many Scarecrows they set before us upon all occasions! God order all for his greater Glory, and grant Unity and Concord among the Missioners, which, I think, is the main Point: I have writ something to this purpose in the second Tome. See S. Thom. in Apoc. cap. 8. v. 6, 7. explicating those words, They prepar'd themselves to sound the Trumpet. Having taken notice that in the second Verse it is said, that a Trumpet was given to every one of the seven Spirits, and what Richardus Victor observes upon the 9th Chap. v. 19. I heard one Voice from the four Horns, &c. One Voice, that is, the Agreement of the Universal Doctrine, from the four Horns of the Golden Altar, that is, from all the Preachers of Christ, preaching the four Gospels through the four Parts of the World. Thus the Heavenly and Divine Seed will certainly bring forth Fruit. Otherwise we shall say, In vain do we labour and run. See Sylveir. Tom. 6. cap. 4. q. 1.

C H A P. XXXIII.

Notes upon F. Martin Martinez his Treatise de Bello Tartarico.

1. I Know not whether I got the better of Sloth, which hindred me from reading the little Book de Bello Tartarico, publish'd by the R. F. Martinez, or whether Curiosity overcame me; I took it up accidentally, thinking it had been Aristotle's Problems, and resolv'd to look it over: I made some Remarks, tho not very weighty ones, and will insert them in this place. Seneca, Epist. 45. says, The Words of Truth are plain, and therefore must not be intangled, &c. To be zealous for Truth in all respects, implies Sincerity of Mind, not a Spirit of Contradiction, as some incurious and troublesome Persons imagine. S. Gregory says, With the true Worshippers of God, even those Wars are sinful which are not made through Ambition or Cruelty, but for the sake of Peace, Cap. apud veros 23. q. 1. Among God's Servants nothing is to be attributed to Discord or Dissension, but to a defire of clearing the Truth, the knowledge whereof is delightful and coveted by all Men, says S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 15. Art. 1. ad 3. S. Augustin, Conf. 10. cap. 23. says, All Men love to know clear Truth.

2. In his Preface to the Reader, Pag. 16. he excuses his Latin if it prove not so polite and elegant as may be expected, with his being taken up with the study of the Chinese Tongue, &c. This were more proper for others, and for those who for above twelve Years handled none but Chinese Books, and spent some more in the Philippine Islands upon the Languages of the Natives there. F. Martinez was not there full six Years, it may be his Humility.

3. Pag. 21. I see he holds the Opinion I mention'd in the First Book, that Tamerlan never conquer'd China, as the History I there spoke of tells us. The Computation utation by Chronology I do not insist on; it is enough I confirm my Opinion of what has been said. This also makes out what I writ against F. de Angelis a Portuguese, that they were the Western Tartars who formerly conquer'd China, of whose who now possess it.

4. Pag. 23. he says, That he who made head against those Tartars, was a servant to the Bonzes. The common Logue in China is, that he was a very brave and resolute Bonzo. He was the first Emperor of the reigning Family before this call'd Tai Ming.

Pag. 26. he confirms what I writ in the First Book, that the Chineses had a Million of Men to guard the Wall; I did some added half a Million more. The Charge was doubtless prodigious, and wonderful how they carry'd Provisions and Necessaries for such a multitude, and defended them from the cold, which is very sharp there in Winter, they must stand in need of many things. To me who know that Country, the supplying all these Wants seems more easy, than to relieve two hundred Soldiers from Madrid if they were but at Pardo. This is no Hyperbole, but a known Truth.

5. Pag. 28. he tells how ill the Chineses treated the Merchants that went to Liao Tung, which cannot be deny'd; but neither Leao Tung, nor Leao Jang, was or is either of them a Metropolis; nor did it then, or does it now belong to the Province of Xan Tung, the Metropolis whereof is call'd Zi Nang.

Pag. 29. he mentions the Great Lamase, by whose means the Tartars sent their Complaints to the Chinese Emperor. He said he was the Pope of the Bonzos in those Parts, and lived in the Kingdom of Tibet. I was often told in China, that as well the Eastern as the Western Tartars put a great value upon the Herb Cha or Te, whereof the most usual Drink in that Kingdom is made; and not being allow'd to carry it out, they use this Contrivance to get it: They first treat with the Chineses that sell it, agree about the Price, and appoint a day to carry it away. This done, they take as many Horses as they think will carry the Burden, and keep them three or four days without a mouthful of Food; then they come in with them, and give them as much as ever they are able to eat of that Herb; immediately they mount them, and with all speed get out of the Bounds of China: As soon as they are within their own they alight, kill the Horses; rip open their Bellies, and take out all the Cha they eat, dry it, and so carry it about to sell and make Drink of it.

6. Pag. 31. He writes of the barbarous Custom of the Tartars at the Death of Noble-men, that they burn their Wives, some Servants, Horses, and other things to go serve the Dead. In India this Custom is in some measure practis'd, but he says they left it off when they came into China; Being reprov'd by the Chineses themselves. I mention'd that they had not left it off till the Year 1668, when the present Emperor forbid it.

7. From Page 34 forwards, he relates the Persecution his Society endur'd there in the Year 1618, and says, some remain'd hid, perhaps he means F. Longobardo. He adds, That some were cruelly bastinado'd by the Magistrates. It might be so, but he does not set down the Causes of the Persecution, but only that a Mandarin, who was an Enemy to the Law of God, promoted it. He attributes the Mischief the Tartars did in China to this Persecution, tho he affirms the Faith was advanced by it. But the Faith increas'd, as it is wont to do by Persecution, &c. Which further confirms what I writ concerning this Matter, in the first Book of my second Tome. I writ, that when the Tartar possess'd himself of the Imperial City, about the Year 41 or 42, there were on the Walls of Pe King 7000 Pieces of Cannon; so I was told when I was in that City. But before that, when they attempted to break in, and durst not, F. Martinez says there was in the Imperial City, An infinite number of Cannon; these words imply more than the determinate number of 7000.

8. As for what he writes Page 42. of the Portuguese Succours; I already took notice that the Soldiers of Macao never came to Court, whereof there is a credible Witness at Madrid in the Service of the Lady Marchioness de los Velez, who then was in Arms, and went with those Men from Macao; only five or six Gunners went up to the Court. I do not look upon it as probable, that the Law of God was then, and till those times publickly preach'd with the Emperor's Consent.

9. What he says, Pag. 45. that the Tartars even pull out all their Beard by the Roots, is contrary to what we have seen thousands of times. They use Whiskers like the Turks, and larger. Nor do I agree to what he writes, Pag. 47. But they are handsome enough in Body and Face, and much delighted with Strangers. This is not not at all proper ; I have heard so much of the Cruelties and Inhumanities of the Tartars, that all he writes concerning them is credible. Pag. 56. he says, the Portuguese Gunners that went to Court were seven, which differs not much from what was said before.

10. Then he gives an Account of the Rebellion of the Chinese Robbers, and the destruction of the Metropolis of the Province of Ho Nan, where the good F. Figueredo had his Church ; he might well have sav'd his Life, but like a good Shepherd would not leave or forsake his Flock ; he attended them living, and bore them company in death. F. Figueredo was an excellent Missioner, and writ extraordinary good Books in the Chinese Character. I read some of them, and they pleas'd me to the height ; therefore I wondred that those of his Society forbid them to their Brethren, since he printed them with leave. True it is, the Prohibition did not reach to us, or the native Christians.

S. Paul, 2 Cor. 6. sets down the Qualifications of Missioners in these words ; In much Patience, in Tribulations, in Wants, in Afflictions, in Stripes, in Prisons, in Seditions. Cajetan adds, which are rais'd against us in Citys, &c. It is fit the whole be read, with the Expolutions of S. Thomas and Cajetan. It were no hard matter to apply every Particular to this Reverend Father : But one I cannot make out of him, which is, that whereas the Fathers of the Society in China underwent so many Persecutions, which I mention'd in the first Book of my second Tome ; yet I never heard that F. Figueredo suffer'd in any of them, notwithstanding he was against the practice of his own Order, and follow'd that which the Dominicans and Franciscans always observ'd, in relation to the Worship the Chinese give to their Dead, their Boards, Confucius, and other Particulars. This to me is a Mystery that requires much Reflection.

11. Pag. 79. He corroborates my Opinion, wherein I agree with the Fathers, Longobardo, Gouvea, and other grave Men of the Society : For they believe, says he, that Crowns are given by Heaven ; nor do they think they ought to be seiz'd by Human Arts, or Force. How come others to contend that the Chinese know God, when they themselves say the contrary ? The God they acknowledged is Heaven, and not any other thing distinct from it.

12. From Pag. 87. forward, he gives a relation of the Rebels breaking into the Imperial City and Palace, and the Chinese Emperor's unhappy End ; he agrees he hang'd himself, and says, he kill'd a Daughter he had that was marriageable : It was reported in Peking as I writ it.

13. Pag. 94. He speaks of the Imprisonment of the Father of U San Kuei the Chinese General, and the Letter he writ to his Son, with the Answer he sent to it ; it is worth every Man's knowledge, and that makes me insert it here. The Rebel press'd him to write to his Son, to submit himself and all his Army to him, and obey his Orders. The good old Man took the Pencil, and writ thus ; " Son, the Changes we see, are the Effects of Heaven and Fate, the Rule of Ta Ming is ended, our Emperor perish'd, Heaven has deliver'd up the Crown and Scepter to this Robber Li Kung ; we must sute our selves to the Times, and make a Virtue of Necessity to escape his Tyranny and a cruel Death. He promises to make you a King, provided you and your Men will acknowledge him Emperor. My Life depends on your Answer, consider what you owe to him that begot you.

U San Kuei read his old Father's Letter ; no doubt it forced Tears from him, and fatherly Love strove in his Breast, with the Duty he owed as a Loyal Subject to his Emperor. The latter prevail'd, and he generously answer'd his Father in a few words, thus ; " I will not have him be my Father who is not true and loyal to the Emperor ; if you, Sir, forget the Fidelity you owe to the Emperor, no body will think it strange I should forget the Duty I owe to such a Father ; I will rather die than serve a Robber. He sent this Loyal and Resolute Answer to his Father, and presently sent to crave Aid of the Tartar. He acted inconsiderately and rashly ; this was the occasion of the mighty Havock he saw soon after. He call'd in Lions to drive out Dogs.

14. P. 97. He confirms what I was told in China, and mention'd in the First Book, that they were employ'd eight days carrying Riches out at four Gates of the Palace, upon Carts, Horses, Camels, and Mens shoulders. I do not agree to what he says Page 105 and 106, that the Tartars took from U San Kuei the Command of the Army ; he was desirous so to do, but never durst provoke him. He kept that Poss till my time ; and if it were were not so, what ground was there for the Hopes the Chineses had conceiv'd of this Man?

What he writes Page 125. concerning the petty King, who went over to the small Island near to the City and Port of Ning Po, and made himself King of it, was not of any continuance. The Governor of Kin Hoa, a great Friend to F. Martinez, was beheaded in my time at Pe King.

15. Pag. 126. He relates how he was taken by the Tartar, but after another manner than really it was. F. Martinez was then with Liu Chung Zao in the Quality of Mandarine of the Ammunition, a Title his Brethren did not approve of, he had scarce time to cut off his Hair; he own'd himself a near Kinsman of F. Adamus, and that sav'd him.

Pag. 38 and 39. He gives an account of the Baptism of Constantine his Mother, &c. I have writ somewhat concerning this Particular, and refer my self to it. Some things might have been spar'd in this Point; and in the Cut he inserts in this place, they who are vers'd in these Affairs will understand it.

16. Pag. 167. He says, all the Tartar and Chinese Troops are rang'd under eight Colours: In the First Book I said it was under 24; I was often told so in China.

Pag. 168. He mentions the Tartars eating Horses and Camels, which has been set down before. I often heard, that these People had a custom, as soon as they kill'd one of them, to take out its Heart and eat it raw.

17. Pag. 178. He writes that Amavandus the Tartar in three days threw up a Trench ten Leagues in length, with several Forts upon it. This will seem incredible in these Parts, but is not so to me, who have seen the vast numbers of People that can be gather'd to furnish such a Work; tho it be very much if it had been but six or seven Leagues, and it would take up a great multitude to man it.

From Pag. 176 forwards, he describes the taking of Canton; it cost dear. That which most terrify'd the Chineses was, a wooden Castle the Tartars built, which overtopped the Walls whence they play'd their Guns, and then the Chineses began to abandon the Wall. Peter Caravallo a Mongrel got by a Portuguese, who seeing himself left alone upon the Wall, fled hastily, told me, that if only 2 hundred Men had kept their Post with Fire-Arms, they had certainly repulsed the Tartars, and disappointed their Designs. The Fathers, Alvaro Semedo, and Feliciano Pacheco, both Portugueses, were then in that Metropolis; the latter, as he told us several times, got out, tho with much difficulty, with his Musket upon his Shoulder. The Tartars took the former, and from him a great Sum of Mony, as F. Antony Gouvea told us in that City.

18. Pag. 180. He says, almost all the Tartars love, honour, and respect those of his Society; this appears by our Sufferings. He adds, Et non pauci ex illis jam fidem amiserunt nostram. I understand it not; if by amiserunt he means they have receiv'd, he is much deceiv'd; here and there one it may be, and this seems to be the Author's meaning.

19. From Pag. 182 forwards, he speaks of the cruel Actions of the second Rebel, or Robber; I look upon them all to be true. The Fathers Magallanes and Bullo suffer'd very much under this Man. F. Gouvea said it was their own Fault, because they were very headstrong.

20. Pag. 193 and 194. he says, That Robber call'd together the Learned to be examin'd, and that above 18000 met; All whom, as the custom is, he put into the College of the City, as it were, to be examin'd, and put them all barbarously to death. F. Martinez here gives it for granted, that in every Metropolis there is a College for Examinations, and that large enough to contain the number above-mention'd. Why then did he give out at Rome, that the Examinations were made, and Degrees taken in the Chappel dedicated to Confucius, which cannot hold fifty Men standing? There is no answering this Point.

21. Pag. 207. in Appendice, he says in the Margin; "The religious Worship of the Chineses towards the Dead. And in the body of the Page, "No Punishment is more heinous among the Chineses than that sort of Execution; for by reason of the Religion ingrafted in their Minds, they pay a supreme Veneration to the Sepulchers of the Dead. Hence it follows that all the Chineses do towards their Dead, is not a Civil Worship. This is certainly a necessary Consequence, else it would not be a Religious Worship of the Chineses towards the Dead, nor would the extraordinary Veneration they have for their Tombs be an Effect of the Religion ingrafted in their Minds. It were well for the Father if this were not contrary to what he himself propos'd at Rome. From what is here writ I also infer, that what I said in another place is true, that the Chineſes look upon the place of their Sepulchers as holy, and not profane, as well as other Nations.

To confirm what I alledg in another place out of F. Suarez, contra Reg. Ang. to prove that the Worship of the Chineſes towards their Dead, is not only Civil and Political, but Ceremonious and Religious: I here add what F. John de Sancto Thoma says, 2. 2. q. 87. Disp. 27. Art. 4. "A Worship is call'd Holy and Religious, not because it is Divine, but because it is above the Civil Degree; that is, it is given to Persons near to God, and above humane Conversation: And, because those Persons to whom it is given, are above the Civil Rank. No Man who has been in China, can reasonably defend, that the Ceremonies wherewith that Nation honours their Philosophers, Emperors, and Progenitors departed, are not far superior to those they use to honour the living. Card. Lug. de Incarnat. Disp. 35. Seſſ. 1. n. 1. says, "That is call'd Civil Worship, which usually Men give to one another. And it is certainly very different from that the Chineſes give to their Dead. This Matter shall be handled at large in the second Tome; for the present it suffices that F. Martinez calls that the Chineſes practice, a Religious Worship towards the Dead.

22. Pag. 210. he says, He knows not what was the End of Jun Lie, I set it down in the Fifth Book. He adds, That F. Andrew Xavier follow'd him, his Wife and Son. I have given an Account how they abandon'd and forsook him; F. Vittorio Riccio was told it by the Eunuch, who went to crave Succours in the Island Hia Muen; and because the King, Queen, and other Christians had never a Priest, he press'd to have the said Father go with him; who would have gone, had he been furnish'd with a Companion to whom he might commit the Charge of his Christians.

23. Pag. 215. and last, He tells the News he receiv'd at Bruxels of the Missioners. Tartars kindness to the Missioners, that they gave full liberty to preach the Gospel, that they allow'd the erecting of new Churches, and contributed towards them. The last I neither do, nor for the World can agree to: The first part I grant, and was an Eye-witness to it: But that mighty Liberty and Toleration lasted not long, because it was all built upon Sand. F. Martinez, as I was often told, was of opinion, that the Tartar was lawfully possess'd of the Chineſe Empire. I always thought he would have prov'd his Title in this little Book; but nothing can be gather'd out of all he writes to make this out, or prove his Assertion, so that I am left more at liberty to go on in my own Opinion.

24. A Learned and Judicious Man thinks nothing impossible. S. Thomas, 1 p. q. 94. Art. 4. "Nothing is incredible to a wise Man; Children and Fools are surpriz'd at every thing as strange. He will not therefore make a doubt of what has been hitherto said, or shall be added in the second Tome. Some Persons are amaz'd to hear that many new Christians turn Apostates, without regarding that many of our own People do the same among the Mahometans, of which sort there are enough at Tunis, Algier, and in other parts. We know, that according to S. Augustin, lib. 1. cont. Julian. c. 3. whom A Lapide quotes and follows in Gen. 3. 5. Adam lost his faith when he sinn'd: So S. Peter. What S. Thomas did we all know. Besides, Himeneus and Alexander fell back, 2 Tim. 4. What wonder is it the Chineſes and other Nations should do the same? What we ought to admire is, that there should be any who forsaking so many Idolatries in which they were bred from their Infancy, come over and embrace our Holy Law, without seeing any Miracles as the Antients did. And whosoever reflects upon the inconsistency of the Jews, who saw so many Prodigies as God perform'd among them, and for them, will less wonder at what many Chineſes have done: I see more to admire at among Christians. One of my Order exhorted an Alcade of Manila to moderate himself in some Particulars, he put him in mind of the Account he was to give to God; and he answer'd, Let me but come off well when I am call'd to account here, for that in the other World does not much trouble me. No Chineſe would would have utter'd such an extravagancy. This Man had not read that which all we who have Faith ought to know. Let him that has the curiosity read Oleaster in 6 Levit. ad mores. I call'd to mind a while since an extraordinary Passage, which is in the Classick Chinese Authors. They write of one who being altogether ignorant, one morning awak'd so learned, that he repeated all the Chinese Doctrines by heart. They praise this Man very much; what I understand of it is, that only God, and none else can infuse habitual Knowledge: This is an agreed Point of Divinity, which A Lapid follows in Gen. 11. 7. The Devil may infuse actual Knowledge, either suggesting, or speaking himself, and perhaps it is most likely he did so in this case we have mention'd. Other Stories and Accidents, which might be added in this place, are inserted in the second Tome.

Decrees and Propositions resolv'd Rome, by order of the Holy Con- gregation of the Inquisition.

Questions propos'd to the Holy Congregation, de Propaganda Fide, by the Missioners of China. With the Answers to them, approved by Decree of the said Holy Congregation.

The following Propositions transmitted by the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, to the Inquisition, were resolv'd as follows, by the Fathers Qualificators of the said Inquisition.

1. WHETHER the Chinese Christians are oblig'd to the observation of the positive Precepts of the Church, as to Fasting, Confessing, and Receiving once a Year, keeping of Holy Days, in the same manner as the Indians in New Spain and the Philippine Islands are oblig'd, by the Decree of Pope Paul the 3d for the Western and Southern Indians.

Fasting.

They are of opinion, that the Positive Laws of the Church for Fasting bind the Chinese Christians, and that the Missioners are to notify it to them. But considering the nature of Countries, and Persons, his Holiness if he pleases may grant the same Dispensation Paul the 3d of happy Memory granted to the Indians; which being obtain'd, let the Missioners endeavour to make known to them the Goodness of our Holy Mother the Church, who favours them in remitting a great part of what she has decreed for the whole World.

Confession.

They also judg the aforesaid Chinese are oblig'd to Sacramental Confession once a Year, and the Missioners are to make them sensible of this Duty.

Communicating.

The same they judg as to receiving the Holy Communion once a Year. But as for the performing of it at the time appointed, viz. at Easter, that is to be understood, unless there be some impediment, or any great danger threaten. However care is to be taken, that they receive within 2 or 3 Months next before or after Easter, as far as may be done without danger, or at least within the space of a Year beginning from Easter.

Lastly, they judg the Chinese who are converted to the Faith are absolutely oblig'd to keep Holy-days, and the Missioners are bound to let them understand as much. Yet, if his Holiness please, he may limit the number of Holy-days according to the Privilege granted the Indians by Paul the 3d.

2. Whether the Ministers of the Gospel in the said Kingdom may, for the present at least, forbear giving Women the Holy Oil of Catechumens, the putting Spittle in their Ears, and Salt in their Mouths: As also administering the Sacrament of Extreme Unction to Women. The cause of putting the Question is, for that the Chinese are very jealous of their Wives, Daughters and other Women, and will be scandaliz'd at such Actions.

They judg the Sacramental Rites ought to be us'd in baptizing of Women, and the Extreme Unction to be given them; and that the cause they alledg for their doubt is not sufficient for the Missioners (as far as lies in their power) to omit these things. Therefore care is to be taken, that such wholesome Rites and Ceremonies be introduced and observ'd, and the Missioners must administer them with such Circumspection, and give the Men such instructions, that they may be void of all thoughts of any indecency.

3. It is establish'd by Law in the aforesaid Kingdom, that 30 per Cent. Interest taken for Money lent, without any regard Gain otherwise failing, or Loss accruing. the Question is, Whether it be lawful for the said Chineses to receive the said 30 per cent. the Rate establish'd by Law in that Kingdom, tho their Profit cease not in another place, nor Loss accrue. The cause of the doubt is, for that the Principal runs some hazard, to wit, that he who borrows may run away, or delay Payment, or force the Creditor to recover it by Law, or the like.

They judg nothing above the Principal ought to be taken immediately and directly for the Loan. But if they receive any thing on account of the danger may probably happen, as in this case, they are not to be molested, so regard be had to the nature of the danger and the likelihood of it, and there be a proportion betwixt the greatness of the danger and what is receiv'd.

4. It is frequent throughout all China to have publick Houses assign'd for Usury, where publick Usurers put out their Money to use upon Pawns, deducting the Interest, and yet to receive so much per Month for every Ducat; and in case the owner of the Pawns within a certain number of Years does not redeem them, paying the Principal and Interest, he loses all his Right and Title to those Pawns. Now these Houses are useful to the Publick; and tho the Usurers themselves would desist from that Trade of Usury, yet they are compell'd to follow it by the Magistrates. The Question is, Whether if these Usurers should desire to be converted to the Faith, they may be baptiz'd tho they continue in their course of Usury, for the reason above mention'd, or what is to be done in that case?

They judg that the Chineses who continue in the Practice of Usury cannot be baptiz'd. But if they be compell'd by a Magistrate to lend their own Money, then they may take something above the Principal, tho they have a Pawn, both because of the trouble forced upon them, and for their care in keeping the Pawns, as also of the Profit they might make another way, and of the present Loss they are at. But if at the time appointed, there shall remain upon selling the Pawn any thing above the Principal and Lawful Interest accruing, for the reasons abovemention'd they shall restore it to the Owner.

5. Whether the Sons of the aforesaid Usurers, being Christians when they inherit their Fathers Wealth, be oblig'd to make restitution of what their Parents got by Usury either in the whole or in part, according to the excessive extortion. And in case such

Sons of Usurers, now become Christians, be compelled by the Government, or Magistrate to open and keep up their Parents publick Houses of Usury; what then the Ministers of the Gospel are to do in this case for the ease of their Consciences.

They judg, that the Heirs of Usurers are obliged to make restitution of what their Parents have unlawfully got by Usury, to the true Owners, if any such can be found; if not, according to the rules assign'd by Doctors. But the actual restitution must be directed by Learned, Pious, and Discreet Men. As for the second part of the Question, it is answer'd in the next above it.

6. It is the Custom among the People, and Contributors in the Cities of that Kingdom to lay certain Impositions, which are exacted from the neighbouring People, to be spent at the Feast of the new Year, in Sacrifices and Idolatries of their Devils, in Invitations and Banquets prepar'd in their Temples, as also in Festivals, and other indifferent shows for the Peoples Diversion. Quære, whether it be lawful for Christians, and their Ministers (of whom it is demanded as of Neighbours) at least for the present, to contribute towards these things? For in case the Christians would not contribute to it, some Tumult will be rais'd against them by the Gentiles.

They judg the Christians may contribute Money, provided they do not design by such Contributions to join in those Idolatrous, or Superstitious acts; supposing that cause for it, which is propos'd but doubtfully: Especially entring their Protestation, if it may be done with Convenience, that they pay those Contributions only for the diversion of the People, and indifferent actions, or at least such as are not opposite to the Worship of the Christian Religion.

7. In all the Cities and Towns of that Kingdom, there are Temples erected and dedicated to a certain Idol call'd Chim Ho-am, which the Chineses pretend to be the Ruler, Protector, and Guardian of the City; and it is an establish'd Law of the Kingdom, that all Governours of Towns and Cities, whom they call Mandarin, when they enter upon the Government, and twice a Month throughout the Year, upon pain of forfeiting their Employment, shall repair to the said Temples, and there prostrating themselves before the Altar of the said Idol, kneeling, and bowing their Head down to the very Ground, adore and worship the said Idol, and offer in Sacrifice to it Candles, Perfumes, Flowers, Flesh, and Wine. And when they take possession of their Government, they take an Oath

rette.* Oath before the aforesaid Idol, that they will govern uprightly; and in case they fail, submit themselves to be punished by the Idol; and also they beg of him a Rule and Method to govern well, and other things to this purpose. Quære, whether considering the Frailty of that Nation, it may be allow'd for the present, that such Governours being Christians carry some Cross, which they may conceal among the Flowers on the Idol's Altar, or in their own hands; and directing their intention not to the Idol, but to the Cross, perform all those Genuflexions, Bowings, and Adorations before that Altar outwardly and feignedly, directing all the Worship inwardly in their Heart to the Cross? For if such Governours be obliged to desist from doing this, they will sooner revolt from the Faith than lose their Commands.

They judg, it is no way lawful for Christians to perform these publick Acts of Worship and Honour to an Idol, upon pretence, or intentionally to a Cross they have in their Hand, or hid among Flowers on the Altar.

Confucius.* 8. In the aforesaid Kingdom of China there was a learned Master in Moral Philosophy, long since dead, whose Name was KUM FUCU, so much admir'd throughout the Kingdom for his Doctrine, Rules, and Instructions, that as well the Kings as all other Persons of what Degree or Quality soever, propose him to themselves as an example to be imitated and follow'd, at least in the speculative part, and extol and worship him as a Saint; and there are Temples erected in Honour of the said Master in every City and Town. Governours are oblig'd to offer a Solemn Sacrifice twice a Year in his Temple, they themselves doing the Duty of a Priest, (they repair thither without Solemnity twice a Month throughout the Year) with them go some of the Literati, or Learned, to assist them in the offering of that Sacrifice, which consists of a whole dead Swine, a whole Goat, Candles, Wine, Flowers, Sweets, &c. Also all the Learned, when they take a Degree, are oblig'd to go to this Master's Temple, to kneel before his Altar, and offer on it Candles and Sweets. All this Worship, Sacrifice and Honour, according to the formal intention of all those Gentiles, is design'd as a Thanksgiving for the good Instructions left by him in his Doctrine, and that they may obtain of him, through the Merit of his excellent Wit, the Blessing of Wisdom and Understanding. Quære, whether such Governours as are or shall be Christians, or the Learned call'd and forc'd, may repair to the said Temple, offer such Sacrifice, or assist at it, or make any Genuflexions before that Altar, or receive any Part of those Idol Offerings; chiefly, because those Gentiles believe, that he who eats of those Idol Offerings will make a great Progress in Learning, and advance in Degrees; and whether they may lawfully do this, carrying a Cross in their Hands, as was mention'd in the last foregoing doubt, because if this be forbidden them, the People will mutiny, the Ministers of the Gospel will be banish'd, and the Conversion of Souls will be hindered, and cease.

They judg, that what is contain'd in the Question propos'd cannot be allow'd the Christians upon any pretence whatsoever.

9. 'Tis a Custom inviolably observ'd among the Chinese, as a Doctrine deliver'd by the said Master KUM FUCU, to have Temples in all Towns of the Kingdom, dedicated to their Grandfathers and Progenitors; and all that are of the Family meet twice a Year in every one of them, to offer solemn Sacrifices to their aforesaid Progenitors, with abundance of Ceremonies; and they place the Image of their deceas'd Parent or Grandfather on an Altar adorn'd with many Candles, Flowers, and Sweets; and in this Sacrifice there is one that plays the part of the Priest, who with his assistance, offers Flesh, Wine, Sweets, Goats Heads, &c. Now this Sacrifice, according to the common intention of that Nation, is design'd as a Thanksgiving to their aforesaid Progenitors, an Honour and Respect paid them for all Benefits already receiv'd, and which they hope to receive from them. Therefore, prostrating before the Altar, they offer many Prayers, begging Health, long Life, a plentiful Harvest, many Children, much Prosperity, and to be deliver'd from all Adversity. Which Sacrifice is also perform'd in their Houses and at the Tombs of the dead, but with less Solemnity. Quære, whether Christians may feignedly, and only in outward show, as was propos'd above, be present at this Sacrifice, or exercise any part of it jointly with the Infidels, either in the Temple at home, or at the Tomb publicly, or privately, or how it may be allow'd Christians? lest if they be absolutely forbid doing it, they lose the Faith, or rather forsake the outward actions of Christians.

They judg, it is no way lawful for the Chinese Christians to be present at the Sacrifices to their Progenitors, or at their Prayers, or at any superstitious Rites whatsoever the Gentiles use towards them, tho it be without any intention of joining with them, or only for outward form; and much less can they be permitted to exercise any Function relating to those matters.

10. The

The Chinese Christians do affirm, that by the aforesaid Offerings they design to pay other Honour to their Progenitors, than if whilst they were yet living, and that is in memory and as an acknowledgment of the Being receiv'd from them; and were they living, they would offer them the same things to feed on; and they offer them without any other intention, or hope in their Prayers, knowing they are dead, and their Souls bury'd in Hell. Quære, whether if these things were done among Christians only without the Company of Infidels in the Temples, or Houses, or at the Tombs, placing some Cross on the Altar of the aforesaid dead, and directing their intention to it, provided they attribute nothing to their Progenitors but a Filial Respect, which (if they were still living) they would have paid, by presenting them Eatables, and Sweets; that so they may please the People: The question is therefore, whether this may be tolerated for the present to avoid other inconveniences?

They judg, consequently to what has been said above, that the aforesaid Points cannot be salv'd, either by the Application of a Cross, or the absence of Gentiles, or by the intention of the Actions, in themselves unlawful and superstitious, in the Worship of the true God.

11. Moreover the Chinese, to put them in mind of their Ancestors, make use of certain Tablets on which the Names of their Progenitors are writ, which they call the Seats of the Souls, believing the Souls of the dead come to rest upon those Tablets, to receive Sacrifices and Offerings; and the aforesaid Tablets are placed on Altars peculiar to that purpose, with Roses, Candles, Lamps, and Sweets about them; and they kneel, pray and offer up their Devotions before the said Tablets, and expect those dead Persons shall relieve them in their Troubles and Adversities. Quære, whether it be lawful for Christians, laying aside all Heathen Superstitions and Errors, to make use for the present of the said Tablets, and to place them among the Images of our Lord and the Saints on the same Altar, or on another apart, adorn'd as aforesaid, for the Satisfaction of the Gentiles; or whether they may offer the aforesaid Prayers, and sacrifice with the intention aforesaid?

They judg, it is absolutely unlawful to keep those Tablets on a true Altar, and peculiarly dedicated to their Ancestors, much less to offer Prayers and Sacrifice to them, tho it be done with a private and counterfeit intention.

12. When any Person happens to die in that Kingdom, whether he be a Christian, or a Gentile, it is observ'd as an inviolable

Custom, to set up an Altar in the House of the Party deceas'd, and to place on it his or Nava-ber Image, or else the Tablet aforesaid, and to adorn it with Sweets, Flowers and Candles, and to set the Carcase in the Coffin behind it. All they who come to those Houses to condole, make 3 or 4 Genuflections before the Altar and Image of the Person deceas'd, prostrating themselves on the Ground, with their Heads touching it, bringing with them some Candles and Sweets, to be consum'd and burnt on the Altar before the Image of the dead Person. Quære, whether it be lawful for Christians, and chiefly for the Ministers of the Holy Gospel, to do these things, especially when the Persons deceas'd are of the greatest Quality?

They judg, that provided the Tablet set up be only in the nature of a Board, and not a true and exact Altar, if all other particulars be within the bounds of a Civil and Political Worship, they may be tolerated.

13. Quære, whether the Ministers of the Gospel are oblig'd to declare to, and particularly to instruct the Catechumens ready for Baptism, that their Sacrifices and all things above mention'd are unlawful, tho there ensue many inconveniences of so doing, as their forbearing to receive Baptism, the Persecution, Death, or Banishment of the Ministers of the Gospel?

They judg, the Ministers of the Gospel are oblig'd to teach that all Sacrifices but those of the true God are unlawful, that the Worship of Devils and Idols is to be laid aside, and that all things relating to that Worship are false, and repugnant to the Christian Faith: But that they are to descend to Particulars, according as they find the readiness of wit, or dulness of the Catechumens shall require, and with respect to other Circumstances, Customs, and Dangers.

14. In the Chinese Language this word Xing signifies Holy; and in the Books of Christian Doctrine printed by some Ministers of the Holy Gospel, this word XING is made use of in naming the most blessed Trinity, Christ our Lord, the blessed Virgin, and the rest of the Saints. Quære, whether when in the said Books there is occasion for naming the Chinese Master CUM FU CU, or the King of China's Order, or other Kings, who are generally reputed Holy in that Kingdom, tho they are Infidels and Idolaters, it be lawful for us the Ministers of Christ to call the aforesaid Persons by this name XING?

They judg, no positive resolution can be given concerning this Word, or the use of it, unless they first had a knowledge

Nava-rette. ledg of the Language, and of its true and genuine signification. But if that word in China has a latitude, the Ministers may make use of it; if it be confin'd to signify a true and perfect Sanctity, then they may not upon any account.

Worship of their Emperor 15. In many Temples of that Kingdom there is a Gilt Tablet placed on a Table, or Altar, and set out with all sorts of Ornaments, as Candles, Flowers and Sweets, on which Tablet the following Letters or Characters are writ: HOAM TY UAN SUI VAN VAN SUI. That is, May the King of China live many thousands of Years. And it is the custom of those Idolaters twice or thrice a Year to sacrifice before that Tablet, and make Genusflexions in honour of it.

Quære, Whether the Ministers of the Gospel may place such an Altar and Table in their Churches in manner aforesaid, and this before the Altar on which the Priests of God offer up the unspotted Offering?

They judg that excluding the Sacrifices, and Altar properly so call'd, the other parts, which seem to imply only a Civil Worship, or can be reduced to it, may be permitted.

Mas for Infidels. 16. Q. Whether it will be lawful in that Kingdom for the Christians to pray and offer the true Sacrifice to our Lord God for their Dead who depart this life in their infidelity!

They judg it is utterly unlawful, if they depart this life in their infidelity.

17. Q. Whether we Preachers of the Gospel are oblig'd in that Kingdom to preach Christ crucify'd, and to show his most holy Image, especially in our Churches? The cause of making this doubt, is because the Gentiles are scandaliz'd at such preaching and showing, and look upon it as the greatest folly.

They judg that the Doctrine of Christ's Passion is on no pretence or policy whatsoever to be delay'd till after Baptism, but of necessity to precede it. But tho the Ministers of the Gospel are not oblig'd to the actual preaching of Christ Crucify'd in every Sermon, but to deliver the Word of God and Divine Mysteries discreetly, and according as opportunity serves, and to expound them according to the capacity of the Catechumens, yet they are not to forbear preaching upon the Passion of our Lord, for that reason, because the Gentiles are scandaliz'd at it, or think it a folly.

They also judg it convenient, that there be Images of Christ Crucify'd in the Churches, and therefore care is to be taken, that they be expos'd to view, as much as conveniently may be.

Decree of the Pope, 1645.

“ THE most Eminent Lord Cardinal Genette, having reported the above-written Questions, with the Answers and Resolutions of the Congregation of Divines particularly appointed to examine the said Questions; the Holy Congregation of the most Eminent Lords Cardinals de Propaganda Fide, approv'd the aforesaid Answers and Resolutions; and upon the humble application of the same Congregation, our most Holy Father for preserving of Unity in Preaching, and the practice of it, has strictly commanded all and every the Missioners, of what Order, Rule, or Institute soever, even those of the Society of Jesús, who at present are or shall be in the Kingdom of China, upon pain of incurring ipso facto an Excommunication, reserv'd only to be taken off by his Holiness, and the See Apostolick, that they carefully observe the aforesaid Answers and Resolutions, and practise them, and cause them to be observ'd and “ practis'd by others, whom it shall concern, till such time as his Holiness, or the Holy See Apostolick shall order the contrary. Printed at Rome in the Printing-House of the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 1645. with Permission of Superiors.

This Decree was set forth at the instance of F. John Baptist de Morales, a Religious Man of our Province of the Rosary in the Philippine Islands, bred in the Monastery of S. Paul, in the City Exija, a great Missioner in China, of known Virtue, and very zealous for the good of Souls. He having preach'd the Gospel some years in that Empire, and together with the Religious of the Order of our Holy Father S. Francis, who preach'd our holy Faith there, observ'd some considerable Points, which they could not resolve themselves; by express Command from his Superiors, he sail'd from Macao to Persia, whence he travel'd by Land, and came to Rome, where he fairly propos'd the Doubts mention'd in this Paper, which which his Holiness, Pope Urban the 8th, had by another way before receiv'd an account of, as he plainly told the said Father, when he kiss'd his foot, ordering those Doubts to be laid before the Congregation of the Holy Inquisition. They were finally resolv'd and deliver'd, when Pope Innocent the 10th of happy Memory, sat in S. Peter's Chair. In the Year 1646, when I went over to the Philippine Islands with F. John, we carry'd along with us a great number of Authentick Copies; some, tho but few, were left in Europe. When we came to Manila, a Packet sent by Monsenhor Ingoli Secretary to the Congregation de Propaganda Fide, was deliver'd to the Chapter, the See being then Vacant, and with it an Authentick Copy of the Decree, with Orders from that Holy Congregation to publish and make it known to all Religious Orders, which was punctually perform'd. He sent another Packet and Copy to the same effect, to the Metropolitan of Goa, the Court of the East-Indies, which was no less punctually obey'd. The same was done in the City Macao, inhabited by Portugueses, and seated in the Dominions of China. In the Year 1649 F. John went over again into China, and by express Order from the Holy Congregation, according to form, intimated the aforesaid Decree to the F. Vice-Provincial of the Society then in China; to which his Reverence, and others of his Brethren answer'd, They had further matter to lay before his Holiness.

The most Reverend and most Learned F. Thomas Hurtado, afterwards writ in Spain upon this Decree, p. 1. resol. Moral. vac. 3. ch. 1. resol. 40. The most Illustrious Lord D. F. Peter de Tapia, Archbishop of Sevil, quotes it in his Caten. Moral. Princip. tom. 2. lib. 1. quæst. 3. art. 9. n. 20. he refers to the Author above, who speaks of it in his resol. orthod. Moral. de vero Mart. Fidei tract. ult. F. Henao of the Society mentions it too, de Divin. Sacrif. disp. 29. sect. 17. where he raises some Doubts, which I will answer fairly and distinctly in the second Tome. F. Angelo Maria of the Regular Clergy writ at large in Italy upon the same Subject, with much sincerity and good Doctrine. Some without any reason for it, as I shall make appear in my second Tome, say that that our Decree was annul'd and vacated by that which pass'd in the Year 1646, at the instance of the R. F. Martin Martinez, which shall be mention'd hereafter. For this reason the Lord Bishop D. F. John de Polanco, my Companion in that Mission, ask'd of the Congregation of the Holy Inquisition, whether it was so or not. Their answer was, that they confirm'd it anew, as the Reader may see immediately.

Thus much may suffice till my second Tome comes abroad, only adding, that the faithful printed Memorial, which was presented some Years since to his Majesty King Philip the Fourth, mention'd by the most Reverend F. Hurtado, and several times by F. Henao, was compos'd by F. James Collado, above spoke of; this is a matter well known, and I cannot imagin how it comes to pass that Grave and Learned Author should not have heard of it all this while. What he says, Long Ways long Lies, I have sufficiently observ'd on account of several Passages in my second Tome, and some in this.

Answers of the Holy Congregation of the Universal Inquisition, approv'd by our most Holy Father Alexander the Seventh, to the Questions propos'd by the Missioners of the Society of Jesus in China, Ann. 1656.

THE underwritten Questions, and many others were propos'd to the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, by some Missioners of China, in the Year 1645. which being by his Holiness's Order transmitted to the Holy Congregation of the Supreme and Universal Inquisition, each of them was examin'd by the Divines Qualificators, and the Answer annex'd to every one, in the same manner as follows.

1. Whether the Chinese Christians be oblig'd to observe the positive Ecclesiastical
Vol. I.

Law, as to Fasting, Confessing, and Receiving once a Year, keeping of Holy Days in such manner as the Indians in New Spain and the Philippine Islands are oblig'd, according to the appointment of Pope Paul the Third, for the Western and Southern Indians?

They judg the positive Ecclesiastical Law for Fasting absolutely binds the Chinese Christians, and that the Missioners are to declare it to them. But with regard had to the nature of the Countries and People, if his Holiness please,
C c he

he may grant them the Dispensation, which was formerly granted to the Indians by Pope Paul the Third of Happy Memory; which being obtain'd, let the Missioners endeavour to make them sensible of our Holy Mother the Church's Goodness to them, whom it eases of a great part of what is laid upon all the World.

They also judg the aforesaid Chineses are oblig'd to Sacramental Confession once a Year, and the Missioners are to make them sensible of this duty.

The same they judg as to Receiving the Holy Communion once a Year. But as for the performing it at the time appointed, viz. at Easter, that is to be understood unless there be some impediment, or any great danger threaten. However care is to be taken that they receive within two or three Months next before or after Easter, as far as may be done without danger, or at least within the space of a Year, beginning from Easter.

Lastly, they judg, the Chineses who are converted to the Faith, are absolutely oblig'd to keep Holidays, and the Missioners are bound to let them understand as much. Yet, if his Holiness please, he may limit the number of the Holidays, according to the Privilege granted to the Indians by Pope Paul the Third.

2. Whether the Ministers of the Gospel in the said Kingdom may for the present at least, forbear giving Women the Holy Oil of Catechumens, the putting Spittle in their Ears, and Salt in their Mouths; as also administering the Sacrament of Extreme Unction to Women? The cause of putting the question is, for that the Chineses are very jealous of their Wives, Daughters, and other Women, and will be scandaliz'd at such actions.

They judg the Sacramental Rites ought be us'd in Baptizing of Women, and the Extreme Unction to be given them; and that the cause they alledg for their doubt, is not sufficient for the Missioners (as far as lies in their power) to omit these things. Therefore care is to be taken that such wholesom Rites and Ceremonies be introduced, and observ'd, and the Missioners must administer them with such circumspection, and give the Men such Instructions, that they may be free from all thoughts of any indecency.

3. In the foresaid Kingdom of China, there was a Learned Master in Moral Philosophy, long since dead, whose name was KUM FU ZU, so much admir'd throughout the Kingdom for his Doctrine, Rules and Instructions, that as well the King, as all other Persons of what degree or quality soever, propose him to themselves as an example to be imitated and follow'd, at least in the Speculative part, and extol and worship him as a Saint; and there are Temples erected in honour of the said Master in every City and Town. Governours are oblig'd to offer a solemn Sacrifice twice a Year in his Temple, they themselves doing the duty of a Priest (they repair thither without Solemnity twice a Month throughout the Year) with them go some of the Literati, or Learned, to assist them in the offering of that Sacrifice, which consists of a whole dead Swine, a whole Goat, Candles, Wine, Flowers, Sweets, &c. Also all the Learned, when they take a Degree are oblig'd to go to this Master's Temple to kneel before his Altar, and offer on it Candles and Sweets. All this Worship, Sacrifice and Honour, according to the formal intention of all those Gentiles, is design'd as a Thanksgiving, for the good Instructions left by him in his Doctrine, and that they may obtain of him through the merit of his Wit, the blessing of Understanding.

Quære, Whether such Governours as are or shall be Christians, or the Learned call'd and forced, may repair to the said Temple, offer such Sacrifice, or assist at it, or make any Genuflexions before that Altar, or receive any part of those Idol-offerings; chiefly because those Gentiles believe, that he who eats of those Idol-offerings, will make a great progress in Learning, and advance in Degrees? And whether they may lawfully do this, carrying a Cross in their hands, as was mention'd in the last foregoing doubt, because if this be forbidden them, the People will mutiny, the Ministers of the Gospel will be banish'd, and the conversion of Souls will be hindered and cease?

They judg that what is contain'd in the Question propos'd cannot be allow'd the Christians upon any pretence whatsoever.

4. 'Tis a Custom inviolably observ'd among the Chineses, as a Doctrine deliver'd by the said Master KUM FU CU, to have Temples in all Towns of the Kingdom, dedicated to their Grandfathers and Progenitors; and all that are of the Family meet twice a Year in every one of them, to offer solemn Sacrifices to their aforesaid Progenitors, with abundance of Ceremonies; and they place the Image of their deceas'd Parent or Grandfather, on an Altar adorn'd with many many Candles, Flowers, and Sweets; and in this Sacrifice there is one that plays the part of the Priest, with his Assistants, who offer Wine, Flesh, Sweets, Goats-Heads, &c. Now this Sacrifice according to the common intention of that Nation, is design'd as a Thanksgiving to their aforesaid Progenitors, and Honour and Respect paid them for all benefits already receiv'd, and which they hope to receive from them. Therefore prostrating before the Altar, they offer many Prayers, begging Health, long Life, a plentiful Harvest, many Children, much Prosperity, and to be deliver'd from all Adversity. Which Sacrifice is also perform'd in their Houses, and at the Tombs of the Dead, but with less Solemnity.

Quære, Whether Christians may feignedly and only in outward show, as was propos'd above, be present at this Sacrifice, or exercise any part of it jointly with the Infidels, either in the Temple at home, or at the Tomb, publicly or privately, or how it may be allow'd Christians? lest if they be absolutely forbid doing it, they lose the Faith, or rather forsake the outward actions of Christians.

They judge it is no way lawful for the Chinese Christians to be present at the Sacrifices to their Progenitors, or at their Prayers, or at any Superstitious Rites whatsoever the Gentiles use towards them, tho it be without any intention of joining with them, or only for outward form; and much less can they be permitted to exercise any function relating to those matters.

But whereas the Missioners of the Society of Jesus in the aforesaid Kingdom were not heard at that time, after the Year 1655 they propos'd the aforesaid four Questions to the same holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, with the diversity of Circumstances, which is adjoin'd to each Question, &c. The matter was by Order of our most Holy Father remitted to the Holy Congregation of the Supreme and Holy Inquisition. The said Holy Congregation having heard the Opinions of the Qualificators, answer'd as follows.

1. Quære, Whether the Missioners are oblig'd to signify to the new Christians, when first baptiz'd, the Ecclesiastical positive Law as binding under mortal Sin, in relation to Fasting and Confessing, and Receiving once a Year.

The reason of making a doubt about Fasting is, because the Chinese are us'd from their Infancy to eat three times a Day, which the lightness of their Diet obliges them to. This would oblige Magistrates to go to their Courts fasting where they continue from Eight in the Morning till Two Afternoon, which they could not possibly do. Nava-rette.

The reason of making the doubt concerning Holidays, Confession, and Communion, is because most of the Christians must work for their Living, and the Christians are often forced by Infidel Magistrates to do several sorts of Work upon Holidays. And the Christian Magistrates themselves must keep their Courts upon Days, which among us are kept Holy, upon pain of forfeiting their Employments. Holidays.

The Missioners are but few in number, the Kingdom of a vast extent, and therefore many Christians cannot hear Mass upon Holidays, and Receive and Confess once a Year. Confession.

The Holy Congregation, according to what has been above propos'd, judges, That the positive Ecclesiastical Law relating to fasting, keeping of Holidays, Sacramental Confession and Communion once a Year, is to be made known to the Christian Chinese by the Missioners, as obliging under mortal Sin; but that they may at the same time declare the causes which excuse the Faithful from the observing of those Precepts, and if his Holiness pleases, Power may be granted the Missioners to grant Dispensations as they think fit, only in particular cases.

2. Quære, Whether all the Sacramentals are to be applied in the baptizing of Females at Womens estate? Again, Whether it be sufficient to administer the Sacrament of Extreme Unction only to such Women as desire it? Baptism. Extreme Unction.

Again, Whether it may be refus'd even them that ask it upon a prudent foresight of inconveniences and dangers that may ensue to all Christians?

The occasion of making this Doubt, is the incredible modesty of the Chinese Women, their reserv'dness, and their commendable avoiding, not only the conversation of Men, but even the sight of them; in which particular, unless the Missioners be extraordinary cautious, a mighty Scandal will be given the Chinese, and the whole Body of Christians there may be expos'd to imminent Danger. Modesty.

The Holy Congregation, in order to what has been above propos'd, judges, That on account of a pressing proportionable necessity, some Sacramentals may be omitted in baptizing of Women, and that the Sacrament of Extreme Unction may be also forborn.

Quer. 3. Whether the Christian Literati, or Learned Chinese, may perform the Ceremony of taking the Degrees, which is done in Confucius his Hall? For no Sacrifice, or Minister of the Idolatrous Sect is concern'd there; nothing is perform'd that has been instituted by Idolaters, but only the Scholars and Philosophers meet, acknowledging Confucius as their Master, with only Civil and Political Rites instituted from their very Original for mere Civil Worship.

For all that are to take their Degrees go together into Confucius his Hall, where the Chancellors, Doctors, and Examiners expect them; there they altogether, without offering any thing, perform those Ceremonies and Inclinations after the Chinese fashion, which all Scholars do to their Masters whilst living: and thus having acknowledg'd Confucius the Philosopher for their Master, they take their Degrees from the Chancellors, and depart. Besides, that Hall of Confucius is an Academy, and not properly a Temple, for it is shut to all but Scholars.

The Holy Congregation judges, according to what has been above propos'd, that the aforesaid Ceremonies may be allow'd the Chinese, because the Worship seems to be merely Civil and Political.

Worship of the Dead.

Quer. 4. Whether the Ceremonies paid to the Dead, according to the Rules set by Philosophers, may be allow'd among Christians, forbidding all the superstitious part which has been added?

Again, Whether the Christians may perform those lawful Ceremonies in company with their Pagan Kindred?

Again, Whether Christians may be present, especially after making a Protestation of Faith, when the Infidels perform the ceremonious part, they not joining with, or encouraging them, only because it would be a great reflection if they were then absent, and it would cause Enmity and Hatred? The Chinese assign no Divinity to the Souls of the Dead, they neither hope nor ask any thing of them.

There are three several ways they honour their Dead.

First, When any one dies, whether he be Christian or Heathen, it is an inviolable Custom to erect an Altar in the House of the Party deceas'd, and to place his or her Image on a Tablet, containing the Person's Name on it, set out with Sweets, Flowers, and Candles, and to lay the Body in the Coffin behind it. All Persons that come into those Houses to condole, kneel three or four times before the aforesaid Tablet, or Image, prostrating themselves, and touching the ground with their Heads, bringing some Candles and Sweets along with them, to be consum'd or burnt on that Altar or Board before the Image of the Party deceas'd.

The second way is, that they perform twice a Year, in their Ancestors or Progenitors Halls, so the Chinese call them, not Temples, for that is the meaning of T S U T A N G, which are Memorials or Monuments of Families; only the great Men have them, or the richest Families: no dead Body is bury'd in them but in the Mountains. Within there is only the Image of the noblest of their Progenitors; then upon steps one above another, there are little Boards or Tablets about a span in length, on which are written the Names of all the Family, their Quality, Honour, Sex, and Age, and the day of their Death, even to Infants of both Sexes. In this Hall all the Kindred meet twice a Year; the richest of them offer Flesh, Wine, Candles, Sweets. The poorer sort who cannot have such Halls, keep the Tablets of their Ancestors at home, in some particular place, or else upon the Altar on which are the Images of their Holy Men, which cannot have another place allow'd them because of the smallness of the House; yet they do not worship nor offer any thing to them, but they are there for want of another place: for the aforesaid Ceremonies are not perform'd by the Chinese any where but in the Hall of the Dead; and if they have none, they are omitted.

The third is that performed at the Tombs of the Dead, which are all without the Walls on Mountains, according to the Laws of the Kingdom: To these the Children or Relations repair, at least once a Year, about the beginning of May; they pull up by the Roots the Weeds and Grass that is grown about the Tombs, cleanse them, weep, then shriek out, make several genuflexions, as was mention'd in the first Way, lay out Meat dress'd, and Wine; then their Tears ceasing, they eat and drink.

The Holy Congregation, according to what has been above propos'd, judges, That the converted Chinese may be permitted to perform the said Ceremonies towards their Dead, even among the Infidels, so that such as are superstitious be forbore. That they may be only present among the Infidels when they perform the superstitious part, especially after making a Protestation of their Faith, and there being no danger of their being perverted; and this, if Enmity and Hatred not be otherwise avoided. Thursday, March 23. 1656.

In the General Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, held in the Apostolick Palace at S. Peter's before our most Holy Lord Alexander the Seventh, by Divine Providence Pope, and the most Eminent and Reverend Lord Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, especially deputed by the Holy See Apostolick General Inquisitors against Heretical Pravity throughout the whole Commonweal of Christendom.

The aforesaid Questions, together with the Answers and Resolutions of the Holy Congregation, being there reported, our most Holy Lord Pope Alexander the Seventh aforesaid approv'd the said Answers and Resolutions. Instead of a Seal. John Lupus Not. to the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, &c. Printed at Rome in the Printing-House of the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 1656. By permission of Superiors.

In my second Tome I spoke something in relation to this Decree: F. Henao mentions it Sect. 17. Disp. 29. de divino Mysterio Sacrificio, num. 226. He seems to blame the most Illustrious Lord Tapia, and most

R. F. Thomas Hurtado, as if they had designedly omitted to make mention of this Decree, which he has not the least reason for. If those of his Society will not publish it at Macao, nor even in China; if some of his own Brethren in that Mission had not seen it in my time, nor any Person has as yet seen it sufficiently authoriz'd: If F. Martin Martinez, who by his Proposition obtain'd it, would not show it: If the Fathers, John Adamus, Ignatius de Aosta, Antony Gouvea, and others, did not like it: If the Fathers of the Society themselves had made no account of it in China, as F. Emanuel George plainly own'd; how, or which way should those Authors have knowledge of it? I said already, I would answer the rest of F. Henao's Objections in my second Tome. I also reserve for that place some Observations I have already made and set down, upon the brief Relation publish'd at Rome in the Tuscan Language, by F. Prosper Intorceta a Sicilian Missioner in China, and my Companion in the Persecution and Banishment. I was very desirous to have found him at Rome, and am of opinion that he having notice of my going to that Court, set out immediately for France to carry Missioners to that Mission. I will clear all things, without leaving the least thing unanswered.

1. WHAT F. Martin Martinez propos'd at Rome, being positively disapproved of by F. John Adamus, and the Fathers Anthony Gouvea, and Ignatius de Aosta, both Prelates of their Mission in China, and F. Emanuel George, all of them of the Society, and that it was very displeasing to those of the two Religious Orders: I made it my business at Rome to prevail with the Holy Congregation to recal and annul what had been decreed upon the four Questions above-mention'd, making it appear by what shall be here set down, that the said Father had not legally stated the Matter of Fact, which he was to propose and explain to that Holy Assembly. It is the custom of the Church, says S. Bernard, Ep. 180. ad Innocent. 2, Pap. to revoke things of this nature; The See Apostolick is usually careful in this Point; not to be backward in recalling whatsoever it finds has been fraudulently drawn from it, and not merited by Truth. The words of S. Augustin, lib. 2. de Baptism. c. 3. are much to this purpose, they are these; Former great Councils are often corrected by the latter, when Experience lays open that which was shut, and makes known what was hid. Which, as Cabassucius Not. Concil. pag. mibi 450. well observes it to be understood, Not in Definitions of Faith, these being immutable in the Church, but in things that concern Discipline, Matter of Fact, or Persons. Nor can or ought it therefore to be said, that the Head of the Church, or any of his Congregations err'd in the first Decree they granted; but that his Holiness, or the Holy Congregation was misinform'd. The Confessor is not in the wrong, or errs, who gives Absolution to a Penitent ill-dispos'd, who conceals and hides his unworthiness and ill disposition: We say he was impos'd upon. The most eminent Lord Cardinal Ottobono taught me this Simily upon this Subject; and I take take what Cardinal Bellarmine says, Lib. 3. de Rom. Pontif. c. 2. in this sense; That the Pope with his Congregation of Counsellors, or with a General Council may err in private Controversies of Matter of Fact, which depend on the Informations and Testimonies of Men. Which is no more than to say, that the Pope, Council, and Holy Congregations may be impos'd upon by those who give them information.

2. The same Cardinal says, "That the Pope as a private Doctor may err, &c. and that through ignorance, as it sometimes happens to other Doctors. But here Cabassucius, p. 299. makes this note, "Nevertheless, whosoever should on this pretence make a Schism in the Church, or obstinately condemn the Pope himself, or a Synod, to whom respect is ever due from the Faithful on account of their Dignity, those Persons would doubtless offend God, and give scandal to the Faithful. This comes pat to the Answer one made in my hearing; being ask'd, Whether Bishops could declare the Forms of Sacraments? He said with a stately tone, much emphasis, and haughtiness: If the Bishops be as ours, who have always been most Learned and Eminent Men, they may. Many Popes may not, because they are rais'd to it, being but ignorant Men. This said a private Missioner, with such respect and reverence did he speak of those the Holy Ghost makes choice of to steer S. Peter's Boat. This Doctrine will make it no difficult matter to him to disobey the Apostolical Decrees. What censure such an expression deserves will appear by the Answers given to the Questions I propos'd. And tho at Rome they agreed to the Reflections I made and presented touching the information given by F. Martinez in his four Questions offer'd to the Holy Congregation, yet they thought not that a sufficient ground to proceed to the aforesaid Revocation of that Decree, because there wanted some one of the adverse Party at that Court, to argue the Matter; wherefore it was put off till further inquiry, which was order'd to be made. And tho the main Reflections may be found in several parts of the second Tome, yet I thought fit to insert them here altogether, this being their proper place: and because it is convenient the Reader should be immediately satisfy'd, as to the principal Grounds of the Controversies that have been between the three Orders, I give it for granted that F. Martinez, and the rest that were assisting with their Accounts to forward his Propositions, meant well, and had a good Intention; and tho what shall be writ may cause some suspicion that it was not so, yet it shall proceed from strength of Argument, not of Design, to thwart theirs which I look upon as blameless. Cabassucius, p. 457. proves this Matter elegantly; and because it is a general Case, and may serve upon other occasions, I will here insert his words: "But that it may appear of how great consequence it is, whether a Man acts out of a good or bad Design, Lewis Allemannus Cardinal and Bishop of Arles, who relying on the Judgment of the gravest Divines and Canonists of that time, had conceiv'd a most deep Notion of the Authority of Councils above the Pope, and who otherwise was extreme zealous for restoring Ecclesiastical Discipline, which he positively believ'd to have been long since deprav'd and corrupted by the Roman Court; and grounded himself besides on the Declaration of the General Council of Constance, Sess. 4. which defines, That a General Council lawfully assembled, has such an Authority as binds the Pope himself, and can force him to obedience, and can no way be infring'd, annull'd or alter'd by the Pope. Upon this he most inflexibly oppos'd the Commands of Eugenius, and stood stiff for the Assembly at Basil. Moreover, Lewis Allemannus insisted on the approbation of Pope Martin the Fifth, who confirm'd that Council, as far as all its Acts were made in the due course of a Council, as he calls it. Those at Basil in their first Sessions, reviv'd that Decree of the Council of Constance: Which was the cause that Eugenius the Fourth dissolv'd the Council; but they not obeying, and rather designing to chuse a new Pope, then Eugenius to secure the Unity of the Church, recall'd his Dissolution, and again sent his Ambassadors to the Council. Then the Fathers at Basil repeated the said Decree, Sess. 18, &c. And he that on this account (had not his sincere Design and upright Intention, supported by the Judgment of grave and pious Doctors, interpos'd) might have been thought an impious Shismatick, and under an Anathema, which Eugenius had denounced upon him and his Followers; nevertheless, because he was not guided in this Affair by any human Affection, but by a good Intention, back'd by the Advice of the wise Men of that time, the false Synod soon after breaking up, he not long after made such an End, that after his Death he was renowned for Miracles, and his Tomb at this day is held in great veneration at Arles. Then he compares him to Pascasius Deacon of the Holy Roman Church; "Who having supported the Schism of Laurentius out of a sincere Intention, as ought to be believ'd, was famous for Miracles after his Death. He confirms it with the comparison of S. Cyprian, and others; and concludes, that Clement the Seventh beatify'd the said Cardinal Ludovicus. So that their Sincerity and good Intention sav'd all these Persons, even in matters of such concern, and so nice.

 The same might be the case of F. Martinez in his Propositions, and of others in other Matters mention'd in the Con-troverlies.

3. In the first Query, to excuse the Converts from fasting, he assigns as the Reason of his doubt, that The lightness of their Diet obliges them to eat thrice a day.
 And that Magistrates must repair to their Courts fasting, where they continue from eight in Morning till two in the Afternoon, so that it would be altogether impossible for them to do it. Observe in the first place, that China is one of the plentifullest Countries in the World for Provisions, they are all cheap, and as good as the best in Europe. There is great abundance of Beef, Pork all the Year about, Mutton, Goats-flesh, Hens, Capons, Geese, Pheasants, tame and wild Ducks, Pigeons, Turtle-Doves, small Birds, and all very good; there is no want of Horse-flesh: Dogs-flesh is look'd upon as a dainty, and that of the As's as still better.
 Certain it is, these things mention'd cannot be call'd Light Diet. For Fasting-days there is Sea-fish all along the Coast, and all over China fresh Water; Fish enough in Rivers and Ponds: We saw all sorts of Fish eaten among us very plentifully and cheap in China. There are infinite quantities of Hen and Goose-Eggs, which latter the Chineses are fond of. In some Places there is Milk and little Cheeses, excellent Salmon, choice Olives, Eels, Trouts, Oysters, and Salt-fish;
 a thousand sorts of Varieties for Colla-tions; many sorts of Cakes, great variety of Greens, Beans, infinite Vetches; abundance of excellent Fruit, Rice, Wheat, French-Wheat, and a thousand other odd sorts of Food. All which positively makes against the lightness of Diet, mention'd as a Reason of the doubt; nor is that it which obliges them to eat three times a day, but only the custom of eating a Breakfast as is us'd in Europe, where People do it because they have been bred so to nourish the Body, and be the better able to go about their business;

 so that the Chineses breakfast as the Europeans do. The Quality and Quantity is also small and distinct from what is eaten at Noon. The Wine, tho not made of Grapes in some parts, is good, in others better.

4. 2d Reflection. If the Reason of making the Doubt were true, methinks we Missioners might for the same cause be excus'd from fasting, and with better reason than the Chineses, because those light Meats are natural to them, and we us'd to others more solid and nourishing, which is not so at all. So if the Europeans in America and the Philippine Islands, did eat nothing but as the Indians do, they would certainly enjoy the same Privilege as the others; for the ground of granting it was their eating so small a quantity, and their Food having so little nourishment, for they are really light and slender. Nor does this Argument hold in the Philippine Islands; the Indians eat but twice a day, therefore their Diet is strong and nourishing; consequently it does not hold in China, or Europe to say, they eat three times, therefore the Meat is light and not nourishing. Both these Differences proceed from other Causes, which are either the Peoples being stronger, or more laborious, or the Country's being hotter or colder. Cold Countries require more Sustenance than the hot:
 according as the heat or cold increases, more or less Food is requisite; which is most certain, and Experience shows it better than Speculation. How is it possible a Chinese, Spaniard, Frenchman, and much less a German, should subsist upon what an Indian of Macasar or Borneo lives on? All one of them eats in a day, is not equivalent to a quarter of a pound of Bread, and a little Water, yet they are as strong, lusty and plump as any Europeans.

5. If the Diet of China be light and slender, how comes it we see infinite numbers of People that fast there, and in all Countries even to India? and these People abstain from Flesh, Fish, White-meats and Wine all their whole lives, yet they are sound and healthy, and strong enough to labour, some at Tillage, others in Boats, and others at mechanick handicraft Trades; and the Women work at the Lightness of the Diet, even excluding Fish, Flesh, &c. will not prevail with them to leave their devilish Fasts; and yet it shall be of force tho they eat Fish, and Whitemeats, and drink Wine, &c. to excuse them from the Fasts of the Church. Only one Objection can be made against this Argument, which is, that those Chineses only keep abstinence from those things mention'd, and therefore eat Breakfast and Supper of such meats as are allow'd them; but the Christians, tho they eat Fish and Whitemeats, &c. must eat no Breakfast, which is what they cannot endure, because they are otherwise us'd. The Answer is, that this proceeds not from the Lightness of the meat, which was the cause of the doubt. Besides, among Labouring People, what is us'd here may be us'd there; for Scholars, as a small quantity is tolerated among us, so it may among them, which F. Brancato has already assign'd to be 2 Ounces, upon which a Scholar may well hold out till Noon, and we see many Men and Women fast very well without it.

6. Nor are ours the most rigid Fasts in the World. The 50th Canon of the Council of Laodicea commands, that Christians in Lent keep Xerophagia. Tertullian lib. 1. advers. Psychicos, says, we keep the Xerophagia, which is, abstinence from all Flesh and Broth, and all freshest Fruits, that we may neither eat nor drink any thing of Wine. And this we see was in the Infancy of the Church. Cabassucius pag. 148. adds: The Greeks to this day observe such a Xerophagia in their Fasts; and Balsamon tells us, abstinence from Fish is much us'd among them, which Tertullian includes under the denomination of all sorts of Flesh. Also the Armenian Christians, the Eutychians and Schismatics, do not only abstain from earthly Flesh, Whitemeats, and Eggs, but also from Fish, Wine, and Oil, as many write, who have travel'd those Countries in our time. And Balsamon ad Apost. can. 69. tells us that the Greeks observe the Xenographia, throughout the whole Year, upon Wednesdays and Fridays, so far that neither upon these Days, nor the Fasts of Lent, they never dispense with sick People, tho in danger of Death, any farther than to eat Fish. It goes yet further with the Chineses, and others who keep the Xenographia all their Life time, without ever dispensing with it; tho they be in danger of Death, they do not allow of Fish, Whitemeats, or Eggs. What wonder the Carthusians should not dispense with Flesh?

7. It is also to be observ'd that the Chineses make great account of Fast; and therefore we find the first Question they put, when they discourse concerning our Holy Faith, is what Fasts we have: and when we make them easy, saying there are but few, as believing this makes it more grateful to them, they rather dislike it, for they do not approve it should oblige them to so few Fasts. For which reason I often said in China, that if it were in my power, I would not dispense with one fasting Day. I conclude this point, according to the intention of it, which was to show that the reason alledg'd for excusing the Chinese Convert from the Duty of fasting, viz. the lightness of the Diet, has not the least shadow of Truth.

8. As to what he alledges to excuse the Mandarines from fasting, I declare there is no Truth in it. For the better understanding whereof, it must be understood, that the greater the Mandarines are, the seldomer, and the less time they sit in Court, which is in their own Houses, except those at Court (therefore the Chineses do not say the Mandarine goes to, or comes from his Court, but that he comes out to, or withdraws from it, because it is a Room in his House; so he comes out of his own Apartment, where nobody goes in about business, to a publick Hall where he hears Causes, and from this to another yet more publick: by which it appears that the word Adire, which is to go to, can only be verify'd of the Mandarines at Court, and no others throughout the whole Empire.) So the supreme Mandarine or Governour usually residing in a Metropolis, goes to his Court but 2 or 3 times a Month. The Viceroy's do the same, the Governours of Cities or T A O S, somewhat oftner. The Judges and their Assistants are they that follow it most, and they have no fix'd time to come out, or to sit, as is usual in Spain; but they come out when they please, and so withdraw. This indeed is observ'd, that as soon as the Judg, for example, comes out to his Court, immediately his Deputies come out to theirs; and as soon as he withdraws, they do so too: but to say any Mandarine sits in Court from 8 in the Morning till two in the Afternoon, is a mere Chimera. And if this ever hapned, yet it ought not to be represented as a constant, settled, and general Practice. And tho it were really so, yet there was no necessity of representing it at Rome, because this is one among the many other Cases Cases set down by Divines, that excuse a Man from fasting. Besides, the Chinese Mandarines whilst they sit in Court, publicly and very freely eat and drink whatsoever they fancy; and therefore any of them who should be a Christian might be advis'd to take some refreshment there, if he found himself faint, which he might do without the least reflection. In short, the reason alledg'd for making the doubt is altogether groundless.

9. To excuse them from keeping of Holy days he gives this following reason: Because most of the Christians must work for their Living, and the Christians are often forced by the Infidel Magistrates to undergo several sorts of Labour; the Christian Magistrates themselves must keep their Courts, even upon our Holy days, on pain of forfeiting their Employments. I answer, that when a Man must of necessity work to maintain himself, his Wife and Children, &c. there is no need of going further about it, or putting the question; for it is a plain case, that a superior Law exempts him from the Precept: nor is it proper to endeavour that all Men should be excus'd on account of this sort of People, when there are others not under those Circumstances. Besides, where there are Tradesmen in a City who know that Mass is said at such an Hour, the hearing of it will not obstruct their working for their living, especially according to that erroneous opinion some Men hold, that the Church does not oblige to forbear work, but only to hear Mass. So that this Argument will clear the latter, but not the others; and it will be only accidentally, and when that necessity presses, and that reason stands good. So those Labourers, whom the Mandarines command to work upon Holy days, are discharg'd from the Precept of the Church, which is not obligatory when any considerable damage may accrue to the Christian from it. Yet I am of opinion that will happen but seldom, for there are so many of every Trade in China, that there is no necessity of forcing the Christians to do any sort of work. Therefore I look upon that Proposition as Chimerical, when he says, And the Christians are often forced by the Infidel Magistrates, &c. For which reason when this point was argu'd at Canton, no Man made use of this Argument. As to what concerns the Mandarines, I declare I never heard there was any such Penalty for those who omit frequenting their Courts. I have already said, the greatest Courts; but certain it is, supposing such a Law, that if they cannot conveniently hear Mass before, they are discharg'd of the Duty. But if they go to the Court at 8 of the Clock, why may not they hear Mass at 7? and if the Mandarines go from their Courts a visiting, and receive them, go to Plays, Entertainments, and other Festivals they have on their Tablets, without forfeiting their Employments, why might not they hear Mass on Sundays, and great Holy days? This is only a pumping for Reasons to stand out in their opinion, as they us'd to say at Rome.

10. To excuse the Chinese from yearly Confession, and from Communion, he proposes, That the Missioners are few, the Kingdom of a vast extent, and therefore many Christians cannot hear Mass upon Holidays, nor confess and receive once a Year. I allow there is no Precept that obliges those, who cannot hear Mass, or confess and receive either in China, or any where else. We know there are Visitations, particularly in America and the Philippine Islands, where they do not see a Priest in a Year or two, but they meet upon Holy days in the Church to pray and humble themselves before God, and yet they are oblig'd to hear Mass, confess, &c. The same then must be allow'd in China, tho in China it is ealier to visit the Christians, than in some parts of the Philippine Islands, where we must go several Leagues by Sea, and in danger of Enemies; and if we go by Land, the ways are so bad that they are almost impassable, without any thing to eat, or any Houses to rest, as I know by experience. Besides, if there are so few Missioners that they cannot assist the Christians, why will they not suffer other religious Men to help them? And if when the Christians call them, they go to them, why do the Fathers of the Society complain of us and the Franciscans, as F. Martinez actually did complain of F. John Baptist de Morales, because he went with a Companion to the City NING PO, when he was courted and invited by the Licentiate CHU Cosmus? Or why shall not the Missioner labour and travel, in visiting his Flock, to teach, instruct and feed their Souls, as F. Antony of S. Mary used to say of F. John Francis Ferrari did? Therefore I say all the reasons alledg'd for the Doubts, are not according to the General Opinion of the Society, but F. Martinez's his own, and fram'd by one or two more, and have nothing in them.

11. The Holy Congregation answers, The

by the Missioners, as obliging under mortal Nava-jin, &c. It must be here observ'd, that tho his Holiness Innocent the 10th ordain'd and commanded the same, and his Decree, as is order'd in it, was notify'd to those of the Society, nevertheless they took no notice of it, alledging they had further matter to lay before his Holiness; they made their information by F. Martinez, and had the same answer, and yet they did not notify to the Christians what the Holy Congregation commands. Therefore the stress does not lie upon the Court of Rome's being well or ill inform'd, there must be something more in it. So that till F. Ignatius d' Acoſta entred upon the Government of his Mission in China, there was no talk of notifying the positive Ecclesiastical Law to those People; and the said Father commanded it to be notify'd, many of his Brethren opposing it, and it had not been done by another, as I myself heard it said. And still some contend that the Chinese are not yet capable of this duty, whereas the Indians of America and the Philippine Islands were subject to it from their first Conversion. Before the Church had declar'd it self as to this point, there might be some plausible reasons, or pretences, to think the contrary lawful. But since the Church has pronounced judgment, it is a crime even to doubt of it, says Cabassucius, p. 153. upon another case.

1. The second Question is concerning administering the Sacramentals to Females at Womens estate. He drove the reasons of the doubt as far as possible, saying, Unless the Missioners be extremely cautious, a mighty scandal will be given to the Chinese, and all the state of Christianity there may be expos'd to most imminent danger. Notwithstanding this rigid and exorbitant Proposition the Holy Congregation decided, as appears in the Decree. F. Joseph de Morales writ largely upon this Subject, in his Treatises, pag. 294. but immodestly, and mixing with the Truth what is not so. I writ in the second Tome what hapned in Canton, when this Point was argu'd. Here I must observe that F. Trigancius mentions the Baptism of some Women, perform'd with all the Ceremonies of the Church, which prov'd very prejudicing. And F. Morales brings an example of another baptiz'd by one of theirs, who was not well vers'd there, which gave some scandal. What can we say to this? If they on account of the second Precept omit the Sacramentals, we on account of the first, and of many which we have both before and after, of which no inconveniences follow'd, tho they were on Purpose. More will continue to practise them. And since they who have power so to do, order it to be put in execution, even when they have receiv'd information from the Society, those of the Society are oblig'd to perform the same, without opposing the Decree, which they cannot do but they must commit a great crime, and give scandal. I refer the Reader to the Resolutions taken at Canton, which will satisfy him as to all that concerns this Point, and he will there find enough to answer F. Morales.

2. Here I must observe two things, supposing the Sacramentals to be a matter of great moment in the Church. The first is, what is ordain'd by the first Canon of the Council of Orange: If any Person in case of necessity have not receiv'd the Holy Oil in Baptism, let the Bishop be advertis'd of it, when he comes to be Confirm'd, that he may in the first place anoint him in the Crown of the Head, which should have been done in Baptism, then on the Forehead for the Sacrament of Confirmation, that both the Anointings may be look'd upon as necessary. Caballucius, p. 225. says thus upon this Canon: This Canon teaches us many things: First, That he who is baptiz'd, is to be anointed with Holy Oil on the Crown of the Head, by any Priest administering Baptism, &c. Fifthly, That both Anointings are necessary. So that it is not so trivial a matter, that every Man may omit it of his own head. This Ceremony, says Amularius Fortunatus, lib. 1. de Eccles. Offic. cap. 27. had its beginning under Pope S. Silvester.

My second and chief Reflection I take from Cabassucius, pag. 146. where, speaking of the Oil of Catechumens, he says thus: But the anointing with Oil of Catechumens, which preceded Baptism, was us'd among the Latins upon the Head and Breast of the Person that was to be Baptiz'd, as Pamelius out of S. Ambrose observes on Tertullian of Baptism, in the beginning of the Book; and also on the Breast and Shoulders, &c. But among the Greeks the Anointing was perform'd by the Priest all over the Body of the Person to be Baptiz'd; for so it is Learnedly deliver'd by Dionysius, Eccles. Hier. cap. 2. Cyril, Chrysostom. A little lower: For this reason, Reinaldus Theophilus in his Treatise of the Prohibition of Clergymen conversing with Women, is fully perswaded that Women us'd formerly to be anointed all over the Body, as well as Men, upon the bare skin, but that the temptation of the Eyes was prevented by some Linnen-cloth spread before them, &c. If this Ceremony were still in use, there is no doubt but it would be attended with all the inconveniences F. Martinez proposes, should it be practis'd in China; but it is easier to introduce those us'd by the Roman Church, administering them as ought to be, than it is to give the Communion to Women, and hear their Confessions. Which notwithstanding, a Viceroy said to F. Sambiasi, If you deal with Women, there's no more to be said. Yet I say, notwithstanding this, and other difficulties that attend these actions, they are all overcome, and the Fathers of the Society have taken no notice of them, therefore there is the less occasion here to descant on it.

1. As to the third Question it is to be observ'd, the better to judg of the Proposition, That there never was any Dispute in China, whether it was lawful or not to receive the Degrees of Batchelor, Licentiate and Doctor: and it was so far from being argu'd, that no body ever had a thought of making a doubt of it. Therefore it was nothing to the purpose, an unnecessary and idle action to propose this matter, in regard that nothing but what is difficult and doubtful ought to be propos'd and ask'd. But it being true that Deep calleth unto Deep; when he had committed this error, and fallen into such a fault, he tumbled headlong by degrees into many others of greater consequence. He sets it down in the Question as granted, that the Degrees are taken in the Hall (so he terms the Temple) of Confucius. Nothing in the World can be more unreasonable, or untrue; it is set down in its proper place how and where the Degrees are confer'd, and how impossible it is to do it in that place, if they would. If F. Martinez propos'd such things as those, most certain it is, the Answer given upon them, tho not revok'd, does not make against us.

Another stumble is this, he says, No Sacrificer, or Minister of the Idolatrous Sect, is present. No Man in China ever imagin'd any such thing, taking the words as they sound, and as he and we distinguish between the Sect of the Learned, and that of the Idols, which went out of India into China. In this sense we all agree, that none of the Idolatrous Sect have to do either at the conferring of Degrees, or any other Ceremony of the Learned, nor would they allow it on any account whatsoever. Therefore the proposing of it was only to trick the Holy Congregation; and since no body has made a doubt of it, it follows there was some further fetch in proposing it after that manner. He says further, Nothing at all is done that has been instituted by Idolaters; this includes the same double meaning, which is easily taken way, if it be granted, as to the Sect that went out of India, and denying it as to that of the Learned. He goes on telling, that the Learned own Confucius as their Master, performing to him Civil and Political Ceremonies, from their first Institution directed to mere Civil Worship. I say in the first place, that it is most false, that they give any Worship either Political or Religious to Confucius at the time of taking their Degrees; the Veneration they pay to him is some days after receiving the Degree, as all that vast Kingdom well knows. Therefore he has err'd again in proposing this, and has committed a great error as to the Rites with which the Learned honour their Confucius, be it at this or any other time: for the difficulty being whether the said Rites are Religious or Civil, he ought to explain them, that it might be judg'd and determin'd of which sort they were; and not to give that for granted which was his duty to prove, and which we the Franciscans, and many of his own Society have always deny'd. We of the two Religious Orders never went about to abolish any thing that is Civil and Political in China, nor is it reasonable we should; we cut off what is Religious in a false Religion, and we prove it to be such, not only by Arguments, but by the Authority of the Gravest Missioners of the Society. Therefore to suppose them to be Civil Rites, is to suppose what ought to be prov'd; so that all the difficulty would be, Whether it is lawful to give a Political Worship to Confucius, which no body ever yet deny'd.

2. As for those Rites being from their very original instituted as a mere Civil Worship, he ought not to assert, but to prove it, and to lay down the first Institution, that it might be judg'd, whether it was Religious or Political. F. Martinez, and some of his Brethren would maintain against the sense of other very Learned Men of the Society, that of the Learned Sect, which Becanus in Analog. Vet. & Nov. Testam. cap. 11. q. 3. writes of the Pharisees, The Sect of the Pharisees in its first Original and Institution was most certain, according to that of Act. 16. 5. according to the most certain Sect of our Religion. Becanus does not suppose but proves this, and so ought F. Martinez to do. Then he says, That Vices afterwards crept in, and thus it err'd in many particulars. The said Fathers would make out the same of Confucius his Sect, viz. that in its beginning it was holy, spotless and good, all Political and courteous, and agreeable to Reason; but that afterwards by degrees it was corrupted and defil'd; so that at present we are not to regard what is ill that has clung to it, but endeavour to cut it off, and look only on that which is properly its own, and very good. How true this is appears by the fifth Book, and by another in my second Tome, and it will be proper to read what à Lapide writes in Numb. 21. 8. speaking of the Brazen Serpent, Q. 4. and what has been already quoted out of Becanus; and he adds, But afterwards, as it usually happens, there sprung up Superstitions and false Doctrines, with which the latter Pharisees in the time of Christ were infected, and therefore severely rebuk'd by him, not that all, but most of them were such; for it appears some were clear from these vices, as Nicodemus, Gamaliel, and Paul. Here it may be observ'd, first, that our Saviour reprov'd the Pharisees, not regarding the Origin of the Sect, whereof he makes no mention, but looking upon the condition it was then in. Therefore supposing, but not granting, that the Learned Sect was good in its first Institution, we must consider whether it afterwards alter'd, and embraced new Doctrines, not look to its beginning, which is past and came not near these times. 2. That notwithstanding there were some who follow'd that Sect according to its first Institution, as those above nam'd; yet Christ several times severely reprov'd the other Sectaries, who had degenerated from that first state; whence we may infer, that had the Sect been corrupted in all its Individuals, our Lord's reproof had been still more sharp, as only looking upon their present ill state, without looking back on that past, whose goodness is no justification of the depravedness it had fallen into through the malice of Men. Now since the Learned Sect is at this time wholly and in all its members corrupt, perverted and degenerated, there is no reason why laying aside its present condition we should only regard what it was formerly. To go about to persuade that the Followers of other Sects have intruded Superstitions into that of the Learned, is a Chimerical undertaking, since all men know what care the Learned have always taken to shut all others. The case is, that Sect was always bad, as the Fathers Longobardus and Jouveau prove.

3. F. Martinez goes on and says, that all who are to take their Degree enter Confucius his Hall together. Here he proposes two things which had nothing of truth in them. The one, that they go into that place before they take their Degree, which is not so. The other, that they can all go in, or be contain'd there; both which Particulars are false, and falsly grounded, that is, that they are examin'd and take their Degrees there; whence it follows, that the Chancellors, Doctors, and Examiners expecting them there, and the rest that follows, is also false. For, as has been said, in that Place, or Hall, there is no Examination nor Degrees given or taken, nor is any act of Learning perform'd; and it is afterwards, not before, that the Scholars go thither to worship that Philosopher.

As to the last part, that the said Hall is an Academy, and not a Temple, properly so call'd, because it is shut to all, we will answer it at large in another place.

4. The Holy Congregation, according to what had been propos'd, answer'd, That the said Ceremonies be tolerated, because the said Worship seems to be merely Political and Civil; of which Answer no doubt is to be made, because being sutable to the Proposition, which represents nothing that may cause any suspicion of Superstition, it follows that it must be good and justifiable.

It is well worth observing, that F. Martinez knowing all the Points wherein the doubt and difficulty consisted, did not propose, or make known any one of them at Rome, but only mention'd that whereof there never was any Controversie, except the calling Confucius his Temple a Hall, or College. Nevertheless the said Father, and others of his Brethren gave out in China, that this Decree had revok'd all that had been order'd by that of Innocent the Tenth: whence I infer, what others said before, that he had no further regard than to procure a Sugar-plum for his own Palat.

If he had desir'd to know the truth, he ought to have propos'd and stated the question thus: Most Eminent Lords, when they are to offer Sacrifice to Confucius, the Chineses try the Beasts by pouring hot Wine into their Ears; if they move their Heads, they are accepted for the Sacrifice, if not, they are laid aside. Is this Ceremony Political, or Superstitious? The reason of making the doubt is, because such like Acts and Rites are condemn'd as Superstitious in other Gentiles; for instance, our Torre 2. 2. 9. 85. art. 1. disp. 3. says that, Mighty care and industry was us'd in chusing of Victims, for the fattest were chosen out of the flock, such as were not lamé, or sick, or any other way faulty, faulty; but if the Victim in coming to the Altar struggled very much, or came as it were unwillingly to the Altar, or if it fled or groan'd when struck, &c. it was put away from the Altar, as being judged no way acceptable to the Gods.

The Greeks try'd the worthiness of their Victims by laying Food before them; for if the Beasts would not eat it, they thought that Sacrifice was not acceptable to the Gods. The greater Victims were also us'd to go with gilt Horns, but the lesser crown'd with Boughs. Now all this being superstitious, I put the Question to your Eminencies, Whether what has been propos'd be so too? As also their offering to the Dead Goats-heads adorn'd with Flowers and Boughs.

He should further put the Question. In order to perform their Ceremonies to Confucius and the Dead, there is a washing of Hands; and for the departed Abstinence, Fasts, and separation from the Marriage-bed for the space of seven days; and a Master of Ceremonies prescribes what is to be done, and other things mention'd in this Book. The Question is, Whether this be political, or not? The reason of making the Doubt is, because these same Actions are condemned as Superstitious, and irreligious Worship in other Gentiles. Torre above quoted says thus, Num. 12. The Priest first purify'd himself by washing his Hands: He abstain'd from many things, to wit, from Flesh, and Wine, and from all venereal Acts, &c. He wore a most pure Garment, and a Crier who proclaim'd Silence, said at the same time, Do this you are about, &c. All this was Religious, and not Political Worship, and consequently it must be so in China.

Thus these Points must be propos'd, not giving it for granted they are political Rites, and then putting the question, Whether they may be allow'd? this is down-right ridiculous. Nor is it to the purpose to alledge, that washing of Hands, putting on clean Clothes, Fasting, abstaining from venereal Acts, &c. are things indifferent; for, tho it is true that in themselves they are so, like kneeling, taking off the Hat, &c. yet they are decided to be Political or Religious, according to Time and Place, by the Intention, Object, and other Circumstances. Many Instances of this sort are brought in the proper place, here I will only insert what our Torre writes, Num. 12. ut sup. That the Priests of Cybele did cut off their Privy Members, or else destroy'd the Genital Power by the use of certain Herbs. Which most certainly in them was no

Political, but a Religious Act; and the same Action in the People of Cochinchina, and the Bonzos of China, (some of whom to live at ease, cut a small String belonging to the Private Parts) is no Religion, but Barbarity. The same Argument may be urg'd in all other cases, except for the Sacrifice and Temple, which are, at least by the Law of Nations, dedicated to God.

1. Quer. 4. There are Reflections enough to be made here: In the first place he sets it down as a Rule, that whatsoever there is superstitious in the Ceremonies perform'd to the Dead in China, is added to what the Learned instituted: And whereas the contrary appears by the testimony of most grave Fathers of the Society, and by the Classick Authors of the Learned Sect, he ought not, nor in reason could take such a thing for granted.

He asks further, Whether the Christians may perform the same Ceremonies among the Infidels? If he gives it for granted, that the proper Ceremonies of the Learned are not superstitious, and cuts off the superstitious part, that has crept in from abroad, there is no doubt but they may perform them, nay there is no need of putting the Question. The Church has always taken care that Christians should not imitate the Actions of the Infidels, lest it should be a ground to believe they agree in the same Errors. On this account it was order'd, that no Bread, or other eatable things should be put upon the Graves of the Faithful departed at Macao, as shall be said hereafter. This it was the Council of Ilberis or Granada had regard to, when it said, Can. 34. It has been thought fit that Candles be not lighted in the day-time in the Church-yard, for the Souls of the Holy are not to be disturb'd. Cabassius on this place, Pag. 19. "This Prohibition, which broachers of Novelties abuse, contrary to the pious use of Catholics, was proper in those times when Christians liv'd among Pagans, lest the former should be infected with Superstition; for the Heathens were perswaded that the Souls of the Dead wanted Meat and Light, to dispel hunger and darkness, and therefore they carry'd Food, Milk and Wine to the Graves, as Plutarch testifies at the beginning of Romulus his Life; and so other Antients, as Homer, &c. The reason why the Faithful use Torches and Candles at Funerals is altogether mystical, to signify Light Everlasting, &c. But the word “ word disturbing which the Canon makes use of, signifies a displeasure the Saints conceive after this Life at the Superstition of those that are living. But when Gentilism declining, Christian Religion lifted up its head, then at last the Faithful having banish'd all fear, or suspicion of approving or imitating the profane Rites of the Heathens, follow'd the Funerals of Christians with lighted Candles. Card. Lugo de Incarn. disp. 37. sect. 2. num. 20. mentions the aforesaid Canon, tho' to another purpose, which he solves five several ways, see it there. The same is to be done in China, in relation to laying Meat before the Images or Tablets of the Dead, or on their Tombs for the same reason.

The difficulty is, Whether the Ceremonies which are taken from the Doctrine of the Philosophers, are political, or belong to a false religious Worship; and therefore it was his duty to propose them as they are in themselves; that such Sentence might pass upon them as they deserve'd.

2. He goes on with the Question, Whether Christians may be present, particularly after making a Protestation of the Faith, whilst the Infidels perform the superstitious part, not joining with, or authorizing them, but because it would be much taken notice of, if the Kindred were then absent, and it would cause hatred and enmity? In confirmation of the Protestation of Faith, we may add what Morales mentions pag. 159. he says, That one D. Peter and Lady Mary, being present at one of the Anniversaries they perform to the Dead, when all the Ceremonies of the Learned Sect were perform'd, and those of the Sect of the Idols came on, D. Peter with a loud Voice declar'd, He had perform'd the first because they were good, but could not as a Christian perform those of the Idols, as being wicked, and so went away with his Wife. Thus that Father pleases himself, and thinks every body will be satisfy'd with this Story. In the first place, this shows how little he is acquainted with China, since he calls that Christian a Gentleman, and by the Title of D. Peter, and his Wife Donna, whereas it is notorious that we never give any body in that Country the stile of Don, nor do we call them Gentlemen, because there is no Gentility there but what every Man acquires, excepting very few, of whom I spoke in another place. And tho' this be not to our purpose, yet it shews his mistake in meddling with what he does not understand. I should make no difficulty to say D. Peter, and the Lady Mary are counterfeit and imaginary; but that it may not be said I do it to shun the difficulty I allow of the Passage as true and real, and deny what Morales just before much extols, saying, That the Chinese Christians are very obedient and strict observers of what the Millioners say and teach them. But to the purpose, I do not deny but there may be some, especially of the Learned, if they are good Christians, who will not perform or be present at the Ceremonies of the Sect call'd of the Idols. But the difficulty lies not in this, since we all agree that these are bad, as the Learned Infidels themselves confess, tho' they perform them among the rest. The Question is, Whether the Ceremonies peculiar to the Learned are Superstitious, and whether the Christians may perform or be present at them, when they are condemned as such? and yet as to these, there is no Man who will protest he is a Christian, and forbear performing them; and if any do protest, there will ensue Enmity, Hatred, and Quarrels among the Kindred, unless he who does so be a Person in great Authority, whom they highly honour and respect.

3. In the second place I maintain, That the Christians by their presence at those Ceremonies, cannot but cooperate and authorize the Act, or else Enmity and Hatred must ensue, which is what F. Martinez would prevent. The reason is plain, because all there present compose one Body in order to those Ceremonies, for every one stands in his place assign'd him, and acts the part allotted him, kneels and rises with the rest, upon a word given by the Master of the Ceremonies; so that there is not the least difference in outward appearance betwixt Christians and Infidels as to all that is done there: So that if the Christian might be there apart from the rest, for instance in a corner, only looking on, as Tertullian said, he would be present materialiter, and not cooperating or authorising; as when a Catholick goes into a Church of Hereticks out of curiosity, or with a design to oppose what he sees or hears there: but if he be there in that manner as has been said, he is present formaliter, and as a part of that Body. Whence I draw this conclusion, that F. Martinez gave in his Information, only to the end abovementioned.

4. Those Propositions, The Chinese assign no Divinity to the Souls departed, they expect nothing, nor ask nothing of them, are all opposite to what his own Brethren ren own, and to what F. Martinez himself confess'd in China, as shall appear in the second Tome.

5. In the first way or manner. The first is, &c. he pass'd by some things of a small moment. It is not to be admir'd that F. John Baptist should omit something, neither he nor others of those times could see throughly into all things; but those of the Society must of necessity in so many Years have discover'd more, as appears in their Works which shall be quoted. In the first place he omitted the Letters on that Tablet or Tabernacle, which they say is the Seat of the Person departed's Soul; he also pass'd by the others which mention, that Children offer Sacrifice to their Parents. He further forbore to make it known, that the Chineses believe the airy Souls of their Friends departed come to those Tabernacles, and are maintain'd by the steam of the Meat laid before them.

And to conclude, he speaks not of the Chair and Bed of the Soul where they place its Figure. All this is to be found in the Ritual of the Learned, with which other Sects have had nothing to do, nor have insert'd nothing into it.

6. The second way is, &c. In this too he was short, first in calling the Temples of the Dead SCU TANG, concealing the word MIAO, which is more frequent and proper to a Temple, tho' the first be so too, but for those that are less than the MIAO's, which Emperors, petty Kings, and Persons of Note have. This Point shall be treated of at large in its place.

We have already observ'd what he forbore to make known as to the Tablets, and many Sacrifices and Ceremonies perform'd in those Temples, as shall be said. In the last he was very much out, saying, Which nevertheless they do not worship; whereas the contrary is well known to all Men, and that there is no new or full Moon through the Year but they light Candles before them, burn Perfumes, place Meat, and make genuflexions. It also appears by the Ritual, that many who have no Temples, perform their Ceremonies at home, in the same manner as those that have.

7. The third way is, &c. Here he omitted one thing very material, which is, that at every Tomb there is a little Chapel dedicated to the Tutelar Spirit of the dead Person there bury'd, to whom they offer Sacrifice in Thanksgiving, for his care in guarding the said Party deceas'd, and whom they intreat to protect, and look to him for the future.

By what has been said in these Reflections, the Reader may easily gather, whether F. Martinez his Proposition was legal, sincere, and true, or not; and he will be the better enabled with more ease to satisfy himself in those Points which are handled in the second Tome.

As for what concerns the Answer of the Holy Congregation, to which I give all imaginable Honour, it is to be observ'd that it never allows of any superstitious Act, as F. Prosper Intorceta publicly declar'd at Canton; which, besides that it is otherwise most certain, the most eminent Lord Cardinal Ottoboni confirm'd to me with his own Mouth. It is to be observ'd in the second place, that by those words, They may only be present, it only allows of a Material Presence, not the formal, cooperative, or authoritative.

8. Concerning the other Point, which F. John Baptist de Morales propos'd in the Year 1646, F. Martinez made no mention, the reason of it is not to be guess'd; nor did he touch upon that about Christ crucify'd, tho' the Fathers of the Society were much concern'd at it, as thinking we had done them much wrong. I write what I know, and make out in another place. F. Joseph de Morales enlarg'd much upon this Subject, with his usual Modesty and Piety; he treats of it from Pag. 342, to Pag. 473. he shall be fully answer'd, God willing. I will here only insert what he quotes Pag. 470. out of the Council of Iliberis, or Granada, Can. 36. which is thus, "It has been thought fit that there should be no Pictures in Churches, lest that which is honour'd and worship'd be painted on the Walls. He sets down two Reasons for it, one taken from Alanus, cap. Dial. cap. 16. Sanderus lib. 2. de Adorat. Imag. p. 4. and of F. Turrianus; and Cabassucius follows it, pag. 20. and says, "For the understanding the Design of the Council, the time is to be consider'd when the Persecution of the Gentiles rag'd against the Christians; for this Canon is in favour of Holy Images, which it therefore forbids being painted on the Walls, lest they be scoffed at by the Gentiles. Which Inconveniency did not attend those painted on Cloth, Paper, or Board, because they could be remov'd and hid. Hence Morales would infer, that the Image of Christ crucify'd, is not to be expos'd to the danger of being insulted by the Gentiles: But this does not answer, nor is it to the purpose of the Matter

~ The second Reason is taken from Vasquez lib. 2. de Adorat. disp. 5. cap. 2. n. 133. who is follow'd by Ayala, our Torre 2. 2. q. 94. art. 1. disp. 6. dub. 2. and others. The Council thought it inconvenient and indecent, that Holy Images should be painted on the Walls, because the dampness and other accidents defaced them, and so they rather mov'd laughter than devotion; and because in times of War Churches are polluted, and all respect to Holy Images is lost; which makes nothing at all to what our Adversary aims at, unless apply'd through many Consequences, in which great Difficulties occur. Cardinal Lugo de Incarn. disp. 36. Sect. 1. num. 10. follows both Reasons, and concludes, that the Precept is repeal'd. Torre, Cano, and others, give a truer Solution, which is, that it was a Provincial Synod, held without any Authority of the Pope; and as it err'd in other things, so it did in this. I will add a fourth, which Cabassucius assigns. "Besides, says he, "Baronius not without reason suspects "that this Canon was counterfeited and "forg'd by the Iconoclasts who formerly "inhabited Spain. His reason is, because "tho it be set down by Ivo, lib. 3. yet

"it is not mention'd by those that compil'd the Canons before him, as Ferdinand the Deacon, Dionysius Exiguus, Cresconius; as also because none of the Spanish old Iconoclasts, tho they us'd all possible care to draw Arguments from any part whatsoever against Holy Images, ever produced any Canon of the Council of Iliberis which was held in Spain. Nor did Vigilantius, and Claudius Bishop of Turin, who were both well acquainted with Spain, and oppos'd Holy Images.

What Consequence can be deduced from an Antecedent so uncertain, to make use of it against the exposing the Image of Christ crucified? I must also observe in this place, that when the Persecution in China began, some of us endeavour'd to secure the Holy Images, for the Reasons above-mention'd, and others did not take them up.

S. Hierom, Epist. 14. to S. Augustin, writes thus; "If I write any thing in my defence, the fault is yours that provoked me, not mine, because I am oblig'd to answer. I might say the same to F. Martin Martinez if he were alive, and should blame or complain of me; but I believe he would take no notice of it, because he would be satisfy'd I had right and reason on my side.

Queries propos'd to the Holy General Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition; and by its leave and direction transmitted to the most Reverend Fathers, F. Laurence Brancato de Lauræa of the Order of the Friars Minors, of S. Francis, Consultor of the Holy Congregations of the Holy Inquisition, Rites and Indulgences, Examiner of Bishops, and the Publick Divines of the Sapientia at Rome.

And F. John Bona Abbot of the Congregation of S. Bernard de Fulco, Consultor of the Holy Inquisition, Rites and Indulgences; but now Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church.

1. W Hereas the blind Gentiles do on several accounts highly extol and commend several Infidels long since dead, and have added them to the number of their vain Deities or Gods, or else do honour and worship them as Saints. Quære; Whether (laying aside that vain belief) it be lawful for Christians who live among Infidels, first making a Protestation of their Faith, or without it, to honour those dead Men with Ceremonies of External Worship, such as Kneeling, Prostrations, Offerings, and the like, either in company with the said Gentiles, or elsewhere apart, when those things either according to the Intention of the Gentiles, or by Use, and Custom, or Law, are directed to a superstitious Worship?

2. Whereas the same Gentiles do honor and worship their principal Master Confucius, who dy'd in Infidelity, as a Saint; and perform many things, as making Offerings, Genuflexions, Prostrations, burning of Perfumes, praying and begging of Assistance, Graces, and Benefits, before a small Tablet, with this Inscription; The Throne, or honourable Seat of the Spirit, or Soul of the most holy and principal Master. Quære; Whether it be lawful for Christians to light Candles, and burn Sweets before the said Tablet, or together with the

the Gentiles, or apart, to kneel, prostrate themselves, burn Perfumes, the said Christians omitting the Prayers and Invocation?

3. Whereas the Gentiles believe, that the Souls of their Ancestors departed dwell on certain little Tablets, on which these words are written, The Throne or Seat of the Soul of N, or N; and that they attend to receive the Offerings and Sacrifices the Gentiles make to them, imploring and expecting their Assistance in their Necessities. Quære; Whether the Christians may keep such Tablets, either in the Temples, or their private Houses; at least if they raze that Inscription, the Throne or Seat of the Soul, and lay aside that false Belief of the Soul's residing on them; whether in such case they may have them in their Houses, or any other places, and there either with the Gentiles, or apart, may honour them with offering Fruits of the Earth, and Sweets, or at least by Prostrations by way of Gratitude, and celebrating their Memory?

4. In all Towns and Citys of China there is a Temple dedicated to the Idol CHING HOANG; which is look'd upon and believ'd to be the Guardian and Ruler of that place. Governors, when they enter upon their Employments, and twice a month, are oblig'd, under the Penalty of forfeiting their Government, to go to that Temple, and there to worship, falling down before the Idol, and to offer to it Sacrifice of Wine, Flesh, Flowers, Candles, and Sweets; and they swear before it, that they will govern uprightly and justly; and if they should do the contrary, they submit themselves to the Punishment the Idol shall inflict on them, and ask of him a Rule and Assistance that they may govern well. Quære 1. Whether Christian Governors may perform these things, or must quit their Employments? 2. Whether they may be tolerated to do it for the present, in case they erect in the middle of the Temple where the Idols are, an Eminency apart from the Idol-Altar, and place on it a Cross, or the Picture of our Saviour not hid, but visible to all the Gentiles; and prostrate themselves before it, and take their Oath of Fidelity, and make their Offerings, either after a Protestation of their Faith, or without it, and direct their Worship to the true God represented in the Image of Christ; or at least, whether the said Christian Governors may worship the Cross, or Image of Christ so placed in the Temple on the aforesaid Days appointed by Law, omitting Genuflexions, Prostrations, and the Offerings?

5. And forasmuch as there is a Court, or Royal Council of Mathematicians, or Astrologers, whose Business it is, and chiefly the Presidents, every Year to make, publish, subscribe, and put his Seal to an Ephemeris or Diary, in which many vain and superstitious things are contain'd, and Fortunate days are set down; some for repairing to the Idol-Temples to offer up their Prayers there, offer Sacrifices, to visit the Temples of their Forefathers departed, to worship and honour them, and beg their Assistance; others for Marrying, for trying of Causes, driving Bargains, buying and selling, and so forth. Quære, Whether it be lawful for any Christian to be President, or a Member of the said Council, to order the said Ephemeris or Prediction, or any other Affairs relating to that College, to command the printing or using of it, to set Hand or Seal to authorize it; or at least to permit, consent, and allow, that the President's Subscription and Seal be put to the said Prediction or Ephemeris, so contriv'd with those superstitious Observations, and irreligious Rules, by the other Counsellors, and so to be publish'd, subscrib'd with his and the other Names? And whether he be not rather oblig'd to refuse the Office of President, or a Member of that Council, tho the King offer to press it upon him, and if he be in possession, to resign it, lest he any way be concern'd in the superstitious Practices above-mention'd, or seem by his Seal to give them any Authority?

6. Whether it be lawful for Priests and Ministers of the Gospel, or other Christians, to be present among the Gentiles, and Idol Priests, at the Funeral and solemn Interment of Gentiles; or to follow the Corps particularly of such Noblemen who during their Lifetime were Friends, Protectors and Benefactors of the Ministers of the Gospel, and Christians, or else are Kindred and Relations of some Catholick or Christian Family, in regard that several superstitious Rites are us'd and practis'd by the Gentiles and Idol-Priests attending such Funerals? And if the Christians, or Ministers of the Gospel refuse to be present, it may cause Railing and Enmity against the Christians and Priests of God.

7. Whether it be lawful for Christians, or Ministers of the Gospel, either to express their Friendship; or on account of any dead Person's Dignity, Worth or Quality, or for any other respect, either towards the dead Person, or his Family,

Funerals

rette.* Heirs or Kindred, to ſet out Meat and Drink before their Houſes, or in the Road where the Bier is to paſs, in caſe the antient Cuſtom continue, which has been eſtabliſh'd by long practice, of ſetting out Tables cover'd with Meat, prepar'd by the Gentiles on the day of the burial, in the way to the Tomb, whereas the Gentiles believe the Souls of the Dead take that Meat as Provision for their Journey, and feed on it?

8. Whether poor Chriſtians, by profeſſion Pipers, or the like, who live by their Labour, may for the Gain that is offer'd when call'd, or compell'd, play on their Instruments at the Funerals of Gentiles, carry the Bier, or perform any other Employment among the other Superſtitious, in the preſence of the Gentiles and Idol-Prieſts, who do ſeveral ſuperſtitious Acts?

9. Whether Chriſtian Artificers, ſuch as Carpenters, Maſons, or Architects, or the like, who are freely hir'd for their Pay; or being conſtrain'd by the Magiſtrates, or moſt powerful Men, may lawfully contribute with their Labour towards the building, or repairing of Idol-Temples, or only about laying the Foundations, making or mending the Roofs, or cleaning the Walls and Pavements, or clearing the Altars, or opening and ſhutting the Gates of Temples, and ſuch-like Employments? The reaſon of making the Doubt is, becauſe ſome Chineſe Chriſtians have not yet a true vigour and fortitude of Spirit in the Chriſtian Religion they have embraced, and are terrify'd when any trouble, danger, or hardship threatens from the Magiſtrates, or great Ones, if they reſuſe to obey their Commands?

10. Laſtly, In caſe ſome Acts may be tolerated, or lawful for Chriſtians making a Proteſtation of their Faith; Que-re, How and when it ought to be made; whether before the Gentiles, before, after, or at the very time the Ceremonies are acting? or whether it be ſufficient to make it before Chriſtians only, whether many or few? as to which it is determin'd the number may be aſcertain'd, for the better and fairer proceeding in a Matter of ſuch great moment.

We whoſe Names are under written, being conſulted about the aforeſaid Doubts, having God's Honour before our Eyes, that we may provide for the Salvation of Souls, do judg the following Answers ſhould be given to each of the Queſtions propos'd.

HAT it is not lawful for the Chriſtians living among Gentiles to worſhip dead Gentiles, whom thoſe Infidels honour as Saints, with thoſe Rites of exterior Worſhip mention'd in the Queſtion; neither with the Gentiles, nor elſewhere apart, without making a publick Proteſtation of their Faith; and thoſe that ſhall do it, will commit a heinous Sin, and Idolatry.

2. As to the Worſhip of Confucius before the Tablet, call'd The Throne of the Soul, &c. We answer, That it is not lawful for Chriſtians, either in company of the Infidels, or apart, to perform thoſe Genuflexions, Proſtrations, or other things mention'd in the Queſtion, tho the ſaid Chriſtians omit the Prayers and Supplications.

3. Concerning the Tablets on which the Gentiles imagine the Souls departed aſſiſt to receive Offerings, &c. as is contain'd in the Queſtion propos'd: We ſay unlawful for Chriſtians to keep the Tablets, either in Temples or their private Houſes, either with that Inſcrip-tion, The Throne, or Seat of the Soul, or without it; and that it is alſo unlawful to worſhip them, either among the Gentiles, or apart, or to make any Offering to them, even excluding the falſe belief of the Soul's reſiding in them.

4. Concerning the Temple of the Idol CHING HO ANG. In answer to the firſt part of the Queſtion, we ſay, It is unlawful for Governors, either upon taking poſſeſſion of their Employments, or on any other account whatſoever, to worſhip that Idol, or perform any part of what is contain'd in the Queſtion propos'd, but are rather bound to quit their Employment, than perform it. To the ſecond part of the Queſtion we answer, That it is not lawful for any Chriſtians, even Governors, to place a Croſs, or Image of Chriſt in the Idol-Temple, tho apart from the Idol-Altar; and that nothing of what is propos'd in the Queſtion can be tolerated, tho the Worſhip be directed to the true God, and Image of Chriſt, as is propos'd.

5. As to the College of Mathematicians, &c. We say, it is not lawful for a Christian to hold the Place of President, or Counsellor in it, if he is bound by his place to subscribe, or put his Seal to those Superstitious Edicts, Observations, or Predictions, much less to publish them by his Authority; but he is rather oblig'd to quit that Post. Nor can he approve of, or have a hand in contriving them.

6. Touching the Burial of the Dead. If the Christians do not joyn in the Superstitious Acts, but do it merely out of Civil respect, it is Lawful, otherwise it is not.

7. For the setting out of Meat upon Tables, as the dead Body is carry'd, we say it is not lawful without making a publick protestation of their Faith.

8. Concerning Minstrels and other acts usually perform'd at Funerals, with a mixture of Superstitious practices, as in the Question: We think it unlawful to play on Instruments after this manner, and to perform the other acts spoken of.

9. As to Labour in building, repairing, or cleansing of Temples, and the rest contain'd in the Question: We say, it is no way lawful for Christians, nor to be tolerated upon any account or pretence whatsoever.

10. We say, that in case a Protestation of Faith is to be made on account of any Toleration, it must be in publick before the Gentiles and Christians, who are present at that Function so tolerated. November the 27th 1669.

I F. Laurence de Laurea of the Fryars Minors, Consultor of the Holy Inquisition, &c. am of this Opinion.

I D. John Bona, Abbot of S. Bernard, hold the same.

It is here to be observ'd, that the second Doubt, and those that follow, except the 6th and 7th, were solv'd many Years since, in the same manner as they are here, by the Millioners of the Society of Jesus, at a Meeting they had in the Province of NANKING, as will appear in the second Book of the second Tome.

" The Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Inquisition pass'd the 23d of March 1656, declar'd it should be observ'd, according to the Questions, Circumstances, and all particulars mention'd in them. " Wednesday the 20th of the aforesaid Month of November, 1669, the most Illustrious, and most Reverend Lord Jerome Casanate, a Member of the Holy Inquisition, having made his Report to our most Holy Father Clement the 9th by the Divine Providence Pope, his Holiness approv'd of it.

F. Martin Martinez his Decree being brought into China, some Persons gave out, that all whatsoever was contain'd in the first Decree was by this revok'd and made void, tho they did not notify, or publish it in that Mission. Which plainly appears to be false by what the Sacred Congregation of the Universal Inquisition at Rome declares in this place.

In the Year 1673, by reason of new difficulties arising in the Mission of China, the Author of this Book had recourse to Rome, and lay'd the following Doubts before the Holy Congregation. The Answer that was deliver'd to him runs thus.

Doubts of the Chineses propos'd Anno 1674 by the R. F. F. Dominick Navarette of the Order of Preachers, and Missioner in China, to the Sacred General Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition, and by its Authority transmitted to the most Reverend Fathers, F. Laurence Brancato de Lauræa, of the Order of Friars Minors of S. Francis, Consultor of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Inquisition, Rites and Indulgences, Examiner of Bishops, and the Publick Divines of the Sapiencia at Rome. And to the most Reverend F. Cajetan Miraballo, of the Regular Clergy, and Qualificator of the Holy Inquisition.

Concerning the Chinese Magistrates or Mandarines, 25 Doubts.

Eclipse.

1. WHETHER it be lawful for Mandarines, when they have once embraced the Catholick Faith, to be present at the festival Acclamations the Chineses are us'd to make with great Noise and Shouts to the Sun and Moon during the time of an Eclipse?

To the first, the Answer is, That it is not Lawful.

I ask'd of antient Missioners, what Allowance, or Toleration might be given in this case; and they having given me no answer, I resolv'd to propose this and other Doubts at Rome. In the 2d Tome, I write all I have heard and understood concerning these Doubts. In this place, I with much Brevity touch upon what is most material; tho in this particular, as more singular to Europeans, it is convenient I should dilate somewhat more. It is an inviolable custom in China, to send advice from Court throughout the whole Empire of the Day and Hour when any Eclipse of the Sun or Moon is to happen. When the Mandarines have notice of it, two or three days before it comes they past up their Orders in all publick places of Cities and Towns, to this effect: Such a day, at such an hour, there is an Eclipse of the Sun or Moon, let all those whose Duty it is come to perform and be present at the usual Ceremonies, to deliver the Planet from that trouble. At the time appointed the Mandarines, other Persons of note, and a great many Bonzes meet; when the Eclipse commences, they begin to make Genuflections, and Prostrations, shout and hollow, beat upon Basons; the Bonzes pray, and all of them cry out in a hideous manner, till the Eclipse is over: this they call delivering and rescuing the Sun or Moon from the Trouble they are then in. This Ceremony is of great Antiquity in that Kingdom. Their Ritual, Tom. 4. pag. 13. makes mention of it, and ordains that the Kings attend the Emperor to assist, or succour the Sun or Moon in that distress; and to this purpose orders them to come with Drums, and Souldiers adorn'd with those Colours, which answer to the four parts of the World. This is enough for the understanding of the Doubt propos'd; and tho it is a barbarous Ceremony, let no Man

Man think strange that the Chineses should perform it, since it has been practis'd by Europeans, in the time of those great Doctors of the Church, S. Ambrose, and S. Augustin. Spondanus mentions it Anno 377. n. 5. S. Ambrose says, He absolutely took away the Acclamations that us'd to be made upon the Eclipse of the Sun. S. Augustin Serm. 1. Dom. 10. post Trin. speaks thus: If you know any that shout, when the Moon is darkned, admonish them of it, giving them to understand, that they commit a grievous Sin; for as much as they sacrilegiously presume to conceit that they can defend the Moon from Wüchcraft, when by God's Command it is darkned at certain times.

Thus the European and Asiatick Ceremony is condemn'd, and it appears to have been more Criminal among Christians than among Gentiles.

And if any Man shall say (tho I know not that any body has said so) that the Christian Mandarines, as believing in nothing that is done there, may be present without any scruple of Conscience, to avoid some inconveniences that may follow their absenting themselves: I answer; How shall it appear to thee, to us, or to the Church, that they do not inwardly believe what they outwardly profess? What avails it not to believe inwardly, if they approve of the aforesaid Superstitions by their outward presence?

Not can the Emperor's Command excuse them. S. Ignatius the Martyr ad Antioch. said: We are to be obedient to Cæsar in those things in which there is no danger of the Soul. And Tertul. lib. de Idolol. c. 15. As far as to separation from Idolatry, and within the bounds of Discipline. Thus far at most extends Obedience and Submission. The Substance of my Proposition consists in what has been written, which is enough for the present.

2. Whether the Christian Officers, or Souldiers may lawfully be present at the Processions, Genuflections, or other Ceremonies, wherewith at certain times the Military Men worship their great Commander, whom they call KI TO?

The Answer to the Second Question, That it is not Lawful.

I observ'd in another place, that the Chinese Souldiery have their God Mars, as other Nations had. That they acknowledg in him a true Deity, or something of a Deity, is plain matter of fact. When they have any Military Expedition in hand, the following Ceremony is perform'd in the Field. They cover a Table with variety of Meats, and Dainties; over it they spread the Standard, or Colours, then take it off, and the Souldiers and Officers kneel and prostrate themselves before it. Then the Commander in chief repairs to the Temple dedicated to him, whose Soul they say is in the Standard; there he kneels and makes Offerings, all to the end he may be successful in War. This was made out to me in China. F. John Garcia an antient Missioner of my Order told me, that he once saw a Mahometan Captain refuse to be present, when the said Ceremony was perform'd. F. Antony of S. Mary a Franciscan told me, that the Christian Souldiers in the Province of XAN TUNG went to it as frequently as the Gentiles. I propos'd the matter at Rome for the satisfaction of all Persons, and the more security in a thing of such moment, not that I was ignorant of the Truth.

3. It often happens that the lawful Kings being expel'd, Tyrants intrude. Quære, Whether these be oblig'd before they are baptiz'd to depart from their Rebellion, and peaceably to restore the Kingdoms they have usurp'd to the right Owner?

To the 3d, They are to be advis'd to restore what they have wrongfully taken; and if they promise so to do, Baptism is not to be deny'd them.

4. The Chineses unanimously agree that the Tartar now reigning is a Tyrant. Quære, Whether we may admit the Souldiers and Magistrates, who serve him for pay in Civil and Military Employments, to Baptism, and when baptiz'd administer other Sacraments to them; and baptize the Emperor himself, whilst he wrongfully holds the Kingdom? Item, what answer we are to give the Chineses, and what advice concerning the Government of the Tartars, when they ask our opinion touching the said Tartar's Right?

To the 4th, Concerning the Emperor, as in the 3d Question: As for those that serve them, if they desire to be baptiz'd, Baptism must not be deny'd them on this account, if they promise, that when the Prince asks it they will give good and just advice; and so other Sacraments may be afterwards administered to them, if they are well dispos'd.

In my Controversies I write all that was said concerning these Points, in the meetings we had at Canton. Tertul. in Apolog. cap. 39. says: For as much as Christians

*Nava-

~ Christians are never to take part with Ty-

rette.

Discourſing about baptizing the Em- peror of China, one of the Company ſaid, I find no doubt in this particular. For Constantine tyrannically uſurp'd the Empire, and yet S. Silveſter baptiz'd him: But Hiſtorians tell us how far this is from Truth, ſomething out of them I writ in the place already cited, and the Reader may ſee Ribadenegra on the Feaſt of S. Silveſter.

5. Whether Souldiers and Officers marry'd in France, going over into New France may there marry again?

To the 5th. If they can prove that they are free (that is, from their firſt Wives by Death) and that they have no other Canonical impediments, they may marry Catholicks. The proof muſt be legal.

A certain Miſſioner would have it, that French Souldiers who were marry'd at Home, might marry again when they went over into New France, and had not their Wives along with them, by reaſon of the great danger of Incontinency: this he ſaid the Divines at Paris aſſerted, and had given it under their Hands. Others with much reaſon condemn'd this Doctrin, for according to it a French Chriſtian (and conſequently any other) leaving his Wife in France might take another in New France, another in the Iſland Guadalupe, if he went thither; another at Martinico, another at Mada-gaſcar, and another in India, becauſe in all parts there is danger of Incontinency. Nor can I imagine the Divines of Paris ever gave ſuch an opinion (as infallibly they never did) yet becauſe all the reaſons that can be urg'd againſt it, tho very forcible and perſwaſive, cannot convince that Party, it was requiſite to uſe other methods, as having recourſe to Rome to undeceive him.

6. The Chineſes worſhip all the Spirits, which they imagine to be employ'd in guarding of Cities and Kingdoms, in the ſingle Idol, CHING HOANG; yet they confeſs they were real Men, born and bred in that Kingdom. Quære, Whether Chriſtians may lawfully give them the name of Angel Guardian?

To the 6th they answer, That it is not Lawful.

I have already taken notice, that the Doubts propos'd at Rome concern- ing CHING HOANG, have been ſolv'd by the Miſſioners of the Society, tho there has been ſome Controverſy about this point in China. But the rea- ſon why I gave in that the Idols CHING HOANG, to whom ſome have given the name of Guardian An- gels, were Men, known to the Chineſes as ſuch, whoſe Names, Sirnames, and Native Countries are notorious to all Men, was becauſe I had throughly exam- in'd into and made out the matter in that Country; and if ſo, it is plain they can be no Guardian Angels. This is the method the Franciſcans and we Do- minicans have taken, following the ex- ample of the Fathers, Hurtado, Julio, Aleni, Gouvea, and other antient Men of the Society.

7. Whether Mandarines upon preſſing neceſſities may conceal the true Religion, and outwardly feign themſelves Idolaters, tho the reſt of the Chriſtians be ſcandaliz'd at theſe exterior Shows?

The answer to the 7th is, That they may not.

The Holy Congregation gave the ſame Deciſion upon another occaſion, as F. Eſcob ſays in ſum. fol. 585. n. 68. but there was a reaſon for propoſing it over again.

8. Whether the Sacrifices offer'd by the Chineſes to the Idol CHING HOANG, be oppoſite to true Chriſtian Religion?

Answer to the 8th. That they are oppo- ſite.

It was ſaid a Metaphyſician maintain'd the contrary, urging that the ſaid Idol was inſtituted before the coming of God upon Earth. Idolatry being a Sin againſt the Law of Nature, it is moſt certain, it was ever oppoſite to the Law of God, which ever was and is one and the ſame, tho in different States: ſo that this and other Sins, which are ſo of themſelves and in their own nature, have a Malice and Deformity of their own, from which they can never be ſeparated, nor any way excus'd.

9. Whether Chriſtian Mandarines may among the Gentiles in outward Show fall down before the Chineſe Idols, directing all thoſe Ceremonies with an inward Humi- liation of their Heart to the true God, and to a Croſs placed on the Idol Altar?

Answer to the 9th. That they may not.

There is ſome Body that aſſerts the affirmative, urging the words of Tertul- lian, but not quoted fairly as they are in his Works. What this Author writ, is as follows: If plainly call'd to the Prieſthood, and Sacrifice, I will not go, becauſe because it is the proper Service of the Idol. Neither will I be concern'd in the like by my Advice, or Charge. If being call'd to the Sacrifice I am present, I shall partake in the Idolatry; if any other cause obliges me to be with him that sacrifices, I shall only be a Spectator of the Sacrifice. Tertullian only allows of the mere material presence, and nothing more, which all Men allow.

10. Item, Whether they may, in the same place, perform the Sacrifices and Prayers usually offer'd for the good success of the Government, with other Ceremonies according to the Chinese Ritual; provided they inwardly in their Hearts despise the Idol, and direct all these Actions to the true God?

Answer to the 10th. That they may not.

Tho it be perform'd in that manner and with that intention, it cannot but be outward Idolatry.

11. Whether it may be permitted the Japaneses, who are converted to the Faith, to make those Bonfires the Gentiles every Year use to make as a false Commemoration of the Souls of their Friends departed, confounding the Civil with many Heathenish Rites?

Answer to the 11th. That it may not be permitted.

Morales pag. 291 instances this particular in these words. In Japan the Christians are tolerated in the making of Illuminations, or Bonfires to rejoice the People, when the Gentiles keep that Feast for the Souls departed, and think they come to their Houses; tho the Japaneses mix Heathen Ceremonies among the Political Rites: and yet nevertheless their Divines of India determin'd, that the Christians might perform both. I propos'd the Point so at Rome, and the Answer was in the Negative.

12. Whether the Mandarines or Magistrates may be lawfully admitted to Baptism? Item, Whether Mandarines once Baptiz'd may lawfully accept of the said Employments; and whether the Missioners may admit those who have once accepted of such Dignity, to the Sacraments of the Church?

Answer to the 12th. They cannot unless they quit those Employments.

I had brought my Doubts to this Head, but was not yet fully resolv'd. I spoke with F. Claudius Motet of the Society; he told me plainly, the Mandarines were incapable of Holy Baptism. F. Stanislaus Torrente affirm'd the same. The principal reasons are: 1. Because by their place they are oblig'd to perform the Ceremonies to the Idol CHING HO ANG, and when they enter upon their Employment to beg his Aid and Assistance that they may govern well. 2. Because in time of great Drought, or too much Rain, they repair to the Temples of the Idols to beg fair Weather, or Rain, or at least to the Mountains and Valleys, and Idol LUNG VU ANG, who is the God of Waters. 3. Because they must attend upon the Eclipses of the Sun and Moon, and because of the Ceremonies they perform upon taking possession of their Employments, and at other times to Confucius. These were the Reasons I gave, and had the Answer as above. It shall be all spoke of at large in its place; and other reasons alludg'd.

13. Whether Christians who are Masters in publick Schools, who are vulgarly call'd HIO KUON, may be lawfully admitted to the Sacraments, and whether they may lawfully accept of such publick Employments? The reason of making the doubt is, because it is the duty of these Places to be present at all the Ceremonies which are perform'd to Confucius.

Ans. to 13. As was answer'd elsewhere; that if those Honours paid to Confucius are absolutely Political, they may be permitted; if Religious, not.

The Masters who live in Houses within the Universities are call'd HIO KUON; the Scholars that are upon Register are subject to them. I propos'd the reason for the doubt, which I mention in my Controversies. By the answer given concerning the Ceremonies perform'd to Confucius, it will appear, whether they are Political or Religious.

I must here take notice, that the Military Mandarines are free from the Impediments propos'd in these two Doubts and Solutions; so that if they are under no others, they may well be admitted to Baptism.

14. Whether to avoid Persecution from the Infidels, the Chinese of the Learned Sect are to be let alone in their simplicity, or their Ignorance concerning the Sacrifices of Confucius and other Ceremonies; or whether the Missioners are not rather oblig'd to advise and instruct them, and to drive from their minds the darkness of ignorance by the Doctrine of Christ?

Answer to the 14th. The Missioners are oblig'd to teach the Chinese the Truth; and lay open their Errors.

It will appear by the second Book of Nava-Controversies, what motive I had to put this Question, and who it was that writ the contrary to the Answer given at Rome.

15. Whether it be lawful to baptize Mandarines, or others, unless they first turn their Concubines out of doors?

Ans. to 15. They cannot be baptiz'd, unless they turn out their Concubines.

The Missioners of China cannot deny but that some Persons have baptiz'd Chineses, whilst they had their Concubines yet in the House; and that it may in some case be verifi'd that they are expell'd Formaliter, tho not Materialiter. I grant, and believe those that are acquainted with the affairs of China will own as much, to them it belongs to weigh the circumstances duly.

I writ in another place, whether those we call Concubines in China are so in a strict sense; or whether we may give them the name of Wives, and say the Chineses have several Wives, as the Jews had, or only one Wife, and Concubines? I said before that it was likely God's dispensation to his People to have many Wives extended to the Gentiles as well. For clearing this doubt, I add to what has been already said, that in the first Council of Toledo, Can. 17. she is call'd a Concubine, Who was taken to cohabit with a Man, without a Dower, and all other Solemnities. So Gratianus expounds it C. is qui dist. 34. and it appears by S. Augustin, lib. de bon. conjug. whose Authority the same Gratianus alledges C. Concup. &c. Soler. 32. q. 2. Justinian is of the same opinion, as may be seen in Cabassucius, p. 219. According to this rule, I say, that those in China, tho we give them the name of Concubines, are in reality Wives, and all the difference is in the Solemnity us'd at the Marriage of the first Wife.

Wives.

16. It is establish'd by a Law publish'd at PE KING, that all Persons who pass before an Idol-Temple on Horse-back, shall alight in honour and respect to it. Quære, Whether the Missioners, or other Christians, may with safety obey this Law?

Ans. to 16. That they cannot.

This case was put by one of those that came from Court to another residing at Canton, when we were confin'd there: the latter desiring to know my opinion, I writ the best I understood to the point, proving it was not lawful for a Catholic to alight before his Horse, as he past before such a Temple. Tertull. de Idol. says that All worship given to an Idol is forbidden. He did not approve of my judgment: for the more satisfaction I propos'd it at Rome, where I had the Answer as above. What Arguments pass between us are brought in their place.

17. Whether a Heathen King or his Ministers, in hatred to the Faith commanding the pulling down of Churches, Missioners, other Christians may obey such a Law?

Ans. to 17. That they may not.

It seems, something of this nature was taken notice of in two Missioners wherein they were govern'd by reason that were something plausible, the reason did not approve of the action. Some were of opinion there lay an Excommunication against it. It is well known, that we cannot in time of Persecution deliver Books, Pictures, Vestments, &c. to Gentiles, nor discover those that have then tho it cost us our lives; and certainly it is a greater offence to throw down Churches.

18. Whether the Chinese Christians may pay respect to an Idol, not as it is the false representative of a Deity, but as it is valued and much belov'd by a Heathen, who is friend?

Ans. to 18. That they cannot.

This case was put to me; I answer'd in the Negative, as I was answer'd at Rome and gave the reasons, which are in the Controversies. He that put the case to me persisted in the contrary opinion, and I believe will do so still. Among the reasons I urg'd, one was, That exterior actions of Honour and Worship, and the like, are not abstractive from Formalities, as those of the Understanding are and therefore, tho those us'd to the Idols were separable, yet that did not appear to exterior actions. Nor was it any thing to the purpose, tho the Idol was a precious thing my Friend had a great esteem for, because even among Christians such an action would be look'd upon as very mean. Would it be proper, that in Italy where they place so great a value upon fine Statues, I should bow or pay any Honour to them to flatter the Owner? The Statue, or Idol has no relation to the Owner, but to the Thing represented; and if a motion to an Image is the same as to the thing imagin'd, the Corporal motion with which I worship the Statue must be of the same nature.

19. When a white Elephant is dead, which is by all Persons look'd upon as a presage of good fortune, the multitude flock together, and with them the false Heathen Priests, who as the Elephant's Carcase is carry'd through the City with mournful Pomi when it passes before them kneel, and making a barbarous lamentation, worship its Bones. Quære, Whether Christians may lawfully be present at this Funeral Pomp, bearing the Gentiles company in those same Genuflexions?

Ans. to 19. That they may not.

I have writ the History of the White Elephant, so highly valued by the Kings of India. It is well known that whilst he lives he is serv'd with as much respect as the King himself, when dead he is bury'd with Royal Pomp. They carry the Carcase in Procession, many Idolatrous Priests attend it; as it passes through the Streets all Persons there present kneel and touch the Ground with their Foreheads. The case is, whether Catholick Priests and other Christians, who accidentally or designedly see that sight, may lawfully make those Genuflexions among the Gentiles, and as they do them, or by themselves, being in a place where no Gentile is.

I always held the Negative, which I maintain'd the best I could against one, who obstinately defended the contrary opinion, reducing it to a Civil and Political Worship. Brute Beasts are incapable even of this sort of Worship, as S. Thomas teaches, 2. 2. q. art. So that no Excellency appears in the Object to claim this Civil Respect, much less any above it, as in all appearance, according to the circumstances, that which the Gentiles pay seems to be.

Whether in case the King expressly commands all Christians to attend the Bier, and perform the Funeral Rites, and Prostrations, we may obey?

Ans. to 20. As elsewhere, if there be any Apostatical or Superstitious acts in attending the Bier, and the Funeral, they may not; if they be only Civil, they may.

The determination, Whether that Worship be Civil or Religious, is left to those who are there, so that the difficulty is not fully solv'd. Tho I am satisfy'd it is more than probable, that the Worship on the part of the Gentiles is more than Civil; for there is no doubt but that the whole Kingdoms bewailing the death of the Elephant, putting on Mourning, a vast number of Priests meeting at the Funeral, and all People lamenting as it were some great Loss and Disaster befallen the Kingdom, must have something of a great mystery among those Gentiles, especially for as much as that Beast is look'd upon as a presage of happiness and success in those Countries, where they have not the Light of the Gospel.

When this hapned, the King did not command all Persons to come to worship the Carcase of the Elephant, but that all who were present as it past by should pay him the honour and respect above mentioned. To save doubts, and cut off difficulties, what occasion was there for Priests and Christians to go see that monstrous Solemnity? were it not better to have spar'd that curiosity, to avoid an action never done in the Church? In my Controversies I mention the Instances that may be urg'd against me, and answer them.

21. Whether it be lawful for Mandarines, or other Christians before their Feasts to spill a little Wine on the ground? The reason of making the doubt is, because the said Ceremony is prescrib'd by the Rituals under the denomination of a Sacrifice. Libation.

Ans. to 21. That it is not lawful.

This Ceremony is of great Antiquity in China, and is kept up to this day. For the better understanding of it, I here insert what F. Prosper Intorceta writes in his Sapientia Sincia, p. 73. §. 4. translating the Chinese Text into Latin. It speaks of Confucius, and says, Tho he fed on the coarser Rice, yet pouring one part upon the ground, he sacrificed to those dead Persons, who in former ages had taught the manner of tilling the Earth, dressing Meat, &c. And this was the custom of the Antients in token of Gratitude; and he perform'd these things with much gravity and reverence. The Commentator CHANG KO LAO expounds thus: Confucius took his Food, not to nourish the Body, but for to increase in Virtue. Other words yet plainer shall be set down in another place. Thus it appears that the shedding any part of Meat or Drink on the ground, is in China call'd a Sacrifice, and is no Civil or Political action.

22. Whether we be oblig'd to take away the Bills and Scroles which are set up by order of the Magistrates to defame our Faith, against our Houses and Churches, or to confirm the Faith by a publick confession of it before the Magistrates?

Ans. to the 22. They are oblig'd to take them away; and if being accus'd before the Judges they are examin'd to the matter of Fact, they are oblig'd to make a Profession of the true Faith.

The thing hapned in China in the Year 1665. it was argued, and there was no small variety of Opinions. The Fathers Grelon and Gaviani of the Society, adher'd stilly to the Resolution above written, I follow'd their Sentiment. Some years before F. Francis Diaz of my Order, with his own hand tore the Edicts set up at FO Nava-NGAN by order of a Mandarine against our Holy Faith. True it is, he was most cruelly bastinado'd for it, but exercis'd a great deal of Patience under it; and tho some body has condemn'd the action, I insert it here as Heroical and Glorious. F. John Baptist de Morales and his Companions had resolv'd to do the same at FO CHEU, it was not their fault that it was not done. S. Justin Martyr in former ages did the same, and was cruelly tormented for it. This is grounded on the Doctrine of S. Thomas, generally receiv'd by all Men, 2. 2. q. 3. art. 2. where he says, that when God's Honour and the good of our Neighbour requires it, the outward confession of Faith becomes of precept.

23. Whether when the Infidels publish Books and Pamphlets reflecting on our Faith, and falsely aspersing the Missioners, we are oblig'd by publick Writing to defend the Faith, and clear our selves from Slanders; or whether we may give way to the prevailing party, and with timorous silence bear with our unjust Slanderers?

Ans. to the 23. If there be no imminent danger of a sharper Persecution, they may confute them by words and writing; if there be danger, let them bear for a while, and carry themselves upon the Negative.

I have writ some things concerning this point, which seem to make out more than is here determin'd; however, it is a plain case we are to stand by this Resolution. We know that formerly several Persons stood up, and writ Apologies in defence of our Holy Faith; and Spondanus, Ann. 172, 277, 278, & 301. tells it us of Justinus, Miletus, Apollinaris, and others; and it is certain they did as we ought to do.

24. Whether when a Tyrant commands Missioners, or other Christians to deliver up the Books of the Holy Faith, as was done in the Year 1665, it be lawful to deliver them?

Ans. to the 24. That it is not lawful.

This Point was determin'd in the 13th Can. of the Council of Arles, where are these words, It expels them from the Clergy who shall deliver up Sacred Books or Vessels to the Gentiles, or give in the Names of the Faithful.

The Martyrology on the 2d of February mentions several who suffer'd Glorious Martyrdom for refusing to deliver up the Holy Books. And they who through fear of Torments deliver'd them, were look'd upon as publick Traytors.

In November also is Celebrated the Feast of S. Valerianus, who suffer'd for refusing to deliver up the Sacred Vestments. Read the Martyrology on the first of February.

25. Whether Christians may lawfully give Pictures of Saints to the Infidels their Friends? For on the one side, their affections are gain'd by those Pictures in which they very much delight, and the way is made easier for instructing them. But on the other side, they lying in the profound sleep of Gentility, experience has shown that they do not honour them as Pictures of Saints, but, as Idols of the Europeans.

Ans. to the 25. If there be no danger of their abusing them, they may, to the intent to secure peace with them, and allure them to the Faith.

Doubts concerning the Worship given to Confucius.

1. W Hether F. Martin Martinez did fully and truly lay before the Holy Congregation the whole matter of Fact, in relation to the Ceremonies perform'd to Confucius by the Learned?

2. Whether the Decree of the Holy Congregation, as to the third Question propos'd by F. Martinez, be grounded on a very probable opinion, or on the Proposition made by the said F. Martinez?

3. Whether the Structures dedicated to the Worship of Confucius be Temples or not?

These three Points were answer'd in another place.

The Notes upon the Decree granted in favour of F. Martinez, which were set down before, fit this place, as do other things I have in my Controversies. In relation to the third Point, I must observe and declare in this place briefly, that all the Dictionaries the Fathers of the Society have writ in China, call that which is dedicated to Confucius a Temple, as shall appear more plainly in the place above-mention'd, and it is properly express'd by the Chinese word MIAO. Observe further, that the Difficulties there have been in these times concerning the Philosopher Confucius, tho they were made made known by the Dominican and Franciscan Missioners, yet they were not the Authors of them, as shall be made out in the second Book of Controversies, where those are set down which were several Years before among those of the Society.

4. Whether to kneel before the Statue of Confucius, or his Tablet, to burn Perfumes, light Candles, and the like, be mere political Worship?

Answer to the 4th, That these things are not lawful.

That is as much as to say, that these Actions are not merely Political.

5. Whether the Ceremony of chusing Beasts to be offer'd to Confucius, be only Political and Civil?

To the fifth no Answer is given, because the Matter of Fact does not appear.

I propos'd the Matter of Fact, to my thinking, as plain as possible could be, which made me admire at the Answer. I will repeat it here briefly: The day before Sacrifice is offer'd to Confucius, they chuse the Beasts thus; they pour hot Wine into the Ears of the Swine (those of the Society say it is a sort of Liquor like Oil) if the Swine moves its Head, it is accepted of as fit for Sacrifice; if not, it is rejected. Other antient Gentiles us'd such like trials, as is mention'd in the second Tome. When the Beast is accepted of, the Mandarine makes it a bow, and when kill'd another. Let any Man judg whether this can be a Civil political Action.

6. Whether the offering of Hogs-Blood and Bristles to Confucius, be political; the same is ask'd concerning the Ceremony of burying the Bristles and Blood above-mention'd?

Answer to the 6th; Be it as it will, it is not lawful.

When the Swine are kill'd, they keep some of their Hair, or Bristles and Blood, which they offer the next day before Confucius his Image, or Tablet; and afterwards bury it very solemnly, as is more particularly set down in another place. Some contend this Action is political; the Fathers Gouvea, Gaviniani, and others, were of another opinion.

7. Whether the Ceremony upon a Figure of a Man made of Straw, which was instituted according to the Ritual, to call upon the Spirits that they may be present at the Sacrifices, be Religious or Political?

Answer to the 7th, That it is not lawful.

This Ceremony is us'd in their Offerings or Sacrifices they make to the Dead. They lay under the Tables there cover'd, a Figure of a Man, on which they pour a little Wine. This is all explicated at large in the second Tome of Controversies; I can find no way to make it Political.

8. Whether the Action of washing his Hands, which is perform'd by the Magistrate, as a Preparatory to make the Offerings to Confucius, be Political or Ceremonial?

Answer to the 8th; That it is not lawful.

It plainly appears, that the Argument some People make use of, which is to say, that these Actions are indifferent, and therefore may be tolerated, is of no force. To wash Hands, is in it self indifferent; but in this case, and upon such Circumstances, it becomes Ceremonious and Religious. The Priests washing at the Altar after the Offertory, neither is, nor can be call'd a Civil or Political Action, but Ceremonious and very Religious.

9. Whether Confucius his Tablet, which the Chineses think to be the Seat of the Soul, be a thing appertaining to political Worship? For they believe the airy Spirit of Confucius comes to it to receive the Offerings.

Answer to the 9th; That it is not lawful.

I find many Missioners of China divided about this and other Points. I took the Doubt above propos'd from the Dispute that was some Years since among the Society. The Resolution they then came to is the very same as that above-written: That the Learned Chineses believe the Soul of their Master comes to the Tablets, is own'd by themselves, and the Characters on it fully express as much. That some deny it, is rather the effect of their obstinate Will, than of Reason or Understanding.

10. The Magistrates offer to Confucius pieces of white Silk, which after the Offering they cast into the Fire, and with it a Vessel of Wine, saying some Collects. Quære, Whether these things belong to mere civil Worship?

Answer to the 10th; That it is not lawful.

Among the other Ceremonies they perform to this Philosopher twice a Year, besides other things they offer him nine pieces of white Sattin, every one with a Collect, they may not be any more: After the Offering they tie them to long Staves like Pikes, and burn them. Some say it is done in token of rejoicing; and

Nava- that as it is a political and civil Action rette, to offer them to Persons living, so it may be to the Statue or Tablet of Confu- cius.

11. The Magistrate with both hands twice lifts up on high some Wine, which they call blessed Wine, and then drinks it; in like manner he lifts up a portion of Meat, which he receives from one attending, and offers it to Confucius. The Offering being ended, some Collects are read, which express Confucius his presence, and invite him to drink of the Wine that is offer'd him; and the Gentiles believe they shall receive Honour, Advancement, and Happiness, as the consequence of these Offerings. Quære, Whether the aforesaid Offerings are in the nature of Sacrifice?

Answer to the 11th; That they are not lawful.

The main thing we desire to know, is, Whether such Ceremonies be lawful or not? It signifies little to me, whether they may be reputed as Sacrifices, or not. But by reading the Reasons alledg'd in the second Tome, every Man may decide what the Consequence of them is. In this Proposition I did not deviate a tittle from what I was told by Learned Christians, who are they that best understand these Affairs; nor from what is writ in the second Book of the second Tome.

12. Whether the Statue of Confucius be an Idol, or false Sanctity be attributed to it by the Chineses?

Answer to the 12th; It was said in another place not to be lawful.

I could have wish'd the Answer had been plainer, and sutable to the Reasons I propos'd for making the Doubt; I bring them in the place above-mention'd. The Fathers Semedo, Kircher, and other grave Men, all of the Society of Jesus, are for me, whose Opinion agrees with the Sentiments of our Fathers and the Franciscans.

13. Whether the Ceremony of accompanying the Spirit of Confucius be Civil and Political?

Answer to the 13th; That the Matter of Fact does not appear.

Among the Ceremonies the Chineses perform to their Master, and Forefathers departed, there is bringing down of Spirits, dismissing and receiving, others call it accompanying of them; be it as it will all is bad, it is set down in the second Tome.

14. Whether the Table set up before the Statue or Tablet of Confucius be an Altar?

Answer to the 14th; That it is not lawful.

According to the Question this implies, that it is not lawful to place a Table before the Statue or Tablet of Confucius, as the Chineses use it, with Candlesticks, Antependium, and other Formalities, nothing differing from the Idol-Altars.

15. Whether the Ceremony of chusing a Day for making of the said Offerings, can be reckon'd a mere Act of Civil and Political Worship?

Answer to the 15th; If the Worship be religious, neither is it nor the choice lawful.

The Offerings and other Actions explain'd in the foregoing Questions, are adjudg'd a Religious, not a Civil Worship; therefore it is so often repeated, That it is not lawful: consequently it must be so to chuse a Day to perform any of those Acts. It is not as in our Parts; Days are fix'd for several sorts of business that occurs, or for Bull-feasts, Rejoicings, or undertaking a Journey, &c. wherein regard is had to some corporal Conveniencies, as the People being more at leisure, less likelihood of Rain, a more temperate Season, &c. It is far otherwise in China, they observe whether the Days be lucky or unlucky; whether they shall succeed to day, or miscarry to morrow. That Nation believes in gross Errors, and therefore we all look upon these Chioces as superstitious, they using generally Lots in them. And this not only to chuse days, but to find a fortunate Hour for what they are to do.

16. Supposing the Books of Confucius, and the Learned Sect contain many, and those visible Errors; Quære, Whether Christians may undertake the Employment of Masters, and teach, expound, and maintain such false Doctrines? The reason of making the Doubt is, because if they do so, they approve of those Doctrines, and spread abroad their Errors. On the other side, if this be forbid them, several who have no other livelihood will doubtless leave our Religion.

Answer to the 16th; That they may not.

The Fathers of the Society some Years since argu'd this Point: He that decided it, supposes Confucius and his Sect are full of many Errors. The Reasons of making a Doubt on both sides were sufficiently laid open; they are explain'd in what has been writ, and yet the Resolution was in the Negative. All will be made plainer in the second Tome.

17. Supposing the aforesention'd Errors; Quære, Whether Christians may lawfully enter upon Examinations? For very often Errors against Faith are propos'd in them, which those

those who are to be examin'd, are oblig'd to justify, commend, explain, and maintain, in so much that it is not lawful for any Man to vary one jot from the Doctrine of the Classick Authors; but the forbidding of this will certainly be the shutting up the Way of Salvation to many of them.

Answer to the 17th; That they cannot enter upon those Examinations, unless they do it with a design to oppose false Doctrines.

I was always at a stand about these two Points; but being young in the Mission, I div'd into the Matter, and observ'd what others did. Afterwards finding them controverted by the Fathers of the Society, my Doubt increas'd. Hitherto it was look'd upon as a great Inconvenience to hinder the Learned from performing the Ceremonies to their Master and Philosopher; that which follows upon this Resolution, if not greater, is at least more universal, as affecting many more. The inconveniences are already mention'd, and notwithstanding them, the afore said resolution was given. I don't question but it will surprize some in China, but it will not appear so strange to those who have read the Arguments that pass among those of the Society upon this and other Points in the Year 1628. What they decreed is set down in the second Tome. I have ever declar'd, that if an action be bad in it self, it neither is, nor can be justify'd on account of the inconveniences that may ensue of not practicing it. Read Cajetan in 3. ad Rom. where he handles this Point acutely.

18. Whether the Wine and Flesh offer'd to Confucius, are to be reputed as Idol-Offerings?

Answer to the 18th; The Matter of Fact does not appear; if the Offering be a Sacrifice, it is unlawful, and the thing offer'd an Idol-Offering.

The said Offerings have been condemn'd above as unlawful, tho it be not decided whether they are Sacrifices. In the Treatise of the Missioners of the Society, they are allow'd as Sacrifices; and it seems to be sufficiently made out by the Reasons I urg'd in a particular Treatise on this Subject. The Chinese Dictionarys made by the Europeans, agree in the same.

19. Supposing that Confucius never own'd a God, nor Angels, nor the Immortality of the Soul, nor any Reward or Punishment after this Life; Quære, Whether Christians being ask'd by Infidels concerning his Salvation, and State in the other World, may, or ought to affirm that he obtain'd Life Everlasting? For we have not the least ground to say Nava- so, and to answer the contrary, may cause many Inconveniences.

Answer to the 19th; Upon that Supposition it cannot be affirm'd that Confucius is sav'd.

Much to this purpose is said in the second Tome. There has been variety of Opinions concerning the Supposition, even among those of the Society, and they are afoot to this day: There is not the least difficulty in the Resolution given to me and others, who are very certain that Man never had any knowledg of God. Others may pry further into the Matter, to resolve what Answer they shall give. The Answer which has been often given, is with the rest in the place above-mention'd.

20. Whether it be lawful to maintain that Confucius out-did Solomon in Morals?

Answer to the 20th; It does not become a Christian to make such Comparisons, and give such Judgment.

In the second Tome I mention, how a Missioner was guilty of this failing; whereas others agree that this Philosopher was not equal to Seneca, Cicero, or other antient Europeans. Such Expressions cannot be oppos'd, but by laying them before those that have Power to decide them. There is no better way to stop the Mouths of Talkers. Read S. Jerome in 3. ad Ephes. Christost. Hom. 15. in Gen. and S. Greg. in 1. Reg. 1. Corn. à Lap. in Proem. ad Pent. vid. Sylveir. Tom. 2. c. 4. in Luc. q. 2. & 6. pag. 376. n. 20.

21. The Missioners of the Society have an Order for their Mission, which expressly forbids them by any means to affirm, that our Holy Law agrees with the Sect of Confucius in the whole, or in any part: the Holy Congregation may, if it pleases, order the same upon this Point. For such an Order is very material for the honour of the Evangelical Law.

Answer to the 21st; All Missioners are oblig'd to say the same concerning the Law of Confucius, that was prescrib'd the Jesuits, as is instanced by the Holy Congregation.

F. John Balat upon several occasions acquainted me with this Order, and in my presence stop'd the Mouths of some impertinent Persons with it; but he did not inform me whether it came from the Holy Congregation. Since it did, there is no doubt but it obliges all Persons, and that more strictly than if it came from some particular Superior. Certainly he that that mov'd for it, gave very good Reasons for what he did. And since no Application has been made to recal it, all the reason in the World it should be observ'd, and that we all observe it.

Eight Doubts concerning the Sacraments.

1. WHether the Form of Baptism in the Chinese Language be valid; it is thus, NGO SI VL, or NI IN FU, KIE ZU, KIE XING XIN MING CHE. Many deny it, and urge, that the Chineses do not know either a true Spirit, or true Sanctity; nor do the words XING XIN in their first Institution signify the Holy Ghost: Nor is the Unity of Essence, Power, or Virtue express'd.

Ans. to 1. No other Answer can be given, but that they must use a Form, or words that express the Action of Baptizing, and the Unity of Essence, together with the Trinity of Persons; or else use the Latin words as in the Western-Church.

We had a great Disputation upon this Subject at Canton. The greater part were of opinion it was valid: I and some others oppos'd it as much as possible, and could not be satisfy'd in a Point of such great Consequence. I sent Advice to those of my Order who were absconded, never to make use of that Form, or suffer it to be us'd by the Christians. If it be valid, I do not question but that which Authors reject out of Cajetan is much more so. Some time after I saw it rejected, and declar'd invalid in a Treatise of the Fathers of the Society. In the second Tome I set down the Arguments us'd on both sides. And tho I declar'd the principal Substance of it at Rome, being it depends on a strange Language whereof they have no knowledg, they do not think convenient to resolve according to it, when there is but one by who understands it.

2. Whether it be convenient to add to the Form of Baptism the Chinese Christians commonly use, viz. NGO SI VL, &c. the word IE, that the word MING which signifies the Name, may be confin'd to the singular number? For so and no otherwise is the Unity of Essence or Virtue signify'd.

Ans. to 2. as to the first.

It is an essential Point in Baptism to express the Unity of Essence, as was said to the first Doubt. In all the form set down about it, there is no Word or Particle to confine the word MING to the singular Number; and of it self, and as it there stands, it serves indifferently for the Singular or Plural; but rather for the latter in this place, because three Persons go before. In Latin and Spanish we place In the Name before the Persons, and the Chineses according to their Grammar place it at last. The more I have study'd this Business, the greater the Difficulty appears. Those of my Order add the aforesaid word.

Item, Whether absolutely speaking it be lawful to baptize the Children of Infidels, Hereticks and Apostates, leaving them under the care of their Parents? The Missioners vary, and so do Authors; but the Council of Toledo speaking of the Jews, gives it in the Negative. The Infidels bearing Converts say, that Baptism delivers from the Devil, and is a wholesom Medicine to this and other Purposes, they beg their sick or possess'd Children may be baptiz'd. Quære, Whether it be lawful to baptize them upon the foresaid Motives?

Ans. It is not lawful to baptize them, if they are to be left after Baptism in the power of Infidels.

Answer to the other part; That it is not lawful to baptize upon those Motives alone.

I have seen both Cases, and variety of Opinions among the Missioners. The Council of Toledo 4. c. 59. & refertur cap. Judaor. 16. quæst. 1. speaks thus; That the Children of Jews which are baptized, be separated from the company of their Parents, lest they be led by them into Error and Prevarication. The same reason stands good in the case of Gentiles and Hereticks. The Resolution set down, is the Doctrine of Master Bannez upon the Subject of Baptism, and others. Some Moderns, and among them Diana speak otherwise as to the Children of Hereticks. Read Leander tract. 2. de Bapt. disp. 5. quæst. 8.

Authors speak variously as to the second Case. Our most Reverend Passerinus has it in terminis, and resolves as above. In the second Tome I speak enough to the purpose.

3. The Missioners are unanimously of opinion, that it is very expedient, for avoiding the Calumnies of the Gentiles, to give Females at Womens estate the Sacramental with

with a Pencil, and not with the Finger. However it is desir'd to know the will of our most Holy Lord.

Ans. to 3. It was answer'd elsewhere, that the common practice of the Church is to be observ'd.

I suppose it may be done as was propos'd, and that this Opinion is general among Doctors, therefore I was perswaded the Answer would have been favourable. But they always taking care, and that with good reason, not to open away to depart from the general use and practice of the Church, they did not consent to what I desir'd, tho in China we all agreed to it. And if they will not dispense with a Ceremony so easily to be dispens'd with in appearance, how should they dispense with not administering of the Sacramentals?

4. Whether on account of any one singular case it be lawful absolutely and universally to abstain from administering the Oil of Catechumens to Females at Womens estate? For it seems to be against the Decree of the Holy Congregation.

Ans. to 4. That it is not lawful.

In the second Tome I set down all that was alledg'd in the Disputation at Canton upon this Point.

5. The Holy Congregation may be pleas'd to order, that all Missioners administer the Sacrament of Baptism in the same form.

Ans. to 5. It was order'd before, that all should observe Uniformity in Holy Rites.

There has been no small variety in this particular, as shall appear in its place.

6. His Holiness's pleasure is also desir'd, for the Bishops using some sort of instrument in administering Confirmation, to anoint Women grown with the Holy Chrism, and to give the stroke on the Cheek. His pleasure is likewise desir'd for omitting the anointing of Feet in administering extreme Unction to Women.

Answer to 6. It has been answer'd before, that the Custom of the Church is to be observ'd in administering these Sacraments.

It is plain the point concerning Confirmation is more difficult than what was propos'd, num. 3. for grave Authors say, it is an essential part of this Sacrament, that the Bishop lay on the Chrism with his own Fingers. And according to this opinion, the Pope cannot dispense for doing it with any other instrument. There is another opinion that holds the contrary.

As to the second part the difficulty was less, since all Doctors agree with S. Thomas, that the anointing of the Feet is no essential part of that Sacrament. Nevertheless it is not allow'd for the reason above assign'd. Baronius says, The Church is most tenacious of Antiquity. It will not allow any to depart from its ancient and universal Custom. We think in China it is a commendable Zeal that moves us to attempt these and the like things, to make the access to our Religion the more easie and pleasing; and I don't doubt but at Rome their Zeal is as great and as hot as ours, and yet we see they oppose our opinions. These Resolutions by Order of the Holy Congregation were laid before the Cardinals Bona and Casanate, of whose Learning, Zeal, and Virtue, none can make any question no more than of the most Reverend Fathers Consultors who sign'd them. We writ to Manila upon this very Subject, and the most R. F. F. Francis de Paula, then the second time Provincial of our Province, Commissary of the Inquisition, and Bishop Elect of New Caceres, answer'd us, That we must not omit the anointing of the Feet; and in case we could not do it, we should forbear administering the Sacrament. The Answer seem'd to us rigid, and I find it was agreeable to the Resolution at Rome.

The following case is part of that which went before.

6. The Chineses when they Marry are Marriage. wont to kneel to Heaven and Earth, to repair to the Idol-Temples, where many of them place the Images of their Ancestors departed, or else their Tablets, and kneel to them. Quære, Whether it be lawful to tolerate the aforesaid Ceremonies, or connive at them, leaving the Christians in their ignorance, or simplicity.

Ans. to 6. Concerning Marriages, and the Superstitions us'd at them, the Answer is, they are not lawful.

This Point is handled in the second Book of the second Tome.

7. Experience teaches that of 100 Wo- Convert men which are gain'd to the Church, whilst they are Marry'd to Heathen Husbands, at least Fourscore fall back. But for Maid-servants who appear good Christians whilst they are under the yoke of Servitude, when marry'd to Infidels, not one of them perseveres; what remedy can the Missioners find against such misfortunes?

Ans. to 7. The remedy is, and most absolutely necessary, that the Faithful do not marry Infidels, because the Marriage is not valid; other Remedies are to be ask'd of God.

Nava-rette. F. Francis Brancato had much experience of the first part, he said not twenty in a hundred persever'd. Of the second I know not how it has been found in other parts, but in ours we are sure no Woman slave ever continu'd a Christian after she was marry'd to an Infidel. Read Oleas. in 7. Deut. v. 1. ad Mores. Diana writes, such Marriages were tolerated in those Countries, because there were hopes the Infidel Husband would be converted by the Christian Wife, or è contra; he was little vers'd in these affairs. The reason is, because the Missioners cannot hinder it. In the Resolution above those Marriages are declar'd void, by reason of the Impedimentum dirimens there is in them; and the same Impediment lasting as long as they live together, it is in effect living in Fornication, and consequently either the Husband or Wife that is a Christian cannot be absolv'd till they part. There is no doubt but this will give great trouble to the Missioners, and those Christians who are so marry'd. As long as positive Church-laws were not publish'd, this might be conniv'd at, but at present it cannot; therefore recourse must be had to God: we must govern our selves as we are directed, and not rely on our own knowledg, fancy and opinion. Thus shall we go on safely; and tho we imagin we shall advance little this way, perhaps we may prevail the more, and God whose Cause it is may favour, protect and assist us. And tho there be fewer Christians, a few good are better than a great many bad ones. Our Nider in his Treatise de Reform. Relig. speaks of an Emperor who was us'd to say, He had rather have ten good Horses in his Stable than an hundred bad ones; and he was in the right.

F. Adrian Grelon urg'd this very same in a Meeting at Canton, let us look for the Grain and leave the Chaff.

8. There is no small variety of Opinions among the Missioners concerning the Marriages of those Countries, whether they are valid or not; as for the Chinese Marriages some hold the Affirmative, some the Negative. The Philosopher Confucius assign'd five Impediments which dissolve Matrimony, to be observ'd by his School. 1. If a Woman be Talkative. 2. If she fall into the Leprosy. 3. If she be Barren. 4. If she happens to steal from her Husband. 5. If she prove disobedient to her Father and Mother-in-law. Upon any of these accounts a Man has full liberty to dissolve the Marriage, and the Woman has leave to marry another. Quære, Whether the aforesaid Impediments do any way prejudice the indissolubility of Matrimony?

Ans. to 8. Those Impediments mention'd do not dissolve Matrimony.

We had several Disputes at Canton concerning these Points. In the second Tome I set down what both Parties alledg'd. F. M. Ferre argues, Whether the Marriages of Tunquin be valid, or not, and largely proves the Affirmative. I do not question but it is a favourable opinion for Missioners, if they will follow it. The greatest difficulty lies in this, whether, if the matter of Fact be propos'd as in reality it is, and as I can testify in this particular by what I have heard, I then judg it to be as the aforesaid Author writes. The great opinion all Men have of his extraordinary Knowledg, makes his Doctrine the more practicable, as do the Reasons he gives for his opinion, and the Answers to all Arguments that can be urg'd against him.

Twenty five Doubts concerning the Worship the Chineses give to their Dead.

1. WHether other Missioners are to stick to the information given into the Holy Congregation by F. Martin Martinez touching the business of the Dead here propos'd, and are oblig'd to obey the Decree granted him by the said Holy Congregation? The reason of making the doubt is, because it was disapprov'd by very grave Fathers of the Society.

Ans. to 1. It has been answer'd before, and Missioners are to act according to the Resolutions of the Holy Congregation.

In the second Tome I give an account, how F. Martinez his Propositions were dislik'd by the Fathers John Adamus, Antony de Gouvea, and Ignatius d' Acoſta, the antientest and graveſt Missioners of these times, nor did F. Emanuel George approve of it. For these four I have it of my own knowledg, and guess the same of others. The Reflections above on these Propositions, clear this Point.

2. The Chinese Rituals ordain, That when any Person dies another takes his Garment, and standing on the top of the House towards the North with the dead Body's Garment ment call the Soul three times. He is to call towards Heaven, then towards Earth, and lastly through the middle Region: which done, folding up the dead Person's Garment, he goes down towards the South, and stretching it out upon the Body, they thus expect the return of the Soul and Resurrection of the Body three Days. If the Person was taken away by a violent death, the same Ceremonies are perform'd without the City. Quære, Whether the aforesaid Ceremonies may be tolerated in Christians, for the comfort of their Relations?

Ans. to 2. That it is not lawful.

I thought no Man would have spoken a good word for this Ceremony, which is still practis'd in China, because it plainly appears of it self to be bad. Since I found some contend it is only Civil and Political. What has been said about it is mention'd in its proper place.

3. When the Body is laid into the Tomb, the Chineses are wont to put Wheat, Rice, and other sorts of Grain, as also Gold, Silver and Jewels, according to the quality of the Party deceas'd, into his mouth. And gathering the parings of the Nails into little Bags, together with the Scizors that cut them off, they place them in the four corners of the Coffin. Quære, Whether it be lawful to allow these things to Christians, and to connive at their simplicity?

For these things seem to be done, that the Dead may make use of what is bury'd with them, which appears by that, before the Tartars put out the Edict for cutting off the Hair, they were wont to put the Hair and a Comb into the Coffin, which they do not now since they don't wear long Hair.

Ans. to 3. That the Missioners are oblig'd to make known those errors to such as are converted, and to admonish them to leave them.

It is easy to guess that a Nation so full of Superstitions, and so remote from the Light of the Gospel, must at every step stumble and fall. What has been mention'd can no way be excus'd from being a vain custom. We do not speak here of the Ceremony abundance of Chineses use, of putting a piece of Money into the mouth of the dead Person, which is to serve the Soul as a Viaticum into India; no Man doubts but this is plainly Superstitious.

4. Whether it may be allow'd Christians to place a Corporeal Representation of the Soul near the dead Body, to secure and protect it?

Ans. to 4. That it is not lawful.

The Chinese Ritual directs, when any Person dies, to make of pieces of Silk

the Image and Representation of the Soul, with its Face, Eyes, and other Limbs, in the resemblance of a Child in Swadling Bands, as they are usually dress'd in Spain. They place it near to the dead Body, to cherish and protect it. The Cut of it is in the Ritual. It is plain, this is contrary to the Law of God.

5. Concerning the Chinese TIA O, Condolance in Spanish call'd Pesame, in English Condoling; Quære, whether it may be tolerated in Christians? The reason of making the Doubt is, because the Chinese Ritual ordains, that the aforesaid Ceremonies of Condoling are to be perform'd before the Bed on which the Image of the Soul lies, and they offer Candles and Perfumes to that Figure or Image; which not having been propos'd in the Year 1645, therefore now the Decision of the Holy Congregation is desir'd.

Answer 5. As elsewhere in the Negative.

There has been no little disagreement about this particular in China. True it is, I never saw the case set down by any Missioner, so formally as I propos'd it; but the Holy Congregation forbid it without all that, much more when all the Particulars above are express'd. F. Antony Gouvea several times told me, he did not like it; and if what the Ritual says, whence I took the Proposition, be observ'd, I believe no Man will like it.

6. It is the Custom of the Chineses at every 30 Foot the Bier is carry'd, to scatter a certain quantity of ruddy Earth. Quære, Whether it be lawful for Christians to do it, forasmuch as it seems to tend to no good end?

Answer 6th. That it is not Lawful.

At every 30 Foot or thereabouts, as the Bier passes, they throw down a basket of ruddy Clay: I own I am not satisfy'd of the end or design of it, but it appears this Action can have no good meaning. The graver sort use it. I must observe that all that is said in this place belongs to the Learned Sect.

7. Quære, Whether F. Martinez his Proposition, viz. The Chineses attribute no Divinity to their Souls departed, they neither ask, nor hope any thing of them, be tolerable? Forasmuch as the Gravest Missioners, and almost all that are now in China, maintain the contrary; and F. Martinez himself affirm'd the contrary in China.

Answer 7th. As was answer'd elsewhere, that it is not Lawful.

I could have wish'd the Solution of this Doubt had been plain, I write much about

about it in the 2d Tome. F. Antony of S. Mary a Franciscan writ enough against the Proposition. The same may be gather'd from the writings of the Fathers Matthew Riccius, Julius Aleni, and Pantoja; the Fathers Acosta and Fabre are of the same opinion in express Terms, and F. John Balat assur'd me the same of the rest. F. Alvaro Semedo publish'd it in print, pag. 125 of his Chinese Empire, and 119. F. Gouvea writes the same in his Manuscript History, which has had the Approbation of the Fathers Acuna the Visitor, Amaya the Vice-provincial, and Canavari a very antient Missioner; it is in the 6 Chap. fol. 26. In the meetings those of the Society had in the Years 28 and 44, they conclude upon the same. So does F. Intorceta in his Sapientia Sinica, pag. 39. The Infidels maintain it, Christians own it, and F. Martinez himself confess'd in China that it was true for 300 Years last part. He propos'd the contrary at Rome, and methinks ought to have express'd what has been said, tho' he had not thought it to be so from the Original institution of the Chineses. It shall be explain'd at large in the place above mention'd.

8. Whether it be Lawful to leave the Christians who sacrifice to their Dead and to Confucius, in their ignorance and simplicity, and to connive at these their Sacrifices? For the Chineses are wont to choose certain days to perform the aforesaid Sacrifices, and to consult Heaven, whether the Day so chosen be fit for those Ceremonies.

Answer 8th. That they are oblig'd to admonish them of the aforesaid errors.

I use the word Sacrifices, because in my opinion, and of others, they are really such, and because all the Missioners of the Society call them so in their Writings, and among others it may be seen in F. Intorceta's Sapientia Sinica. And it is not likely, or credible that so many Learned Men, and so well vers'd in the Language and Books of the Chineses, should not have divid'd into the sense of the words, and had the sense to distinguish betwixt an Offering and a Sacrifice. A further account is given of it in its place.

9. Whether the Chineses previous three days Fast, and abstaining from the Marriage, and for 7 Days, to dispose them for the aforesaid Sacrifices, be a Political preparatory cleansing, or rather Religious, and may be lawfully allow'd the Christians?

Answer 9th. That the aforesaid Preparation is unlawful.

I could never conceive these were Political and Civil acts, whereas the End to which they are directed is not such; whether it be a Sacrifice in the strictest, or in the largest sense, but no honourable Offering. For it is a receiv'd Maxim, that Actions take their denomination from the End they tend to, concerning which see S. Tom. 1. 2. q. 18. art 2. and 4.

10. Whether that treble crying out in the nature of sighing may be allow'd the Christians? The Chinese Ritual directs, that as they go into the Temples of the dead, some Persons cry out three times after the nature of sighing, to awake the Souls that dwell within with the noise.

Answer 10th. That it is not Lawful.

This Ceremony is not perform'd every time they go into those Temples, but at such time as other Ceremonies are to be perform'd there. It is to the purpose, whether the Voice be in the nature of a Sigh, Hoarse, or after any other material manner. Read a Lapide in 6 Bar. v. 31.

11. Whether the Ceremonies and Worship perform'd by the Chineses to the dead be real Sacrifices? whereas nothing seems to be wanting to make them so: As also because they are call'd by the Chineses KUNG JANG, as the Worship of the Idols is call'd.

Answer 11th. That they are unlawful.

I said above, it signify'd little to us whether they are Sacrifices or not, the matter is to know whether those Ceremonies are lawful. The reason of putting the Question whether they are true Sacrifices was taken from Cardinal Lugo, who teaches that Sacrifice is equally so call'd, whether true or Idolatrous, and that the latter is also truly so on account of the reality of the sign. As Vasquez and others, taking it from S. Thomas, say that, Adoration is equally so call'd, whether it be that of the true Deity or Idolatrous. This point is handled at large in the 2d Tome often mention'd.

12. Whether the Houses of the dead be Temples, or Halls? The aforesaid Houses have three several Names, SCU TANG, MIAO, and NI; all which, according to the Chinese Books, the common way of talking, the Ceremonies perform'd in them, and the end for which they are erected, belong to Temples, not to Halls.

Answer 12th. No answer can be given, because the matter of Fact is not plainly made out. The

The proofs I brought were in themselves very sufficient: but the recalling of the Decree granted to F. Martinez, depending on this point, it was thought necessary there should have been some body who was well vers'd in the Chinese Language to speak for him. F. Martin Martinez was the first of all the Missioners that ever were in China, who invented the name of Halls for the aforesaid Structures; and so it appears by all the Dictionaries the Fathers of the Society had put out in China: the Fathers Alvaro Semedo and Intorceta, which last writ after F. Martinez had made his Proposition, unanimously call them Temples. They plainly are made out to be so by the Chinese Books, by their shape and form, being in all respects equal to the Idol Temples. The use and end they are built for is well known, which is no other than to perform Ceremonies to and worship their Dead, to petition and pray to them. In short, they are no dwelling places or habitation for living People, nor built to that purpose; have Pictures, and Altars with Candlesticks, and other Ornaments; and many of them have a Bell: the Chineses look upon them as Temples, what matter is it if others call them Halls? H. O. B. This being a material point, and upon which much variance has been, it was requisite to insert in the 2d Tome all that was said to it at Canton, or writ upon the Subject.

13. Whether it be lawful for Christians to be present in the aforesaid places, together with the Infidels, at the Prayers, Sacrifices and other Ceremonies, not giving an inward consent, but only in outward presence, directing all those things in their mind to God, which the others direct to their Dead?

Ans. to 13. That it is not lawful.

F. Antony of S. Mary and I enquir'd concerning this Point of some Christians, and particularly of one whose name was Paul, and another call CHANG Mark, a Batchelor; who told us, it was an establish'd Custom in China, to pray to their Progenitors, deceas'd Emperors, and Confucius the Philosopher; and that they and other Christians were present at it, as well as the Infidels; only with this difference, that when the Prayers were read directed to the Dead, they as Christians directed them in their intention to God. Other matters to this purpose are handled in the second Tome.

14. Whether the Tablets of the Dead are absolutely to be call'd Superstitious?

Ans. to 14. That they are Superstitious. Nava-

This is a very material Point in that recte. Mission. At first they call'd them little Boards, or Tablets; they ought to call them Tabernacles, as in effect they are. One of them was carry'd to Rome, the most Eminent Lords Cardinals of the Holy Congregation saw it; the Letters and Mysteries contain'd in the form, figure, length, breadth and depth, were explicated to them, with other Particulars necessary towards their making a Judgment of them. They have been condemn'd three times. F. Antony de Gouvea us'd to tell me he did not like the Letters that were in those Tabernacles. Brother Antony Fernandez, Temporal Coadjutor to the Society, a Chinese by Birth, and other Christians, assur'd me it was very common in that Kingdom to believe that the Souls of the Dead come to those Boards, and reside in them. The same appears by the Chinese Books, and the two Meetings of the Society above mention'd. All shall be set down in the place above written.

15. Whether Christians, laying aside the Souls' Errors concerning the steam of the Meat feeding the Souls of the dead, and of their residing in those Boards, may lawfully pay the other ceremonious Worship to the Boards, and offer Meat before them?

Answer 15th. That it is not Lawful.

These two points were discuss'd in the two meetings aforesaid; and they agree, that the Chineses imagine the Souls feed upon the steam and smell of the Meat they offer before the Boards, or Tablets.

16. At Sepulchers the Chineses offer Sacrifice. Sacrifice to the peculiar Spirits of those Places, to whom they also return thanks for the Benefits they have bestow'd on the dead Bodies, and pray that they will always assist them. Which being given for granted; Quære, Whether F. Martinez ought to have express'd this Ceremony in his Proposition? Item, Whether Christians omitting the aforesaid Ceremony, may lawfully perform the rest? For their Ritual commanding the observation of all these Ceremonies, the Chineses seeing some of them perform'd by the Christians, will believe they observe all the rest.

Answer 16th. That the Faithful cannot join in those Superstitions.

This point has been handled in the reflections upon F. Martinez his Propositions. More shall be said in another place.

17. The Chinese Ritual allows Sons lawfully begotten to offer Sacrifice to the Dead, which it absolutely forbids the Illegitimate. Quære, Whether it be lawful for Christians to take upon them and perform this Office and Employment?

Ans. to 17. That it is not lawful.

Since even the Sons of Concubines, who, according to what has been said above, cannot be altogether call'd Illegitimate, are excluded from those Offerings as incapable and irregular, it is a visible Consequence, that what is there offer'd is not an indifferent Oblation to the living and dead, as some would make it, because no Person is incapable or excluded from offering Meat or other things to the living; therefore it is most certain there is something more peculiar and mysterious in this Action, as there is in erecting Temples to the Dead, which all Persons may not do: and it is most undoubted, that all Persons whatsoever may build as many Houses, Habitations, and Halls as they please, there being no determinate number for them, as there is for Temples, which the Emperor himself cannot exceed or increase, whereas he is under no confinement as to Palaces and Halls. These reasons were ever of great force with me as to what has been said; others shall be alledg'd in due time in confirmation of this Subject.

Ceremonies to the Dead.

18. Whether it be lawful for Christians to give an Account before the Boards or Tablets, in the Temples of their departed Ancestors, of their Mariages or Contracts, to offer Meat with the usual Genuflexions, shedding Wine upon the Image of a Man made of Straw? Item, Whether it be lawful to perform the same Ceremony, and burn Perfumes when they undertake any Business, enter upon Employments, go abroad, and return home?

Ans. to 18. That it is not lawful.

I spoke of some Ceremonies the Chinese use at their Marriages in the second Book of this Volume. As for the rest that concern the Chinese Nation, I was always of opinion the Holy Ghost spoke to it, Wisd. 13. where he says, "Then maketh he Prayer for his Goods, for his Wife and Children, and is not ashamed to speak to that which hath no Life. For Health, he calleth upon that which is weak; for Life, prayeth to that which is dead; for Aid, humbly beseecheth that which hath least means to help; and for a good Journey, he asketh of that which cannot set a foot-is: And for gaining and getting, and for good success of his hands. asketh Ability to do of him that is most unable to do any thing.

19. When the Structure of the Temple of the Dead is finish'd, the Crevices that remain are to be fill'd up with the Blood of Beasts, according to the great Chinese Ritual, which is, it says, to worship the Habitation of Spirits. Quære, Whether Christians may lawfully perform the aforesaid Ceremony?

Ans. to 19. That it cannot be lawfully done or practis'd.

It is a plain case, this Ceremony is not perform'd in China in Halls, or other dwelling-places.

20. Whether it be lawful to celebrate publick Obsequies with the Mass for Heathens, who dy'd in their Infidelity, for the Comfort of Christians, tho'the Sacrifice of the Mass be not apply'd for the Infidels departed? Item, Whether it be lawful to say Masses for the Dead, that God may ease their Pains?

Ans. to 20. That it is not lawful.

A Missioner practis'd the first part, as he himself publicly own'd to all the rest of us that were there assembled together, but only he approv'd of it: The same Person maintain'd the second. What was urg'd about it on both sides, is set down in the second Tome. As to the second part, see S. Thom. in 4. d. 45. q. 2. art. 2. and Suarez de vit. Christ. d. 43. sect. 3. & tom. 4. in 3 part. M. S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 83. d. 27. art. 6. and Lugo de Incarn. disp. 5. sect. 5. num. 108.

21. Whether Gentiles who do not live overloosely, but in some measure modestly, be punish'd with eternal Sufferings? Some Missioners defend the Negative.

Ans. to 21. Those who teach that such Gentiles are not punish'd with Everlasting Pains, contradict the Gospel.

Methinks this may suffice to stop their Mouths. What was said on this Subject shall be set down. Some say, that if any one dy'd in only original and venial Sin, he would be damn'd, much more those we have spoken of. Read Wisd. 13.

22. Whether there be a distinct place to be assign'd in the other World for the Souls of the aforesaid Gentiles besides Hell, Purgatory, and Limbus? Some maintain it.

Ans. to 22. The Question is impertinent, and the Assertion false, which says there is any other place besides those nam'd in Holy Writ.

Some Mens extravagant Opinions force the asking of impertinent Questions; but there being no other way to reduce reduce them to the right way, this must be follow'd. Three or four who defended the Proposition next before it, maintain'd this too. On the one side, they excluded those Souls from the Hell of the Damn'd; they could find no means to bring them into Purgatory, or Limbus, much less into Heaven, where they own'd they could not be; wherefore they had no way left but to find or assign another place. It shall be further explain'd in the Controversies. See the Divines in 4. d. 45. where they assign only four places; and 5. Thom. 2. 2. q. 83. d. 27. art. 6.

23. Whether it may without judging rashly be affirm'd of an Infidel notoriously wicked, who hangs himself, that he is damn'd? Some deny it, on account that God at the last moment of Life might enlighten his understanding, and give him such Grace, that being converted he might make an Act of Contrition.

Ans. to 23. Missioners are not to argue about these Possibilities, but are oblig'd to teach, that Infidels who do not receive Baptism, either actually, or in their wishes, are damn'd, much more if they kill themselves.

Much was said to this Point, and the two foregoing Cases were set down on account of this.

24. Whether Infidels who transgress the Laws of Nature deserve eternal Punishment? Some deny it, alledging they are excus'd from such grievous pains by their not knowing God, and the Law-maker.

Ans. to 24. That they are damn'd.

Here the Argument began, Whether the Sins of the Infidels, tho against the Laws of Nature, are to be look'd upon only in a Civil, and not in a Theological Sense, with other Particulars which I shall mention in due time; it is enough now to give a hint of them.

25. It is express in the three Catechisms printed in the Chinese Language, by the Missioners of the three Religious Orders,

That the Law-giver of the Idolatrous Sect Foe by name, was damn'd. In the time of the Persecution, some of the Counsellors of the Court of Rites examining certain Missioners as to this saying; they answered, It was not to be understood so absolutely, but conditionally, viz. If he did not know God, and keep his Commandments. Quære, Whether the Answer was good and proper? For Books do not speak conditionally, but absolutely. Besides, the Faithful and others, by these conditional Expressions, will judge we flinch for fear.

Ans. to 25. If it is notorious that he was the Law-giver of that Sect, and equally notorious that he had not the Knowledge of God, it is to be answer'd, That he was damn'd.

There are some who, upon pretence of Charity, deny it can be absolutely affirm'd, that this or that Man was damn'd, whether he dy'd a Heretick or Infidel; they presently allege that God might assist them at the last Moment of their Life, and move their Hearts to true sorrow and contrition. And consequently they maintain, it can only be affirm'd of Judas, and the rest the Scripture makes appear were damn'd, because this Truth is there reveal'd: But that it cannot be said of Arius, Calvin, Luther, and others. Yet we certainly know that one is set down in the Roman Martyrology as a Martyr, who was slain at Damascus by the Mahometans, for saying that Mahomet was in Hell, notwithstanding he had the knowledge of God. How much better may it be said of Foe, who liv'd seven hundred Years before the coming of Christ, there being not the least sign that he had any knowledge of God; and having been the Founder of a Sect, which has sent twenty times more Souls to Hell than that of Mahomet has done? I spoke of this Sectary and his Sect in the second Book.

Four Doubts concerning Fasts.

1. ALL the Antient and Modern Missioners, except two or three, agree in this particular, that the superstitious observers of the Chinese Fasts are not to be admitted to Baptism, unless they first actually break those Fasts. Whereupon the Holy Congregation is intreated to enjoin this Practice by their positive Command, that the Ministers of the Gospel may act uniformly in a Matter of great consequence, if otherwise carry'd.

Ans. to 1. All the Superstitions of the Gentiles in relation to Fasting, which are laid before those that are to be baptiz'd, must absolutely be abrogated.

Much was said and writ to this Point; among others the Fathers Balat and Gre-

Java- Won writ two very learned Treatises, which I was mightily pleas'd with. The substance of them I will insert in the second Tome.

2. Whether those who keep these superstitious Fasts may continue them for fear of the Devil, and of the Mischiefs he can do them?

Ans. to 2. That they are not to be kept or observ'd.

Those above nam'd writ to this Point, and exhorted me to do the same. One was positive in defending the contrary to the Resolution above. The principal Matter he had to say was, God's Judgments are secret and inscrutable; his Divine Majesty may permit the Devil to punish a Chinese for having left the superstitious Fasts, wherewith before he honoured this common Enemy; why then may not this Chinese, after receiving Baptism, continue his Fasts, to free himself from the Harms and Mischiefs the Devil does him? Thus much, as delivering ones self from the Mischiefs and Harms the Devil may do, is good ex parte objecti; and consequently it is so to continue the Fasts. The reason I alledg against it is this, making use of the same Antecedent, then may he for the same Cause and Motive continue the Adoration of the Idols he ador'd before Baptism. The Parity holds good all along, without the least shadow of Disparity in my Opinion. It shall be all made out.

3. His Holiness is intreated, that as his most Holy Predecessors dispens'd with the West-Indies about Fasting, so his Holiness will be pleas'd to grant the same Liberty to the Chinese Christians, not only from fasting, but from abstinence from Flesh. Many are of opinion that it is convenient, and there are Motives enough to perswade the doing of it.

Ans. to 3. As for abstinence from Fasting, and other Particulars of the positive Ecclesiastical Law, an Answer was given in the Year 1656.

I ask'd more than that, the Resolution there given seem'd somewhat dark to those of the Society, and therefore they took up with the Resolution in the Year 1646. In my time we made use of a Decision of Innocent the Tenth; some made a Doubt of it, and therefore I desir'd this Point should be further explain'd.

4. His Holiness may be pleas'd to dispense, that the Christian Chinese may not be oblig'd to fast upon their Birth-days (which all of them keep with great solemnity) if they should fall out on fasting-days.

Ans. to 4. as to the third.

I have already mention'd the most universal Custom of China, for all Men to celebrate their Birth-days with the greatest Solemnity they possibly can. Every one of these Days to the Chineses is a mighty Festival; the Kindred, Friends, and Acquaintance meet, and together with the Family, celebrate the Master of the House his Nativity, and the main Diversion is Feasting. I was of opinion if their Birth-day fell in Lent, on Eves or Fridays, there was occasion enough for dispensing, not only with the Fast, but even with the abstinence from Flesh, especially since there is such a Dispensation for the Eve of their New Year, and the two days following, tho they fall upon Ash-wednesday, or a Friday in Lent, as sometimes it happens.

Sixteen Doubts relating to the same Mission.

1645. 1. Whether the Answers of the Holy Congregation to the Questions propos'd in the Year 1645, may be said to have been given without bearing the Parties concern'd?

1656. 2. Whether it may be said, that the Holy Congregation, when in the Year 1656 it judg'd that the Ceremonies of Confucius then specify'd, might be allow'd the Christian Chinese, gave that Judgment, supposing some of them to be bad?

The two first Questions were sufficiently answer'd in the Years 1645, and 1656.

I desir'd a fuller Answer, but it was not given me; they are govern'd at Rome by more elevated Causes, and I do not question but they are just and righteous, tho neither I nor some others comprehend them; but it becomes us always, and is our duty to respect and honour their Commands with the greatest submission and obedience, and to execute them. There are some Men who let fly, without ever considering what they are to say, contrary to the Advice the Holy Ghost gives us in this particular. To maintain that the aforesaid Decree, and Answers annexed annexed to it, were given without having heard the Parties concern'd, is downright condemning his Holiness, and the Holy Congregation, as corrupt Judges and Persons, who know not how to decree what is convenient. What Judge is there, tho he be but a Country Bailiff, but knows that Judgment cannot be given against a Party not heard? Those Questions were propos'd, without mentioning any Person whatsoever that held a contrary Opinion, as a Man would propose a Doubt or a Case of Conscience, in which no body is concern'd but he that proposes or asks.

As for Confucius his Ceremonies, some are of opinion they are good, politically; others, that they are bad. These last said, the Holy Congregation did not approve of them, because an Approbation must be of a good thing; but that it tolerated them tho bad, as the Civil Government tolerates lewd Women. And to express thus much, the words of the Decree are, They may be tolerated. The most eminent Lord Cardinal Ottoboni, when I discours'd his Eminency upon this Point, plainly told me this was never the Intention of the Holy Congregation; and he being a Member of it, and having been so when that Decree pass'd, could not but understand the whole Affair. And tho it were so, how could we absolve the *Chinese*s who perform'd those evil Ceremonies unless they forsook them, and if they had no purpose to amend? The Government's toleration of lewd Women, tho it remits the Penalty due according to the Laws of the Kingdom to their Crimes, yet it takes not off the Guilt, nor does it authorize Confessors to absolve them whilst they continue in that bad state of Life. The case is the same.

3. What Censure that Proposition deserves, which asserts, that all Popes have not the Authority of declaring which are the Forms of Sacraments?

Ans. to 3. They who maintain it are to be impeach'd by Name, that they may be punish'd.

A Missioner publickly spoke what is contain'd in the Proposition; the reason he gave for it was set down before; I lik'd it very ill. The most eminent Lord Cardinal Bona condemn'd it, and the reason given for it very much.

4. Whether it may be said, that the Church does not yet define the Mystery of the Immaculate Conception, only because it fears lest the Fathers Preachers should not submit?

Ans. to 4. That such trifling Matters

ters do not concern the Mission.

The Answer is very good; it is odd they should in China, and in time of Persecution, think to govern all the World. They threw this in my Dish; and tho it be meritorious to suppress and wink at personal defects, it is detestable to bear with those which are so great a Blemish to the whole Order, especially when it has so many positive Acts in matter of Obedience, even to bare Orders of the See Apostolick. It were easy to mention some in this place, and instance many more.

5. This concerns Confucius, and has been set down already.

6. Supposing that the Infidel Chinese ask Assistance of their Emperors departed, and of their Forefathers who died in Infidelity; Whether it be lawful for Christians to perform such Ceremonies with them, directing the intention of their Petitions to God?

Ans. to 6. It was answer'd before, That it is not lawful.

7. Whether it be lawful for Christians to honour the Images of their Ancestors departed who died in Infidelity, with Perfumes and lighted Candles?

Ans. to 7. That it is not lawful.

This Worship is Religious, not Political, whatsoever others may say of it. Read Cardinal Lugo de Incarn. disp. 37. sect. 2. num. 21.

8. Supposing it be the Opinion of the Chinese Infidels, that the Spirits or airy Souls of the Dead are refresh'd with the Steam of Eatables offer'd, and that their Posterity living fare the better for it: Whether nevertheless it be lawful for Christians to make such Feasts for their Dead?

Ans. to 8. It is not lawful.

Which is to be understood, tho the Christian do not believe that Error. These Points are handled in the second Book of the second Tome.

9. Supposing it to be the Opinion of the Chinese Infidels, that many Felicities accrue to Posterity, by chusing a place for a Tomb according to the Ritual of the Learned Self; Whether it be lawful for Christians to chuse a Burying-place according to the said Ritual?

Ans. to 9. That it is not lawful upon that Motive.

In its place I set down the Ceremony the Learned use upon this account, which tho it be very different from those of other Sectaries, yet they will always have it, that the good Fortune of their Posterity proceeds from the good situation of the Tomb.

Nava-
rette.

10. Whether it be lawful for Christians to fast in honour of their Emperors departed, or other notable Men, or of their Ancestors?

Ans. to 10. That it is not lawful.

Fasting was never a Political action.

11. Whether Youths, who fast in honour of their Mothers, that they may restore the Blood lost at their Birth, may be admitted to Baptism, as long as they refuse to forbear from that Fast?

Ans. to 11. That they cannot be admitted to Baptism, till they lay aside all Superstitions.

12. Whether it be lawful for Christians either of their own accord, or when commanded, to build Idol-Temples, or rebuild those that are destroy'd? The same is ask'd concerning the little vaulted Chappels or Boxes of Idols.

Ans. to 12. That it is not lawful.

F. Julius Aleni set down this Decision some Years ago in a Book of Confession he printed in the Chinese Character, but all Missioners do not consent to it. And I find F. Morales holds the contrary in his Treatises, lib. 2. cap. 6. §. 3. num. 10. pag. mibi 290. his words are these: A Christian Painter or Carver, who has a Picture or Statue of an Idol bespoke, does not sin in painting or carving, and delivering it to him he knows desires it to commit Idolatry, if he cannot without considerable prejudice to himself avoid doing of it. He quotes F. Hurtado, to corroborate his opinion. But his Brethren in China would not agree to it by any means, when this Point was argu'd, but condemn'd the opinion, one only excepted, who always lov'd to be singular. Morales adds, and says the same for those who upon the like occasion build Idol-Temples, Jews Synagogues, or Mahometan Mosques. F. Gabriel Vasquez gave the same resolution, when ask'd by our F. General Claudius, on account of Japan, on the 4th of April 1595; and the Fathers Azor, Michael Vasquez, and Mucius de Angelis asserted it at Rome in the General Congregation of the Universal Inquisition in Palat. App. on Mount Quirinalis, before our most Holy Lord Clem. 8. on the 1602. second of June 1602. Had I known what has been here set down, when I was at Rome, there is no doubt but I had propos'd it as a reason of making the doubt. I had before read something concerning the matter, but not having those Treatises at hand, rather than omit it, I propos'd the question absolutely; and it is strange, that some Months passing before the Answer was given me, and those Ministers being so well vers'd in the Resolutions that have been given at that

Court, they should make no mention of this, which is so much in favour of the Missioners, who desire these affairs may be delay'd as much as possible. I also observe that F. Morales, tho he sets down what those grave Fathers affirm'd before his Holiness, yet he does not tell us, whether that Opinion was approv'd of there or not, and that alters the case very much. In short, since I ask'd how we ought to proceed, and what we ought to do in China, we will act according to the Answer given me, as long as we have no other Orders, and others may do as they think best. The sentence of S. Thomas and his Scholars 2. 2. Quæst. 169. is well known.

13. Whether it be lawful for Christians to contribute to the building or repairing of Idol-Temples?

Ans. to 13. That it is not lawful.

It cannot be deny'd but that he who contributes to the building of an Idol-Temple, is accessory at a greater distance to the sin of Idolatry, than he that makes the Idol, or builds the Temple: and consequently if it is not lawful to contribute, a fortiori it must be own'd to be unlawful to make Idols and build Temples. By which it appears how far they are at Rome from justifying the making of Idols, and building their Temples. F. Morales writes much to the contrary, but the Resolution mention'd suffices to secure us from erring.

14. Whether Missioners or other Christians are oblig'd to give Alms, unless in case of extreme necessity, to Idol-Priests, who will not work?

Ans. 14. If it be given for mercy sake, it is lawful.

I own I was the rigidest in this Point, when we disputed it: First because Alms is not to be given to those who want through laziness, and because they will not work. It is the Doctrine of Soto, and many more quoted and follow'd by Leander tr. 5. de Eleemofina disp. 5. q. 4. Secondly, tho Alms is to be given to wicked Men and Infidels, yet it must not be when they are cherish'd in their sins by the benefit; and to give it to Bonzo's seems to encourage them the further in their Hellish state. 3dly, Tho we are to give Alms to Enemies, as Christ commands Mat. 5. yet it must not be in case That were the means to support those enemies in their malice against us, and would make them more able to oppress us. 4thly, Because even in case of extreme necessity Alms are not to be given to the Enemies of the Commonweal. Read Leander q. 6, 7, & 8. why then should it be given given to Bonzo's who are mortal Enemies of Christ's Commonwealth? What are these but Soldiers of Hell, who continually have their Weapons in their Hands to make War upon the Church and its Members, and can never make peace or truce with them? We are bound to stand by what is resolv'd.

15. Whether a Chalice that is bless'd and remains whole, is to be thought to have lost its blessing or consecration, because it was only put to a profane use by Hereticks, for instance to drink out of it at Table?

Ans. to 15. That it remains accursed.

That the Reader may be satisfy'd in this particular, I will here set down the matter of fact. The Dutch in India do by the Chalice they have rob'd the Churches of, as King Belshazzar did by the Holy Vessels Nebuchadnezzar had carry'd from Jerusalem, Dan. 5. 3, 4. only with this difference, that the Dutch every Year commit the Sacrilege that King did but once, because it has not pleas'd God to punish them, as he did him.

Their custom, or rather Sacrilegious abuse is, that at great Feasts, or when they celebrate the Anniversary of taking such Towns, they place the Chalice on the Side-boards, and make use of them to drink Healths about. It hapned at Faccatra that two Priests and a Lay-man, a good Christian, whom I know very well, were invited. They drank in one of the Chalice to the Elder of the Priests, who without regarding or making the least scruple drank out of it. The other Priest, as I remember, told me he rose from Table, abhorring what he had seen his Companion do. The Lay-man was in a great disorder and scandaliz'd; I cannot be positive, whether he rose too. When afterwards they represented the heinousness of the action to that Priest, he us'd to answer, That those Chalice had lost their Consecration, as being profan'd by Hereticks. Notwithstanding this Answer, which did not please all Men, the action was ill look'd upon, and much talk'd of. Discourfing on this Subject at Madagascar, with the Lord Bishop of Hiopolis, he told me; To show what great difference there is betwixt the actions of Men, your Reverence must understand, that the same Year the Dutch took Cochin, they carry'd some Chalice and other holy Things to Suratte, where they made a plentiful Feast. Among the Guests was an Englishman of great Note, they gave him a Chalice to drink out of, and he refus'd it, saying before all the Company, Tho I am not of the Roman Religion;

yet this and other Vessels there were dedicated to the Service of our God, and this is enough to make me have a respect for them, and not to presume to drink out of them; Gentlemen, you must excuse me, for I cannot comply with you in this particular. I was astonish'd when I heard it. Granting that Chalice was profan'd by Hereticks, and had lost its Consecration, yet he who drank out of it did ill, because of the scandal that follow'd, and because the Hereticks might reflect on it. And since he went upon that ground, he ought to have declar'd it, and made it out before he drank to prevent what follow'd, and has been related; as also because of the famous Maxim in the Canon Law, Semel. 51. de Reg. Jur. in 6. ibid. What is once dedicated to God must not be any more turn'd to human uses. He acted contrary to this rule.

In relation to the Answer given observe that the word Execrare (translated by me in the Answer accursed) according to Silv. verb. calic. §. 2. Serr. 3. p. q. 83. pag. mibi 625. and others, signifies to lose the Consecration, and that it requires to be consecrated anew, so that the aforesaid Chalice loses the first Consecration it receiv'd; as when the Cup breaks off from the foot, according to the common opinion of Authors. Whence it follows that Priest was in the right, in saying that Chalice was not then consecrated.

What Authors usually say, is of no small force against this, viz. that A thing once consecrated loses not its Consecration as long as it remains whole and the same. So says S. Thomas 2. 2. Quæst. 88. art. 11. in corp. & 3. part. Quæst. 83. art. 3. ad 3. See the same S. Thom. 2. 2. Quæst. 88. art. 19. in confirm. ult. arg. Serra quoted above, and Leand. tract. 5. par. 5. disp. 2. Quæst. 42. where he has these words, Consecration is indelible, whilst the thing it self & suppositum remains. He quotes S. Antonine, Silvester Paludanus, and others.

But the case here spoken of being so singular, there must be something more in it. That it requires some blessing or Ceremony, as a Church that is polluted, seems to be plain. Read Leander, part 2. tract. 8. disp. 3. Quæst. 4. & Quæst. 31.

16. Whether it does not seem convenient that the Holy Congregation command all Missioners in China to abstain from building Sumptuous Churches, from wearing costly Apparel, and making great Presents without necessity; in regard these things are insupportable to some Missioners, and gave occasion for the Persecution?

To the 16th, nothing is to be answered.

I and many more thought it requisite to assign some limitation in the matters propos'd. Something shall be said upon the Subject in its place. Several Opinions have been in China concerning the silk Garments, many Millions wear. The antient ones blame the younger; these justify them, and defend they are very convenient in that Mission. The Fathers Gouvea, Acosti, Lubeli, and Torrente abhor them, and F. Balat much detests the Presents that have been given without any benefit to the Church.

F. Augeri and others look upon it as most certain, that the Clothing, and Buildings contributed much towards the Persecution that was rais'd. The same hapned in Japan. But what F. Antony of S. Mary most lamented, and I am concern'd at, is, that if the Presents go on, neither the two Religious Orders, nor any others that shall go thither will be able to support that Custom and Practice, whereupon they will be oblig'd to withdraw, unless it shall please God to order some other means. His holy Will be done.

Twenty other special Difficulties.

1. WHETHER among the Mysteries propos'd to Catechumens to believe, it is lawful or convenient to add, that the Blessed Virgin was conceiv'd without Original Sin?

2. Whether it be lawful in New Missions to write concerning the said Mystery in such manner, that Converts may believe the affirmative is absolutely defin'd as Catholic Faith?

Answer to these two Doubts. That the Constitutions of Sixtus the 4th, Paul the 5th, Gregory the 15th, and Alexander the 7th, are to be read and observ'd.

I would not have meddled with these points, had not others taken notice of them in China, it is a Duty to obey Apostolical Constitutions. The first Case is printed in the Chinese Language.

3. Whether it be convenient to give out among Converts that the Blessed Virgin plainly beheld the Divine Essence from the first moment of her Conception, and so continu'd through the whole course of her Life, as is unanimously believ'd of Christ our Lord?

Answer 3d. The Missioners are to forbear such useless Arguments.

This is a very good answer. I knew him who first set that saying afoot, and how it took root among some Persons; the occasion was very inconsiderable for a matter of such moment, nor was the Wisdom or Authority of the Author sufficient to give it any reputation. No body lik'd it in China, and it being no way necessary for the Salvation of the Chinese, it is a useless argument for them. Nay did those Christians, or others put the Question, we ought to answer, not to what they propos'd, but to the purpose that most concern'd them to know, after the example of Christ. One ask'd him, Luc. 15. Lord whether are there but few sav'd? He answered, Do ye strive to get in at the narrow Gate. Lord, that is not the Question, answer directly to what is ask'd. S. Cyril in Catena Aurea; But it must be said, that it was the Custom of our Saviour, not to answer those that ask'd according to their mind, when they ask'd useless Questions, but with regard to what was beneficial to the hearers. But what benefit were it to the hearers to know whether many or few are sav'd? But it was more necessary to know the means through which a Man may attain Salvation. This same I say as to the Proposition.

4. Whether invincible Ignorance may be allow'd in the Converts touching self-murder? Some maintain the affirmative, but we are perswaded it cannot be so in it self and regularly, because before Baptism they are sufficiently instructed in the Commandments.

Answer 4th. That they are bound to teach them the Truth, that they may lay aside Errors.

In the Year 1665 it hapned at the 1665 Court of PE KING, that a Christian, as soon as he had confess'd and communicated, went home and hang'd himself, and was bury'd like other Christians. Upon this the Doubt here propos'd was started, and several opinions were given: mine always was, that such ignorance could not be allow'd of; first because this Sin is specify'd in the Catechism printed there, and in the next place, because if in China there cannot not be invincible ignorance allow'd in case of killing another, much less can it be for killing ones self. Nor is that Nation, or others in those parts, so void of sense, as to follow the errors other barbarous People do, as to the Law of Nature. Our Capicucque Master of the sacred Palace does not allow this ignorance in any Man, as I shall show in another place. See S. Thomas 2. 2. q. 64. art. 5. and his Disciples.

5. Whether it be Lawful for Converts to hear Mass cover'd, and to receive the Communion in the same manner? The greater and antienter number of Missioners answer in the affirmative, according to the ancient and general practice among them all, except here and there one, which is grounded on the Dispensation granted to Missioners by Paul the 5th to say Mass cover'd, because in that Country it is a sign of Respect.

Answer 5th. That the Decrees of Popes are to be observ'd, where there are any, as is alledg'd in the case propos'd.

This Question was started by some few, after it had been many Years practis'd without opposition. I writ a Treatise somewhat copious upon the Subject, which pleas'd all that were of my opinion; something shall be brought out of it in the 2d Tome. One of the reasons urg'd was, that since we Priests say Mass in China cover'd, and Paul the 5th dispens'd with it in regard to the way of paying respect and civility in that Kingdom, which is opposite to ours in this particular, for the same reason, and a fortiori, the same ought to be understood of the Natives. For to do the contrary look'd preposterous, that the European should worship God with the Chinese Ceremony, which in the Church is irreverence; and that the Chinese should worship him with the European Ceremony, which to them and their Kingdom is a great disrespect.

6. Whether Missioners being ask'd by a Tyrant whether they will stay in his Kingdom, upon promise made that they will not diffuse the Gospel, may lawfully consent, promise, and accept of such a condition? The Missioners no way agreed about deciding this case, when it press'd upon them.

Answer 6th. That they cannot make such a promise.

Tho this took not effect, yet we were all perswaded it would, so that we argu'd long about it, without agreeing in any point. On the one hand the Christians lamented, for if we answer'd in the Negative, they were for ever depriv'd of Priests, and their Tears were very moving. Therefore a considerable number of us Missioners were of opinion it was lawful to make such a promise, and that it was no evil or scandalous condition which was required of us. Every Man writ down his Sentiments, but when we thought the Trial was at hand, all were left at liberty to make their minds known. Something of what was writ upon the Subject shall be inserted in its place. See S. Thom. 2. 2. quæst. 88. d. 29. art. 7.

7. Whether it be Lawful for Missioners, or other Christians without necessity to go to the Idol Temples, and to say the Office there kneeling, even where they may be seen by the Faithful and Infidels? Some maintain it.

Answer 7th. That it is not Lawful.

F. Morales writes something to this purpose, and F. Gouvea told me it might very well be done. Others dislike it, and I thought it fit to put the Question, that one false Antecedent may not produce other Consequences. I writ upon the Subject, as shall appear in another place.

8. Whether any could attain to Life everlasting, without the knowledge of God the Supernatural Being, and without the knowledge of the Immortality of our Soul, and of Reward and Punishment after this Life? Some maintain the affirmative, speaking both of the Jews and Gentiles.

Answer 8th. That the affirmative can neither be defended, nor taught.

The Fathers Fabre and Coplet were guilty of this weakness, there was noise enough about it. The Fathers Balat, Grelon, and I positively maintain'd the contrary, and brought reasons enough for it, which shall be inserted in the 2d Tome. See S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 1. disp. 4. art. 1. Ferre, Serra, Leander, and others.

9. Whether the Friars Minors, and Dominicans may and ought to follow some Opinions, which they think improbable, because others affirm they may be put in practice, and that they have sufficient reasons for them? For it seems too hard to follow the Footsteps of others blindfold.

Answer 9th. That no Man can act contrary to his Conscience in a known improbability.

In the Second Tome I write what has been done in this case. Nevertheless I am of opinion, that if all those in China agree in one point, we of my Order may lay aside any scruple and follow them, practising the same; but it is a sufficient ground not to be thought to act rashly, but prudently, when many go on in the same method unanimously, after having consider'd, weigh'd, and confer'd about the matter. True it is, I am of opinion, it is more than probable, we shall not come to this pass.

10. Whether all those, who were directly concern'd in the banishment of Doctor Brindean an Apostolick Missioner from the City Macao, incur'd the Censure laid upon those that hinder Missioners, by his Holiness Urban the 8th in his Bull pass'd in the Year 1633? The affirmative seems to be true.

Answer 10th. No answer can be given, the Party is not heard.

The matter of fact and all Circumstances are set down, as may be seen in its place.

11. Whether they who within the Mission drive Missioners from one Province to another, incur the aforesaid Censure? For such Persons truly hinder Missioners in their Business and Duty.

Answer 11th. That the words of the Decree are to be maturely consider'd, in order to give an answer upon any fact.

Some particular Canon Laws, alledg'd by Authors in the like cases, sute with this point.

12. Whether he who directly or indirectly endeavours to turn Missioners out of their Missions, tho it does not take effect, incurs the aforesaid Censure? For tho it does not take effect, they are in appearance, and actually Obstructors, especially because by troubling and molesting them, they are the immediate cause that they cannot conveniently perform the Duty they have in hand.

Answer 12th. As to the last.

In like Cases like Judgment, cap. 2. de transf. Episc. It is well known that in these cases regard must be had to the Intention of the Law-maker, and to the Motive he had for making such a Law. From these principles we must descend to particular cases, and consider whether they are comprehended under it, or not.

13. Whether it be lawful for Regulars Mendicants, especially Missioners, and others who by the Pope's particular Order exercise the Function of Curates in India, to take upon them to be Godfathers in the Sacraments of Baptism and Confirmation? Some Authors defend the affirmative; and whereas spiritual advantages may accrue from their undertaking it, it is most humbly prayed that his Holiness will dispense in this case.

Answer 13th. That it is not Lawful.

The affirmative is frequently enough to be found among modern Divines, you may see Leander Tract. 2. de Baptism. disp. 7. q. 16. tho our Serra does not follow it 3. p. q. 67. art. 6. only in case there be no Lay Person to be had, and with his Superiors leave. Quintaduennas has writ upon the Subject. There was within these few Years a great contest on this account in the Kingdom of Siam, and a French Bishop who resided there highly condemn'd this Opinion, wherein I was always of opinion he exceeded. He might very well refuse to admit of the Religious Man as Godfather, without condemning Quintaduennas for allowing and teaching that Opinion. It is no new thing to say, that when any thing is forbid the Monks in the Canon Law, the Mendicants are not taken under the denomination of Monks, their Circumstances being different from those of the others. Much less ought it to be understood of Missioners, and other Regulars who perform the function of Curates. The Resolution given has settled the business for the future.

14. Whether any Missioners of the Kingdom of Cochinchina had the Power to dispense with a Convert to marry two Sisters successively? (observe that they were his own Sisters.)

Answer 14th. No answer can be given without hearing the Missioners, who affirm they have this Authority, but without it they cannot.

The greatest difficulty is, whether this matter be capable of a Dispensation or no. The case was argu'd at Madrid in the Reign of K. Philip the 2d, our Master Orellana and others maintain'd the Negative. The Lord Araujo in stat. Eccles. follows this Opinion, and sufficiently makes it out, against Basilus who quotes Leander for the contrary opinion, and others. The Resolution here mention makes out the contrary. More shall be said in another place. Allowing it to be capable of a Dispensation, it might be a sufficient motive to grant it, if the King of Siam and the Queen his Sister were converted to our Holy Faith; but certainly it is too much to make use of it for a Japanese Shopkeeper, and two Sisters successively. I mention'd in another place that Corn. a Lap. follows Orellana's opinion.

15. Whether it be lawful for Missioners to carry warlike Ammunition into Countries of Infidels, upon pretence of opening, or keeping open the way to plant or diffuse the Word of God? For such Infidels, tho during some time they show the Christians some Tokens of Friendship, yet they soon turn Tail, as present experience has taught.

Answer 15th. That it is not Lawful.

16. Whether Christian Merchants may lawfully do the same upon pretence of securing their Trade? The Bull de Cœna Domini against those that do so was publickly read in the City Macao some Years since.

Answer 16th. That it is not Lawful.

Something is writ concerning both cases in the 2d Tome.

17. Whether any Missioners had any particular privilege not to make the Chinese Converts acquainted with the duty of observing the positive Ecclesiastical Precepts?

Answer 17th. This was answer'd in the Years 1645, and 1656.

F. Morales writ upon this Subject, he quotes the Fathers Hurtado and Emanuel Diaz, who affirm'd it, tho they own, they cannot tell what Pope it was that granted it.

18. Whether it be Lawful for Churchmen, or Seculars, to cast great Guns in Countries of Infidels, and to teach them those Arts, and to be Engineers for raising of Forts, and other works?

Answer 18th. Church-men may not concern themselves in such Affairs.

I expected the Answer in relation to Seculars, who follow this business in those parts; and methinks it may be made out of that which was given to the 16th Doubt.

19. Whether a Confessor may lawfully allow Penitents half Confessions, upon pretence that all may gain the Jubilee, which they could not do, if they were to confess entirely, because the time of the Jubilee is not sufficient to hear all out? Some body there is that maintains the affirmative. Yet when there are several other Confessors upon the spot, to whom the Penitents may have recourse, it seems, that Confessions are dock'd unreasonably.

Answer 19th. That it cannot be done upon any account.

Ever since in the Year 1659 I read this opinion at Macasar I mislik'd it, and much more the practice of it which has follow'd in some parts, where there was plenty of Confessors; and I am sa-tisfy'd that all who have heard of this opinion, are of my mind.

20. An Oath among the Chineses is taken, as follows, according to their Ritual. First they dig a square Pit in the Ground, over which they slaughter a Beast, and cut off its left Ear, which they lay in a Dish with Jewels; in another they have the Blood adorn'd in the same manner: they write the Oath upon a Paper with that Blood, and anoint their Lips: having read the Paper, the Beast is thrown into the Pit, and the Paper being laid on its back is cover'd with the Earth. Quære, Whether it be Lawful for Christians to observe this form of Swearing, or be present when this Ceremony is perform'd?

Answer 20th. That it is not Lawful.

We whose Names are underwritten, to whom the Solution of these Doubts was committed by the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Inquisition, thought fit to return the Answers above mention'd. April the 22d, 1674.

I F. Laurence de Laurea of the Order of Friars Minors, Consultor and Qualificator of the Holy Inquisition, sign'd with my own Hand.

I Cajetan Miroballas of the Regular Clergy, Qualificator of the Holy Inquisition, sign'd with my own Hand.

I had some more Doubts to propose, but forbore, because I would not be too troublesome to those most Reverend Fathers, and because I was my self indispos'd: I set them down in the 2d Tome, where I have set down what Doctors have said upon them. We have Light to follow, and a plain Way to tread with safety, which I do not doubt is the same to others.

21. On account of what was said in the eighth Doubt concerning the Sacraments, I have one thing to observe, not unlike what happen'd about the same time in Europe. The same influence of the Stars it is likely prevail'd in both places. There are certain Books in China call'd KIA IU, that is, Family Discourses, or Household Doctrine. There are six Volumes, I read them all; Confucius the Philosopher was the Author of them, and his Name is in the Title Page. The Learned Sect, and their School, agree they are his; the said Books are quoted in the Works of that Sect, and particularly in the great Philosophy. Notwithstanding all this, and that Confucius has been above these two thousand Years quietly possess'd of the Title of Author

rette.

Nava-
of these Books, in my time a few Missioners took in hand positively to maintain they were no Work of his. Is it possible there should be a stranger Undertaking in the World? That Europeans should go into China to argue that Confucius is not the Author of those Books, unjustly outing him of a Possession he has enjoy'd so many Years, without any better Authority than that they find in them some Doctrine opposite to what has been practis'd of late Years? Hereticks deny the Books of Macchabees are Canonical, because they oppose their Tenets, without any other reason. Others for the same reason deny S. Thomas the Honour of a great part of his Works; and so in time they may deny what S. Augustin and others writ. Truth is at this time so odious, that it finds not Hearers, but Persecutors, said Hugo in 8 Joan. v. 40.

I must also observe, that some call that of the Learned in China a Political Sect; and I doubt not but it is so, as that of the Pharisees was. Cajetan ad Philip. 3. says thus, For it was the principal Political Sect among the Jews; I say Political, to distinguish it from that of the Essians, because that was not Political, as being without Matrimony like Monks. Even so is the Learned Sect of China Political. But this does not take away its being Religious, as the Fathers Matthew Riccius, Longobardo, Gouvea, and others plainly declare.

22. Lastly I observe, that Oleaster in 7 Gen. argues, whether there are any Creatures unclean by the Law or Dictates of Nature? He defines and proves there are none, and says, But it is very strange, we see some Birds and Beasts which no body will eat to this day, as the Ass, Horse, Camel, Lion, and others. And among Birds we see no body eats the Kite, nor other Birds of prey, nor the Jackdaw, nor the Pie, nor others. Against eating of which almost all of us have a certain abhorrence, as it were natural. To resolve this Point, I say it is requisite to know several Nations. In Spain we abhor Asses, Dogs, Horse-flesh, &c. consequently they do so in other Countries; that is no good Inference. I have said before, that throughout all China Asses-flesh is valu'd more than any other, tho there are Capons, Partridges, and excellent Pheasants; Dogs-flesh is the next in esteem, Horse-flesh is extraordinary good, and I always lik'd wild Mice. In the Philippine Islands Bats are good Meat, Jackdaws are eaten in other parts: In short, God created them all for Man, and they are all good; so says the 9th Chap. of Gen. and S. Paul confirms it Rom. 14. See S. Thomas Lect. 3. The Uncleaness of the Law mention'd Levit. 11. is of another nature. Read also S. Paul ad Tim. 1. and S. Thomas Lect. 1. All Creatures are good, and none to be rejected, &c.

Oleaster treats of this Subject again on Chap. 9. v. 3. where he has these words; I can by no means grant that Noah was allow'd to eat all living Creatures, or all that move, viz. that it should be lawful to him to eat Snakes, Moles, Mice, and the like. I said before it was requisite to see much of the World to solve such Doubts. On the 7th Chap. above-quoted, he places the Camel among the unclean Beasts, and we see it is not so to the Tartars who have entred China. In this 9th Chap. he names the Mice, and I know they are eaten in China, and not only the wild ones bred in Fields, but those that breed in Houses, tho I would never eat of these last. He also excludes Snakes; the Iguana which in New-Spain and the Philippine Islands is a dainty Dish, is certainly a Species of Serpent or Snake. The Crocodile is also a very deform'd and frightful Serpent, yet the Indians eat it. Snakes are eaten in China; and so the Toad I said in another place is call'd X E I U, which is uglier to look at than our Toads, is an excellent Bit in that Country and fit for a Prince, I ate it several times. As for Shell-fish I have seen and eaten many very loathsome to look at. Since so many things which Europeans abhor are eaten in those parts, what may we not believe is eaten in Africk among the Blacks, and in other Countries through the World? The same I say in regard of several sorts of Grain which they eat there, with such Herbs as no Man in these parts would eat. Besides, how many are there among us who could not endure to eat Snails or Frogs, and yet in other parts they are valued? In China a pound of Frogs is worth double the price of any other Fish whatsoever.

lick, deputed by Apostolick Authority, and residing in the Eastern parts, have caus'd it to be made known to us, that to take their way through Portugal to the East-Indies and China is no less difficult to them, and to the Secular Clergy sent, and to be sent into those parts, than to the Religious Persons aforesaid, and utterly useless to the propagation of the Gospel, and that there are other ways much easier and shorter; and have therefore caus'd us to be humbly intreated, that we would be pleas'd in our Apostolick Goodness, to provide for them opportunely in the aforesaid Particulars, and dispense as follows. We therefore being willing to grant a special Favour to the Bishops and Vicars Apostolick, and by these Presents absolving every their Persons from any Ecclesiastical Sentence, Censure, or pains of Excommunication, Suspension and Interdict denounced ipso facto, or by any Man upon any occasion or cause, if they have incurr'd any such, and deemed them absolv'd; and being favourably inclin'd to grant such Requests, by the special Advice of the Congregation of our venerable Brethren the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church appointed over the Affairs of propagating the Faith, do by these Presents, and Apostolick Authority, confirm, approve, and renew the aforesaid Letters of our Predecessor Urban: And we do extend and enlarge the same Letters to the said Bishops and Vicars Apostolick, and also to Secular Priests and Laymen, as well those already sent, as to be sent hereafter into China, Cochinchina, Tunkin, Siam, and other Places, Islands, Provinces, Regions and Kingdoms of India, and other Eastern Parts; so that they, and any of them, may freely and lawfully go thither any other way whatsoever they shall think fit, besides the way of Portugal, and shall no way be oblig'd to pass through Portugal, or to take shipping there; in other things still observing the Form, Authority and Tenor of the aforesaid Predecessors of Clement. And we do actually, without further denouncing, accordingly excommunicate any Ecclesiasticks and Religious Men, of any Order or Institute, as well not Mendicants as Mendicants, even of the Society of Jesus, and Seculars, who any way whatsoever obstruct the going of Bishops and Vicars Apostolick, as also of Secular Priests and Laymen, as well those already sent, as those to be sent hereafter into China, Cochinchina, Tunkin, Siam, and other places, Islands, Provinces, Regions, and Kingdoms of India, and other Eastern parts. Decreeing the said Letters shall remain and continue in full force and vigour, and have their full and entire effect; and that those whom it does, or may at any time concern, do in all respects give full submission to them, and do respectively observe 'em punctually and inviolably, and that so it ought to be defin'd and adjudg'd by any ordinary Judges and Delegates whatsoever, even the Judges of Causes in the Apostolick Palace, and any others, whatsoever Preheminence or Authority they do or may exercise, any Power or Authority of judging or interpreting otherwise being taken from them, and every of them; and that it shall be void and of no effect, if any Person shall attempt any thing to the contrary of what is here mention'd, upon any Authority, knowingly or ignorantly. Therefore we command all and every the Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates of Churches and Places, even of Regulars, throughout all the World, that they cause these Letters to be inviolably observ'd by all Persons in their respective Provinces, Cities, Dioceses, Chapters and Jurisdictions; and cause them to be solemnly publish'd, as often as they shall be requir'd so to do by the aforesaid Bishops and Vicars Apostolick; as also by Secular Priests and Laymen, as well those already sent, as that shall be sent as before, or any of them: Notwithstanding the Apostolick Constitutions and Ordinations, and all those things, and every of them, which the aforesaid our Predecessor, in his aforesaid Letters, would have to be no Obstruction, and all things else whatsoever to the contrary. But our Will is, that the same credit be given in all places to the Copies of these Letters, even tho they be printed; or when subscrib'd by some publick Notary, and seal'd by any Person constituted in an Ecclesiastical Dignity, as would be given to these Presents if they were produced and shown.

 HIS said Martin was born in the Year of our Lord 1473. on Novemb. 11th, the very Day consecrated to the Memory of that Bishop whose Name he receiv'd, in the Town of Kopfstain or Kuefstein, which Maximilian the first Emperor of that Name by a powerful hand took from the Dukedom of Bavaria, and added to the Country of Tyrol, about the Year 1604. His Father John was a Man of great Power and Wealth; of Twelve Children which through the Divine Blessing he had by his Noble Consort Elizabeth Soiterine à Winda, this Martin was the third, whose Education both for Learning and Manners, he took care should be futable to his Noble Birth.

When he advanc'd from Childhood, and left the Schools, he applied himself to Military Discipline and Affairs of War, being equally the Darling of the Muses, and a stout Champion of Mars.

Having compleated the 26th Year of his Age, and being disposed to enter into the state of Wedlock, he was married to Benigna a very choice Lady of Honourable Birth, and a Liberal Fortune, being the Daughter of that Valiant Knight Christopher Schellers à Gartenau. The Solemnity was consummated in the Treasure-house of Burckbusum on the 7th of September, Anno 1499, in the Presence and by the Advice of the following Persons of Quality, viz. Janus Ebron à Wildenberg Knight, James and William Haunsper, Sigismund ab Apfentbal, Mark Hohenfelder, Janus ab Offenbaim, Peter à Baumgarten a Noble Lawyer, George a Privy Counsellor to the Duke of Bavaria, Wolfgang and Janus of Baumgarten, George à Kemmatau, and Janus Trenbeccius.

This Wife he enjoyed six Years, and had by her one Son whose Name was John, and two Daughters, Anna and Margaret; all which died very young, and were soon followed by their sorrowful Mother, who was also snatcht from him by an untimely death, Novemb. 17. Anno 1505.

Being thus deprived of his Lady and her Children, and thereby so overwhelmed with Grief that his own Life seem'd burdensom to him, he began to think of some Diversion to pass away the tediousness of his time: And according to the Superstition of that Age, he resolv'd to pay a Visit to Jerusalem our Lord's Sepulcher, Mount Sinai, &c. and what he had Vowed he quickly performed with great Labour and Expence; taking along with him one Vincent a Priest, and Gregory his Servant, whose Surnames I have not been able as yet hitherto to learn.

In this long and tedious Journey he himself kept a Diary in the German Tongue of all Remarkables seen, observed or heard by him each Day. Which Notes of his were something difficult to read, but (which gives relief in this Difficulty) his Servant Gregory also kept a Diary of the same things in Latin as well as he could, and as the Learning of the Age permitted. From these two Diaries I have compos'd the following History in the Form and Method it is now publish'd in the Latin Tongue (which I have also translated into the Teutonic, which may also shortly perhaps see the Light) at the Desire, and by the Encouragement of the Noble Heirs of the deceased Christopher-Philip a Baumgarten, who was the Son of Martin by a second Venter.

Being returned from his Pilgrimage, he took for his second Wife Apollonia a Virgin, Daughter to that Generous and Valiant Gentleman Thomas Earl of Liechtenstein, to whom he was married Jan. 9. 1510. at Kueffstein, and had by her Eight Sons, viz. Francis, Bartholomew, Wolfgangus, Martin-Philip, Christophor-Philip, Janus-Philip, David and Paulus Degenhardus. And Three Daughters, viz. Katherine, Barbara and Elizabeth.

One of this Number, viz. Christophor-Philip, lived to the 70th Year of his Age, and then died in the Palatinate of Wisin, at the House of his Son-in-law, on May 17th, Anno 1593. having obtained an Immortal Fame for his Piety, Constancy and Beneficence, and left behind him Six Daughters, who were all joined in Marriage to several Noble Personages. One of them having lately lost her Husband Morenavius of Tyrol, is now a Widow.

About the Year 1520. when by the Ministry of Dr. Martin Luther, an Instrument chosen of God, the Heavenly Doctrine began to be recover'd to its former Purity; This Noble Knight, after diligent Reading, Meditation and Prayer, by the Conduct of the Divine Spirit, also acknowledged the Truth of the Gospel, which having embrac'd with his whole heart, he confest both by word and writing, and also with very great faithfulness instructed his Children in the same, which procur'd him the hatred of many, and expos'd him to very great afflictions; against which storm of temptation he was often encouraged by the Consolatory Letters of Luther, the Originals of which are in my hands.

And how great a Progress he made in the Evangelical Truth; yea, how great not only a Christian but Divine he became (tho not so by Profession) in respect of his Faith, Writings and Practice, will appear to the wise and impartial Reader, by perusing some of his weighty Epistles, which if God permit shall be annexed, together with the before said Consolatory Letters of Dr. Luther, to the Funeral Oration on his Son Christophor-Philip; in which you may observe his ardent and pious Zeal, his great and unshaken Mind, his large Reading and Accurate Judgment; and in short, the Reader will there find abundant matter both for his admiration and instruction.

And furthermore he himself hath given an account of the course and actions of his own Life, in the following Epistle written by him to a certain Counsellor at the Emperor's Court, upon the occasion of his being circumvented by the Calumnys and Envy of some Malignant Persons.

Baumgarten.

S I R,

I Intreat your Worship as soon as possible to recommend me to M. Salamancus, that he may lay open before the most Illustrious Prince Ferdinand our Emper or the following Articles: And thereby let him know what kind of Person I am, and what I have done for the advantage of the House of Austria. I also desire that you would make the most diligent Enquiry on all hands concerning my Life and Actions, how much I have laboured, and what progress I have made in the Minerals, and how much further I should yet hope by God's help to promote the Interest of our most Illustrious Prince, if he will vouchsafe to protect me, that I may not be subverted by mine Enemies, but may be suffered to go on in my begun Undertaking.

I. I am dignified with the Noble Order of Knighthood, being first made a Knight in my Peregrination to the Holy Sepulcher of our Lord, and to St. Katharine, Anno 1507. And afterwards Created the second time a Knight by his Imperial Majesty Maximilian, Anno 1508.

II. My Father brought great Profit to the DD. A. often lending them large Sums of Money in their Necessity without any Interest. Also in the Mineral Affairs, viz. in Silver, Copper, &c. to the greater profit of the Princes than our own, as is now very manifest.

III. My Father at the instance and pleasure of the Emperor Maximilian paid for A. D. C. to the aforesaid Maximilian 32000 Florins, of the Value of more than 50000 Crowns of Gold, whence we his Heirs have suffered so great Damage. The truth of which you may learn in Schwatz, and in other places.

IV. Notwithstanding which I have indefatigably laboured in the Minerals, viz. in Rattenburg above twenty eight Years, in Luentz above twelve Years, in Schwatz I was thirteen Years ago; so far once by the fraud of others imposed on, as that I sold all my Shares, but about four Years since I procured others which I am yet in the improvement of. And thus in these three places I spent of my own proper Goods above 30000 Florins. For the all this time the Profits revolving into the Prince's Treasure amounted to more than 30000 Florins a Year, yet still no Profits came into my hands, as your Worship knows.

Baumgarten. V. In the Wars with the Bavarians eighteen Years ago, I lost in this City, and in the Works without the City, of my proper Goods above 8000 Florins, which shows I have not been sparing of my own Interest.

VI. Twelve Years ago, at the Command and Pleasure of the Emperor Maximilian, I went in Arms to Luentz with Horses and Carriages, and remain'd there half a Year at my own charge, where also in the mean while I recovered the Minerals, and diligently laboured therein; and yet to this day I have never received a Penny for my great and manifold Labours.

VII. I have been now for three Years violently molested by my Creditors, who lent me some small Sums of Money upon my Works in the Silver and Copper, out of which I could not in a competent time pay them according to our agreement; and therefore, tho all would be well paid at last, they not only are unpeaceable towards me themselves, but also by their insidious practices alienate the minds of others from helping me, wherever I have made applications for Moneys to satisfy them, and to compleat the Works in which I am engaged for the profit of the Austrian Family, as well as my own. All which they do for no other reason, but because they see me by great Labours and Diligence to have so far succeeded as to make many fair Discoveries in the Minerals, which, God willing, will bring not only great Profit and Honour to my self, but also to the whole House of Austria; in which they would fain frustrate me, and get the Work now it is almost complicated into their own hands.

Wherefore, from the consideration of all the aforesaid acts both of my self and of my Parents and Ancestors, I encourage my self in a good hope and confidence that our Illustrious Prince Ferdinand will (as being much famed for his esteem of Truth and Equity) so protect me, that the aforementioned insidious practices may not prevail against me, but that under the Covert of his Favour I may continue in the Prosecution of that in which I have made so great an advance. If upon the whole I have not hitherto, I hope I shall for the future deserve this Illustrious Favour, provided I am reliev'd in these matters. Farewel.

This Pious, Honourable and Magnanimous Knight, died in the true Acknowledgment, ardent Invocation, and constant Confession of Jesus Christ, Anno Domini 1535. in the 62d Year of his Age, when he had fought a good Fight, and kept the Faith undefiled, together with a pure Conscience, at Kuefflein, and was there interr'd in the Chappel belonging to the Family of the Baumgartens, where he expects a joyful Resurrection of his Body, renovated into a state of Immortality, in the Glorious Day of the restitution of all things. Which as to him, so to us, and all the truly faithful who love the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, he of his Infinite mercy grant, who is the Triune, Holy, Just, True, Eternal God, Blessed for Evermore. Amen.

THE TRAVELS OF

MARTIN BAUMGARTEN.

BOOK I.

Giving an Account of Ægypt and Arabia.

CHAP. I.

He goes from Kueffstein in Germany to Venice: A Commendation of that Place.

IN the Year of Christ 1507. in the Month of April, I Martin Baumgarten, having invoc'd the Divine Assistance and Conduct, set out from home, accompany'd by Vincentius a Priest, and one Servant nam'd George. We took our way to Venice, a City the most Celebrated and Worthy a Traveller's Observation in the World; rising up, as 'twere, out of the Sea, and abounding in all things, tho it naturally produces nothing for the Service of Man. Whatever can be said in its Praise falls short of its desert. There we found a great many Persons come from several Parts, with the same resolution of Travelling that we had; who going aboard a Ship that lay ready for them, set Sail soon after our Arrival. We staid there a Month, judging it worth while to consider that place not in a hurry, but leisurely and deliberately: In which time we took a distinct View of the Magnificent Churches, Monuments, Gardens, and generally all that was remarkable; and provided our selves with every thing necessary for our intended Voyage.

CHAP. II.

Their Departure from Venice, and first Storm at Sea.

ON the 25th of July, we agreed with the Master of a Ship, had our Cabin assign'd us, and the day appointed for setting Sail; which being come, and the Wind serving, the Seamen strove who should be first aboard, the Merchants brought their Goods, and the Vessel had quickly all her Lading; mean time we put our selves and Baggage into a Lighter, and got aboard as they were haling up the Sails and getting out of the Harbour. Presently it sprung a brisk Gale, the Sails were all fill'd; the Ship flew before the Wind, and both City and Harbour disappear'd.

But in a little time the Wind chop'd about; blew a Storm, and forc'd us back to the place where we had weigh'd Anchor, notwithstanding our utmost endeavours to prevent it. The Mariners in great Consternation set up a hideous Cry, and fearing the Ship would be driven aground, took in their Sails, plied their Oars, and encouraging one another, tugg'd stoutly to keep her up against the Wind. To hear the Outcrys of the Seamen:

Baumgarten. men, and see them beat their Breasts, was more dreadful to us than the danger it self. Having brought her to an Anchor, we were miserably tost, and the rolling did not suffer us to sleep or take any refreshment all that night. This was a hard beginning of our Voyage, but supporting our selves with Hopes of the Divine Protection, we took courage to undergo this and greater Calamities if they should happen.

C H A P. III.

For some Days the Winds prove inconstant ; they arrive at Rovigno in Istria.

ON the 26th of July, about Sun-rising, the Wind slacken'd, and we would willingly have set Sail ; but there being a Calm, we chose to Row, and made no great way. But not long after, a brisk and favourable Gale blowing, all gave a shout, thrice the Trumpet sounded, thrice we prayed ; and making all the Sail we could, went joyfully away before the Wind.

And with full Sail we plow'd the Ocean's Back.

About Noon the Wind chang'd, and prov'd cross, which oblig'd us to furl our Sails, and drop from the Prow an Anchor ; so all that time and the following Night we were tofs'd, sometimes under, sometimes above the raging Billows ; and having undergone the like hardship all the 27th and 28th days, with much ado on the 29th we came before Rovigno, a Town in Istria, subject to the Republick of Venice. There we came to an Anchor, and went into the Town ; and after we had refreshed our selves, and bought some Provisions, went aboard again. But the Wind blowing hard, we thought it not safe to rely upon one Anchor, and therefore dropt another that was greater, and were forc'd to ride there three days with great uneasiness.

C H A P. IV.

They enter Pola, their stay there. The catching of the Fishes call'd Tonini, Tonigobardin, who return'd from Venice, overtakes them while they stay'd at Pola.

ON the 2d day of August, there blew a small but favourable Gale, which brought us into the Harbour of * Pola on the third day. At that time this Town was the Metropolis of Istria, and a very fine and delightful place. It is said to have been first inhabited by the Colchi, and afterwards made a Roman Colony, as the Remains of a large Amphitheater, and many other Monuments of Antiquity seem to confirm. Having therefore fix'd our Ship in that large and safe Harbour, we went ashore, took Lodgings, and stayed there six days, partly to buy Provisions, and partly to wait the arrival of another Galley.

In the mean time we had occasion to be diverted with seeing the Catching of a certain sort of large and strong Fish, with a big Head and little sharp Tail, which they call Tonini. The manner of Catching them is this : In the Months of August and September they use to go up and down in Companies, and to play together on the Coast. As soon as they are,

got within the Mouth of the Harbour, and notice of it given to the People of the Town by certain Boys who are placed in the tops of Trees for that purpose ; they all rush out to this Fishing, as if it was to engage an Enemy : Some in Boats, laying Nets to prevent their escape : Others standing on the Shore arm'd with sharp pointed Spears, ready to attack these Fishes so soon as they should be forced ashore by the Nets and the shouting of the People. Then the most vigorous and nimble of the young Men leaping in naked among the Fishes, attack them with their Spears and Hooks ; and oftentimes it happens that before they can catch them, while they are endeavouring to bring them ashore, they are pull'd into the Water by the strength of those Creatures in their own Element. But the poor Fishes while they are endeavouring to make their escape with the Dart sticking in their Backs, and the Wounds they have received, so soon as they come where the Boats are placed in Circle,

* Call'd Pietas Julia by Pliny.

Catching of the Tonnins.

Circle, find all means of escaping cut off, by the Nets laid there for that end; and being struck at also by those that are in the Boats, run mad and enraged to the shore, and expose themselves to the merciless strokes of the Fishers: but finding no quarter there, tumble up and down in rage and despair among the young Mens feet, till by their own struggling, and the repeated blows of the Fishers, they are at length overcome and thrown ashore, where fresh companies of the weaker fort attack them anew with Stones and Clubs, and put an end to their lives. These Fishes are so strong, that as long as they can but keep their Tails under Water, the strongest Man is hardly able to overcome them. That day there were six and fifty catch'd, the next day a hundred, and at last a hundred thirty two. The number of the Fishes that were catch'd was so great, that they served all the Town, and almost fill'd our Galley at a small charge; and having salted them, we had as many as serv'd till we came to Alexandria.

On the 10th of August the other Galley arriv'd, having on board Tongobardin, the Sultan of Egypt's Ambassador to the Republick of Venice; who had no sooner landed, but he was honourably receiv'd by the Governour of the City, who gave him a most splendid Entertainment. Without the City there is an antient Tree, whose Branches spread very wide, and at whose Root there is a pleasant Spring, incessantly sending forth fresh supplies of wholesom Water. Under the spacious shade of this Tree there were Seats placed, covered with Silk, and a Table furnish'd with great variety of curious Dishes, and a numerous train of Servants stood by to serve the Guests. There Tongobardin having taken his Seat, I and my Company, and some Venetian Merchants who had been invited, sat down; and while we were eating, drank heartily of that cool Spring, the Weather then being very hot. But by the excessive eating of green Graps, both I and several other of the Guests contracted a violent Fever; which however we cured by fasting three days together.

CHAP. V.

Their departure from Pola. A second Danger at Sea.

ON the 11th day we came out of the Harbour of Pola; but by reason our Ship's Crew was not compleat, we were forced to drop Anchor, and stay off the Town till the Captain's Clerk, who went ashore to Pola to make up the just number of our Seamen, returned: About Sun-set there arose a Storm, and it blew so hard that we durst not weigh, but were forced to lie there tumbling up and down all next day.

On the 13th we weigh'd Anchor, the Wind standing fair, and had very good sailing all that and the following night, so that we had now lost all sight of Land, and could see nothing but Air and Water. But the Wind beginning to blow very hard, the Waves began to swell, and a horrible darkness covered the face of the Sea: And the Storm and Waves did so increase, that our Galley was oftentimes under Water; and the things that were lying on the Deck were some of them wash'd off into the Sea, and others (the Hatches by chance being up) thrown down into the Hold, where we, in great fear, were expecting the last minute of our Life. But the Storm ceas'd, and that night and the next day, with a fair and moderate Gale, we cut the Surface of the Adriatick Sea; the Sea being sometimes calm, sometimes boisterous during the rest of our Voyage.

Second Danger at Sea.

CHAP. VI.

The Captain of the Galley musters his Soldiers. The other Galley that was in company breaks her Tards.

ON the 16th the Wind standing fair, we had Ragusa, a free and considerable City in Dalmatia, on the left hand; and on the right, but at a great distance, Apulia and the Mountain Gargano. On the day following the Captain of our Galley

Galley muster'd all his Soldiers, assigning to all his Archers, Gunners, &c. their Posts; and withal encouraging them to acquit themselves bravely if there should be occasion. They were all drawn up on the Fore-deck, and turning about towards the Stern, gave notable proofs of their Strength and Skill. Some of 'em with great art and dexterity managed the strong Bow and Arrows; others with no less strength and agility, by brandishing their drawn Swords, and shaking their Shields, sometimes advancing, sometimes retiring, showed how manfully they could fight if there were occasion for't. Some with long Spears practising their Strokes on all hands, as if they had already engaged the Enemy. This Muster being over, and the Captain having applauded their strength and skill, he bestowed on every one of 'em a certain quantity of Wine and Victuals. In the mean time our Companion-Galley, while she was at some distance from us, in tacking about broke her Yards; which oblig'd us to furl our Sails and stay for her night and day, till she should mend her Yards and come up to us.

C H A P. VII.

Ceraunia, Epirus, The Cimeritæ, and their Victory over the Turks.

Ceraunia. ON the 18th day, the Wind being fair for us, we discovered Ceraunia, or il Monte di Chimera, at a great distance ahead of us. Ceraunia are high Mountains in Epirus, which are said to have that Name from their being often struck, as Strabo asserts, with Thunder, and about which the Adriatick Sea ends, and the Ionian begins. The Sea betwixt these Mountains and Italy is so narrow, that Aeneas, whose Adventures Virgil describes, sail'd it over in half a night's time.

Epirus. Moreover Epirus is also call'd Arthon, Cimeritæ. and the Inhabitants of Ceraunia, Cime- ritæ. They are Christians living after the manner of the Greeks, and a free People independant on the Venetians and all others; and secure against the Attempts of the Turks, their formidable Neighbour, who being Master of almost all Epirus, and thinking it shameful to have his Conquests stopt by an inconsiderable handful of poor People, invaded them last month with an Army of five thousand Men, who were every one of 'em cut off; as we were first informed by a small Ship of theirs that we met, and had the Report afterwards confirmed by the whole People of Corcyra.

C H A P. VIII.

A Description of Corcyra, or Corfu, the Town and Island. Something concerning Cephalonia.

See Pliny, lib. 4. c. 1. ON the 19th day, with a small gale of Wind, we came in sight of Corfu; and it blowing a little fresher, next day we came within a small distance from it. We met a Galley belonging to Corfu, which was cruising on that Coast to clear it of Turkish Pirates. She no sooner discover'd us to be Friends, than she put out her Colours, and joyfully welcom'd us by sounding a Trumpet three times: and leaving Botronto, a Town belonging to the Turks on the left, piloted us into the very Harbour. In the evening we went ashore into that Grecian Town, where we refreshed our selves plentifully with Food and Sleep. On the one and twentieth day we viewed the Town, the Castles, and what was remarkable in the Neighbourhood. This Island situated in the Ionian Sea, not far from the Adriatick, and is 120 miles in compass; antiently inhabited by the Phæaci, and govern'd by King Alcinous, but is now subject to the Republick of Venice. On the East and South it is a plain and very delightful Country, covered with Vines, and several other Kinds of Trees, and lies but a little way off Epirus. Moreover a part of the City (which is likewise called Corfu) is inclosed with a strong Wall, and defended by two Castles, which make it terrible to an Enemy. That evening, after we had bought us some Provisions, we went aboard again to encounter new Hardships at Sea. joyfully set sail, and cut the frothy Sea fore a favourable Wind. On the 23^d day, the same Wind continuing, we lost sight of Cephalonia, which is an Island situated in the Ionian Sea, according to Pliny, lib. 4. Nat. Hist. It was sometime call'd Melana; and, as Homer shews thro' all his Odyss. was under the Jurisdiction of Ulysses: Now it is subject to the Ve-Baumnetians, who not long ago took it from the Turks, but at the expence of a great deal of Blood. ~ Baumgarten.

C H A P. IX.

Peloponnesus, or the Morea, describ'd. Also the Towns in it.

ON the 24th day we arriv'd at the Morea: It is a Peninsula, and one of the noblest Countries in the World, situated between the Aegean and Ionian Sea. Its antient Name Peloponnesus seems to be the contraction of Pelopis Insula, and its Circuit is computed to be 563 miles. Peloponnesus, according to Herodot. lib. 1. was its more antient Name, and it was afterwards called Danaa, then Achaia, and now Morea. That part of it which is call'd Laconia, was formerly call'd Oebalia, in which is Lacedemon, otherwise call'd Sparta, the very Eye of Greece. That neck of Land that joins the Morea to the Continent, is call'd the Isthmus, and is five miles broad. Upon it stood Corinth, famous for its Riches, and its being a Roman Colony, but much more so afterwards for its destruction; the top of its high Castle, call'd Acro-synthos, affording a charming prospect to both Seas. Here it was that the Grecian Princes, fearing their formidable Neighbour the Turk, drew a Wall from Sea to Sea, and by that means separated the Peloponnesus from the rest of Greece, calling the Wall Hexamilon. But Amurath Emperor of the Turks, either while the Grecians were careless, or struck with consternation, level'd it with the ground. The Morea is likewise call'd Cbersonesus, as if one should say Terra Insula, a Country that is almost an Island; for unless it were join'd with a little Isthmus to the Continent, it might be call'd an Island. On the 25th day, the Wind standing fair, we sail'd by Lepanto a City of the Morea, Lepanto and came in sight of Modona, which, they say, was formerly an Archbishop's Seat; but the Turks taking it from the Venetians, after a most bloody Battel, it miserably degenerated into the Turkish Customs and Manners. Peuceus, lib. 3. Chron. 195.

C H A P. X.

Description of the Island Cythera, or Cerigo. Their groundless fear.

ON the 26th day we sailed by the Island of Cerigo, antiently call'd Cythera, which is reckoned the last of the Cyclades, and by Laertius call'd the Island of Laconia. It is about five miles from Malea Promontorium, now il Capo di Malio; and the Straits there make sailing very difficult and dangerous. It was at first call'd Porphyris, but on the account of the famous Temple of Venus that was there, it was call'd afterwards Cythera. It was in this Temple, as the story goes, that Paris ravish'd Helena, and thereby occasion'd the Trojan War.

That day, in the evening, a small gale of Wind blowing, one of our Men from the top of the Main-mast cried out, that there were foul Sail of Ships making up to us. At this we were alarm'd, and all came upon Deck; orders were given to Arms, which we immediately obey'd, believing they were Turks. Some carried Burdens of Stones up to the Topmast-head; some made ready their Guns; others shut up the Entring Port, because it would have been easy to board the Galley at that place, and the rest were employed in ordering and making ready every thing for a Battel; and the hurry and confusion of their Preparations made their fear the greater. But the Captain, and the rest of the Noble Venetians, who were more used to the softness of Pleasures than the hardships and terror of War, betrayed most fear, for their Knees struck one against another, and their Blood grew all chill in a moment. But so soon as these Ships drew nigh, they put out their Colours, and sounded their Trumpets; we knew them for Friends, and did the same, which changed our fear and despair into a sudden joy, and inspir'd new Life and Courage into these almost Lifeless Gentlemen. Drawing nearer they came close up to us, and surround- ed us, lowering their Sails. The chief Men of them went into a Boat, and came on Board us, to know what news from their Native Country; and to enquire whether we had met with any Pirats by vway. They told us that three days before they had engag'd with two French Ships, whom they had beat, but let them go upon their Parole never to fall on any more Venetian Vessels. After some discourse on such matters, we made them eat and drink, and so they went aboard their Ships again. We went on in our Voyage with a gentle Gale, which towards Night began to blow fresher; and with the light of the day we also lost sight of the Land.

C H A P. XI.

Crete: they visit Gnoſſus in that Island. Description of the Labyrinth. Description of Crete, and the Promontory call'd Samonium.

 ON the 27th, a fresh gale blowing from the West, we began to descry at a great distance the lofty Hills of Crete; our Companions gave a Shout, and welcomed the sight of that Island and Gnoſſus.

 On the 28th, we came near to the Town of Candy, but had such a Calm (which the Seamen call'd Bonaza) that it was the third hour of the Night before we could touch Candia; and by reason the Night was very dark, and there were no Stars to be seen, and because we were afraid of the narrowness of the entry into the Harbour, we ply'd our Oars, and at last with great difficulty and danger we got in; and having furl'd our Sails, we came to an Anchor.

 On the 29th we went ashore to the Town of Gnoſſus, now call'd Candia, as is also the whole Island, and went into the House appointed for Travellers; which had been built and endow'd by a certain Duke of Burgundy, who had sometime travelled those parts, and had founded this House for the Accommodation of Travellers. There we staid. This is that Gnoſſus, antiently, as Diodor. Siculus relates, inhabited by the Titans, afterwards the Kingdom of Minos, having the advantage of an excellent Harbour, and adorn'd with several stately Towers, and now subject to the Venetians. Within sight of the Town, towards the South, there is a Hill, which the People of this Country call Jupiters Hill; because there are some remains of the Sepulcher of Jupiter, with his Name engraven on it, as the Inhabitants showed us.

 About the middle of the Island, is Ida the highest Hill in all the Island, and famous for being the place where Jupiter was nurs'd: At the foot of this Hill is to be seen the famous Labyrinth, where the Minotaur was kept, an intricate Prison built of huge Stones, full of Windings and Turnings, where those who would endeavour to get out, go perpetually round without advancing, and after a great deal of Labour are just as near their purpose as when they began. There is only one way to go into it; but within there are innumerable passages; which are now shut up to prevent the danger those might fall into who might have the Curiosity to see it. The greater part of it is decay'd and ruin'd. Of all the four Labyrinths, viz. those in Egypt, Crete, Lemnos, and Cluscum, this in Crete was the most famous, and most celebrated by Greek and Latin Poets. It was made by Daedalus, an Ingenious Artificer, as Ovid relates in his 8th Book of Metamor.

This Island produces Wine and Honey in great abundance. It was first, for the temperateness of the Air, call'd Aeria, afterwards Macaroneson, that is, the blessed Island; then Hecatopolas for its hundred Cities; after that Creta, from a certain King; and now Candia, from its Whiteness. Aristotle speaking of this Island, lib. 2. Polit. says, Nature seems to have design'd this Island for the Mistress of Greece, being commodiously situated, and rising at a due height above the Sea. Servius says, it is not agreed in what Sea it lies; for it has the Lybian on the South, the Aegean on the North, the Icarian on the East, and the Ionian on the West. Navigation is said to have been first invented here, and from the Inhabitants skill in that Art came the Proverb, * Cretensis nescit Adare. So linus says of this Island, that it abounds with Wild Goats, but has no Harts; that Foxes, Wolves, and such like hurtful Creatures are never to be seen in it. The favourable influence of the Sun makes the Vines large and high, and the Trees yield their Fruit in great abundance. There are no Owls hatch'd in Crete, and if they are brought there they quickly die. But the excellency and fruitfulness of the Soil emasculates the Inhabitants; and that saying of the Apostle, which he borrow'd from Epimenides, holds true still, The Cretians are always Liers, evil Beasts, slow bellies. Moreover, on the East-side of this Island is the Promontorium Samonium, commonly call'd Cape Salomon: and in the 27th Baumgarten. Chapter of the Acts, these words are to be seen, Because the Wind suffer'd us not, we sail'd hard by Candia, near to Salmone, &c. On the West side of the Island is the Promontory Criomethopon, which signifies Criomethopon. the Forehead of a Ram. Of all that multitude of Cities, there are only seven now remaining, viz. Candia, Canea, Gissamo, Retimo, Terapitro, Sittia, and Archadia; in the first of which an Archbishop resides, in the last a Bishop. The Villages are said to be in number fourteen hundred. Towns of Candy.

Their third Danger at Sea. Description of the Island Carpathus, or Scarpanto.

HAVING during our stay at Crete provided our Selves with necessaries for our Voyage, on the 2d of September the Weather being good and the Wind standing fair, we left the Harbour and put out to Sea; and sailing close by the Island Standia, which was on our left Hand, we no sooner came to be off of Sittia, a City of Crete, but the Wind began to change, and Aeolus supported himself with us, that sometimes we thought it advisable to put into the Harbour, sometimes to put out to Sea; at last we resolv'd upon the latter, and after we had sail'd about 7 Leagues were forced back, and had well nigh been split upon Standia, had not all hands gone to work, and us'd their utmost endeavour.

We had the like bad luck on the 3d, 4th, and 5th days, and at last with great difficulty came as far as Capo Salomon, and on the sixth left Crete behind us.

On the seventh we sail'd by several Islands, particularly Scarpanto, antiently call'd Carpathus. This Island, according to Pomponius, lib. 2. is situated between Egypt and Rhodes, and was the Kingdom of Proteus. As Pliny relates, it gave name to the Carpathian Sea, and it belongs now to the State of Venice. Carpathus.

On the 8th day, while we were sailing with a gentle gale, and the wearied Seamen were securely diverting themselves with their innocent Plays and Dancing, and in their Holiday Clothes, there came on a sudden such a Whirlwind as covered the Galley with Water, and had almost drown'd some of us; but while they were crying out, and endeavouring to get clear of it, it presently vanished as if it had rose only to fright them. After that we had the Wind and Weather so favourable, that we made more way that day than ever we had done before. A Hurricane.

They come in sight of Alexandria. Danger in the Harbour. The Ambassador Tongobardin is Honourably receiv'd. Their farewell to the Sea for some time.

ON the 9th day about Noon the Watch call'd out that he discover'd Alexandria a head of us. We were transported with the joyful News, however.

ping that now we were at the end of a toilsom and dangerous Voyage, and express'd our Joy by offering up our thankful acknowledgments to God.

Baumgarten.
Pharos. In the evening we arrived at Alexandria, and coming up to the Tower call'd Pharos, which is both a Guard and an Ornament to the Harbour, we lower'd all our Sails (as is usual) to testify our Duty to the Sultan, and then entered our much desired Haven. Gamali, Admiral of the Turkish Fleet, had arriv'd there a little before us, and having put the Turkish Ambassador to the Sultan ashore, had come to an Anchor in the middle of the Harbour. We coming in with a pretty fresh Gale ran foul of his Ships; upon which, the Turks thinking we had done it designedly, presently got to Arms, and with a great Shout stood ready to charge us. But understanding by our doleful cries what the matter was, and also fearing the Laws and Privileges of the Harbour, they thought it advisable to let us alone. With very much ado we got clear of them, and came to an Anchor. But we slept little or none all that Night; for the Turks disturbed us by the confus'd Noise of such Musical Instruments and Voices as they had, demanding a like return from us, and insulting us, while we tamely held our peace.

Tongobardins reception at Alexandria. On the 10th day about Sun rising, Tongobardin, the Sultan's Ambassador, whom we had brought along with us from Venice, went ashore. The whole Youth in the Town came flocking about him to see and pay their humble Respects to him. The chief Man of the City attended with a vast croud of Mamluks, all well mounted, and a great many People making a most disagreeable and confus'd Noise with their Drums and other Instruments, such as they had, receiv'd him very magnificently; and the Venetian Consul, who is the Protector of and Judge between the Subjects of that Republick in those parts, having richly adorn'd a great number of Boats with Streamers, Trumpets, &c. attended the Ambassador ashore, to the great wonder and admiration of the Barbarians. And besides, all the Ships that were in the Harbour paid their Compliment to Tongobardin, by firing an infinite number of Guns, and fill'd the Air with the Din, Fire, and Smoak of them, and the Shouting of their Men.

On the 11th day we went into the Venetian Inn, and took leave of the Sea for some time; and because by our Habit we look'd liker Merchants than Strangers, we had free Liberty to come in and go out there when we would. And besides, we had brought very little Money along with us, having taken Bills of Exchange from Venice, otherwise we must have paid a considerable Custom; for the Saracens make a very narrow search. However we sav'd a great part of what we did bring, by hiding it in Pork, which they abominate above all things. In the mean time, by the help of a Venetian Guide, we view'd the most remarkable places in the City, where we observ'd a great many things worth relating, which I shall insert after I have given an account of the Origin of the City.

Alexandria.

ALEXANDRIA, the greatest City in Egypt, was built by Alexander the Great 320 Years before the Birth of Jesus Christ, on the Coast of the Egyptian Sea, and in that part of Africa that lies near the Mouth of the Nile, which some call the * Canopean, others the † Heracleon. This City as it was founded by Alexander, so it bears his Name, and contains his Tomb; which Julius Cæsar is said to have paid his Devotion at. It is surrounded by a vast Desert, and harbourless Shoar, by Rivers and Woody Fens. The succeeding Kings, as Diod. Siculus relates, did largely contribute towards the encrease of this City by the Donations they gave, and the Ornaments they bestow'd upon it; so that at length according to some it became the most glorious City in the World. Its Length, as Josephus relates, was 30 Furlongs: it is all hollow underground, and has Aqueducts from the Nile to many of the private Houses, through which the Water is carried in to

to them; which settles and grows clear in a few Minutes, and is made use of by the Masters of Families and their Children and Servants: for that which is fetch'd from the Nile is so full of Slime and Mud, that it brings a great many Diseases on those that drink it; but the poorer sort are fain to make use of it, because there is not one publick Fountain in all the City. At this time it looks very Glorious without; the Walls as they are of a large compass, so they are well built, firm and high, and the Turrets upon them are numerous; but within, instead of a City, there's nothing to be seen but a prodigious heap of Stones. 'Tis rare to see a continued Street, but there are wide Courts and Yards, a few Houses intire. Where Alexander's Palace stood formerly, there is now an Obelisk erected, of solid red Marble, eleven hands square at bottom, of a wonderful height, ending in a sharp top; and all over, from top to bottom, full of Figures of living Creatures; and other things, which plainly shows that the Egyptians of old made use of such instead of Letters.

There are some who say that that Obelisk in Rome at S. Peter's in which Julius Cæsar's Bones are kept, stood of old near to this of which I am now speaking; but this far exceeds that both in height and thickness.

There are to be seen still in Alexandria several Christian Churches, among the rest that of S. Saba, possess'd by the Greeks. And in another place that of S. Mark, who is said to have been the first that ever preach'd the Gospel in those parts. And there they show you a Font, in which they say, that Apostle baptiz'd. Behind the Altar of that Church are to be seen Antient Manuscripts, containing the Works of Athanasius, Cyrillus, Irenæus, and several others, all rotten and Moth-eaten, and some of 'em almost quite burnt. Antiently in this City many Eminent Scholars and Divines flourish'd, as Philo Judæus, who wrote several very useful things; Origen the Presbyter, Athanasius that famous and stedfast Bishop of this place; Dydimus, Theophilus, Johannes Eleymona, and many others, whom 'twould be tedious to mention. And here flourish'd the Seventy Interpreters in the time of Ptolomy Philadelphus. In our days one may see here great Quantities of several sorts of Goods brought from most places of the World. Here the Venetian Merchants have two Ware-houses, fill'd with great variety of Goods, over which the Consul, who is a Man of great Authority, prelides. The Genu-Baumes also, and the Turks and Scythians, who have also now learn'd to finger Gold, have their several Ware-houses, which the Moors take care to shut every Night. There are also within the Walls two artificial Hills rais'd so high, that from the top of them one may see Ships at a great distance: and they tell also, that upon occasion they can send Letters from Alexandria to Cairo by Pigeons, to whom they ty them, and whom they breed up for that purpose.

This tho I did not see my self, yet I had good reason to believe, being credibly inform'd of it; and besides, as Pliny relates, at the Siege of Mutina, Brutus ty'd a Letter to a Pigeon's foot, and by that means convey'd it into the Consul's Camp. Without the Walls of the City is to be seen Pompey's Pillar, sixty Cubits high, under which, they say, his Head lies. So much for the City. As to the Harbour, it is so contriv'd, that even in the time of Peace it is not easy to get into it; for the Entry to it is not only strait, but also crooked, by reason of several Rocks and Stones that ly hid under Water. The left side of it is enclosed by artificial Moles; on the right, the Island Pharos, upon which there is a Tower and a Fort, bearing that name. Which Tower was antiently reckoned one of the Seven Wonders of the World, it being so prodigiously high that Sailors could see the Light that was on the top of it at the distance of, or near forty Miles, and by it steer their Course to Land. The Harbour within is very safe, and about 3½ Miles in compass; into which all sorts of Merchandise that that Country wants are brought from other parts of the World, and from whence into those, all that it can spare of its own Product is exported.

While we were one day at a Feast with the Merchants, among other things a certain Venetian told us, That in one Year by a Ship's Loading of Filbert-nuts from Apulia, he could gain Ten thousand Crowns; and that by sending one Ship loaden with Chestnuts, every Year to Tripoli in Syria, he could make Twelve thousand Crowns. And the reason was, because the Moors, Egyptians, Syrians, and other of the Mahometan Religion used that sort of Fruit very much; for altho they have excellent Fruits of their own, and great variety of 'em, yet they soon spoil; and therefore what they do not consume in the Summer-time, they export export into other Countrys: and all Baum- Winter, especially during their * Fast-garten. ing Month, they live on these foreign Nuts, of which their Country produces

 * January. none, and which being carried into other Countrys, do not easily spoil for a long time; nor are they destroyed by Vermin, as with us.

In the mean time we provided our selves with all things necessary for our Journey; and being recommended to Ton- gobardin a Mamaluck, and having frequent opportunity of conversing familiarly with him, we made him a Present of fifty of those Pieces of Gold, which they call Sepaphs, that under his Favour and Protection we might travel the more securely. This Money was no more than what he had long expected from us; for he was always very accessible and affable to us, and oftentimes assur'd us of all the Service that lay in his power. But no sooner had he got our Gold in his Pocker, the hopes of which had made him so courteous, than he began to flight and look down upon us; while we in the mean time, considering we were Strangers, seem'd to take all in very good part.

C H A P. XV.

They set out and arrive at Rosseto. Description of the Nile and Egypt.

ON the 22d of September, betimes in the Morning, we mounted our Mules, in Company with some Italian Merchants, having a Mamaluck for our Guide, and set out for Rosseto; and arriving there, before we could enter the Town, we were forced to pay six of those Pieces of Silver which they call Maydins, a Head at the Gate. Afterwards marching through a Wood of Date-trees, and other sweet smelling ones of several kinds, we sat us down under a Date-tree loaden with Fruit that was not fully ripe; and every one producing his proportion of such Provisions as we had, we refresh'd our selves together, and drank plentifully of a Neighbouring Spring, and laid in a stock of it for the thirst that was to come. From thence travelling through Fens, which the Nile had fill'd at its last overflowing, we came to the Sea, having rid most part of that day. Afterwards we came to other Fens, where we found a Crew of Arabians Fishing, who by downright threatening and violence forced each of us to pay them a Contribution of two Maydins a piece. After that we struck off a little from the Sea, and towards Sun-set came to a little solitary Cottage, where we tied our Mules, and were forced to drink Salt-water, and ly on the Sand.

It happened to be Moon-shine all Night, by reason of which we, who were not accusom'd to such Beds, were afraid of Robbers, and therefore before we had rested four Hours there, thought it advisable to decamp, the Night being pretty clear. After which we came into a Desert cover'd with soft and yielding Sands. There blew a small Gale from the Sea, which raised little Hillocks of Sand behind and before us, so that we could not know where the Road was;

 for it often happen'd, that when we saw the Road plainly before us, a great many such little Hillocks would rise, and in a little time dissipate, and gather again in another place, which did so hide and obstruct the ways that neither we nor our Mules knew which way to go. While by this means we were doubting which was the way, and were straying up and down, we came at last to a certain Wood of Date-trees, under whose Covert we were shelter'd from that inconvenience; and hearing the crowing of a Cock we bent our course that way, and not long after arriv'd at Rosseto; where having unloaded our Mules, we went to sleep for a little time.

Rosseto is a Town in Lower Egypt, lying South and North, on the Banks of the Nile. It is surrounded with no Walls, but by the lofty Spires and Turrets that magnificently adorn its Churches, one would take it for a rich and great City.

The Nile, as Diodor. Sicul. lib. 1. relates, runs from South to North, and is the greatest River, so far as we yet know, that runs into the Sea. It empties it self at seven Mouths, and separates Asia from Africa; but as for its Rise and Source, no Author hitherto hath ever said that he saw it, or had any account of it from others; and its Original is so uncertain, that some have call'd it Asco- pon, that is, a River rising out of the dark.

This River overflows all Egypt, beginning about the Summer-Solstice, and continuing to the Aequinox; bringing always new Slime along with it, and therefore call'd Nilus, as 'twere, from νεα ἰλυσ, new Slime. It waters both till'd and untill'd Ground, as long as the Husbandman thinks fit; for by reason it flows gently, they can let it in, or keep it out according as the Ground requires it.

It makes the Soil so fruitful, and the Tillers work so easy, that when they sow they either bring a flock of Sheep to tread down the Seed, or draw a very shallow Furrow with the Plough; and in four or five Months they duly return to reap a plentiful Harvest; the Egyptians being the only People on Earth who buy a plentiful Crop at so cheap a rate. The untill'd Ground affords Pasturage in so great abundance, that their Ews bring forth, and are shorn twice a year.

But the overflowing of the Nile, must seem strange to those who hear of it, and astonishing to such as see it; it being the only River in the World that swells in the Summer-time, whilst all the rest shrink below their Banks. It increases in the Summer-time, so as to overflow all Egypt, and decreases in the Winter, whilst others overflow their Banks. The Seven Mouths through which it disgorgeth it self into the Sea, are the Pelusian, ~~that runs~~ the Borders of Arabia; the Canopian, the Volbitian, the Sebenitian, the Pathmitian, the Mendesian, and the Thabitian: and tho it hath several others, yet those not being Navigable because of their Fords, they are not reckoned.

There are several causes of its Swelling assign'd, but that which seems most probable is, that the Water which pours down continually, for a certain time, from the Mountains of Æthiopia that ly next to Egypt, are the cause of this River's swelling, especially since the Barbarians who inhabit the Country bear testimony to that Assertion. The Nile is the only great River in the World, that never makes the Air foggy or cold; and therefore, according to Pomp. Mela, of all the Countries in the World, Egypt alone is free from Rain, and yet very fruitful, populous, and abounding in all other kinds of living Creatures. Plato and several others affirm the same. Yet both in Alexandria and Cairo, and the neighbouring Desert, we saw several considerable Showers, but were told that happened very seldom.

Egypt is a plain and Champion Country; and when the Citys, Villages, and Farmers Houses, are fortified against the overflowing of the River, they look like so many little Islands. All the land Creatures that stay in the Fields are drown'd, and such of them as get up to Heights are preserv'd. The Cattel during the Inundation are kept in Houses, and live on the Fodder that their Masters have laid up in store for them. The common People laying aside all thoughts of Labour, bestow all that time on their Pleasures and Feasting. In short, Egypt divided by the several Branches of the Nile, resembles in some measure an expanded Hand. Thus much concerning Egypt and the Nile.

Their pleasant Passage up the Nile, in company with Tongobardin. What sort of a Creature the Crocodile is. The nimbleness of the Arabian Boys. The Arabians dexterity in swimming; and of their Circumcision.

ON the four and twentieth day Tongobardin, whom we had so much long'd for, came at last to Alexandria, attended with great number of Camels: And staying but a short time there, fill'd one of the Boats with his Baggage, and his two Wives that he had brought along with him; his Mamaluks took up another, and a mixt crowd of Christians, Jews, Egyptians, and other Nations the third. And before we had sail'd far, we came to an anchor hard by a Date-tree Wood, over against which, on the opposite bank of the River, there is a large Wood, in which there is an infinite number of Parrots catch'd.

On the 25th we began to sail up the River, and arriv'd at a City call'd Phua, Phua, where we went ashore and refreshed our selves a little. The Place was very populous, and the People were strong and healthful; and there we had the pleasure to see both the Banks covered with Pomegranate, Date, and several other kinds of Fruit-trees. Among the Trees there was an infinite number of Houses and Monu-

Monuments of the Egyptians, some low, others very high, but all of 'em arched; and such a number there was of 'em, that they took up a great space about the City. The Egyptians induced to it by an antient Tradition of their Ancestors, furnish their Houses but indifferently, but bestow a great deal of pains and charge upon their Monuments. They besmear themselves with Dung and Dirt when they bewail their Dead, and they think it unlawful either to burn or bury them; but having anointed and embalm'd them with a great deal of Art, they lay them either in Houses or in the open Air, according to their Circumstances and Quality. Most part lay their deceased Friends and Relations in Vaults built on purpose on the tops of their Houses; and value themselves mightily, if they can show that they have accommodated their dead Friends within their Houses.

Looking from thence on the 26th day, we pass'd by a great many of the Country-peoples Cottages; and went often ashore, where we made the verdant Grass our Table when we inclin'd to eat, and shar'd in the Plays and Pastimes with which Tongobardin's Mamalucks diverted themselves. At that time we saw a certain young Moor, because he had been found drinking Wine privately, receive 20 severe lashes on his Back and Belly.

Every night Tongobardin caused to be set up a great many Lamps in form of a Pyramid, and several little Bells to be tied to the Sails, into which the Wind blowing with a little force, made a certain motion in them, which caused an agreeable sort of melody, and very pleasant to the ear. But the Mamalucks that were in the other Boat, when it was dark, used to shoot up a sort of fiery Arrows into the Air, which in some measure resembled Lightning or falling Stars. We who followed in the third Boat, were not behind with the rest in our Sports and Divertisements; for we had with us a sort of an Egyptian Trumpeter, who as to the matter of Art and sweetness of Melody, was absolutely ignorant and unskilful; but because his Cornet sounded very loud, and was heard at a great distance, and we were ready to split at his unskilful and awkward way of sounding, never doubting but that by our laughter we were commending and extolling him, and not at all suspecting our mockery, the more he perceiv'd us ready to fall down with laughing, the louder and oftner he sounded. In this manner, while we were sailing, did we shorten the night, and in the day time we were charm'd with the delightful prospects of Fields and Trees, and the ravishing melody of Birds that we had never seen before, who were warbling out their shrill and pleasant Notes. And besides, the Air being then pure and wholesom, and a gentle breeze of Wind blowing from among the odoriferous Trees and Flowers that were over against us, did wonderfully inspire us with life and vigour, for both Banks of the River were almost covered with Sugar-Canes and other wholesom Plants; among which, as the Sailors told us, there lay vast numbers of Crocodiles. The Crocodile is a four-footed Creature (for we view'd many of their Skins with great exactness) so call'd from Crocus, which signifies Saffron, either because it is of that colour, or because it mortally hates the smell of that Plant. It is altogether of a Dragon-form; it lives all night in the Water, and all day for the most part on Land. Its Eggs are shaped like those of Geese, and their young ones that are hatch'd in 'em commonly grow to be sixteen Cubits long; and if we will believe Pliny and Solinus, they are sometimes twenty Cubits long; they grow as long as they live, and their Life is almost as long as that of a Man. It is the only Creature that wants a Tongue, and its Body is wonderfully fortified by Nature, for its whole Back is all over Scales, and these are wonderfully hard. Its Belly is soft, and therefore it is the Dolphin's mortal Enemy, who wounds its Belly with the Fins of his Back under water. Its Eyes resemble those of a Sow, and it has a great many Teeth on both sides of its Mouth, two of which are considerably longer than the rest. It not only eats Men, whom it weeps to see approaching, and then devours them (from whence comes the Proverb, * A Crocodile's Tears) but also other Creatures whose fate it is to come near the River, whom it tears to pieces with its Teeth and Claws that are very strong and sharp; and its bite is so severe and venomous, that there is no cure for the Wounds it gives with its Teeth. It is a great lover of Honey, and Saffron is the only thing that can preserve the Bee-hives. The Ichneumon gets in at its Mouth while it is asleep, and gnaws its Entrails and kills it. It is a terrible Creature to those that run away from it, but a mere Coward before those who manfully pursue it.

While we were sailing up the River for some days, and sometime having our Boats drawn along with Ropes, we happened to see on both sides of the River, great companies of Arabian Boys, with Famine painted in their Faces, begging some Viſuals of us. They ran with such swiftness and nimbleness, that they kept pace with our Boats, and as they ran, struck their Buttocks with the soles of their Feet. We were mightily pleas'd with the sight, especially to see them strive to outrun one another for the Bisket and Fruits which we threw ashore to them. As we pass'd along, we saw a great many Villages and Country-houses, about which were great numbers of Cattel, Camels, wild Oxen, and several other kinds; and besides all these the Husbandmen reaping the second Crop of that Year; for in Egypt there are two Harvests, one in April, and another in September. We likewise saw the Arabi-

ans, with their Clothes tied about their Heads swimming through the River, one Baum- half of their Body being above, the other garten, under Water; so that one would have thought rather that they were walking Dractery through the Water than swimming. at Swim Near a certain Village we saw the Egypt- ing. tians celebrating a Feast, and dancing; there was a great multitude of them, and they were all on foot, except one who sat a Horseback in the midst of them and overtopt all the rest. And when we had asked what the meaning of that was, we were told, that he whom we saw on Horseback had been circumcised that day, and that all the rest were celebrating the Solemnity. The Modern Egyptians, as well as the rest of the Mahometans, are circumcised, but not before the thirteenth Year of their Age, after the manner of their Forefather Ishmael, whom, as Moses relates in the 17th Chapter of Genesis, his Father Abraham circumcised at the same Age. Arabians circumcised.

C H A P. XVII.

The Insolence of the Mamalucks. Entry into Cairo. Who Tongobardin was. His Wives. The Solemnity and Rejoicing upon his returning to Cairo. The Travellers Clothes changed.

On the 28th day of September we came in sight of the lofty Pyramids of Memphis, and by that knew that we were not far from Cairo. That day seven Vessels belonging to the neighbouring Country, laden with all kind of Provisions for Memphis, joined us: So that evening we arriv'd at Bulaco, which is the next Port to Cairo for those that are coming up the Nile.

On the 29th we loaded our Mules, and drove them before us to Cairo. By the way, one of our Company happening to grow tired, and having got upon one of the Mules, met with a company of Mamalucks on Horseback, who threw him down to the ground; for these Mamalucks, you must know, have the impudence to pretend, that whoever meets them sitting on the back of a labouring Beast, let his Country and Condition be what it will, he must get off and pay them homage: but this we were ignorant of before we were taught by this Accident. Not long after we entered Cairo, and staid in a place that was assign'd us in Tongobardin's House till he should come home.

This Tongobardin was a Spaniard born, and had been made a Mamaluck: He had been a Deacon of the Church while he staid in his own Country; but after he had renounced Christianity and turn'd Tongobardin Mahometan, he was made Patron and Protector of all those Christians that should happen to live within the Sultan's Dominions, notwithstanding his Apostacy from their Faith; and in a short time became a great and powerful Man. All Christians were receiv'd into his House; and it was customary for every Merchant to pay him two pieces of Gold, and every one who came from afar to visit Religious Places, five.

At last, on the 30th day, Tongobardin, in a rich Garment that had been presented him by the State of Venice, and attended by a great number of Mamalucks, made his entry into his own House in great state. His Wives, that were five and thirty in number, meeting all together in an upper part of the House, with a strange sort of singing and confused noise, welcom'd him home. He, together with those that came along with him, and those who came to compliment him him upon his arrival, sat all down upon rich Tapestry. In the middle of his Palace there was a large Court, round, in which there were a great many Chambers that look'd into the Court; in one of which we staid, and it being open, we could see all that was done in the Court.

Upon rich Carpets that were spread there, were set 260 large Dishes, fill'd with great variety of the best and most costly Meats; of which after every one had tasted a little, they presently rose up, and having begg'd leave to be gone, and rendred their humble thanks, they all went home very sober and grave, and the whole Entertainment was in a minute devour'd by a ravenous crowd of poor People who were allow'd to take it. After this all the great Men came thronging in to pay their Compliments to Tongobardin; among the rest the Calif, that is, their Pope, with a very white, and as 'twere horned Crown on his Head, and a long black Beard, came with a numerous Train, and in great pomp to welcome Tongobardin, who received him very honourably.

In the mean time we having, by the Advice of a certain Greek, procured Egyptian Habits, Girdles, and Ornaments of the Head, went up and down through the City wherever we had a mind, having one of Tongobardin's Slaves for our Guide, viewing the situation of the place, considering the Manners and Customs of the People, and observing what was remarkable.

Description of Cairo or Memphis. The Customs of it.

Memphis, now call'd Cairo, is the greatest City in Egypt, and the Seat of their Kings. It was built by Ogdous, otherwise call'd Vohereus, and is 150 Furlongs in compass. It stands in the most commodious place of all that Country, where the Nile divides it self into several Branches. On one side it is fortified with strong Ramparts, as well to defend it against the Inundation of the Nile, as to secure it against any Attacks of an Enemy: On the other it is rendered almost impregnable by a great and deep artificial Lake, which is fill'd with the superfluous Water of the River. In this City therefore, because of the commodiousness of the Place, the succeeding Kings leaving Thebes, made this the Seat of their Empire, and adorn'd it with many magnificent Buildings; it is still a very large City. They do positively aver, whether true or false I know not, that there are about four and twenty thousand Mosques in it; its high Towers are both a Defence and an Ornament to it: and upon these their Priests, night and day, at certain hours, make a strange, loud and barbarous noise. On the sides of their Churches, and at the corners of the Streets, there are certain large Vessels placed, that are fill'd with Water for drinking from the Nile. But there are besides these a great many Moors who carry Buckets full of Water through the Streets, and without distinction of Persons, freely give it in silver Cups to all that have a mind to drink. The former are usually Legacies left by the richer sort when they are dying, and sometimes given by People in perfect health: And not only this, but the richer sort, out of a pious and religious Design, cause burning Torches and Lamps every night to be hung up upon the Towers. They repair the ruinous Mosques and Towers; they offer up their Praises to God Almighty, after their own way, three times a day. They fill these Cisterns, as I have said before, with Water; and twice a day they sprinkle Water on the Street to cool the Air and lay the Dust. And they say likewise (which does not seem altogether incredible) that above 8000 Men get their living by carrying Water, some having but one, some two, and some five Camels at work: and there is a story passes, which I will not aver to be true, that there are more People here, who having no Houses of their own, lie all night in the open Air, than there are Inhabitants in Venice. There are reckoned there (which is no contemptible number) fifteen thousand Jews.

There are very few private Kitchens in this City; for they not only have their Meat dress'd, but also eat in publick Houses. They say there are ten thousand Cooks in Cairo, the greatest part of whom carry Vessels on their Heads along the Streets, and dress the Victuals that they are to sell as they go along. The Streets are very narrow, and for the most part cover'd above with Branches of Trees

The Houses for the most part are of Brick, that are only harden'd by the heat of the Sun, and mixt with Straw to make them firm; a great many are both built and covered with nothing but Canes and Reeds, and are not at all to be compared with our Houses. But the great Mens Houses are as fine and magnificent as any thing can be. Morcover the City of Cairo is so large, that one can hardly walk round it in nine or ten hours. In the upper part of it stands the Sultan's Castle, both large and strong; to which you enter by twelve Iron Gates, all well secured with Guns and Guards: But there is one that looks very mean, which is, that there are none but wooden Keys to open and shut them with.

The City it self is divided into two parts, one whereof is called Cairo, the other Babylon; which the Babylonians who came from Mesopotamia, having obtain'd the Ground from the King, are said to have built, and in memory of their Country to have given it the name of Babylon, which was antiently the Seat of their Kings. In old times famous Men from most parts of the World came to see this place, and to see and converse with the wise Men and Prophets that were in it, as St. Jerom says in the Prologue of the Bible. Hither did Plato and Pythagoras come; and here came the great Apollonius, after he had travell'd all the East, to see the Philosophers, and the famous Table of the Sun, which is thought to have stood in the Temple of the Sun, in Cairo.

The Pleasures of Tongobardin with his Wives. His Magnificence.

ON the first day of October, Tongobardin sent to us to come to him, that we might have a more narrow view of his House, and the Splendor in which he lived. We had scarce entred his Closet, when there came a certain great Man whom they call'd Armircio, desiring to speak with him. Upon which (lest Armircio should suspect him for conversing with Christians) he ordered us to withdraw into a pleasant Garden, where we were to lurk till he should go away. At night he call'd us, and carried me and my Company, and two Franciscans, into the Appartment of his Women; where after he had set himself down with his Wives about him, all emulously striving to please and divert him, he ordered us to take our Seats; the Room being all covered with silken Carpets, for those of the highest, lowest and middle Ranks. Sometimes sporting with one, sometimes with another of his Women, he began to argue, that there was no Life in the World more glorious or happy than that which he enjoy'd; the religious Men and I holding our peace all the while. The Ointments and Perfumes that were about the Women smelt so sweet, and the Sweetmeats and Liquors that were presented to us were so fine and so rare, that nothing could be imagin'd beyond them in their kind. He promised to entertain us next day with some wonderful Shows, and in the mean time allowed us to withdraw, it being time to go to Bed.

C H A P. XX.

The Habit of the Sultan, of the Mamalucks, of the Caliph. The Field that was prepar'd for the Shows. A Specimen of the wonderful Dexterity of the young Men. Master of Arms. Funerals. Mock-fight from off an Elephant. Rewards. The Danger the Spectators were in. The Village Matherea. Hir'd Interpreter.

ON the second of October we went before Sun-rising, to avoid a Crowd, to the Sultan's Palace, having a Mamaluck, who was one of Tongobardin's Slaves, for our Guide; where we saw about sixty thousand Mamalucks stand in a most submissive manner, and profound silence; all in the same fashion of Clothes, and of the same colour, which was White. We saw also the Sultan himself, in a sort of a Hu Habit.

Baumgarten. Summer-room with Lattice-windows, and a pointed Diadem on his Head, his Robes of the purest white; but his Beard long, black, and thick. Next to him, but a degree lower, sat the Caliph of the same Village and Complexion, and distinguished by his Diadem. Next under him sat the Turkish Ambassador, for whose sake these Sports and Games which I am going to give account of, were appointed. On the side of the Castle there was a large and plain Field, which had been before prepared for this purpose: about the middle of which, on one side, there were three artificial Hillocks of Sand, about fifty paces distant from one another; and on the top of each of them there was fixt a Spear bearing the Mark that the Archers were to shoot at; and the like was on the other side, so that in the middle betwixt them there was as much room left as might serve for six Horses to run abreast. In this Plain a great number of young Men clad in Silk, that was richly embroidered, with their usual light Arms, mounted their sprightly Horses, and began their Games in this manner.

the Young Men.*

First, They ran at a full career betwixt the first two of these Hillocks, and dexterously shot their Arrows at the Marks that were fixt to the tops of the Spears, both on the right and left hand.

Next they rode in the same manner out between the other two, and fill'd the Marks with their Arrows.

Just so with the same speed they ran through the rest, and shot their Arrows so artfully, that not one of them miss'd his aim.

After these young Men had perform'd their parts, and had left none of the Marks untouch'd, every one took his little Spear that hung behind his back, (as if they minded to act, not at a distance, but hand to hand) and retir'd a little out of the way, till the rest of the Youth had perform'd as they had done. After which all of 'em in the same order as they began, march'd through the same way they had rode, but now a slow pace, with their Standards before them, as in Triumph, till they came to the place from which they had set out; and after they had prepar'd themselves for another kind of Exercise, came out again in a little time.

Some of them while their Horses were running with loose Reins, rode up and down shooting their Arrows at the Marks before and behind, some one, others two, and some three.

Others, while their Horses were at their full speed, would leap off three times, and (the Horse still running) mount again, and in the mean time be shooting their Arrows, and never any of 'em miss his aim.

2. Others not sitting in their Saddles, but standing up, while the Horse seem'd to fly, would hit the Mark exactly.

3. Others while their Horses were at their full speed, would thrice unbend their Bows and toss them about their Head like a Whip, and again bend them, and shoot without ever missing the Mark.

4. Others, while their Horses were at their full speed, would leap off sometimes on one side, sometimes another, but aim as sure as any of the rest.

5. Others again would throw themselves three times backwards off their Horses, and would Vault into the Saddle again, let the Horse run as fast as he would, and in the mean time let fly their Arrows, and hit the Mark as oft as they shot.

6. Others would spring out of their Saddles that were fast tyed to the Horses, and would unty them, and then shoot; thrice they would ty on their Saddles, and as oft pierce the Mark, the Horse all the while running at his full speed.

7. Others sitting after their usual manner, would jump behind their Saddles, and let their Head hang down, then raise themselves up, and get into their Saddles. Thrice they would do this, and as oft let fly their Arrows without ever missing the Mark.

8. Others sitting in their Saddles, in an usual posture, would lay their Heads backwards on their Horses Buttocks, and taking his Tail hold it in their Teeth, then raise themselves up, and shoot as sure as ever they did.

9. Others again, after every flight of an Arrow, would unsheath their Sword, and brandishing it about their Heads, would put it up again, and for all this shoot as sure as could be.

10. Others would sit between drawn sharp pointed Swords, three on either side, and in very thin Clothes, so that if they had but budg'd, tho never so little, to one side or t'other, they must have been wounded; yet so dextrously did they move backwards and forwards, that (as if there had been no danger on either side) they were always sure to pierce the Mark.

11. Among all the young Men who performed these Exercises, there was only one found, who with his Feet loose, could could stand upon the backs of two of the swiftest Horses at their full speed, and let fly three Arrows forwards and backwards.

12. There was another, who alone sit on a Horse without Saddle or Bridle; and at every Mark spring up on his Legs, and hit the Marks, both on his right and left hand, and then sit down again; repeating the same at the second and third Marks, and thereby discovering an incredible agility and skilfulness at shooting.

13. There was another also who was the only one among them that could, while he was sitting on a bare backed Horse, so soon as ever he came to the Marks, lay his back close to the Horse's, then stretching his Feet up in the Air, could start up upon his Feet in a moment, and fix his Arrow in the Mark.

At last, when these Marks were quite loaded with Arrows, the Master of these of Youths, who was an aged and Gray-hair'd Man, taking the Marks in his hand, first held them up as high as he could, then threw them down to the ground. Upon which his Scholars shew'd down their Lances and Arrows upon them, as if they had been putting an end to the lives of their wounded Enemies, and then went prancing up and down by way of Triumph. Among these young Men there were three, who tempting the Almighty by their foolish forwardness, fell down from off their Horses; one of whom expiring as soon as he fell, lest a formal Funeral might disorder the rest, he was immediately carry'd off and buried. The other two being almost dead, were likewise carried off for fear of marring the Show. The rest of these Horsemen, that they might put an end to these Games, taking their Lances in their Hands, and putting Spurs to their Horses, rode up to the Marks that were still remaining, and piercing them with their Lances, carried them aloft on their Points like Trophies. It was worth any one's while to see these tall young Men, neatly cloath'd and decently arm'd, with a wonderful Address perform those Exercises on the back of a Horse at his full speed, which others could hardly do standing on firm ground; and which were equally strange to see, and hard to be believed.

After these Exercises were ended, there was brought out a Machine representing an Elephant, with a wooden Tower on his Back full of Men; who were perpetually firing their Pieces, and throwing fiery Darts about, till they had join'd the young Men, who for the most part had quitted their Horses, and had arm'd themselves like Foot-soldiers. There was also in a certain place of the Field a wooden Castle erected, finely adorn'd without with Standards and Ensigns, and defended by a good number of Soldiers within. This the young Men, with those that were on the Elephant's back, attempted several times to storm, but were as often beat back and put to flight. At last the Garison following the chase too far from the Castle, the Enemy turned upon them, and pursued them to the very Gates of it.

Having done this several times, and the Garison at last venturing still farther from the Castle, were entirely routed, and every Man of 'em made Prisoner. Those who were on the Elephant's Back, having furiously attack'd all that were about them, leapt down from their Castle, made themselves Masters of the Fort that was now empty, and put a small Garison into it, and then join'd the young Men, whilst those who were in the Fort acted like Enemies against all that were about it. They who were in the Castle, without distinction of those that stood near them, threw Darts, Pitch and Fire all about them, so that nobody was safe, especially we, whom the Moors made use of as so many Shields to defend themselves, exposing us, tho not to any great danger, yet to the fear of it. This Show being over, the young Men marching towards the Sultan with their Bows unbended, in a most submissive manner bowed their Heads thrice towards the ground, and then went and mounted their Horses, who all the while had stood tamely and peaceably at a little distance, as if they had done so out of profound reverence to the Sultan.

After all these Exercises and Shows were ended, and the Sultan had highly commended, and magnificently rewarded the Performers, they all return'd to the place from whence they had first come armed. So every one returning home, and we endeavouring to do the same, were apprehended by him who commanded the Gate of the Sultan's Castle; and if the Mamaluck who was our Guide had not earnestly interceded for us, would have been forc'd to pay him a considerable Sum of Money. Having thus escaped his clutches, and with great difficulty struggled through the Crowd to our Lodging, we began to compare Notes of what we had seen, and to write down what

These Exercises are Imitations of the bloody Roman Games, which see in the Saturnalia of the most ingenious Lipsius, lib. 2. cap. 23.

Matherea. On the third day having hired Mules, and two Mamalucks for our Guard, we went to Matherea, a Village not far from the Nile, and about a mile from Cairo, where was once a famous Balm-tree Garden, whereof now there is not so much as any foot-step. The Balm failing, a neighbouring Fountain was dry'd, which, as they told us, used to moisten the Trees and make them very fruitful. About Sun-set we return'd to Cairo.

On the 4th day, making our selves ready for a Journey to Mount Sinai, we hir'd a certain Greek to be our Interpreter, who understood both the Italian and Saracen Language; and having given him sixteen pieces of Gold call'd Seraps, he provided such things as were necessary for our Journey, and hir'd us Camels, and desir'd we would make our selves ready without delay; which we did, and straight pack'd up our Baggage.

Their departure from Cairo, with the Indignities offer'd them. Alcanica. Caravan. Watches by the way. Thieves. Desert of Arabia. Rains in Egypt. Artificial Ditch between the Red-Sea and the Nile. The Salt-Fountain of Moles. The Red-Sea famous for the Passage of the Israelites. Marks of Pharaoh's Punishment there. Saracens eat dead Carcasses. Springs in Elim. Men chok'd there with Heat.

Rudeness of Boys. ON the 5th of October, betimes in the morning, we laded our Camels with Panniers, equally poised on both sides, our selves sitting above them. So departing from Cairo, in company with the two Franciscans, we were most barbarously treated by the Saracen Boys, who pelted us with Dirt, Brickbats, Dust, and rotten Fruit, while we in the mean time had occasion to exercise our Patience. After we had been miserably toss'd and shaken by the uneasy trotting of our Camels, to which we had not been accus-tom'd, we arrived at Alcanica, where we lodged in the House of the Greek Monks, who used to gather and send Provisions from thence to the Monastery of Mount Sinai.

On the 6th day, a certain Arabian understanding that we were there, came, attended with an insolent Mob of his own Gang, and would have created us a great deal of trouble, if we had not prevented it by a few pieces of Silver, which was the only effectual way we could take with him.

Alcanica.

Alcanica is a large and populous City, but (as the other Cities in Egypt are) without any manner of Fortification. It is distant two miles from Cairo, and stands in a sandy Desert not far from the Nile.

On the 7th day we mounted our Camels, and set out from Alcanica, and before we had travel'd a mile came up with the Caravan. They staid waiting till a sufficient number of Travellers should come up, that they might the more securely travel through that Country, which is pestered with Arabian Robbers. Having there unloaded our Camels, and made a sort of Intrenchment with our Panniers, which we used for Seats when we rode, we sat down within them with our Baggage, hardly daring so much as to eat or drink. In the night-time, while the Saracens who travelled with us were asleep, we ventured to eat a little; and afterwards, as if we had been closely besieged, slept and watched by turns, while in the mean time we were almost killed with the noise and suffocating smell of the Camels. In the night-time we heard a terrible Cry in the farther end of the Caravan; for some Arabians having been discovered stealing, and scar'd with the Cry, had run away with some Carpets, a Lance, and a Sack of Bread.

On the 8th day we entered the Deserts of Arabia, through which the Israelites had passed in their way from Egypt to the promised Land; and being join'd by a great many other Travellers, the number of Men and Camels did so increase, that we look'd like an Army consisting of several thousands.

On the 9th we march'd through a dreadful sandy Desert, where nothing that that was green appear'd, not so much as Briars or Thorns, or the least shrub, till towards night that we came into a plain low ground; vvhhere our Muorels, that is, our Mule-drivers, found some small shrubs here and there, vvhich they pluck'd up and gave to their Camels. That evening it rain'd very hard, vvhich, according to many of the Antients, particularly of Plato, never hapned in Egypt.

On the 10th day vve came to the Bay of the Red-Sea, where there had been a deep and a wide Ditch begun to be drawn from thence to the Nile, for a Communication between the East and the West, and facilitating of Commerce. Necho, King of Egypt, vvas the first that began it; Darius King of Persia, attempted to perfect it, but left it off, being told by understanding Men, that if the interjacent ground was cut, all Egypt must inevitably be put under Water, since it lay lower than the Red-Sea. Not far from thence there vvas a Well, dug, as the Story goes, by Moses; the Water of vvhich vvas so salt that Men could not drink it, tho Cattel did. Here therefore, because the Camels had no drink for three days, vve pitch'd our Camp, and staid till about Midnight. This is that Bay, never to be forgotten, vvhich the Children of Israel, under the Conduct of Moses, pass'd over without wetting the Soles of their Feet. Here it was that Pharaoh, with his numerous Army of Foot, Horse, and Chariots, vvas overwhelm'd by the Violence of the Waves; and the Track of his Chariot-wheels, vvhith the Print of his Horses Feet, are to be seen on the Shoar to this day; and tho one should deface them this Minute, they shall plainly appear the next, as Orosius, lib. 1. says, viz. There are evident Monuments of these things remaining; for the Tracks of the Chariot-vvheels are not only to be seen on the Shoar, but as far into the Sea also as ones fight can reach; and if they should at any time be defaced, either by Chance, or through Curiosity, the Divine Power immediately orders the Winds and Floods to restore them to their former condition.

One of our Camels happening to die that day, the hungry Saracens fell upon the Carcase; and lying along upon the Sand, cramm'd their bellies with the Flesh, and the Water of the aforesaid falt Fountain. In the mean time, we bought two Hens from a certain Arabian, and having made a little fire of Camels dung, dress'd them and eat them. Next night we were not a little frighted with a sudden cry that was raised against the thieving Arabians; but they made their escape with what they could conveniently carry away, while our Company was in a hurry and confusion.

On the 11th day fetching a compass round the Bay, but close by the Shoar, we met another Caravan coming from Alther, with Hawks. There, looking from a certain rising Ground, we could neither see the Front nor the Rear of our Caravan, so great was the Multitude of Men, Camels and Mules. That evening we came to Elim, where, as tis recorded Exod. ch. 15. were antiently twelve Wells, and seventy Palm-trees. The Wells are there still, but no Palm-trees, only some low shrubs here and there. Here it was that the Israelites encamping; eat of the Fruit of these Trees, and quench'd their thirst with the Water of the Wells. Near to these Wells, as we were told, in the Month of July last, fifteen Men lost their Lives by thirst and heat. Having pitch'd our Camp a little way from hence, another of our Camels happen'd to die, to the great joy of the devouring Saracens, but grief of its Master. We saw a great many Carcases of Camels, some whose Flesh was quite consum'd, others not.

C H A P. XXII.

The Fountain Gundele, with its hot Waters. Coral search'd for in the Red-Sea. Trees with Prickles. Twice in danger by the Arabians exacting upon them. A Squabble with the Mule-drivers.

ON the 12th we travelled up the Mountains that overlook the Red-Sea; and there we found that all the Water which we had brought from Aleanica for drinking, was quite spent, and therefore we were forced to take up such Water as we could find there with our Hands, and put it into our Vessels to carry with us. It was not only muddy, but also salt and somewhat bitter. With-in sight of this place they show'd us a Well, call'd Gundele, incessantly boiling Well of up Gundele.

up hot Water. At that time one of the Franciscans, not sitting right on his Camel, but shifting from one side to the other seemed to tire his Beast, which so enraged his Master that he struck the Franciscan on the Face, and wounded him.

Having travelled all the 15th day over high and white Mountains, we came in the evening to the Red-Sea again; where by reason the Road was so narrow that we were forced sometimes to ride in the Sea, we lighted off our Horses, and fell a gathering of Curious Shells, little Stones, and white Coral.

This Sea is also call'd Mare Erythraum, from a certain King called Erythra, whose Tomb is to be seen in an Island of that Sea, with an inscription in the Character of that Country. Next night we separated from the Caravan; they travelling along the Coast towards Althor, whilst we struck off to the left, and went up the Mountains. In the mean time our Muledrivers Camel died, and he with his Companions tore off the Flesh and eat it; and stuff'd the Skin with Chaff and Straw, to preserve it for another use.

On the 14th day, when we were travelling over high Mountains of a red and almost shining Colour, our Water fail'd us, and our Victuals was twice-bak'd Bread, dry Cheese, and now and then some Neats Tongues, well salted and dry'd. There an Arabian who was in Company with us, for a certain reward, went about a Mile off and brought us a bottle of Water; which altho it was full of little reddish Worms, we strain'd through a Cloth, and in that necessity drank it with a great deal of Pleasure. The poor Arabian no sooner receiv'd his reward, which was one of those pieces of Silver which they call Maydins, than he bor'd a hole in his Wife's Ear, and hung it to it, upon which she immediately fell a skipping and dancing in a strange manner, and coming to us, touch'd his knee who had given the Money, and kiss'd his Hand. We saw in this Country a great many Trees bearing long and sharp pointed Prickles, of which kind, 'tis said, our Lord's Crown was made. These Trees were blossoming at that time, and sent forth a most delicious smell, which refreshed us extremely, and we brought a great many of the Prickles away with us. In the evening we came into a narrow passage between the Hills, and for fear the Arabian Robbers might waylay us, we staid there all Night; but our Mule-drivers, who knew the Country very well, having gone to water their Camels, did not return before it was very late.

On the 15th day we came to some horrible Precipices and steep Mountains. There was running by us a Bitch with Whelps that belong'd to one of the Arabians, who happening to bring forth her Litter there, and seeing us leave her, was horribly afraid to be left there alone with her Whelps. For a long time she seem'd to be deliberating, at last fell a howling most mournfully, and chose rather to save her self by following us than stay behind and perish with her Puppies. That day about noon, we came to a certain Date-tree Garden vvhhere vve vvere most barbarously used by the People who liv'd there. For understanding that vve vvere Christians, they came flocking out of their Holes with a design to rob us; and raising a hideous Cry, threatned us with their dreadful Bows and Spears; some of them knocking us down off our Camels, others taking us up, and protecting us from the fury of the rest. Our Interpreter neglected us for some time, but did his part at last. However vve vvere five times knock'd down, and had part of our Provisions that were not well enough hid taken from us, and vvith a great deal of difficulty after much noise and severe drubbing, vve vvere let go, upon payment of eight pieces of Silver a Man. This Garden runs along for the space of almost a Mile in a narrow track between the Mountains, where it is impossible for one to turn either to the right or left hand, but must vvith a great deal of Trouble travel thro narrow passages between rows of Trees.

Having got clear of this Wood, vve unhappily fell into the hands of other Arabians, vvho calling themselves the Keepers and Guardians of the Monastery of St. Katharine, and offering us violence if vve did not obey, exacted ten Maydins of us before they vvould let us go, 25 vvhereof make a Ducat.

On the 16th day getting up about midnight to advance in our Journey, our Mule-drivers began to rebel against us, requiring two Seraphs of us above vvhat vvas our bargain; and vvhen vve continu'd to contradict and dispute the matter vvith them, they drove their Camels before them, and vvvent away, leaving us with our Baggage in that vast and dreadful Desert all alone. But consider-

The Monastery of St. Catharine. The Arabian Robbers there. The uneasy Ascent to Mount Horeb. The Steps up to it. Another danger from the Arabians. The Chappels on the Mountain. The Saracens Mosque hard by. Abominable Superstition.

ON the 17th day about Sun-rising we came to the Monastery of St. Catharine; and being admitted into it, we delivered the Letters we had brought from the Patriarch of the Greeks in Cairo to the Abbot of it; and having a room assign'd us, and eat something, when we would have gone to rest, we were surrounded by a crowd of Arabians who put all sorts of Sleep out of our minds. They broke into our room, seiz'd our things as if they had been their own, and in a barbarous manner repeated a certain sort of a word thus, which with them signifies Money; with which having stop't their hellish Mouths, and greas'd their ugly Fists, we shut our doors again, and compos'd our selves to our much desir'd rest. About the second hour of the Night we went up to Mount Horeb. There were in Company with us two Greek Monks, whom they call Celageri, and three Arabians who liv'd in the Monastery of St. Catharin; whom our Interpretur had deputed to be our Guides, himself being so fat that he could not climb to such a height. We ascended the Mountain by the light of the Moon, and carried Victuals and other necessaries along with us; we often rested our selves by the way to recover our lost Breath, and encouraged and rous'd up one another to undergo the Labour. The Ascent of this Hill is both steep and high, and as the Monks that were our Guides told us, it has seven thousand steps of square Stone, besides the greater part where the Ascent is natural. Having come half way up the Mountain, we found a Chappel dedicated to Mary, and within it a pure Spring that was very useful for Strangers. At that Chappel, our three Arabians who had been sent to be our Guard and Guides, began to grow cross, and with their drawn Swords in their Hands would neither suffer us to go backwards nor forwards, till we should promise them some Money; which we found our selves obliged to do rather than fall out with them.

From thence we went to Helias's Chappel, where they say he staid when he fled from Jezebel, 3 Kings 19. At last after much sweating and a great deal of toil and labour we reach'd the top of Mount Horeb, vvhich in most humble posture we offer'd up our hearty thanks to Almighty God who had preserv'd us hitherto, and granted our requests.

From thence we went to the Church dedicated to our blessed Saviour vvhich is built in that place, vvhich, as 'tis said, Moses spake vwith the Lord and received the Tables of the Law, Exod. 34. Hard by that Church there is a Rock, the highest in all the Mountain, and twenty paces round, in vvhich place the Lord is said to have talked vwith Moses, vvhile it smok'd and look'd terrible vwith Clouds, Thunder and Lightning; and indeed to this day both this and some other neighbouring Mountains shine with a sort of brightness resembling that of polish'd Copper. About fifteen paces from hence there is a Saracen Mosque, built over that place vvhich Moses is said to have fasted forty days and forty nights, by a special Divine assistance, before he received the Law, Exod. 24. This Chappel the Saracens make use of to beget, as they fancy, Prophets in; for the Children that are begot there are esteem'd holy, and fill'd with the Spirit of Prophecy. In the Church dedicated to our Saviour we lay down on the bare Ground all Night, and trembled so for cold, that we slept little or none all that Night; and besides, our three Arabians, who had gone into their Mosque to pay their Devotion after their own way, did designedly make such a noise all night, that we were quite disturb'd by them.

They have greater difficulty in ascending Mount Sinai. On the top of it they view all round about. Monastery of the 40 Saints. Moses's Stone. The place where Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up. The Water of Cursing.

ON the 18th day about Sun-rising we came down the West side of Mount Horeb, by a very steep and dangerous way; and came into a Valley betwixt Mount Horeb and Sinai, in which there was a Monastery dedicated to 40 Saints, where refreshing our selves a little, we left our baggage under the care of a certain Monk. We no sooner began to ascend Mount Sinai, than our worthy Guides began to threaten us and offer violence if we did not give them more Money; which because we had not Money about us, and being very desirous to finish our intended Journey, we promised them a Seraph, which was all they desir'd.

For the greater security we took another Companion of our Journey, a Monk of the Monastery of St. Catharine, whom they swore they would kill if we did not make good our promise. Upon these terms both we and they took heart and began our Journey, with much more toil and danger than in Mount Horeb. For by this time the Sun had reach'd the middle of the Heavens, and the tops of the Mountains with which we were surrounded intercepted the cool and refreshing breezes; and besides, such was our stupidity that we had quite forgot to bring bread with us, and our perfidious Guides had made us believe that we should find Water enough on the Mount.

The Ascent was both slippery and steep, inasmuch that for the most part we were forced to make use of all four; which way of creeping was so uneasy, that I cannot express how wearisome and dangerous it was, and how strong ones knees must needs be that could endure it. For while one that's going up treads upon these Stones that lie loose, they presently yield; and in a steep ascent, if one does not take care to set his feet varily, if one of the Stones be mov'd out of its place, the rest follow, and tumble down upon the followers. And besides, while we were below, the roughness of them was very uneasy to us, because they were often tumbling down, and we were forc'd to handle them often when we were beginning to scramble up: but having got up higher, we were a little refresh'd by a cooler Breeze, and the sight of the Goats that were running along the Rocks diverted in some measure the thoughts of the toil. Afterwards refreshing our selves with a little Sugar, and resuming new vigour, we encountered the difficulty again, and sometimes climbing, sometimes creeping, we had almost quite lost our breathing, and were mightily distress'd.

And besides, the Monks and Arabians were so tir'd that they could hardly know the Mountain; for there were a great many high tops of Mountains so like one another, that for a long time it was very hard to tell which was which, if there had not been some heaps of Stones lying here and there, which had been gathered by others to direct succeeding Travellers in their way; by which means our Guides at last coming to know the top of Sinai, got before, and call'd to us with a great deal of joy; which so inspir'd us with Courage and Vigour, that we follow'd them quickly. But at last the Ascent grew so difficult, that all our former Toil and Labour seem'd but sport to this. However, we did not give over, but imploring the Divine assistance, we used our utmost endeavour. At last, through untrodden ways, through sharp and hanging Rocks, through Clefts and horrible Deserts, pulling and drawing one another, sometimes with our Staves, sometimes with our Belts, and sometimes with our Hands, by the assistance of Almighty God, we all arriv'd at the top of the Mountain. But our Arabians, who were not spur'd on by Devotion, and had no Inclination to the thing, thinking it impossible to get up, stay'd below the Rock, admiring our fervour, eagerness and strength. That top of Mount Sinai is scarce 30 paces in compass; there we took a large prospect of the Countries round about us, and began to consider how much we had travelled by Sea and Land, and how much more we had to travel, what hazards and dangers, and what various changes of Fortune might probably befall us, while we were thus divided between fear and hope, and possess'd with a longing for our Native Coun-

We went to hear Prayers with the Monks in this Church; and after their Service was over, they went to the Tomb of St. Catharine, singing after their Grecian way, where one with a Book in his hand began first, and the rest all join'd in a Chorus. After which each of them, in their ugly old habits and hoods, carrying Wax-Candles in their hands, and burning Frankincense, open the Virgin's Coffin, pay their humble reverence to the Body, and then withdraw in very grave manner. They allowed us the honour to touch these, and complemented us with a bit of the Silk in which the Body was wrapt.

Insolence of the Saracens.

This Monastery is said to have been built by the Emperor Justinian; it stands in a Valley at the Foot of Mount Horeb, and is inclosed with a high Wall. Within the Rooms are low and very mean, and the Saracens have the insolence to profane, pull down, and do with it as they think fit. A certain venerable grayhair'd Monk told us that every day there came above fifty Arabians there to get Victuals, and would not be refused, and that the Friars were no better than their Slaves. There is one Mosque within this Monastery, where every night a great many meet together, and make such a noise and clatter that the poor Monks cannot lay their eyelids together for them; and the only thing wherein they show their humanity is, that they don't enter the Friars Church; in all other things they do what they will, looking on themselves as the Masters and Guardians of the place, whereas indeed they are Destroyers of it.

The Monks, who are all Greeks, and live after the Rules, as they say, of St. Basil, are very poor, fast often, never taste Flesh, wear an ugly and careless sort of habit, and look liker Skeletons than living Men. They don't acknowledg the Pope's Supremacy, or indeed any other, but live after their own way, and have their own peculiar Customs.

Their departure from the Monastery of St. Catharine. They view several Monuments of Antiquity. Three times plagued with the Arabians. Something concerning their Life and Manners. What kind of a Creature a Camel is. Two sorts of them.

Builder of the Monastery. Insolence of the Saracens.

HAVING seen all the things and places remarkable in or about the Monastery, we made all possible hast to pack up our baggage, as quietly as we could, and remove them out of the Monastery, sending off our Interpreter and Camel-driver with them, while we in the mean time, making all the hast we could, went into a Garden that was hard by the Monastery, and pass'd through it, having the favour of the Moon's light that shin'd all night. There we saw the burial-place of three thousand Israelites, whom the Sons of Levi slew, at the command of Moses, for having worship'd the Image of the Calf; also the Image of that Calf in Stone, in memory of the Golden one that was burnt, the Ditch in which that Idol was made, the adjoining Water into which Moses threw the Ashes of it; and the round Stone upon which he is said to have broke the Tables of the Law. Having seen all these, we went directly to our Camels that were loaded, and had got before us. There an Arabian Thief, having stole a Coat from one of our Company, was prevail'd with by our Camel-driver to restore it; but not before the Owner had paid him down six small pieces of Silver. And we were obliged to stop the Mouths of the rest of that Gang in the same manner; for they had gathered together to take their leave of us, just as a Flock of Vultures used to do about a Carcase. After which, thanking our Stars that we had so escaped, every one mounted his Camel and went away, by a Road more rugged than that we had travelled before, but shorter.

On the 20th day, getting up with the Sun, we went on in our Journey; and not long after entering that Date-tree Wood, that we spoke of before, met with the same treatment from the Arabians as we had formerly; and having satisfied them with a little Money, there came other two who rob'd us of a pair of Pullets, and scour'd up the Hill when they had done. We sent off our Interpreter and Camel-driver after them, but they took care to let them escape, being as great Rogues as themselves, and Country, 'tis hard to imagine how much we were troubled.

Mount Sinai raises its lofty head so far above those of other Mountains, and affords such a vast prospect on all hands, that altho the Red-Sea be three days journey distant from it, it seem'd to us but about a Gun-shot. From thence we saw several desolate Islands in that Sea, and beyond it the Desert and Mountains of Thebais, where the Hermites, Paulus, Antonius and Macarius, are said to have lived. From thence also we descried Althor, that famous Port on the Red-Sea, into which all the Ships laden with Spices from India come; and from whence they are carried on Camels through the Desert into Alexandria, and from thence by Sea and Land distributed almost through all the World.

But because Thirst and the Importunity of our Guides would not allow us to stay longer, we offered up our humble Devotion to the most high God, and went down; and the descent being easier than the ascent, in a short time, sometimes tumbling, sometimes walking, we came to the middle of the Mountain; where finding a little Spring, but clear and wholesom, we drank heartily, to make amends for the long thirst we had endur'd.

And so having resum'd a little strength, we arriv'd not long after at the Monastery of the 40 Saints, where we were refresh'd with a Cup of Wine, a little Bread and Cheese. This Monastery had sometime been full of Monks, but some foreign Pagans rushing in, kill'd them every Man; and there being 40 of them, their Number gave name to the place. Now it lies almost desolate, only there are always two of the Monks of St. Catharin sent there to perform Divine Service after the manner of the Greeks.

Near to this little Monastery there is a most delightful Garden of Olive, Fig, Pomegranate, Almond, and several other sorts of Trees. Leaving this place, and taking a Compass about Horeb, we came to a certain Stone at the Foot of the Mountain, which Moses, as 'tis recorded Num. 20. having struck with his Rod, brought fourth as much Water as served all the Men and Beasts that were in the Israelites Army.

And altho Moses is said to have struck the Rock only twice with his Rod, yet there are twelve Marks, or Prints of it, according to the number of the Tribes of the Children of Israel. Which Miracle was the more wonderful, because this Stone, tho separated from the rest of the Rock, and is almost of a square figure, yet it is fixt in the Ground by only one pointed Corner, and consequently not in so fit a posture to extract any moisture from the Earth; and therefore its sending forth such abundance of Water must have been the Work of an Almighty Hand, and to this day there comes a sort of Liquor out at one of these Marks; which we both saw and tasted.

Not far from hence there is a place where (as we read Numb. 16.) the Earth opened its Mouth and swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, with their Families and all that they had.

A short way from hence is that Well of which Moses made the People drink the Waters of Malediction, by which many of them died and were buried there, after their adoring the Molten Calf. Hard by this place is the Burial place of the Greek Brethren, where about nine thousand of them are said to be buried.

Having fetch'd a Compass almost about Mount Horeb, near Sun-set we entred the Monastery of St. Catharine; and tho we were almost quite spent with Weariness and Hunger, yet Weariness afflicted us most; for next day we were not able to stand on our Feet, and minded rest and sleep more than eating and drinking.

CHAP. XXV.

St. Catharines Chappel and Tomb. The Superstition of the Greeks there. The Founder of it. The Indignities the Arabians put upon it. The way of living of the Monks.

ON the 19th day we went into the Church of the Monastery of St. Catharine, which was once a very fine Edifice, but now supported only by twelve Pillars arch'd above; on the top of which, as they say, are preserved the Reliques of a great number of Saints, whose Memory the Greeks do solemnize reckoning themselves sure of the Victory, one of their number, who carried deep resentments of the Slavery and Ignominy which they endured, in a set Speech publickly told the rest, that he could not enough admire their Tameness and Cowardice, who so patiently underwent such Drudgery, such Drubbing, such Fetters, and even Death it self, when they could expect nothing after all but Food and Raiment in the most miserable manner; but if they would show themselves Men, let them follow him, and they should all be free, and all Masters.

Having with these words enflamed their natural Boldness, they march'd directly to Alcairo, carrying the Trophies of their slain Enemies before them, and were admitted into the King's Castle, as if they meant no harm; and having made themselves Masters of it, they first beheaded the King with all his Court, and threw his Carcase over the Wall. Afterwards went straight to the City, and destroy'd all with Fire and Sword; treating their imperious and cruel Masters as they had done them. At last after they had satiated their Revenge on these, they gave Quarters to the rest of inferior Rank. They created their Leader King, and those Slaves, who are now call'd Mamaluks, were put in possession of all their Masters Goods. And this, as 'tis said, is the Original of these People, and in this manner did they grow so powerful. They are all Christian Renegado's; and they baptize all their Children, not by a Religious motive, but that they may have a legal Title to their Father's Estate after his death. For none that's unbaptiz'd, or a mere Saracen, or a Jew, can be a Mamaluck; but first they are baptiz'd, and afterwards abjure the Faith, and are circumcis'd. After that they burn the figure of the Cross upon the sole of their Foot, a mark of their contempt of the Christian Religion. The most part of these come from Russia, Albania, Servia, Italy, Spain, and but seldom from our Native Country Germany.

On the 30th Day, having a Moor who was Tongobardin's Slave, for our Guide, we cross'd the Nile to see the Pyramides. They are huge Structures, built of large square-stones, and rais'd to a great height; and have their Name from pyr, Fire, whose form they resemble. The Kings of Egypt built them for their Burial-places, with immense cost and labour; and the reason why they were built so great, and so many hands employed, was that the People might have no time to conspire against their Kings. The three Pyramides that stand towards Lybia, are Baumgarten about 15 Miles from Memphis, which is now called Cairo, and about 5 from the Nile; and for the magnificence and art that is displayed upon them, they may justly be reckoned one of the Seven Wonders of the World, and irresistibly breed admiration in all that behold them. The largest of 'em was built by King Chemmis, and is Quadrilateral. The whole Structure is of a hard, rough and durable stone, which they say was brought a great way off from Arabia. It is a prodigious piece of Work, especially in a Sandy Country; insomuch that it seems rather to be the Work of the Gods than Men; and as the story goes, there were three hundred and sixty thousand Men employed for the space of almost 20 Years in building it; but none of those Kings who designed any of these Pyramids for their Sepulcher were buried in them, for either the hardship that the People endur'd, or the Tyranny and Cruelty of the Kings provok'd their Subjects to that degree, that they either tore their Bodies in pieces, or threw them out of their Monuments. For which reason they usually left special orders with some of their Servants, to lay their Bodies in some mean and obscure place, that they might thereby avoid the fury of the People. There are two other Pyramids, but they are much decayed. But the greatest of these Pyramids is so large still, that the strongest Man that is, standing and throwing a Dart straight forwards, can scarce reach the middle of it; which Experiment has been oftentimes try'd.

On the 31st while we were discoursing with a Italian Merchant, we saw in his House a sort of a Creature, somewhat like a Cat, but much bigger, which being struck with a Rod and made angry, voided a sort of Perfume, valued at its weight in Gold. This Creature which is call'd Muscus, has a Lump near its Navel, which being taken out gives a most pleasant smell, and is esteem'd one of the most delicious Perfumes. The Italians call it Zibetho, and the Germans, Pysem.

The first five Days of November we did nothing but buy such things as were necessary for our Journey to Jerusalem, and sent back to Venice all that was not useful to us, but rather a hinderance. We hir'd our Mules, pack'd up what we thought we might have occasion for on our Journey, and longed for the Day of our departure.

They leave Cairo the second time. Return to Alcanica the third time. Strange way of Hatching Eggs in Egypt. A Saracen Saint. In danger from the Arabians. Another Saracen Saint, or rather Devil. His and his Complements way of Singing.

ON the 6th of December, having obtain'd leave to depart from Tongobardin, as if we intended to return, because we were secretly told he had a design upon us, and having humbly supplicated his aid, we began another Journey; and leaving Cairo, we came to Alcanica, where we took up our Quarters in a little House, close by which there was a plain Piece of Ground, with a Garden, enclosed with a dry Stone-wall, in which we slept and eat, without any other Canopy than the Heavens. We saw there an Oven shut up on all hands with Lime and Clay, into which they used to put the Eggs of several sorts of Fowls, as Geese, Hens, Doves, &c. which, not by the Mothers hatching, but by the warmth and influence of the Fire and Slime, brought forth living young ones, according to their several kinds, in a short time; who afterwards followed a Man either to be fed, or to be sold, as Chickens hatched in a natural way used to follow their mother's. And however this may seem a Fable to some, yet it is certainly true; for in those Ovens there are sometimes three, sometimes four thousand Eggs of different kinds put, and all of them by those means produce their respective young ones. The truth of this will not seem strange to any one who observes the incredible numbers of young Fowl that are in Egypt.

as naked as he came out of his Mother's Belly. It is a custom, as we were then told, among the Mahometans to reverence those as Saints who are mad, and out of their Wits; and they think also that a great deal of Respect is to be paid to those who voluntarily repent and vow Poverty, after they have led a lewd and scandalous life. This sort of Men are allowed an unbridled and unbounded liberty of going into all Houses, of Eating, Drinking, and which is still worse, of lying with whom they will; and if this Copulation produces a Child, it is likewise reckoned holy. They honour these Men very much while they are alive, and after they are dead they build stately Temples and Monuments in honour of them; and they think it a very happy and lucky thing to touch or bury them. This we heard our Mule-driver say, as we understood by our Interpreter. Moreover we heard this Saint mightily commended for a very good Man, of great Piety and unblemish'd Vertue, because he had never defiled himself with Women or Boys, but only with Asses and Mules. We could not forbear laughing at such Sanctity, or rather Beastliness, that what in our judgment ought to be punish'd by burning alive, should by them be thought pious and praise-worthy. But these are rather Beasts in humane shape than Men.

That Night there was great shouting and confusion among those that were in the outer part of the Caravan for fear of Thieves; but all the harm they did was to steal some small inconsiderable matter, we could hardly trust any body. Thus were we reduced to extreme want, having nothing but Bread, that was as hard as a Stone; and had nothing but some good Water, which we had brought from St. Catharin's to refresh our selves with. Before we had gone much farther, we were set upon by a parcel of Robbers, in the dusk of the Evening, which raised a hideous cry, they having surrounded our Interpreter, whom they first met with, repeated their shouts, and in their own barbarous bawling way requir'd Money of us; but being disappointed of that, were forced to take a share of our Biscuit, and after a deal of Clamour and Noise went away like a Company of Dogs when their barking is stopt by throwing them a piece of Bread. It is a wonder that such a barbarous Pack, who have neither Laws nor Government, and who are so poor and beggarly, should not wound and murder those they meet with, when they may do it safely. For they are free from all Subjection, either to the Sultan, or any other. They are all Matters among themselves, and salute one another with very honourable Titles. The poor and the rich, the naked with the cloth'd, the arm'd with the unarm'd, are all, by a certain natural agreement, upon a level. Not long after we had parted with these Robbers, we laid us down to refresh our wearied Bodies with a little sleep; for the uneasy pace of our Camels had so shaken and toss'd us, that we thought our Flesh and Bones had taken leave of one another; especially the two Franciscans, who knew much better how to observe the Rules of their Order than to ride on Camels.

The Camel is a four-footed Creature, ^{4 Camels} having ill shapes, and a worse smell. Its Tail is like that of an Ass, its Feet are fleshy and soft, and cleft in the middle, but the hinder part of them is intire. It has two Knees on each Foreleg, and when it receives its Burden it kneels on both of ^{Plin. l. 8. c. 18.} them. It has no Teeth in its upper Jaw, and eats and drinks very little in respect of its Bulk, insomuch that it can travel four Days without drinking. It makes its water crosswise, and very little of it. The least cooling Breeze makes it slow and lazy, if its Driver does not animate it with his Voice or Pipe, or with Bells; but Heat works the contrary effect upon it. There are, as we are told, two sorts of 'em, the Arabian and the Bastrian. The former have two Hunches on their Back, are swifter than the other, and are call'd Dromedaries; the latter have only one Hunch, and are used for carrying Burdens.

C H A P. XXVII.

Their return to the Red-Sea, and joining the Caravan. Dreams and Fancies of weary and famish'd Travellers. A little Squabble with the Mule drivers about their Hire.

ON the 21st Day, getting up before Sun-rising, we left those horrible rugged Mountains, and came down into the more delightful Country upon the Red-Sea, and met with the same Caravan, loaden with Indian Spices, almost in the very same place where we had parted with them. All our fear fled away then, when we saw our selves securely fortified with such a multitude of Men and Beasts; but travelling all that Day and Night without eating, resting or sleeping, we could not avoid falling off our Camels while we were half-sleeping, half-waking. A thousand strange Dreams and Fancies came into our heads whilst hungry and weary, and we sat nodding on our Camels. We thought we saw some body reaching us Victuals and Drink; and putting out our hands to take it, and stretching our selves to overtake it when it seem'd to draw back, we tumbled off our Camels, and by a severe fall found it a Dream and Illusion. We underwent the same hardship all the 22^d and 23^d Days, mutually pitying one another's leanness and misery, and exhorting each other to Patience and Resignation.

On the 24th about Noon, our Mule-Treachery driver like a cunning and treacherous of the Rogue, leaving the Caravan, led us in ^{Mule-dri- vers.} among barren and sandy Mountains; where having rested our selves and our Camels, he most impudently demanded of us more Money than was his due, withal threatening that unless he had it he would leave us there to shift for our selves. Considering what danger we were in, we thought it advisable to let him have it rather than endure the effects of his fury. So after much wrangling we mounted our Camels, and under covert of Night returned to Alcanica, ready to faint for hunger and sleep. Thus we ended a Journey in five Days returning, which cost us eight going.

On the 25th Day, having not slept all that Night, but eat plentifully in the Morning, and hir'd us Mules, we went directly to Cairo.

C H A P. XXVIII.

They are again insolently treated at their return to Cairo. The Creature call'd Ziraphus. The Indian Ox. An injury done to a Saracen by a Mamaluck, to which is subjoin'd a short History of the Saracens and Mamalucks. Pyramids. The Creature call'd Muscus.

Return to Cairo.

Being arrived at Cairo, we were received in the same manner as we were sent off, by the Boys of the City, who pelted us again with their Dirt, Bricks and rotten Lemons. We got into Tongobardin's House, and were received with the greatest expressions of Joy by the Venetian Merchants, who had almost despair'd of our Return. They listen'd with the greatest attention to the Relations we gave them of the Places and Things we had seen; and after we had tir'd both our selves and them with our Stories, and it was now time to go to Bed, we parted and went to enjoy that sleep and repose which our wearied and spent Bodies did so vehemently long for.

Creature
Ziraphus.

On the 26th looking out at a Window we saw the Ziraphus, the tallest Creature that ever we beheld. Its Skin was all over white and brown, and its Neck was almost two Fathoms long. Its Head was a cubit long, and its Eyes looked brisk and lively; its Breast was upright, and its Back low; it could eat Bread or Fruits, or any thing else they reached to it. The same day we saw an Indian Ox, whose Body was shorter, but Head larger than that of our Oxen; his Horns were large not sharp pointed, but blunt and knotty.

Indian Ox.

We spent all the 27th and 28th Days (except what we bestow'd on recruiting our Spirits with sleep) upon reading the Holy Scriptures.

As we were walking along the Street on the 29th, we saw a Saracen crying bitterly, and thumping his Head and Breasts: and having the curiosity to enquire what the matter was with him, we were told that he had lately given a good Sum of Money for a House, and after he had been at great charge to finish and furnish it, a certain Mamaluck had violently dispossessed him of it, and beat him, only because he fancied the House; for so great is the Mamalucks Authority here,

Mama-

that they may punish or do with a Saracen what they please, and never be call'd in question: and therefore they had thrust him out of his House, and having possessed it, might live in it as long as they would. But the Saracens are not so much as allowed to ride on Horseback, nor bear Arms within the City, but are obliged to take all in good part from the Mamalucks as if they were their meanest Slaves, to give place to them, to pay reverence to them as they pass along, and even to kiss their Knees and Feet; and if it happen that any of 'em are allow'd to kiss a Mamaluck's Hand, he is to look on that as a singular favour: all which, no doubt, is a Punishment inflicted on them by the Divine Justice. For in former times the Saracens are said to have so much thirsted after Dominion over the Christians, that when they could not make Captives of them themselves, they bought them from other Nations who were at War with the Christians; and they no sooner had them in their possession, than they forced them to abjure their Religion, they made them draw their Ploughs, and undergo other such labour and toil; and if they happened to be engag'd in Battel, they used them for a defence and shelter against the attacks of the Enemy.

But these bought Slaves exercised abundance of Fortitude amidst all these hardships and disasters; and the more they were used to them, the more patiently they suffered, and the less they were inclin'd to sink under them: and no longer did they suffer this Yoke to ly on their Necks, than till they thought they had a sufficient number, and a Leader able enough to attempt to shake it off, and even to seize the Sovereignty it self. Now it happen'd on a time that the Egyptians being engaged in a foreign War, arm'd all these Slaves, and of them made up a considerable Army, able to make head against the Enemy. These reckon-matter, which they got clear off with. The place where we pitch'd had on one hand a Wood of Sycomore Trees, on the other a purling Rivulet, over which we had the prospect of a most delightful Country, which was just then yielding a plentiful second Crop.

On the 8th Day we stayed there for some time, waiting the coming of a great many more from several parts, to increase the number of our Caravan: Which being compleat, we immediately set out, there being near 400 Armed Men in the Company; notwithstanding which the Arabians seem'd as if they would attack is three times that Day, it being their daily Employment to plague that Country with their Robberies: but the Mamelucks on Horseback, and the Archers on Foot, so soon as they smelt any danger, did so dispose themselves on all hands, that we with the Goods and Baggage march'd on as fast as we could under their shelter. Baumgarten.

That Evening we came to a certain slimy and muddy Pool, of which both we and our Beasts were forced to drink; where we saw one of their pretended Saracen Saints, in a party-colour'd Coat, and a Straw-cap on his Head, carrying in his Hand a sort of a Red Banner with the Sultan's Arms on't, and flourishing it about to invite the Saracens to sing with him. The words of their Song were almost the same, and their Notes not very different; only when they began they drew them out long, but as they went on they still grew shorter and shorter. The Words I have inserted, as follows.

Salheyo. Cattia. They travel through the Desert; the great number of Dead Bodies there: how they had been killed. Admirald payson'd by the Sultan's Order. Salt pits near the Sea. The Mamelucks take their part against the Mule-drivers.

ON the 9th Day of November, moving from thence we came to a Village call'd Salheyo; close by which in a Garden, or rather a Grove, while we were resting our selves a little, the Inhabitants brought us Melons, Cucumbers, Dates, and some Bread and Pullets, which we bought of them at a small charge; and having fill'd our Bottles out of a neighbouring Puddle, we departed, and travelling all that Night, about the dawning we stopt and took some rest on a rising Ground.

On the 10th, after we had travel'd for some time through Hills of Sand, we came to a Town call'd Cattia, near to which, about a Date-tree Wood, we staid all Night; and tho we saw a great many Arabian Robbers, yet the sight of the Mamelucks so frightened them, that they durst not offer us any Violence.

The 11th Day and following Night we travel'd through deep Sand, and so loose that it yielded and slid back under our Feet; while in the mean time we could see nothing but the Heavens above, and Sand below; for nothing Green, no Tree, or the least shrub was within the reach of our sight.

On the 12th day about Sun-rising we came to a desolate and decay'd Cottage, where we stopt about two hours, and then went on in our Sandy Journey towards the Sea. Not far from this Cottage we saw above ten thousand Carcasses of Sheep, Goats, Asses, and other Creatures lying on the Ground, rotten and half consum'd; the noisom smell of which was so unsufferable, that we were obliged to make all the hast we could to get out of the reach of it. The occasion of their lying there was thus: Admirald, Admirald, one of the Sultan's Chief Ministers, having been sent into Judea to raise a Poll-tax, and finding it hard to get in the Money, had driven away the poor People's Cattle, with a design to carry them to Cairo, and present them to the Sultan; but as he was travelling through that Desert, where there was neither Water nor Pasture, he lost them all. The Sultan understanding this, and considering with

After we had got out of the reach of that stink, we came to a certain Bay, all along the Coast of which there were places where Salt was made. For when the Sea flow'd and covered the Neighbouring Ground that lay low, it filled the Ditches with Salt-water, which when it ebb'd, was turn'd into Salt by the violent heat of the Sun. These places turn'd to so great account to the Sultan, that as we were told, they yielded him a hundred thousand Seraphs a Year. Having travel'd all that Day, and till about Midnight, we arriv'd at a Village call'd Laritsch, where we rested our selves for some time; and then went on till we came to another Bay, where the Mamaluks who were our Guard commanded us to light off our Mules and pay them for their Attendance, for which they exacted a Seraph from every one of the Company. At last, after they had been paid by all the rest, they came to us; but we by our Interpreter refused, alledging that our Mule-driver ought to pay it, since we had made our Bargain with him so, and that we were to pay nothing out of our own Pockets on that account; and that we would confirm what we had said by his own Hand-writing. The Mamaluks seeing us in disorder, and perceiving that we understood not the Language, had compassion on us, and having surrounded the Mule-driver, demanded their Money of him; and when he was beginning to argue the matter with them, they stop't his discourse, and had well nigh fallen foul of him, if he had not been so wise as to perceive where it would end, and to untie the Ribbon that was about his Head, and (tho much against his will) give them the Piece of Gold they demanded.

They hire an Interpreter: Get themselves Saracen Habits. The Temple of Dagon, &c. Arrive at last at Hebron.

ON the 14th day about Sun-set we drew near to Gaza; and after we had for a long time rode close by it, at last we lighted at our Mule-driver's House, and staid there two days, and hir'd a Jew, whose name was David, to be our Interpreter; by whose Advice we bought us Saracen Habits, the cheapest and coarsest we could find, that in that dress we might the more freely go into, or come out of any place where we should have occasion to be. For hitherto we had only covered our Heads, and put a Girdle about us after the fashion of the Country; but our Clothes were of the Grecian Mode, and hardly reached so far as our Knees. But now we were habited like the Saracens every way, had our Heads poll'd after the same manner, and the same figure of Beards; so that we could freely go whither we would.

City Gaza or Gazera, was once a great and strong City, and one of the five principal ones in Palestine, and was call'd so by the Persians: That word in their Language signifies a Treasury, because when Cambyses King of Persia went into Egypt, he made this the Storehouse for all his Riches and Warlike Preparations. It is still a great City, and larger than Jerusalem, but not fortified; situated in a most fruitful Country, not far from the Sea, and environed with delightful Gardens full of Date, Pomegranat, and other fine Fruit-trees: within it are to be seen antient magnificent Buildings, some whereof are intire, others ruinous. There is to be seen the Temple of Dagon, but not above half of it standing; which Sampson (as we read Judg. 16.) taking hold of the two Pillars that supported it, pull'd down, and destroyed both himself and all that were in it: And these Pillars are still preserved there, to perpetuate the memory of the Action. It is plain by the Ruins of this Temple, that it was a very large one, strongly built of large hewed Stones. About a mile from this City towards Hebron, stands the Hill to which (as 'tis recorded in the forecited Chapter of Judges) Sampson by his incredible Strength, carried away the Gates and Bars of this City.

On the 17th about Noon, bending our Course towards Jerusalem, we came to a certain Village where we refreshed our selves and our Mules, because the Road we were next to travel was very bad and rugged. Departing from thence we travelled all night for fear of Robbers; and we had a very toilsom Journey, both because we were afraid of the Robbers, and because the Road was steep, rugged, full of Woods and Dens; which obliged us to halt in a little narrow Valley, and rest our selves and our Beasts who were almost fatigued to death.

On the 18th, travelling between the rugged and broken tops of the Hills, we saw very wholesom and pleasant Herbs, Baum- and fell a gathering of 'em, the smell being mighty refreshing. At length we got out of that narrow Track, and came into the common Road; and not long after arriv'd at a little Town situated on a Height, where they said the Land of Ju- deea began. Here we fill'd our Bottles with fresh Water, and bought us some softer Bread, and so went on in a very bad and stony Road, till we came at last to Hebron, where after a great deal of Intreaty, and the promise of a good Reward for our Entertainment, we were permitted to lodg in the House of a certain poor Widow.

C H A P. IV.

They visit the Wells of the Patriarchs. The Fields of Damascus. The Valley of Mamre. Injuries done by the Mamalucks. Nehelescol. Bethlehem.

ON the 19th day we went under the Conduct of the Jew who was our Interpreter, and a Saracen who was our Guard, to see those Places that are mentioned in the Scriptures. The first that offered themselves to our observation, were the 3 Fountains of these Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. After these the Fields of Damascus, where it is said, or at least guessed, Adam was made. That Field lies about a Bow-shot to the West of Hebron, and the Earth of it is reddish, and feels almost like Wax; so that the Saracens make little Balls of it, which they sell to the Christians to make their Prayer-Beads of. The Saracens also export great quantities of this Earth into Foreign Countries every Year, pretending that no noxious Creature can do those any harm who carry this about them; and that it preserves them from breaking their Bones, and all other sad Accidents. Moreover, as Josephus relates, Hebron is not only more antient than the other Citys of that Country, but even than Memphis in Egypt it self; but now it is liker a Village than a City, standing in that place where the Cave is, in which these Patriarchs and their Wives are bury'd.

Above this double Cave there was antiently a stately Church; for while the Christian Religion flourish'd there, it was a Cathedral, but is now degenerated into a Mosque. However the Infidels have a veneration for the Place, because that all those whom Age, or Poverty, or want of Health, will not allow to visit Mecca, where their pretended Prophet is buried, are allowed to come here, or to the Temple at Jerusalem; but neither Jew nor Christian must enter this Church. Not far from modern Hebron, on a little steep Hill, stands antient Hebron, or rather the Rubbish of it, in which David, as the Scriptures say, reigned seven Years, and where the Burial-place of his Father Jesse is still to be seen. About half a mile from old Hebron is the Valley of Mamre; where, as 'tis related Gen. 18. the Lord appeared to Abraham while he was sitting in the Door of his Tent; when he saw three, but paid worship only to one. When we were thinking to leave Hebron, there came a Mamaluck who was Governour of that Place, and violently took away both our Mules, and all the rest that he could find, to carry his Baggage to Damascus. After we sought up and down a long time for others, at last we found two, upon which we laid our things, and followed them on foot our selves: and we had a very troublesome Journey of it, by reason of the ruggedness of the Road, which was long and hilly, and no Earth on it to cover the bare and rough Stones. And yet (which is very strange) there is here and there among those bare Stones, some Olive, Fig, and Pomegranate Trees. We had not got far from the City when there comes a Mamaluck, and falls like Thunder

Baum-garten. der upon one of our Company who was riding on an Afs, and indisposed: He presently gets off, and offers him to the Mamaluck; but not being satisfied vvith the Afs, commands a Jew vvho vvvas riding on a Horse to dismount. The Jew delay'd it a little, and endeavour'd to prevail vvith him by fair vvords: But the Mamaluck enraged at his disobedience, falls a drubbing of him, and railing at him, and knock'd the poor old and feeble Jew off his Horse. Our Mule-drivers came about the Mamaluck, praying and intreating him to have pity on his Infirmary and old Age, and kiss'd both his Hands and his Feet, and the poor Jew did the like; and so trying the last Remedy, they greased his Fist, and sent him off satisfy'd. But the Jew had been so thresh'd and vvounded, that he had much ado to mount again vvith the help of another Man. After this vve put on in our Journey, and left Nebelescol, that is, the Neh Stream of Grapes, on our left; from whence (as 'tis recorded Numb. 13.) the Spies vvhom Moses sent out, cut off the Vine-branch vvith its Grapes, and brought it on two Mens shoulders to him, together vvith the Pomegranats and Figs of that Country. At last coming to Bethlehem, famous on the account of David and our Lord Jesus Christ, vve vvvere kindly received into the Franciscan Monastery, and entertain'd all that night as plentifully as their condition and manner of living vvould allow.

The antient Magnificence of the Church at Bethlehem, The Sultan's Sacrilege. They view many Monuments of Antiquity. They enter Jerusalem. Abraham Keeper of our Lord's Sepulcher.

ON the 20th, rising from our soft Mats, vve vvvent to see the Church dedicated to our Saviour, vvvhich vvwhile it stood in its Glory, had not its equal, I believe, in the World: It vvvas built of the choicest white Marble, vvonderfully adorned, and curiously supported by two and twenty Pillars in two rows; and the Statuaries had displayed their utmost skill to beautify and adorn it. One may see by the Ruins of it, that it had formerly forty of these Pillars. Moreover, between the Chapters of the Pillars and the Roof, there are to be seen the Histories of the Holy Scripture in beautiful pieces of finest Painting, and set off with such curious pieces of rarest Marble, as nothing can be imagin'd beyond them, or any price great enough for them. Their smoothness and brightness did not yield to those of the best polish'd Mirror; insomuch that some Years ago the Sultan being charm'd with the fineness of 'em, did sacrilegiously carry a great many of 'em to Cairo to adorn his Palace. Here they show'd us whatever was rare and remarkable, as the Place where our Saviour vvvas born, in vvvhich there vvvas a Chappel built in honour of him; the place where the Manger stood, and the wise Men offered their Gifts; the Table on which the Circumcision was perform'd, and other such-like. Having viewed all these, we begg'd the two Friers vvould give us the favour of their company to Jerusalem; and by the way our fellow Travellers show'd us the Cistern of Bethlehem spoken of 2 Kings 23. the Sepulchre of Rachel, the ruinous Tower of the Flock of Galeed, the Houses of Elias and Habakkuk, and of Simeon, near to which we began to have sight of Jerusalem. We no sooner saw it, than we offered up our hearty Thanks to that Immortal Being, who, through so many Dangers by Sea and Land, had protected us and brought us there in health of Body, and soundness of Mind.

So we went up to the Holy Jerusalem by the Valley of Enno, which is between Gyo and Mount Sion; and were carried by the Franciscans into the Monastery of the Minorites that stands on Mount-Sion, and were kindly received, and plentifully refreshed in a place that was appointed for us.

That same day towards Evening, Abraham, the Keeper of our Lord's Sepulcher, understanding there were Strangers come, came to us and talk'd with us, and told us the time we were to see the Holy Sepulcher, and what the Fees were. Neither the Sultan's, nor Tongobardin's Letters signified any thing to us then, tho we had paid eight Seraphs for them in Cairo; and tho the Governor of Jerusalem had received and kiss'd them with a profound Reverence, and laid them them on his Head and read them: We must have recourse to our Money, we must use that Interest, and that must support and protect us. For twenty Seraphs therefore we bought a liberty of going into the Temple, and the Holy Sepulcher, which we intended to do next Morning.

CHAP. VI.

They visit the Holy Sepulcher: View the Monuments of Antiquity. Description of the Sepulcher.

ON the 21st day of November about Sun-rising, we went into the Holy Sepulcher, accompanied by almost all the Monks of Mount-Sion. Coming to the Door of the Church, we found Abraham and a great number of Saracens sitting there, and waiting our coming. After he had taken a Note of all our Names particularly, he set open the Doors of the Church, which we had no sooner entered than he immediately shut them without. All the Monks being arrayed in Habits of divers colours, had each of 'em a Torch put into his hand, and began to sing; and after the singing was done, one of 'em came to us, and began to show and explain the holy Places. First that of Christ's appearing after his Resurrection; next, Mount-Calvary, where he was crucified; the Chaps of the Earth caused by the Earthquake at his Passion; a part of the Pillar where he was scourg'd, inclosed within Rails: Chapels built to preserve the Memory of a great many things; and particularly in that which he showed us in Golgotha, was this Epitaph on King Baldwin.

Rex Balduinus Judas alter Machabæus,

Quem formidabant, cui dona tributa ferebant

Cedar, Egyptus, Dan & homicida Damascus,

Proh dolor! exiguo hoc ossa tegit ecce Sepulchro.

At last we came to the Chappel of the Holy Sepulcher, into which we entered at a little low Door not above two Cubits high; the place it self not open above, but on the South side where the Body was brought in, and continually enlighthned with 38 Lamps. The Figure of the Sepulcher without is square; at the corners of which there are six Pillars, so high that they support a sort of a Cover that's above the Roof of the Chappel; above which there's a little Room, with two rows of Pillars, six in number, and three Cubits in measure. Above these Pillars there is a little gilded Arch resembling a Globe. The Church, in the middle of which the Chappel of the Sepulcher stands, is open above, so wide as the Chappel is large, so that the Holy Sepulcher may in a manner be said to be in the open Air. There we staid all Night, offering up our devout Prayers to God Almighty.

CHAP. VII.

Several Monuments of Antiquity without the City.

ON the 22^d of November about Sun-rising came Abraham, accompanied with a great number of Mamalucks and Saracens, and opened the door, and bid us come out. We obeyed his Order, and went to the Monastery in Mount-Sion where we refreshed our selves: After which we went out without the City to see the Churches and Chappels that were dedicated to several Saints, or built to perpetuate the Memory of some notable Action. Under the Walls of the City and the Temple we came to the Brook Cedron, which runs through the middle of the Valley of Josaphat, and in the Summer time is dry, but in the Spring and Lent-time is level with its Banks. Over this Brook there is an arched Stone-bridge built by Helena; and on the other side of it, near the Road that leads to Bethany, is the Sepulcher of Josaphat King of Juda, from whom the Valley as well as Josaphat has its Name. The Sepulcher is hewed out of a solid Rock, and has a Pyramid atop of it. Hard by it is the Sepulcher of the Prophet Zachariah, a large piece of Work, and cut out of the solid Rock also. We viewed also the Sepulcher

Baumgarten. cher of Abfalom, the Son of David; at which, because he impiously rebelled against his Father, Travellers, even the Saracens and Mamalucks, throw Stones, curling both it, and the Person that lies buried in it; and you may see there a great heap of such Stones. From thence we went and saw Gethsemane, the place where our Saviour in great affection prayed, was taken, and bound. After that we went to visit the Church of the Blessed Virgin, that stands almost in the middle of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and to which we went down by 38 steps. In the middle of the Church stands her Sepulcher made of white Marble: It is larger than that of our Lord, and has two Doors opposite to one another, and her Body is said to lie here. From thence we went up to Mount-Olivet, which is directly opposite to Solomon's Temple towards the East. From the top of it there is a vast Prospect towards the Dead-Sea, Arabia, the Mountains Abarim, Nebo, Pisga, and several other places.

Coming down that side that looks to the Dead-Sea, we visited Bethphage; in which place the Guardian uses to come from Moun-Sion, accompanied with the Brethren on Asses, every Palm-Sunday; and in this manner enter Jerusalem, in memory of what Christ did there; the Saracens in the mean while laughing and making a sport of it.

We came next to Bethany, antiently a place of Strength, but now a forry Village, about three miles from Jerusalem, where Lazarus's Tomb is still to be seen, which is in great veneration with the Saracens; and on the top of it there is a Banner hangs, with Saracen Letters and Figures painted on it.

Not far from hence they show'd us Simeon the Leper's House, which by its Ruins seems to have been a large Pile of Building. It was built all of hewed Stone, and very strong, and was encompassed with a wide and deep Ditch.

As we were returning to Jerusalem, we stept aside a little to see the Trunk of a Tree, on which, as they say, the Traitor Judas hang'd himself. A little way from thence to the left hand is his House, which the Jews have been careful to fence and build a Wall about, for fear the Christians should offer any violence to it; and hard by it is a burial-place of the Jews: and good reason that Fowls of the same kind should flock together.

Towards Evening we return'd to the Monastery, where we rested and refreshed our selves.

C H A P. VIII.

Relation of several Monuments of Antiquity. A strange way of Bird-catching. Story of a certain Maronite. An Apostate Franciscan.

ON the 23d day we went out again to see the Places mentioned in Holy Scripture; and first as we were going down towards the South, we came to the Pool of Siloah, where Christ restor'd Sight to the blind Man, as we read Joh. 9. Near to this is the Well of that name, where pure and clear Water is incessantly boiling up. Above this, about the middle of the Hill, is the piece of ground call'd Aceldama, which was bought with the Mony that Judas sold his Master for: The Empress Helena built a high Wall about it, and covered it above, leaving only nine Holes through which the Light might come in, and dead Bodys might be let down; it is 73 foot long, and 50 broad. A little to the East from hence we entered certain large Caves, where they say the Apostles hid themselves during our Saviour's Passion. There we had occasion to see a way of catching Birds which we had never seen before, for they did not catch them with a Bait as they do with us, but with Water pour'd out upon a Rock; for this is a very dry Country, and the poor Birds when they are flying in the Air, ready to drop down for thirst, seeing the Water shine so clear by the bright Beams of the Sun, fly straight down to it, and before they are aware are caught fast in the Gins. By that time we had seen this Sport it was time to eat something, and so we went to Sion and din'd; and after dinner went to the Gate of the Temple that is call'd Beautiful, where Peter, as we read Act. 3, cured the Man that had been lame from his Mother's Womb. Afterwards having a mind to view Solomon's Temple more narrowly, we were violently hindered by the threatening Saracens, and pushed back again after we were half up the stairs of that Gate. As much as we could observe, both here and from other places, this Temple is not very large, large, it being not half so big as the ancient and true Temple was. As to its figure, it has twelve Sides; it is covered with Lead, and above the middle of its Roof there is a round Dome, on the top of which there is a Crescent; which Sign the Saracens usually place, either at the Doors or on the top of their Mosques; and within it, as we were told, there are two thousand Lamps constantly burning. There is a large Square about this Temple, about a Bowshot broad, all laid with white Marble, which gives a great deal of splendour and magnificence to the Temple; for it reflects the Rays of the Sun so bright and thick, that the Beholders can no more look on it than they can on the Sun it self; and the whiteness, smoothness and cleanness of it, contribute much to that. This Temple is in so great veneration among the Saracens, that the Sultan does not think it beneath him to stile himself the High Priest and Protector of it, and they call it the Holy Sanctuary. It was first built by Solomon in Mount Moria, but was afterwards several times destroyed by the Calamities of War, and again rebuilt through the pious Disposition of several Kings, and the Liberality of the People; but now neither Jew nor Christian must set their Foot within it. If any of these is catch'd in it, he must presently either abjure his Religion, or be cut asunder in the middle; which, as we were told, was the hard Fate of a poor Christian, of the Sect of the Maronites, about half a Year before. He had gone in to view the Temple in the Habit of a Saracen, but was unhappily discovered to be a Christian; and being threatned with present Death, turn'd Mabometan: but not long after, his Conscience checking him for what he had done, he immediately recanted. Upon which he was brought before the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, and cut in two in the middle. For all this he lived three hours, arguing for the Excellency of the Christian Religion, and exposing the Folly and Superstition of the Saracens, and at last gave up his Spirit to him for whose sake he had suffered.

About that time a certain Monk of the Society of Franciscans that lived in Mount Sion, deluded some way or other by the Wiles of the Devil, voluntarily abjur'd his Religion. We had seen him before this time in Cairo, passing for a Mamaluck, and talk'd with him about Apostacy, but could not prevail with him. Near to this Temple, towards Mount Sion, there is a long and high-roof'd Church covered with Lead, which sometime had been call'd Solomon's Porch or Gallery, or the House of the Forest of Libanus, because Solomon used to discourse and give Judgment in it, and because it was built of Timber brought from the Forest of Libanus. While the Christians were Masters of Jerusalem, it was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; and they say now there are eight hundred Lamps constantly burning in it, and it is now much larger than the Temple of Solomon. We were credibly informed by one who accompanied us as far as Damascus, that within the Precinct of this Temple and Solomon's, there were magnificent and costly Buildings, so large, that several thousands of Men might be conveniently lodg'd within them; and a great number of Pillars, disposed in a wonderful order, so that both these Temples with their Courts stood upon them. Next we saw, for the payment of a little Money, the Houses of Pilat and Herod; the latter of which still retains its regularity, and is built of Marble of several Colours; but the Saracens have made a Stable of the other. After this we went to the Monastery to refresh and rest our selves all night.

CHAP. IX.

They enter the Temple the second time. The several Sects that are in it. Their Religions and Customs.

ON the 24th day about Sun-set, we carried certain Monks along with us, and entered the Church the second time, visiting all the Places that had been formerly described to us. In the Quire of the Greeks they show'd us a place, over which there was a Stone about a Cubit broad, which they said was the Center of the habitable Earth; alluding in a literal sense to that saying of David, Psal. 74. God is our King for ever; he hath wrought Salvation in the midst of the Earth.

We staid there full three days, that we might thoroughly learn the Structure and Form of the Temple, and every thing in it,

Baumgarten. it, and inform our selves of the several sorts of Christians that were in it, and of their different Constitutions and Customs. It is very well worth ones while to observe the great variety of Sects that are in this Temple, to hear so many different Languages, Voices, Musick; to see how they differ in their Rites and Ceremonies, their Habits and Manners; and yet to see them, however differing in other things, all believe in, praise, and acknowledg the same Lord Jesus Christ. Among all this variety of Sects, the principal of them are the Latins and Franciscans. Secondly, The Greeks. Thirdly, The Syrians. Fourthly, The Georgites. Fifthly, The Jacobites. Sixthly, The Indians or Abassins; And, Seventhly, The Armenians. Of every one of whom we shall speak briefly.

The Franciscans, who call themselves also Minorites, are appointed by their Superiors, and sent into the Holy City, but not before they have been three Years in Crete; and if any of them happens to die, another is sent into his room. They have their Food and Raiment through the Bounty and Charity of Strangers that come there, but they owe most to the Liberality of the Venetians. It is said, that every Vessel bearing Sail, that comes into the Port of Candy, pays a Ducat of Gold; and this Sum (which is certainly very great) the Venetians pay to the Friars that live there, who remit it to those of their Order at Jerusalem, either in Money or by Bill, or in such things as they stand in need of; and many other great Men are very liberal in their Gifts to them. While we were there, Lewis King of France sent them five hundred Ducats, by one who travelled with us. They have a Monastery at Jerusalem in Mount Sion, in which for the most part twenty of them live: And hard by these there is a little Monastery where five or six of their Order live Monks, and are maintain'd by the Provisors of the Monastery of Sion. In Bethlehem they have a Monastery, in which there are five Friars, whose business is to keep the Manger. Besides these, in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher they have two, one a Priest, the other a Laick, who are sent every month to attend there, and are chang'd in their turns; and their business is to guard the Sepulcher, to keep it clean, and to look after the Lamps.

They have under their care several Chapels and Altars, in Mount Calvary, in the Valley of Jeboshaphat, and Bethany; all which they look after with the greatest Care, and at a vast Charge. They are obliged to perform their Masses and their other Offices before day-light for fear of the Saracens; and all the rest of the day they wander up and down, sometimes to the Holy Sepulcher, sometimes to Mount Olivet, or to the Valley of Jeboshaphat, or to Bethany; sometimes to Bethlehem, or the hilly Country of Judea, the Desert of John, &c. and are very often oppress'd, sometimes by the Saracens, sometimes by the Jews, and oftentimes even by Christians. For besides that they are obliged to give the Saracens a good share of their Provisions whensoever they ask it, and to pay a yearly Tribute to the Governor of Jerusalem, they pay also to the Sultan himself, as we were told, a thousand Ducats. And yet for all this they are every hour, nay every moment in danger of their Lives. They show great Humanity and Hospitality to Strangers; they give them their Advice, they faithfully tell them what they ought to do, and what they ought to avoid and forbear, but still the holy Penny must not be forgot.

The Greeks are of the Primitive Church, rather Enemies than Subject to the See of Rome, and have no regard to the Pope or his Ecclesiastical Censures. Their Clergy-men marry; they wear long Beards, and till one has a Beard he can't be a Priest. They never abstain from Flesh on Saturday, except on Easter-Eve, and then they fast. They take the Communion in Leavened-bread, and do not mix the Wine with Water. They pay no respect to the Sacrament that's consecrated by the Franciscans; nor will they suffer them to celebrate it in those places where they are concerned, no more than if they were excommunicated; and if that should at any time happen upon an extraordinary occasion, they presently wash it as if it was polluted by their Sacrifice. Among all the Eastern Christians they hate those most who live in subjection to the Pope, and in a common Proverb call them Latin Dogs. They have a Quire in the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, where they perform Divine Service after their own manner. They have also a place in Calvary where our Lord was crucified; and without the Church a little Chappel dedicated to All Angels, all which they carefully watch and illuminate with Lamps.

The Syrians are those who live in the Province of Syria, under the miserable Yoke of the Saracens, and are a cowardly, light, and treacherous sort of People.

people. They inform against the Christians to the Saracens, and live much after the manner of the latter, but their Doctrine and Ceremonies are the same with those of the Greeks. In the Church of the Holy Sepulcher they have the Chappel of S. Helena. In their private Affairs they use the Saracen Language, but the Greek in their Divine Service.

The Georgians are a People of the East, a very stout and warlike Nations, so called from one George a Saint, whom they own as their Patron and Protector, paying him most profound Reverence. They say, their Dominions reach as far as the Caspian Mountains. This People, tho encompassed round with Saracens, stand in awe of none, but are dreaded by their Neighbours; and as often as they have a mind to go to Jerusalem, they always march in order of Battel, with flying Colours, paying no Toll or Tribute, and so enter the City. The Women of Quality do use and wear Arms after the manner of the Amazons. They agree with the Greek Church in all the material Points of Faith. The Men never cut their Hair off, nor shave their Beards. Their Clergy wear round Caps, the Laicks four-square ones. In the Temple they have a Chappel of the Invention of the Holy Cross; and they have the same too upon Mount Calvary, and in several other places. They say Mass in the Greek Tongue, but in all other Affairs they speak the Language of the Saracens.

The Jacobines are a People of Asia, a great part whereof they do inhabit, but a far greater Portion of Ethiopia, as far as the upper India, insomuch that they are said to have in their possession 40 Kingdoms. They were first converted to the Christian Faith by St. Matthew the Apostle, afterwards reduced into Error by one Jacob an Arch-Heretick, of whom they took their Name. They have Crosses in their Foreheads burnt with a hot Iron, for the love (as they say) they bear to the Cross, and also to distinguish them from Saracens. They confess their Sins to God only, and that secretly, for their custom is to burn Frankincense; and saying their Prayers, they believe their Petitions ascend to Heaven as the Smoke does, and by that means they shall be purged from the guilt of their Sins. They administer the Sacrament to sucking Children, and circumcise them after the manner of the Saracens. They have a Chappel in the Temple near the Sepulcher of our Saviour, and the place where Christ's Body was embalmed after he was let down from the Cross. They speak a Language of their own.

The Indians or Abassins, are a People under the Government of that powerful and great Monarch, whom we call Prefter-John. This Nation was converted to Christianity by the Apostle St. Thomas. The Indians of this Country are very black, resembling much the Ethiopians. They go frequently on Pilgrimages to visit the Holy Places. Both Men and Women have their Heads cover'd with Blue. They wear colour'd Clothes, and strip'd. In their Behaviour they are very humble, and go bare-foot. They circumcise their Children, and with a hot Iron imprint the Sign of the Cross on their Foreheads, and sometimes on their Noses or Cheeks, believing that this fiery Baptism doth expiate Original Sin. They administer the Sacrament in both kinds, as well to Children as to those of riper Age. On their Festival Solemnities (namely Easter) both Men and Women meet together, and with wild and ridiculous Songs and Noise spend whole Nights. They begin their dancing with clapping of hands, and many together dance round in a ring; and so violent and excessively transported are they on these occasions, that some of them drop down dead upon the spot, and many get an incurable Lameness by it frequently. They have their Chappel too in the Temple, and here and there an Altar. They use the Letters, and speak the Language of their own Country, but understand the Language of the Saracens too.

The Armenians come out of the Country of Armenia, whence they have their Name. They have a Bishop whom they stile Catholick, to whom they yield strict Obedience and profound Reverence; they are Enemies to the Grecians. They observe Lent, but keep it more strictly than do those of the Church of Rome; for they do not only abstain from Flesh all the time, but also from Eggs, Cheese, Milk, Oil, Fish and Wine. To support Nature, they eat Fruit, Spoonmeat or Gruel, and that no oftner than necessity urges them to it.

They have commonly a Bishop at Jerusalem, who wears two Locks of his Hair dangling down over his Shoulders, the rest of his Head is shaved. Their Habitation is in the upper part of the Temple near that of the Indians; and, as they say, they had once Mount Calvary, but the King of the Georgians gave the Sultan so many rich Gifts, that he deprived the Armenians of Mount Calvary, and gave it to the Georgians. They have also the noble and stately Church of St. James Major, built in the very same place where the Blessed Apostle was beheaded by Herod.

All the Laymen among the Armenians cut their Hair in the form of a Cross. They speak the Language of their own Country, and write with their own Letters too.

Other Monuments of Antiquity, and concerning the Situation and Name of Bethlehem.

ON the 28th day in the Morning we went out of the Temple, and walked to Mount Sion to refresh ourselves; which when we had done, we march'd on with the Monks our Guides to the Mountains of Judea: and having seen the Desert of John Baptist, we entered a Cave to quench our Thirst with the Water of a very clear Spring which bubbled up at the very mouth of the Cave. This Cave is in a hollow Rock; 'tis a hard matter to determine whether 'tis artificial or natural, having one of the finest Prospects in the World towards the Hills and Valleys round about it. From this place we went Southward, where we encountred with a very high and steep Mountain; which when we had conquered, we marched down the Hill next to the Well where Philip baptized the Eunuch of Candace Queen of the Aethiopians, as 'tis in the 8th Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. At this place upon a high Hill may be seen the Ruins of the City Ziklag, which King Abish gave David to dwell in when he fled to him, 1 Sam. 27. Then we arriv'd at an Olive yard, above which, to the right hand, we saw the Village Bezech, formerly a Castle, here grew the best Wines in all that Country. Here it was, as it is recorded Judg. 1. that Jebuda General of the Israelites slew ten thousand Men, and took King Adonibezec Prisoner, and ordered his Fingers and Toes to be cut off. This Adonibezec had under his Table seventy Kings, whose Fingers and Toes he made to be cut off, and forced them to gather up the Scraps and Crums that fell from his Table.

From hence, the Sun wearing low, we made the bell of our way to Bethlehem, where we arrived just as it grew dark; we staid there all that Night with our fore-said Guides. This was the City of David of old, now 'tis a small inconsiderable Village, six miles from Jerusalem, on the south-side of it, by the way which leads into Hebron. It is situated on a high but narrow Hill, lying in length from East to West, and having its entrance on the East part: This was antiently called Effrata, but after, for the great plenty of Corn in it, called Bethlehem, i. e. the House of Bread. But according to the propriety of the Saracen Language it is called the House of Flesh; for Beth with them signifies House, and Lehem Flesh: And this not without reason, because here the Word was made Flesh. From hence on the last day of November, we returned to Jerusalem.

Climbing up the Mountain Quarentana. Jericho, its Fruitfulness, Situation, and Extent.

THE first day of December we staid in the Monastery to furnish our selves with some Necessaries. But the next Morning, having risen two hours before Sun-rising, we marched towards Jordan. A Saracen young Man, with one Servant, was both a Guide and Guard to us. The first place we came to was Bethany; and having passed it, we came next to a Fountain, called The Fountain of the Sun. Having there watered our Mules, we went on on our Journey eight miles farther, until we came to the Ruins of Adymon, which was on the Confines of Juda and Benjamin. Having afterwards taken some refreshment at the Fountain of Elisba, and tied our Mules to the Trees, we marched up the Mountain

Quarentana. The Sun shone extremely hot, and annoyed us very much as we strove to get up. For so it was, that when we crept upon the small stones that lay loose and scattered up and down in heaps before we could arrive at any place to fix upon, down we tumbled, stones and all. With many such falls there was scarce any part of our Bodies but was mauled most miserably with the roughness of the stones. But because we thought it dishonourable to be defeated by this Mountain, after we had master'd Horeb and Sinai, higher and more inaccessible Mountains by far than this, we pluck'd up our courage, and went on resolutely till we had gain'd the middle of the Mountain; and here the remaining part appearing still more steep and unconquerable, sixteen of the Monks that were our fellow Travellers deserted us. Three of the lustiest of them stuck to us, the rest going back to the Mules were fain to stay till we returned. And so six of us by the help of God, with much ado, at last got up to the top of the Mountain; and there being entertained with a fine cool Air, we were much refreshed and comforted. On this Mountain they say it was that our Saviour fasted, and was tempted of Satan. From hence we saw the Ruins of a great many Cities and Places; particularly Galgala towards the East, where the Children of Israel pitched their Tents, and were circumcised after they passed the River Jordan, Josh. 5. We saw likewise the Ruins of Hay and Bethel, and of other Cities. And then when we had descended, or rather tumbled down from this Mountain Quarentana, we came to our Company. Having taken some refreshment we went on to Jericho, through places where grew sundry sorts of Trees, some whereof were full of ripe Fruit: some of our Company taken with their beauty, pluck'd a few of them, and found nothing in them but dry Ashes, and a sort of wet or moist Embers. We saw in that place, how strangely Nature seems to act contrary to her own self; for here one might see Trees laden with ripe Fruit, there other Trees just beginning to blossom only, in another place you might see other Trees with the Blossoms fallen off and budding. From one end of this pleasant Forest to the other, the Fountain of Helisæus gently gliding under the Trees, affords nourishment to all that the Earth produces, and the Clemency of the Air doth cherish them. After this we came straight to Jericho, and being received into the House of Zacheus, there we staid all Night. This is the only Baum-House that's left of that once great and famous City; it's built square of hewn Stone, having on every corner a small Turret, without e'er a roof to keep out Sun or Rain. There are round about, about a dozen of small Cottages, if I may properly call 'em so; for nothing of building is to be seen in them, being only fenced in with tall Hedges of Thorns, having within a large place for Cattel to stand and be shut up in. But in the middle they have Huts or Tents where Men use to shelter themselves and Goods from the inclemency of the Sun and Rain.

Jericho is situated in the middle of a Situation great Valley lying towards the Dead-Sea, of Jericho: first overthrown by Joshua; in the room of which he built another, Oza of Bethel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, which our Saviour honoured with his Preaching there. But this too, at the time the Romans besieged Jerusalem, through the treachery of some of its Inhabitants, was taken and destroyed. Instead whereof a third also was rebuilt, but that too was quite destroyed, and scarce a Memorial of it left at this day. It stood very pleasantly in the middle of a Plain, which lies between the Mountains Northward, and the Dead-Sea on the South part. This Plain (as Josephus witnesseth in his 5th Book of the Jewish War, cap. 8.) is 230 Furlongs in length, and in breadth 100 Furlongs, and the River Jordan divides it in the middle. It was famous of old for having the greatest number of best planted Gardens in the whole World; for the Palm-trees that grew there, produced many and several sorts of Fruit, which trodden or prest yielded abundance of Honey, not much inferior to real Honey; tho it self too was the great Nursery and store-place of Honey. It was very fruitful too of Balm once, which of all Fruits is the most precious and valuable. Hence it was that Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, relying upon the Power and Friendship of Mark Anthony, in contempt of mighty Herod transplanted an Orchard of Palm-trees to Cair. Josephus doth so highly extol this Country, that he sticks not to justify him who called this place the Plain of God, because here grew the best of things, and in greatest plenty too. And so prodigious is the encrease it yields of all other sorts of Fruits, that no place in the Universe is comparable to it; and such is the clemency of the Air here, that when it snows in the rest of Judea, the Inhabitants of this place

Land of Sodom.

ON the 3d Day, having followed our Guide, we arrived at the Dead-Sea. In our Journey thither we had a view of that frightful and horrid place, where God did so signally pour down his vengeance upon the Sodomites. The Land lying round about is full of Pits, covered over with Ashes that seem newly cast up there: It scarcely ever produceth any thing Green, but ever looks Black, and as it were scorch'd and blasted with Lightning. It is full of Pits and Holes, into which our Mules stumbling, and throwing us upon the Ground, gave us occasion sometimes of Laughing, and sometimes of compassionating the poor Creatures. It had rain'd for a long time when we were there, and by this means the Earth was grown soft and spongy, so that if any chanc'd to fall, the Ground giving way, immediately receiv'd, and as it were hug'd him in its bosom, being covered above with the clammy tough Earth; one had much ado to get up again. Shortly after we came to the Dead Sea; and there having secured our Mules by fastning them to some Bushes that grew there, we advanced to the Shore. The suffocating Stink, the Melancholy and Hellish Aspect of this place, the Shore full of Reeds and rotten Trees, the unwholesom Saltness and binding quality of the Water, which is bitter as Gall, represented to our Eyes the dreadful Vengeance of an offended and angry God.

Dead Sea.

The Clouds and Fogs that continually hang over it, hindred us from having a fuller view of this Poisonous Lake. He that would have a larger account of it, may consult Josephus, lib. 1. of the Jewish War, cap. 8. or Strabo in the 16th Book of his Geography.

Segor.

Near the Dead Sea to the right hand of it lies the City Segor, a desolate and melancholy place like the rest. This is it that Lot prayed for, Gen. 19. and into which he entred as the Sun went down. Here also, not far from the Town, is to be seen to this day, the Pillar of Salt, into which Lot's Wife was turned for her Disobedience, and not regarding the Threatning of the Almighty, as Moses witnesseth in the place aforesaid.

After this, leaving behind us the Ruins of the Monastery of St. Hierom, where they say this Great Man lived, we came strait to the Streams of Jordan, and to the place where our Saviour is said to have been baptized of John; and not far from this is the place where the Children of Israel passed over upon dry Ground. In our passage we drank of the Water, sprinkling our Faces, Hands, Head and Feet with it, and carry'd with us some of it in a Vessel to our own Country without being corrupted.

Besides other Encomiums of this River, it is remarkable for having been of old the Boundary that separated the Faithful Jews from Infidels; after many windings and turnings, it falleth into the Dead-Sea near Jericho, and there endeth. Concerning the Origin of it, the common opinion is, that it arises under Mount Libanus, from two Fountains, one called Jor, and the other Dan. Josephus will have it otherwise in his Book of the Wars of the Jews, lib. 3. cap. 30. whom, if you please, you may consult. 'Tis renowned for Miracles: Here Naaman the Syrian wash'd off his Leprosy: Iron swam, and won'd not sink here: To Elias and Elisba it afforded a Miracle in Testimony of their being Prophets sent of God. It is most especially renowned, to conclude, for the most evident manifestation of the Sacred and Undivided Trinity in the Baptism of our Saviour Christ, Luk. 3. And so much of Jordan.

IN the mean while the time drew near to visit the Temple of the Holy Sepulcher a third time. And therefore coming to Jerusalem, we went to Abraham to claim our Right; for when we gave him the twenty Seraphs, 'twas on condition we should have the liberty of seeing it once more. He denied it, and put us off till another time. When that time was come, he again would put us off longer. We were resolv'd to bear with him no longer, and told him we would complain of him to the Governour. When he found us to be in earnest with him, he swore by his Head (the usual Oath of his Country) that if we would but give him one Seraph more, he would not stop us one moment longer. We would not stand with him, and so we entred the Temple a third time; yea, and the 4th and 5th time too, which is not customary for Strangers, paying Abraham no more than three Maydins a Head. A certain Italian Merchant had made a Journey from Damascus to visit the Holy Land, Abraham had choud'd this same Spark of a round Sum; we came to the Door with him twice, and having twice paid our Fees we were let in. We viewed all the places we mention'd before severally, and so prepared in eight days time to be gone. We had hired a Mule-driver to carry us and our Goods to Damascus; but because his Mules were not yet come back, that he had sent to Baruthus, we were obliged to tarry some days longer.

On the 20th of December, the Governour of Jerusalem, who is the Sultan's Vicegerent there, had apprehended 28 Robbers who had been very troublesome to that Country with their depredations. He entred Jerusalem in Triumph, causing the Heads of the Robbers to be carry'd before him fixed on the Points of long Pikes.

On the 21st we came to Emmaus, a Saracen being our Guide; we saw nothing here remarkable but Rubbish, and Caves full of Bats.

On the 24th day, being Christmas Eve, the Mules being still at Baruthus, we went to Bethlehem in company of our Monks, and were present at the Vespers of the Friars, giving our humble and hearty Thanks to the Lord, who by his Birth had freed us from the power of the Devil. In the mean time we were surprized with a strange tuneless and tumultuous noise and shouting, the noise of Trumpets, and loud Singing and Howling in a distracted and frightful manner; which was raised it seems by the Grecians, Syrians, Georgians, Armenians, Indians, and the other Sectaries of the Eastern Christians, before mentioned: Every Nation praising God in their own manner, some with Hymns and Songs, others with sounding of Trumpets, and playing on Cymbals; some adoring, with Frankincense, Ointments, costly and odoriferous Spices, do anoint the Holy Places, and feel them with their hands, and kiss them. Moreover the Women too, in an Apartment by themselves, dance round in a Ring to the Timbrel; and with clapping their hands, and wheeling about from one part of the Temple to another, do violently straim their Bodies. Some of the Ladies far exceeded the rest both in Beauty and Dress; these having a Timbrel in their hands, brought to our remembrance the Sister of Aaron, Exod. 15. and what she did with the Daughters of Israel, when Pharoah was drowned.

On Christmas-day we saw there the Grecians and Syrians baptizing their Children, not new-born Infants as is customary with us, but Children of one and two Years old, keeping them on purpose till this Festival. Having here refreshed our selves, we returned to Jerusalem. And here having from the time we first entered, tarried above a Month, we frequently surveyed the Situation of it, and informed our selves, as far as Money or fair Words could prevail, of all the Particularities of it. On the Rainy Days we spent the time in reading and searching the Library of the Monastery. Having had all these Opportunities, I thought it would not be much amiss to give some account of the Situation, present State, and various Fortune of this Renowned City.

C H A P. XIV.

An Historical Description of the City Jerusalem, and of the Temple.

Jerusalem therefore being the most Noble and Renowned City of the East, of which so Glorious Things are said in the Scripture, and the Metropolis of the Jews; according to Josephus in his Book of the Jewish War, lib. 7. c. 26. was first built by the most potent of the Canaanites, who in his own Language was stiled the Just King; and so he was indeed, and called Melchisedec, the Priest of the High God. He was the first that perform'd the Office of a Priest to God, and built here a Temple, and called the City Solma, which before was called Jebus, afterward Salem; after this it was called Jerusalem, Bethel and Luz; and lastly Helia. Hence these Verses:

Its Names. Solyma, Luz, Bethel, Hierosolyma, Jebus, (Helia, Urbs Sacra Jerusalem dicitur, atque Salem.

ons. This City for the space of 515 Years, until David's time, was inhabited by the Canaanites; its Situation was upon a Rock, and it was surrounded or fortified with three Walls, except where it was environed with steep and difficult Ascents, for there it was encompassed but with one Wall. This City, as Strabo truly relates, abounded with Water on the Inside, and without was encompassed with a dry Ditch cut out of the same Rock forty Foot deep, and 250 Foot broad. It was built upon two Hills, facing one another, and separated by a Valley (which the Kings of Judah were at a great deal of cost and pains to fill up). One of the Hills, on which was seated the Upper City, was much higher and evener than the other, and called David's Tower. The other Hill, on which stood the Lower City, was steep on all sides, and reached as far as the Pool of Siloam. The oldest of the three Walls was impregnable, because of the Valleys and the Hills that overlook'd them. And it was for this reason, and because of the natural Strength of the Place, that David, Solomon, and several other Kings were at vast expences and charge to fortify it, and make it impregnable. The whole Circumference of the City was Prephinos; for from the top of this Tower, which was built seventy Cubits high, when the Sun was up, one might have a full Prospect of Arabia, even to the Sea, and the utmost Confines of the Hebrews. It was Octangular: opposite to it stood the Tower Tpicos, and hard by two more, which King Herod built on the Old Wall, and which for Beauty, Largeness and Strength, were not to be parallel'd by any in the whole World. The Largeness of the Stones was prodigious. For they were not built of common Stone, or such as Men could carry, but of polished white Marble, each Stone being in length twenty Cubits, and in breadth fifteen, which were so close joined to one another, that each Tower seem'd to be a solid Rock. The Workmanship was so exquisite, and the corners so finely cut, that the Places where the Stones were joined could not be seen by the most curious eye. To these, placed on the North-side, was joined the Royal Palace, which it is almost impossible to describe. For as to the Magnificence and Stateliness of the Fabrick, and Excellency of the Workmanship, nothing ever could exceed it; and then it was encompass'd round with a Wall thirty Cubits high, and at an equal distance were Beautiful Towers, and also convenient Houses for Men to lodge in, and Rooms large enough to hold a hundred Beds or Tables. The variety of Stones that were there was incredible, all the Countrys in the World being ransacked to find out what was rare and curious for it. But, as I said before, the Wit of Man cannot give a sufficient description of this Place. The very remembrance of it is tormenting, to consider what prodigious Riches the merciless Flames have devour'd; and yet it was not the Romans, but treacherous Villains of their own Country that set it on fire.

Come we now to the Temple, the Magnificence and incredible Glory of which is impossible to be described sufficiently: It was built of Free-Stone, each being forty Cubits long, and six or seven broad, encompassed with three Walls, adorned with Porches covered with Gold and Silver. In a word, there was nothing Heart could wish to please the Eye, but this Temple had to amazement. But neither its Antiquity, nor prodigious Riches, nor People that were spread all

spect, yet it was much more so over the Earth, nor the great Glory of their Religion could preserve it from being destroyed. In a word, so Glorious and Magnificent was this Structure, that when the Romans (who had conquer'd the World) had carry'd the Town and entered it, the Emperour Titus especially, seeing the Fortifications of the City, the Towers which the Conquered had madly deserted, and viewing the height and largeness of them, and the exquisite and artificial joining of the Stones together, he said, It was God certainly that assisted us to Fight, and 'twas God that drove the Jews from these Fortifications.

Namque hominum manus & machina, quid ad ista valerant? For what could Hands and Engines signify to these?

• However this Noble City was taken and laid waste several times, for the wickedness of its Inhabitants, and for their Idolatry and Apostacy from their God.

1st. By Nebuchadnezzar King of Babylon, who ruin'd its Walls and Towers, set the Temple on fire, and carry'd away the Vessels thereof.

2dly. By Afochus or Afochus an Egyptian King.

3dly. By Antiochus Epiphaneus, who took it by Treachery, robbed the Holy Place, commanded the Jews to renounce the Law of their Forefathers, and ordered the Temple should not be called the Temple of the Lord, but of Jupiter Olympias.

4ly. It was taken by Pompey the Great, who made it and the rest of Judea Tributary; and as Strabo relates, Pompey took it upon a Fast-day, when the Jews abstain'd from Working: for having filled the Ditch, and set Ladders to the Walls, he gave orders to pull 'em all down. Yet (as Josephus reports Lib. 1. cap. 16.) he meddled with none of the Holy Vessels or Instruments of the Temple.

Lastly, It was quite razed to the ground the first Year of the Reign of Vespasian, the 8th of December, by Titus his Son, who took the Town and destroyed the Temple. Having taken it, he ordered all to the very Walls to be laid level with the ground, that they who came to see it should hardly believe that ever it was inhabited; for all the Walls and Hedges being pulled down, which the Inhabitants had erected to fence their Houses and Gardens, and all the Woods and Trees being cut down, all the hollow Places and Valleys were filled up; and where any Rocks or Stones stood up, they hewed them down, so that they levelled all. Having thus mowed down all before them for the space of ninety Furlongs round about Jerusalem, it was a miserable sight to see. For where before were stately Trees and curious Gardens, here was nothing now to be seen but a wild Desert. Nor could any Stranger, who had ever seen Judea before, and its lovely Towns and Suburbs, abstain from tears to see this horrid desolation and change. One cause of its dire Calamity was, that they obstinately and perversely refused to acknowledge the time of their Visitation. Baumgarten.

To conclude, whoever desires further to know the great Destruction of this City, the Slaughter of Men, the misery of the Famine, and other dreadful sufferings of the Jews, let him but read Josephus, who had it not by hear-say, but was himself an eye-witness of these things.

After this, what was left of the City was a Receptacle of Murderers and Robbers until Adrian's time, who walled it round, and rebuilt it, calling it after his own Name Helia; and, as St. Jerom writes to Paulina, from the Time of Adrian to the Reign of Constantine, for almost 180 Years, in the place of the Resurrection the Image of Jupiter was worshipped; on the Rock of the Cross was worshipped a Marble Statue of Venus, that the Gentiles had placed there. The Prophane Romans thinking by this means to shock our Belief of the Resurrection and the Cross, if they did but profane those Places with their Idols. Reedify'd by Adrian.

Moreover, as it was then but a Melancholy sight to see, when it was destroyed and made level with the ground, such and perhaps more miserable is the face of it now, there being nothing but Ruins left of the ancient Buildings. Insomuch that the Country which was of old, for its plenty, called a Land flowing with Milk and Honey, may now justly be termed a Land of Thorns, of Thistles and Desolation. Its present condition.

Nevertheless our Predecessors by the means of Charles the Great, or Charlemain, who recovered it with much labour, were in possession of it a long time; and Godfrey having with great Glory recovered it, they again enjoyed it eighty eight Years: and afterwards being taken by Saladin King of Egypt, the Christians miserably lost it to their great damage and dishonour, and they shamefully suffer it to continue in the possession of the Infidels. O shame and confusion! upon the least private Sedition among our selves, Baumgarten. we are stout and valorous, and so bloody minded that we are ready to cut one another's Throats : But when the Enemies of God and the true Church provoke our just resentment, there we are arrant Cowards.

Present Situation. The Description therefore of Jerusalem, as it is at this day, both as to its exterior and interior Situation, is as followeth : It is almost of a Triangular Form. In the East part of it stands the Temple of Solomon, in the North-side within the Walls the Temple of the Holy Sepulcher. On the South-side of it stands Mount Sion, without the Walls, yet joined by the Houses built between the Wall and the Mount ; whence the rest of the City, because it lay lower, was called the Daughter of Sion in Sacred History. At the foot of Mount Sion lyeth the Valley Ennon, where the Royal Gardens were, where also the Israelites had their Idolatrous Groves, in which they made their Children pass through the Fire, and sacrific'd them to their Idols. On the opposite Hill Southward is the field of Akeldama. Opposite to Mount Sion, between the East and South, stands a high but narrow Hill called the Hill or Mountain of Offence or Strife, because there Solomon in complaisance to his Wives had erected a Temple to Chamos the Idol of Moa, and to Molocb the Idol of the Children of Ammon, wherein he highly offended God, 2 King. Not far from the Temple of Solomon is the Valley Jehoshaphat lying in the middle between it and Mount Olivet, which extends it self from the Valley Cedron on the North, to the Valley Ennon, and ends there ; the Valleys are very deep, and difficult of Ascent. Mount Olivet stands opposite to Solomon's Temple on the East-side of it, and is much higher than Jerusalem. Of the three strong Walls, and the broad and deep Ditch that in former times the City was compassed with, there is nothing to be seen at this day but the Rubbish and stupendous Ruins. And thus much of the ancient and present state of the Holy City.

I shall put an End to this Second Book with this Observation of Josephus in his Book of the Jewish War, Lib. 6. cap. ult. I verily believe if the Romans had delay'd their coming against those Miscreants, that the Earth would have opened and swallowed them up, or else that a deluge of Water would have swept them away, or that God would have destroy'd them with Fire from Heaven, as he did Sodom and Gomorrhah.

Giving an Account of Syria, and the Author's Return from thence to Venice by Sea.

CHAP. I.

They go from Jerufalem. A Quarrel of the Muledrivers. Are in danger by Thieves at the River Jordan.

ON the 28th day of December, the Mules that were long look'd for return at last from Barathus. We take leave therefore of our Guide and Friars, and packing up our Bag and Baggage, we mount our Mules about Noon; and going out at the Gate of Judgment, we pass'd on over steep Hills, and deep stony Valleys, until we came to the North part of the City. In the Evening we arriv'd at a certain Village that was fill'd with Ruins and Rubbish (it was of old called Hay, being the same Town that Jeshua took, Jos. 8.) From this place we had a view at a distance of the Valley of Jericho, the Dead-Sea, Galgala, the Mountain Quarentana, and many other remarkable Places towards the East. In this Village we found a great many Travelers that had taken up their Lodging in a very large but unfurnished Inn.

On the 29th about Noon, as we were to leave that place, a Quarrel happened between the Muledrivers; some were for going one way, and others for going another way, infomuch that we had but very few left to go with us. However we pursued our Journey, and met with a great deal of Hardship in our way, over Hills and Dales, till with much ado we arriv'd at last in a large Valley, through the middle of which the River Jordan runs; and there we rested our selves and our Mules till Sun-setting, dreading that Country for Robberies. So soon as it grew dark we left that place, and without any noise march'd on, expecting every moment to be assaulted, till we had got to the North side of the Valley. And no sooner were we arrived there, being hard by the River Jordan, but we were struck with a panick Fear.

For both sides of the Rivers were Danger of Robbers. planted full with Rogues, which we could easily discover by the multitude of Fires that appeared to us. We were here very much straitned, there being no possibility to go backwards nor forwards without manifest hazard: And therefore consulting among our selves what we had best do, we committed our selves to God's Providence, devoutly praying that we might be instructed how to escape so great a Danger. And while we despaired of falling on any Method how to save our selves, all of a sudden we light upon the Robbers Watch, who being but young Boys, and at a good distance from their Party, and being likewise overcome with sleep, and somewhat frightened too, at first they held their peace, but in a moment giving a great shout, and their Party answering them in the same manner, we gave our selves up for dead Men; and so leaving off our intended Journey, we turned aside to a Hill hard by, on the left-hand side of the way, with all the speed we could, intending there to hide our selves, or dispute for our Lives as long as we could, if there was occasion. In the mean time while they were drawing themselves up in a Body together, what with the noise of their Horses feet, and partly by the favour of the darkness of the Night, without their hearing us, we made a shift to get up to the top of a certain Mountain, and from thence down to another Valley hard by, where we continued for some time in profound silence, having sent out our Scouts and Guards to the upper parts of the Hill

(who were very well acquainted with the Ground) to bring us word so soon as they discovered any danger.

CHAP. II.

*The Arabians exact Toll at the River Jordan, and we are in danger by them.
A Country Meeting of the Grecian Christians for Divine Worship.*

ON the 30th day by day-break, our Scouts having returned, bring us word that they could not discover the Thieves any where. They brought along with them an Arabian, whom we hired to be our Guide to Jordan. Taking him with us, away we marched straight to the Fords.

Arabian Robbers exact a Toll.

There we found Arabians in great numbers, some on the Shore, and others up to the middle in the River, who with their Swords drawn, brandishing their Spears, and bending their Bows, opposed our Passage. We were fain to treat with them by our Interpreter, and so had leave to pass the River, having first paid them three Maydens apiece. The River was at that time very low, and the Banks were bare on both sides. We waded it over very slowly, and as we passed, sprinkled our Heads, Hands, and Legs with the Water, and some of it we carried with us to drink. Having got over Jordan, we came next to a very fruitful Plain full of very rank Grass that grew very thick. Here the Arabians (not satisfied it seems with the Money we had given them) came back again upon us, we never suspecting any such matter. Most of our company whom they found out of their Ranks (and with them the two Friars aforesaid) they carried away with them. The Muledrivers seeing this, being more concern'd for the loss of their Mules than the Men, came up to them and expostulated the matter, bending their Bows; and fitting their Arrows to the Strings, the Rogues terrify'd with the bended Bows and sharp Arrows, retire to their Gang. We march on, they who were unarmed together, with the Mules, in the Van; we who had Arms in the Rear, both to guard our selves and our Goods from the Robbers: For these Arabian Thieves come out with a Design not to fight, but to plunder, and therefore they have commonly but few Arms; and when they meet with Men of courage, they are the errantest Cowards in the World. By this means, sometimes resisting them, and sometimes getting away from them, we escaped out of their hands, and betook our selves to the mountainous parts. We past one Mountain that was of great length, full of Corn, Olives, Vines, and fruitful Trees. We saw here some Castles built on small Hills, and some Country Towns. And this Country was given by Lot to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, and to the half-Tribe of Manasseh, as it is Jos. 13. It is at this day a Country very fit for Pasturage, and if it was cultivated, would prove extremely fruitful. Having rode on all that day, and some part of the night following; at length arriving at a certain Country Village, we lodged in our Mule-driver's House.

Ruben.

On the 31st day, being the last of the Year, resting our selves here for some time, we were by our Landlord conducted to a Cave cut in the solid Rock, where the Christians of the Greek Church, who lived in that Town, used to meet to perform Divine Worship; and because that day happened to be the Vigil of the Circumcision of our Lord, we assisted at their Vespers. Which being over, when they distributed to each their boiled Wheat and Loaves, we had our Portion assigned us among the rest, which we very willingly received and kissed, lest by refusing it they might apprehend we undervalued them; and whilst they looked on, and carefully observed us, we eat it up.

*The smallness of the Houses in these Places. A Caravan of Galilee.
The Lake Maron. Dens of Lions near it.*

ON the Morning of the Circumcision the new Year begins with us. For the Solemnity of this Feast we stir'd not out of doors all day long; but the next day following having got more Company, we came to a small Cottage, where we found several other Persons who were to travel to the same Parts we were a going to. There we staid all that night, and were so straitned for want of room, that we were fain to take up our Lodging among the Camels, Cows, and Mules, and had not the conveniency of extending our Body, or sitting down any where. But when one is thoroughly tired and wearied, a very indifferent accommodation will serve their turn.

On the third of January, leaving this mountainous Country, we came to a very large Plain destitute of Trees indeed, but a very fruitful spot of Ground. The Land is fat, and of a reddish colour, but for want of being cultivated as it should be, it is in a manner waste. We were conducted to a small Village here, where we staid all that and the two following days; for our Retinue was not yet so numerous as to adventure travelling in a place so infested with Robbers. The Houses here are miserably low and mean, being commonly built in Ditches, and the Walls both within and without built of Stone, without Lime or Morter. On the outside there's hardly any thing like a House to be seen; so that if a Stranger happen to come there who knows not the place, he is apt to take them for so many heaps of Stones, and to look for Houses among Houses.

On the 6th day came to us a Caravan of 70 Camels, which hastened to Damascus with Corn from Galilee. We joined our selves to this, and a little after came to an Inn, where we found very luckily another Caravan full as strong as the former.

On the 7th day as we travel'd, we left on our left hand the Lake Maron. This Lake Maron is occasion'd by the abundance of Waters that flow down from Mount Libanus about the beginning of the Spring, when the warm West Wind thaws it; and yet this same Mountain in the Summer time is scorched up by the Sun. Because of the overflowing of the Waters there grow here abundance of Reeds, Trees, Thorns, &c. that make an echoing Wood, where the Bears, Lions, and other Beasts of Prey find both food and shelter; and here, they say, the King uses to hunt. At these Waters, as it is in Joshua, Cap. 11. Jabin King of Hazor, with many of his Confederate Princes met, whom Joshua attacked, and the Lord delivered them into his hand.

They are nobly entertained in Damascus. The Consul's Character there. Antiquities of Saul. The Story of a Florentine Merchant, Governour of Damascus. An Encomium on the City, its Situation, Nature of the Place, Merchandise and Product.

ON the 8th day pursuing our Journey in the same Plain, we came at last in the Evening late to Damascus, and went to a Warehouse of the Venetians, who received us with all manner of Civilities, and entertain'd us nobly, so as we wanted for nothing, as if we had been in our own Country; for here we had soft Feather-beds to lie on, all sorts of Meat in very good order, our Feet and Heads wash'd, our Linen shifted; in a word, we were so extremely well used and comforted here, that we look'd more like so many pampered Domesticks than Travellers, after so many nasty Lodgings, toilsom Journeys, Fastings, and many other Inconveniences.

On the 9th day we went to the Consul's House, and there were we most nobly entertained again, with all the respect imaginable; and having supp'd with him, he gave us a satisfactory Account of the Sect of the Mabometans, and their way of living; for this Consul was a very learned, judicious, and graceful Man, of a very majestick Presence and comely Aspect.

On the 10th day having taken some refreshment, some of the Noble Venetians conducted us out of the City to the place where Saul, when he went to persecute the Christians and to apprehend them, fell upon his Face on the ground, and heard a Voice from Heaven, saying, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? &c. Acts 9. Here was in former times a noble Temple, now there is nothing but a huge heap of Rubbish, where the Christians inhabiting Damascus, and Strangers are bury'd. Returning through the Gardens, with which that City and Country abounds in great Variety, we came under the Walls of the Town, and directly under that Window where Paul was let down in a Basket by his Brethren.

Having entred the City we saw the House of Judas, who entertained Paul while he was blind; and the House of Ananias in which Christians dwell, where also there is a very beautiful Chappel.

Whilst we were taking an exact survey of the situation of the Town, the Noble Venetians first, and next some of the Gentlemen of Damascus, and last of all the Consul, all of good credit, entertained us with this true Story.

There was a certain Merchant of Florence, a Man of great Wisdom and very Wealthy: This Man happening to reside at Damascus, where for a long time he had traded in Merchandizing, came at last to be very well acquainted at Court, and to be in singular Favour with the Prince, who promised if he would but renounce his Religion, that he would give him his Daughter to Wife. The Florentine agrees to the Bargain, for being blinded and distracted with Love, he embraces a blind and erroneous Religion, marries and enjoys her. He had seen the Lady before, and was deeply smitten with her Love, and told the Prince he was a dead Man if he did not enjoy her. The Prince took him at this disadvantage, and made him agree to his own Terms. However, by this Marriage he was had in very great esteem, and was much admired by all the Courtiers. After the Prince his Father-in-Law's death, he succeeded him in the Principality, which Office he executed during his Lifetime, to every body's satisfaction; and when he died was honoured with a Temple, or (according to the propriety of the Saracen Language) a Mosque. The Saracens adore him for a Saint, and feeling or handling his Tomb, they kiss it, and now and then stroke their Beards with it. This Florentine encompassed the City Damascus, for the most part, with the Wall that is now about it, and caus'd the Lion, being the Arms of the City of Florence, to be engraven upon it. Before this time Tamerlane had ruin'd the City Damascus. There is however at this day to be seen a very antient Gate, having in it the Statues of the four Evangelists, which may serve for a proof that the Christians had it in their Possession.

Moreover, this City for wholesomeness of Air, plenty of Water, fruitfulness of the Soil, variety of most delicious Fruits, pleasantness of Orchards and Gardens, flourishing of Trade, and lastly for the Antiquity of its Original, far excels all the Citys of Syria: For Schem the Son of Noah was the first Founder of it; whence in the Language of the Saracens 'tis still denominated Sem. It is situated at the foot of the Mountain Antilibanus in a Plain, whose Soil is naturally barren and dry, except where 'tis watered by the small Rivers Pharphar and Abana, which are let in and conveyed through Pipes and small Conduits, and make the Land very fruitful, and most fit for planting of Trees, insomuch that it may be justly stiled Paradise. Among other Fruits which grow there in great abundance, there are likewise our Damascene Prunes, so called, either because they are here in greater plenty, and better in their kind, or else that from hence they were first carry'd and distributed to other Countries.

We purchased in Damascus some things that we brought home with us, viz. Silks and Sattins, Aloes Wood, Raisins of a prodigious bigness and sweetness, Damascene Prunes, Ribbons, and Saracen Caps, Indian Platters or Baskets. There is another place of the same Name near Hebron; the cause why they are both called by the same Name is yet unknown, for Damascus and Hebron are seven days Journey distant one from the other.

*Houses for Cats in Damascus. Original of this Superstition.
Their sudden departure thence for fear of the Prince.*

ON the 11th day as we were walking over the City, they shewed us a House, very large and walled round, which was full of Cats; and having enquired what might be the occasion of it, we were told by very grave serious Men, that the occasion of it was as follows, viz. That when Mahomet once lived here, he brought with him a Cat in his Sleeve, which he was wont to stroke with his own hand, and to feed her, to make much of her; and not only so, but to govern all his Actions by her Directions. And the Followers of Mahomet to this very day, in imitation of him, do keep and worship Cats, and hold it for a notable piece of Alms and Charity to feed them. And if any of those Creatures should happen to be starved for want of Victuals, they reckon he who had the charge of keeping her, deserves condemnation from God. For this reason you shall see a great many of them, who beg Meat and Ox-livers and Hearts in the Markets to feed the Cats with. But it is probable this base and shameful Superstition proceeded from some other cause: For we know that Syria of old was possessed by the Egyptians, amongst whom it was customary to worship several sorts of Animals; such as Dogs, Snipes, Oxen, Hawks, and Cats. The Reason hereof is assigned by Diodorus the Sicilian in his second Book, which he that pleases may read: The chief Reason may be this, that in their Battels and Wars, having in their Colours or Ensigns the figures of these Creatures, they might have obtain'd some signal Victories; or truly, that those Creatures were useful in their kind, and were necessary either for Food, or Defence of Mankind. And so the Cats, because they were very serviceable for killing of Serpents, Mice and Rats, and other venomous Creatures that were very rife in Egypt, were worshipped for Gods: And 'tis very likely, that from this old prevailing Superstition, it has still continued to descend and be in use unto this day. We intended to have seen many more Monuments of this City's Antiquities, but Fortune proved cross to us. For as we were conducted to see Places, and treated with all manner of Civility and Respect by some Noble Venetians, it was told the Prince or Governor of the City, that there were arrived some Christians of great Estates. He being covetous of Money, sends word to the Venetian Consul to ask the Reason why he did not send him an account of the arrival of such Persons, for that he was ready to shew them all imaginable Respect and Civility. The Consul, being a quick ingenious Man, and understanding immediately what the Prince's Design was, sent him an answer, that we were but Merchants and poor Men; but that for the sake of old Acquaintance and Hospitality they had entertain'd them so as they did. And in the mean time he dispatched a Messenger to tell us that we had best march off as soon as we could conveniently, otherwise if we must visit the Prince, it must of necessity put us to a great deal of Charge.

Finding our selves in this condition, on the 12th at Night we huddled our Goods up in a hurry, and departed out of Damascus about the third hour of the Night, the Moon shining. And thus travelling over the steep and unpassable tops of high Hills, we arrived at last about day-breaking at a small Cottage or Hut, and there found a Caravan going to Barutbus.

Country of Bakar. Burial-place of Noah. Castle Baldach. Story of a poor Woman deceiving the Baldachens. Their stay in the Village Bohersee.

ON the 13th in the Morning we rose very early, and travelled over Mountains covered with Snow, and that sounded with Brooks that violently flowed down from the tops of them; which when we had left behind us, we came next

next into a very spacious and lovely Plain, wherein we met with several Rivulets, and namely two Branches of the River Jordan, which we past over. This Plain is now called Bakar, a very fertile Country abounding with high Hills, that seem to be made with hands, on which are seated Castles. The story goes, that here Noah built his Ark; and they shew the place where he was bury'd, being upon a Hill, and of very curious Workmanship. Travelling over this Plain towards the East, one may see a great many Monuments of Antiquity; among which one Stone of a prodigious Magnitude, resembling for bigness a Tower or Hill. Near to this Stone are three Pillars, not unlike those that are to be seen in St. Mark's place in Venice. Not far from hence is the Castle Baldach, whence they say was Baldach the Suite, of whom we read in the Book of Job. The Rows of Pillars in this Castle are admirable, being Stones of a huge bigness; the Building is very high and stately, but all gone to ruin, yet even what is left shews there has been there something very great and noble. It is reported that the Baldachenses, willing to remove the Stone aforementioned, had several times attempted it, but in vain, because of its bigness. A Woman with Child that was very poor, observing how they were baffled, told them, she knew an Art to remove this same Stone with the greatest ease imaginable, to what place soever they pleased; and that she was willing to communicate the same to them, on condition they would provide for her till she was delivered of her Child, and in the time of her lying in. The credulous Baldachenses greedily embrace the motion, and bring the Woman all Necessaries in great plenty, expecting to hear some wonderful Secret. The Woman at last is delivered, and comes where the Stone was, with abundance of Followers. When she came near the Stone, to work she went, stooping down with her back close to the Stone, as if she was ready to take on her Load; and charging the by-standers that they would all put to their hands and help her on with her Burden, and that she would carry it away cleverly whithersoever they would have her: they told her it was not possible for them to do it; neither is it possible for me, said she, both to lift it on and carry it too. They perceiving the Woman was no Fool, and that she talked to the purpose, excused and dismissed her. The Multitude retired disappointed, the Woman was helped in her Necessity, and the Stone continued where it was. Crossing over this Plain once more, we had another Journey over the mountainous parts, till we arriv'd at a Village called Bohersee, and there we tarry'd two days in our Muledriver's House, not able to go on, both for the badness of the Weather, and want of Health.

C H A P. VII.

They suffer extreme Cold. Of the Saracens Fasts, Food, Superstitions, Drinking Kites, and other Customs of Men and Women.

ON the 16th day about Noon, we set out to travel over the Mountains again. Here the cold Wind did drive the Snow so in our Faces, that we could hardly sit on our Mules. There had been a great fall of Snow, which had so covered the Roads, that we were put to all our shifts to find our way: But when we had gained the top of that Hill, we descended by a very steep way; it blew very hard from the tops of the Mountains, and withal rained so fast, that we were extremely mortify'd, and wet to the very skin. Here we were glad to betake our selves to a small Cottage, and kindling a small smoky fire, we dry'd our Clothes in the best manner we could. The Night following a great many Saracens came to us, some to warm themselves, and others to see our Muledriver, with whom they were acquainted.

And because they fasted all the Month of January that Year, instead of keeping the forty days of Lent, each of them laid up Provisions for himself according to his Ability. Now the Saracens way of fasting is, to abstain from Meats of all sorts in the day-time; and when night is come, they indulge themselves in junketing and banquetting, and give up themselves to all manner of Incontinency. They sit at Meals not as we do upon Stools, or eat from Tables, but sitting on a rising ground round in a Ring, they eat very fast and greedily. They never drink at Meals, but when they have done eating, outing, then the Drink is brought, and they drink as heartily as if they had suffer'd Thirst a long time. They are strict observers of the New-Moon, and not only salute but adore its first appearance, observing in all their Actions and Affairs, the Increase and Decrease of it: And for that reason they have always a Half-moon in the tops of their Houses, and Castles, and on the Doors and Roofs of their Churches and Temples. They seldom or never drink Wine, and if they do it is very privately; but Grapes, and Hony made of Grapes, they eat freely. The common sort drink only fair Water, the better and richer sort Water brewed and made up with Ingredients. They very seldom make use of Spoons, but if they have occasion to eat any Spoon-meat, they eat it out of the hollow of their Hand, keeping close their fingers; and thus in a barbarous manner you shall see the Meat dropping from their nasty Paws upon their Beards, and so down into the Dish again, enough to turn ones Stomach. They hate smooth-faced and beardless Men, and never shave their Beards. They shave their Heads, and first cover them with Caps, and afterwards with a Roll made up with many Ribbons. They are very slovenly in their Clothes. Being enur'd to hardship from their Infancy, they are regardless either of cold or heat, able to endure hunger and fatigue. They go barefoot most an end, except when 'tis a very great Frost, or the ways are dirty, and then they use wooden Shoos. They have Shoos only when they travel long Journeys. Very few of them know what Stockings are, and such as wear them, have them come up no higher than the middle of their Leg. Most of 'em, when 'tis very stormy and cold weather, do wear Coats made of Beasts-skins, with the hairy side inward, and reaching no further than their Knees; the Sleeves whereof are so wide that they can easily pull back their hands when they are very cold, and warm them in their naked Bosom. They delight much in Hospitality, and reckon it a point of great clownishness and incivility to exact Mony of Strangers for their Entertainment; for we were several times invited and entertained by them; being made very welcome when we came, but much despised by them when we refused their Invitation. They never bake, but when they are either a going to eat themselves, or to give it away to Strangers. They are of opinion that all Holy Days ought to be spent in feasting and fulfilling the Desires of the Flesh. Their Women are very decently habited all over their Body, having their Face covered with a thin black Veil through which they can see every thing, but no body can see them. They dye their Lips of a dark colour, and mark their Foreheads with a hot Iron. On their Arms they wear Bracelets and Rings of Silver and Iron, according to their Quality and Estate. They wear Jewels in their Lips, Ears and Nostrils, and a sort of Rings on their Fingers. They use on their Heads Turbants, each according to her Quality, which they cover with a white Scarf hanging down to the ground. So much of the Saracen Customs. I will now proceed to give an Account of what I have heard and read concerning their great Impostor Mahomet.

History of Mahomet. His Pedigree. His Disposition; false Preaching; Acts, Laws, Alcoran; Rites of Prayer, Fasts, Pilgrimages, Polygamy, Policy; his Dreams of Pleasure after this Life; blasphemous Arrogance. His opinion of Jesus and Mary. Religion contained in the Alcoran. Death of Mahomet. His Successor; his Sepulcher.

MAHOMET was born on the 23d of April, in the 606th Year of Christ's Nativity, in the Poppedom of Boniface the 4th, and when Phocas the Parricide was Emperor. His Father was an Arabian and an Idolater, but his Mother an Ishmaelite, and of the Religion of the Hebrews. Being descended of these two Sects so opposite to one another, and contrary in their Principles, he adhered to neither; but being a very ingenious and crafty Fellow, and having conversed with Christians, out of the two Opinions he contrived and made up one of his own, which has proved very destructive to Mankind. For, among the Arabians who had him in very great esteem, he publicly preached that Cosroes with his whole whose Family was justly destroyed, because he had caused himself to be worship'd for a God. And yet he himself, as a most wicked and licentious Villain, was wont to worship Idols, and adore Images made with mens hands. When he disputed of the Law of the Hebrews (which the Arabians for the most part professed) and the Traditions of the Christians, he used to affirm that they were one and the same, but that both Parties were much seduced by great Errors, which Errors he pretended to moderate and remedy, by alledging the Hebrews to be in the wrong for denying Jesus to be born of a Virgin, whereas their Ancestors believed and look'd for it. And as for the Christians, he blamed them for their Levity, in believing that Jesus, who was so much beloved of God, and born of the Virgin, should yet be willing to have endured Reproaches, and at last the Death of the Cross. And setting up a Law of his own, he assured his Hearers, that if the Saracens would receive and protect him, and be obedient to him as to a Messenger sent by God, they should set themselves at liberty, and be the Lords and Princes of all the Nations round about them, enjoying great Honours and Riches; which afterwards was, and at this day is too too much verified, through the Cowardice and Slothfulness of our Princes and great Men.

There are others who affirm, that he was born of a mean and vile Parentage, as having been a driver of Mules, or Carrier to a rich Widow, whom afterwards he wheedled so as she was perswaded to marry him. And that by her Riches it was he was so puff'd up, as to have high thoughts of himself, and arrogantly to assume to himself the stile of God's Prophet and Ambassador. For in his Alcoran he brings in God thus speaking to him; Thou wast wise, but educated under Discipline: Thou wast in Error, and yet escaped out of it: Thou wert poor, but art become rich.

Thus, when Mahomet aspir'd to Dominion, and made his first appearance, some of the ruder and meanest sort of People joined him; afterwards having increas'd his Party with a considerable number of Robbers and Thieves, he at length dared to disturb the Bounds of the Roman Empire. But Heraclius the then Emperor soon put a stop to his Progress, having put him to flight, and given him a ugly Wound in his Forehead, which was a plain contradiction to his Prophecy, wherein he said of himself, that God had given him for a Guard and Protection ten Angels, so as it should not be in the power of any to hurt him. After this Defeat the Saracens and Arabians taking up Arms, worsted Heraclius's Generals; so that he who before was successful, is now again unfortunate. Mahomet flush'd with this Victory, and his being made General of their Army, marched, styling himself the Great Prophet of God; and deluded by Magical Arts and Sorcery, the Africans and Asians, whom he animated to such degrees of Courage and Resolution, that they had gone near totally to extinguish the name of Empire, having subdued Alexandria, and other Citys of Syria, Egypt, and Cilicia.

In order to the better forming his Design, he had the Assistance of Sergius a wicked Monk, who for some great Crimes he had committed, was expelled his Monastery, and fled to him; and collecting many Passages out of the Law of Moses, and the Gospel, he put them artificially together in one Body. And that he might engage his Followers to stick the closer to him, he allowed one Man to have four Wives, and those of his own near Kindred too; and as many Concubines as he was able to maintain, besides Slaves, which he might sell, and make use of, or dispose of them at his pleasure.

Moreover he says of his Alcoran; "If we should carry this Law of ours to any Mountain, that Mountain would infallibly move and bow down immediately, out of Respect and Reverence to God and his Law. And that this Law is so excellent, that it is not in the power of Gods or Men to devise a better, for that by it the Devils themselves will be saved."

This Law he appointed to be read five times a day. When they pray, they set their Faces to the South, and fall flat upon the ground three times. Wherein they observe this method, That one of them that are to pray, who for his Age, or some other Excellency, has the preference, first kneels down, and after him the rest, as many as are present, in a direct Line in the same manner. Again, this first, so soon as he thinks they have all kneel'd, he immediately falls down on his Face, and after him the first next to him, and then the second, third, fourth, and so on to the last Man; and thus they pray, and sometimes they sigh and groan heavily. And when this first rises up again, or falls down, so must all the rest do in order one after another, like so many many Monkeys. And when they have showed all their Tricks the third time, then they all rise up together, seeming glad and mightily pleas'd, as if they had obtained what they pray'd for. But 'tis remarkable that before they go to Prayers, in imitation of Baptism or Confession, they plunge themselves in Water. And for that purpose they have before all their Mosques a place full of Water, that they wash themselves in. But if they happen to be in a Desert-place, where they cannot have Water, then they sprinkle themselves with Earth or Dust instead of Water; foolishly thinking this to be effectual to purge and cleanse them from their sins. The subject-matter of their Prayer is nothing but a mere Confession that God is, and was, and will be, and that Mahomet was a Prophet inspired and sent by God.

This Law of his enjoined too, that they should fast one Month every Year; and their manner of Fasting was to abstain from Meats of any kind in the day-time, but to give up themselves in the night to all manner of Jollity and shameful Incontinency. He ordered them likewise to make their Pilgrimages once every Year to visit the House of God which is at Mecca, where when they meet they are obliged to be all clad in the same habit, and so go about throwing of stones through the holes of the Walls, as if they stoned the Devil. He said, that Abraham built this House for his Children, especially the Ishmaelites, to pray in. He charged his Followers likewise that they should persecute, slay, and at least subdue all that opposed his false Religion, and did not believe as he did. He allowed them to eat all sorts of Flesh except Swines-flesh, Carrion and Blood; and yet we have seen them our selves in the Desert eat Carrion, namely the dead Carcasses of Camels, and for all that they would not tast Swines-flesh. The ridiculous reason he gave for this prohibition of eating Pork was, that after the Flood Swine were generated out of Camels Dung, as he foolishly pretended. He permitted those of his party, as was said before, to marry four Wives, and to turn them away at pleasure, and chuse others in their place; but so as they should not exceed the number of Four in their Divorcements. As for hired Concubines, Slaves bought, or such Women as were taken Captives in War, every Man was allowed to have of these as many as he pleased, and was able to maintain, and to sell them, except when they were with Child, for in that case it was not lawful to sell 'em, but they might give them away, and bestow them on whom they pleased. They had the liberty too, to marry their own near Relations and Allies, because by such repeated Marriages one Relation with another, Families became more firmly united among themselves, and their Friendship less liable to a Rupture.

They retain the Laws written in the Old Testament of the Hebrews as to their Goods both moveable and immoveable. They seldom swear, and for that reason the Persons they cite to bear witness in any case are very honest and of great authority, whose Testimony is believed without an Oath. The Mahometan Law forbids likewise the use of Wine, because 'tis the occasion of much mischief and evil, and because they should lose their Liberty and Dominion if they drank it. It promises them a kind of Paradise after this Life, where they shall enjoy all manner of Delight and Pleasure, sitting under very pleasant and delightful Shades, neither annoy'd with Heat, nor pinch'd with Cold, but enjoying every thing they desire so soon as ever they wish for it. That they shall there wear Silks and soft fine Clothes of all sorts of Colours. That the Angels of God shall there attend them as so many Butlers and Drawers to furnish them with most delicious Wines in great plenty. That they shall enjoy all imaginable Delights, with charming beautiful Women, upon curious Beds: But for those that are adversaries to his Religion, and refuse to obey this Law, to them is refer'd the punishment of undergoing the contrary of all these.

Furthermore, Mahomet had the Impudence to arrogate to himself so much as to affirm that Christ prophesy'd of him in these words, I declare unto you concerning the Messenger of God, who is to come after me, whose name is Mahomet, which was written from everlasting in the presence of the Throne of God, at his right hand. In like manner also he saith of David and the Book of Psalms, which he highly commends. The same he doth with the rest of the Prophets; but chiefly Moses is highly extolled by him. Yet he allows Christ to be greater than he, and himself the greatest. He saith, that the Christians corrupted the Gospel, and the Jews the Law of Moses; and there is just so much of truth in both as is contained in his Alcoran. He confesseth too that he was sent by God furnished with Valour in Arms, and that Christ was furnished nished with Power in working Miracles. What Mahomet's Opinion of Christ was, and of the Virgin Mary, the Gospel, and of himself likewise, is evident out of his Alcoran; for there he says that God made Jesus and Mary a Miracle to Men. And in another place, The Word of God Christ Jesus, Son of Mary, was sent by the Creator of the World, to be the face of all Nations in this life, and that which is to come. The same he owns elsewhere: Christ the Power of God, the Word, the Wisdom, the Life, the Breath and Heart of God, born of the Virgin Mary by a Divine Power, raised the Dead, made the Blind to see, and wrought many other Miracles. That he was more excellent than all the Prophets of the Hebrews, and that the Jews shall have no Prophet after Christ. Jesus he prefers to all Men and Prophets, and Mary to all Women. For in his Alcoran he brings in God speaking to Mary, the best of Women, and never touched by any Man, thus: We breathed our own Soul, we have made her and her Son Jesus Christ a Miracle to Men. He adds, that the Body of Jesus went up into Heaven uncorrupted, and he prefers the Christians far before the Jews. For when a Jew was willing to embrace his Religion, he would not admit of him, until he was baptized as a Christian, and then renouncing his Faith he was made an Apostate from our Religion. Yet for all that he accused the Christians of imprudence and stupidity, who believed that Christ the Son of God suffered the shameful and painful death of the Cross. For he says, That whilst the Jews were searching for Christ in the Garden, Judas the Traitor was changed into his likeness, and crucify'd in his stead.

The same Mahomet says in his Alcoran, That he neither had wrought Miracles, nor would he work any; that he was ignorant of many things; that he was a mere Man, but sent and inspired by God; and that it was not in his power to pardon Sins. He forbid also to worship him; and which is more, he confesseth that there are some things in his Book which may be doubted. The Authority of the Gospel he very frankly owns, when he calls it a Light, a Directory and Perfection. And 'tis certain he very much disparages his own Alcoran, when he saith, Whosoever adores the true God, and lives honestly and justly, let him be Christian or Saracen, shall obtain Mercy and Salvation. From these few instances it appears how he has contradicted himself.

His Followers do approve of the Creation of the World and Adam, all the Hebraean History, and a great part of Christ's Doctrine. They believe that Antichrist will be a very wicked Man, and that Christ will kill him. They hold the Resurrection of Bodies, the last Judgment, and Eternal Rewards and Punishments: That Christ shall sit next to God in Judgment. These are but a small number of the many idle Dreams of the Mahometans, among which notwithstanding some Truths are to be met with. For so great is the force of Truth, that very often even its Enemies and Strangers are in a manner compelled to own and profess it whether they will or no.

And thus Mahomet having arrived at the 34th Year of his age, died at last miserably of a Draught of Poison. There are some who say that seven Days before he died he was delirious: That his Belly was swelled like a Tun, and being full of dolorous pain, he thus gave up the Ghost, and ended his wicked Life. They say besides, that Mahomet before his Death desired of his Friends and Acquaintance he should not be buried till three Days after he was dead; for that on the 3^d Day after his Death, he should be taken up to Heaven. But they delay'd burying him not only three but twelve Days, still expecting when he should be taken up, but all in vain. For after their long expectation, finding nothing of the matter, and his Body stinking most horribly, being thus enraged, they thrust him under Ground without a Coffin.

After the Death of this wicked Impostor, his Followers, and chiefly the Caliph who succeeded him in the Empire, fearing lest by so scandalous a Death and Burial, the new broach'd Heresy, together with the Empire, should be both dissolved, he ordered his nasty Carcass to be taken up again, and put in an Iron Coffin or Chest, and they placed it in a Temple whose Walls were of Loadstones: thus the Chest being attracted by the Loadstone upwards, it is reported it there hung pendulous in the Air without any thing to support it until the year of our Lord 1470, being the space of 870 Years; for at that time a violent Storm of Lightning and Hail falling upon part of that Profane Temple, did so shake it, and dash'd the Coffin with the wretched Body to pieces, that it was all beat to ashes, and sunk into the Earth so as it could never be found nor seen again. Now the Mahometans alledg this to be the cause and occasion of this matter, That God being being provoked by the Sins of Mankind, was resolv'd to destroy the whole Frame of the Universe; but Mahomet interceding, and requesting that Blow should light on him alone and on his Sepulcher, he thereby appeas'd God; and so having thus destroy'd the place of his Burial, he spared Mankind.

And this place of his Burial continues still to be had in so much Veneration and Esteem among them of that Sect, that a great part of those who have seen it do immediately burst out into tears upon mentioning it, as if it were unlawful for those who had beheld Mahomet's Tomb, ever to look upon any thing else afterwards: And thus continue weeping till they make themselves stark blind. A just punishment for such wretched fools, that they who before had suffered themselves to be blinded in their understanding, should now likewise be deprived of the Light of their Eyes. And so much of Mahomet. Baum-

C H A P. IX.

After having suffered much by extremity of Weather, at last they enter Baruthum. The excessive Cold in Antilibanum. The pleasantness of the Country about Baruthum. Acts of Titus in that City. Fruit of the Place. Sarepta, Sidon, and Parts adjacent.

ON the 17th Day of January, intending to leave our Hut and pursue our Journey, there arose a most terrible Storm of Wind and Rain, with Thunder and Lightning, which continued at so excessive a rate, as we could not possibly stir from whence we were. And so being forced to stay, we spent all that day in disputing with some Jews, that had been travelling that way, about Religion. We made a shift to kindle a Fire, but it being made of Green-wood, it filled the Hut so with smoke that it had like to have blinded us; thus we continued for some time, till at last our Mule-driver got us a better and larger Fire of Charcoal.

On the 18th we left this place, travelling on foot; for the Hills and Dales were so covered and filled with Snow that there was no traveling for the Mules with the Carriage. As we were coming down from the Mountains we were caught in a cold and heavy Rain, which so swelled the Brooks and Rivers that they ran down with much impetuosity, and carry'd Stones, Sand, and every thing with them that came in their way. We here stop'd again, and in a worse condition than before; for having nowhere to shelter our selves, we contracted a grievous Cold, standing in our Clothes all wet, and it raining very hard. Tho we had three Coats on, the Rain had got through them all, and so loaded them, that they were unsupportable. There was no remedy for us but Patience, and the hopes of a better fortune.

Having thus past the greatest part of the Day, we descended at last into a Plain, where we reached and entred into Baruthum, and were very kindly received there into a Venetian House. Here we refresh'd our selves by changing our Clothes, and the help of a good Fire, and good Victuals. The Day following a Messenger arriv'd from the Mountains of Antilibanum (where we met with so much hardship) giving an account of three Men and four Camels that had been frozen to death: Which when we heard, we thanked our most Gracious Saviour, that we had so narrowly escaped the same fate. The same Day we went out of the City with the Venetian Merchants, and some Friars of the Monastery of St. Saviour, to take a view of the Situation of the Town, and the Ground about it; we entertained our selves with the charming Pleasantness of these Fields; we saw many Olive-yards, and Almond-trees just in their Bloom, the Land very fruitful and well watered, abounding with Pomegranate-trees, and Trees of many other kinds, which at that time were full of Fruit. This Prospect afforded us a great deal of Pleasure, and was the Object of our Admiration. For at the same time that in our Country the Ground is covered all over with hoar-Frost, the Rivers frozen up, and the Woods hardly able to sustain the weight of Snow that is ready to break down all their Boughs; here is a charming Spring, the Brooks sweetly gliding and making a murmuring noise as they flow, adorned on both sides with Grass and Flowers, the Trees so loaden with Fruit, that they often sink and fall to the Ground under their Burthen. And which was still more wonderful, the Mountains within our view were at the same time all covered with Snow.

A Cold fatal to the Antilibanians.

Baruthus, or as the Moderns call it, Berithus, was once a Colony of the Romans, as may be seen by the Ruins of the Amphitheater; and as Josephus mentions in his 7th Book of the Jewish War, it was one of the chief Cities of Phœnicia; where Titus stay'd a considerable time after the taking of Jerusalem; having made there a very great Solemnity on his Father's Birth-day, both by exhibiting to the People Splendid Shews, and exposing a multitude of Captives, some to be devoured by wild Beasts, and the rest forced to kill one another as if they were fighting in a Battel against their Enemies. In this City, as the same Author relates, Agrippa having laid out a vast Sum of Money in building a Theater, appointed Splendid Shows which were to be observed yearly in Commemoration of the Founder. He bestow'd on the People very plentiful Doles of Corn and Oil, and adorned the whole City with beautiful Statues, and stately Images of the Antients, that all the Kingly Pomp and Grandeur seem'd to be transported thither. When Christianity flourish'd in these parts, it was an Episcopop See, at this day 'tis more like a Village than a City. There are however many ruinous Monuments of its Antiquity still extant, and many and various Goods and Merchandizes are Imported into, and Exported out of it. The Musa or Plantane-trees do here grow in such plenty, that from hence they are carry'd to many Places round about; viz. Tripoli, Damascus, Damiata, and as far as Alexandria in Egypt. The Fruit of the Musa or Plantane, in colour and shape is not unlike a Bean, but it is a great deal larger, of a very pleasant tast, and a very sweet and wholesom smell, and tasting very like Honey. They grow in Clusters, that is in Bunches, ten, twenty, and sometimes more in a Cluster together; which wheresoever you cut it, and as often as it is cut, let it be in never so many pieces, you shall plainly see on both sides of the part cut a Cross. They say that this is the Tree of Knowledg of Good and Evil, which the Lord forbad Adam to eat; and 'tis commonly called here Adam's Tree. The Leaves of it are ten Foot long, and a hand-breadth and half-broad, on which they used to write in former times before the Invention of Paper. About three Miles from Baruthus lies the City Sarepta of the Sidonians, where, as it is recorded in 3 King. 17. Elias miraculously encreased the poor Woman's Meal and Oil, and rais'd her Son from Death.

About two Miles from hence is Sidon, Sidon once a Famous and Potent City of Phœnicia, where Dido celebrated by Virgil was born, who having fled from her Brother who sought her life, built Carthage, ever emulous of the Roman Empire. Having gone to Baruthum again, we stay'd there several Days, expecting the Barks that were to carry us over into Cyprus.

C H A P. X.

A Voyage to Tripoli. Passus Canis, or Passo di Cane. The River Narriabrahim. Biblus. Patran, or Botros.

ON the 29th arriv'd a Messenger, who brought us an account that the Ship was laden, and ready to sail to Cyprus; wherefore without tarrying any longer, we got all our Baggage put up, and in a Boat, and having taken leave of our Landlord, we immediately departed. We thought it not advisable to go by Land, because of the Robbers, who but the day before had murdered two Persons upon the Road; for at that time the Governour of Baruthum, and the Governour of Tripoli were at deadly and open Enmity with one another. Rowing thus along the Bay for the space of three Miles and upwards, we landed on the Coast of Tripoli, near a place called in Latin Passus Canis, but in the Saracen Language Narrikelb. This place is so called, because of a River that flows into the Sea, having in the mouth of it a Rock, standing in the very middle of the River, and one half above Water. This Rock in Figure resembles a Dog, and by the violent dashing of the Stream against it makes a noise like the barking of a Dog. In this place ended the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, and began that of Antioch; it lies in the middle between Baruthum and Tripoli, but it belongs to Tripoli.

Having, as was said before, been set on shore in this place, we hired Mules again, gain, and travelled all that Day along the Sea-shore. Afterwards we came to a River, which the Turks call Narriabrahim, over which there is a stately Bridge of Square-stone; we were afterwards fain to shelter our selves in a Hut that by good luck we light on, from the violent Rain; and here we staid all that Night, glad to take up our Lodging among the Mules.

On the 30th of January rising betimes in the Morning, three Hours before the Sun was up, we moved from thence, and had a troublesom Journey of it; for the way being very rough, and it being so dark that we could not see our way, we often came tumbling down to the Ground with our Mules, Baggage and all, which put us to abundance of inconvenience. But when the Sun appeared, we had a much easier Journey of it. We came at last to a Town half demolished, which at that time was called Jubiletum, but formerly Biblus, or Bibium; and was an Episcopal See. Strabo, Lib. 16. says this Biblus was of old the Palace of Cynera, in which were the Temples of Adonis; and when oppressed by a Tyrant, that Pompey restored their Liberty by killing him. A little after we came to Patron, formerly Botros, a Town once famous for Glory and Wealth, abounding with excellent Wine, Oil, and all sorts of Fruit; but now 'tis a very small Town, yet encompassed with a Wall. Having left Botros, because we travelled by the Sea-side, we entred into a mountainous Wood, and went on till we came to the top of the Mountains, and then turn'd down to the Sea again. We found the way very difficult, and the Sun going down we arrived at last at Tripoli, and went to a Venetian House, where we were made welcome, and very kindly entertained, &c.

C H A P. XI.

A Survey of Libanus. Delightfulness of the Territory of Tripoli. Wealth of its Inhabitants. Reason of the Names of Tripoli and Libanus. Its Fruitfulness.

ON the 31st Day we went out of the Town to have a view of the Place, having for our Guide Alberto Coleth a Physician of Tripoli; and that we might have the fuller view, we went to the top of a Hill hard by. We saw about three Miles off of the City the so much celebrated Mount Libanus, which was very high indeed, and then covered with Snow, but full of Cedar, Firs, Plane-trees, and a great many other stately Trees. Here was to be seen too the Streams of Water mentioned in the Canticles, that run violently into the Sea. The lower Hills and places adjoining to the City are full of Vineyards, Corn, and Olive-trees. Here may be seen on all sides of it pleasant and delightful Fields, Rivers, Brooks, and cool and refreshing Springs. Here are various sorts of Trees, bearing several sorts of Fruit, Silks and Silkworms; here are delicious Flowers for colour and smell. In short, here is to be seen as much variety of every thing as can make a place delightful.

The People inhabiting the adjacent parts are likewise very rich, and this is owing to the Situation of the place, because of its many Navigable Rivers, whereby they have the conveniency of buying and trucking all sorts of Merchandize, and thereby enriching themselves. Strabo will have the name Tripoli to be given it, because of its three Cities, viz. Tyre, Sidon, and Aradum; and that Libanus is so call'd from its Whiteness, because 'tis continually covered with Snow both Summer and Winter; which tho it seem dry, yet abounds with many pleasant and wholesom Springs. It produces Cedars, Cypress-trees, Olive-trees, and a Gum which they call Olibanum; and many more Trees and Herbs very serviceable and beneficial to Mankind. It is free from Serpents, and all other Venomous Creatures, and formerly produc'd Excellent Wines.

Medals dug up about Tripoli. Arabian Metamorphosis. Persian Water, its Virtue and Use.

An antient Medal of Gold.

ON the 1st day of February we went out of the Town again to take a view of its situation on the other side; and there we saw in the first place the Harbour of the City fortified with many Towers, and the Ruins of antient Tripoli, out of which were dug up many Medals, and other Monuments of Antiquity. There Mr. Coletb shewed us a piece of Gold that happened to be dug up there lately, having on it the Image of Mars with a Spear in his hand, and this Inscription.

Restitutor Reip. Sp. F. Aug. d. N. Valen.

We saw likewise two more of Silver, one of Augustus Cæsar, and the other of Romulus and Remus sucking a She-Wolf. Afterwards having seen several other things we return'd home again, and were entertain'd at Dinner with many strange and wonderful Relations of the Sophi and his Exploits, and of other Matters that were famous and much talk'd of in those Eastern Countries. We were credibly inform'd, by very grave and prudent Men, that on the way as you go to Mecca, there was, or rather had been, a certain great City, in which, by the dreadful Judgment of God, not only Men and Beasts were turned into Stone, but likewise their very Utensils, and each according to its own former Shape and Figure. The same day, while we were listening to this Relation, and some others of the like nature, there came to the place where we were two Men of Cyprus with a wonderful Water that they had been sent out of Cyprus into Persia to fetch. Of this same Water they told very strange stories, particularly, that if any of it happened to drop on the ground, or any Vessel it was in, it no sooner touched the ground, but it vanished immediately out of sight; that for this reason they were obliged always to have it fix'd on a forked stick: That it was of great use against the Caterpillars that destroy the Corn, for that in whatever Place or Country they kept some of this Water, Caterpillars could no longer live there: That formerly Cyprus had been much infested with this sort of Vermin, but that the Inhabitants having got some of this Water and hung it up in one of their Temples, the whole Island was by that means freed from them. They told us moreover, that they had been sent for this Water by the Governor of Cyprus, and that they had been above ten Months in their Journey: That when they first set out there were four of them, but that the other two being almost starved to death with the cold, were not able to come up with them. What was related to us here, we found to be actually true when we came to Cyprus, as that it was not only sprinkled on their Fields against the Caterpillars, but that it was commonly drank as a Remedy or Medicine against most Distempers, and that it was effectual to that purpose.

C H A P. XIII.

A Persian Coin. Mahometan Sects. History of the Pedigree and Exploits of Sophi. His Religion and Manners. Sultan of Egypt's arrogant Titles.

ON the 2^d day of February there overtook us an Italian Merchant from the City of Aleppo, which is situated in the Confines of the Turks and Sultan's Dominions, and parts both their Empires. This Man related strange and incredible Stories of the Sophi, and shewed us first, and after much perswasion and entreaty, at last delivered to us a piece of his Money, being Silver, and very large indeed, and in value worth a Scraph; on which there was this Inscription in Arabick; Sophi Bitzind roshel halla elkaber liballadey ana Sultan Sophi. The meaning whereof is this, I am the true SULTAN; that is, PRINCE SOPHI, sent by God for the banishment of all my Enemies. The same Merchant moreover told us, that the same Sophi had in his Army above 200 thousand very warlike Men, that he was at

at deadly Enmity with the Turk, had lately killed above fifteen thousand of his Men; and having slain three Sons of a very powerful Turkish Prince, called Haliduli, he was now marching against the Grand Turk himself. I will therefore in this place give a short Account of this Sophi, according to what I learned of this Merchant and others.

There was a Nephew of Mahomet's, by name Haly, who being likewise esteemed a Saint and a Prophet by his Followers, this Impostor broach'd a new Heresy: For the Mahometan Superstition is divided into 72 Sects, out of all which they believe one only by which they can be saved; but which is that one, they cannot yet come to a determination. Every Sect think their own the only true one, and that all the rest are in the state of Damnation; and more especially those of Sophi's Sect live in the belief of this. From this Haly aforesaid sprung this Sophi, whose proper name was Ischa Ismael. For Sophi is the name of the Sect, as were the Sects of the Arians and Manicheans among the Christians. For their Opinions see 1 Lips. lib. de una relig.

This Sophi's Father and Mother died while he was a Child, and he himself was driven out of his native Country by the Tyrant who had killed his Father. When he was grown up to Man's Estate, he got together an undisciplined Rabble, and with them march'd without any order to a populous and rich City, which he took in spite of the Tyrant, and here exercised a barbarous Cruelty, putting all to the Sword, and sparing neither Sex nor Age. This Action struck Terror into the King, and all the Princes round about. There flocked to him great numbers from all parts, especially those of the Sophian Sect, being encouraged by the fame of his Generosity, for he divided all the plunder of that rich City among his Soldiers; and likewise because of an old Prophecy they had among them, That there should arise one of Haly's Offspring, who should advance the Fame and Glory of their Sect above the Skies. Sophi thus encouraged and strengthen'd in number of Soldiers, made daily Excursions into the neighbouring territories, destroying all with Fire and Sword wherever he came; and partly by Force, and partly by Policy, he had the good fortune to get into his power some of their best fortified Towns and Castles. He had several times engaged a numerous Army with a small handful of Men, and yet came off victorious; whereby he became very formidable, not only to private Citys, but even to his Adversary the King of Persia, who seeing him thus daily to increase in Strength and Courage, fearing the worst, sent against him the General of his Army.

Sophi not in the least daunted hereat, met, engaged, and vanquished him. This Victory and Triumph so enhanced the esteem his Men had of him, that they began now to extol him, not as a Man, but even to adore him as a God that had come down from Heaven, and his Enemies dreaded him like Lightning. But the King of Persia imputing his late Loss to the ill Conduct of his General, resolv'd to go himself in Person; and raising a more numerous Army than the former, advanced at the Head of them; and having engaged with Sophi, was by him taken and slain. He afterwards married the deceased King's Daughter, who taking occasion to resent her Father's Death, and blaming him for it, he killed her too with his own hands; which Cruelty when the Mother also reprehended, she had the same Fate. In this manner did Sophi prevail over all his Adversaries, insomuch that Divine Honours were paid him by all the East almost. They say, that to get himself the more Veneration, he never appeared in publick but with his Face covered: That he used no Counsellors: That he was extremely fond of a Cat he kept, whose Divination he observed in all his Actions. He is said to have kept a great Hog too, which in contempt of the Turks he called Turk: They say he equally hated the Turks and Jews, and loved the Christians, as appears plainly by a Christian who had made his escape out of the Slavery of the Turks, and went to him for protection. This Man having proved himself to be a Christian, by shewing that he was not circumcised, had of Sophi a good Horse, and a great Sum of Mony, and a free Passport to Damascus; where he safely arrived, and gave this Account, and several other Relations to the Venetian Merchants that resided there.

He was of a middle Stature, about seven and twenty Years old; of a corpulent Body; very moderate in Pleasures; enjoy'd all things in common with his Friends, reserving nothing to himself in particular. He was fortified by an Army richly accoutred with Gold and warlike Arms. Some days before, his Embassy that was sent to the Sultan, tarried some time at Damascus. They all of them wore long Caps, with twelve foldings.

And thus much of Sophi. What the Sultan thinks of himself, may be plainly seen by his Letters to the General of the Venetians, which the Consul of Tripoli shewed us. In them he loads himself with these Titles.

the Sultan.*

"Sultan the Great Sovereign Governor, named Camfonalgaauri, Elnelekelezeraph, the Mighty, Excellent, Noble, Wise, Just Warrior: A constant protector of his Countries, and who by God's Assistance is victorious, King of Kings, the Sword of the World and of Faith. Sultan and Prince of the Mahometan Religion, and of Mahometans. The Restorer of Justice over all the World, and who by Hereditary Right possesses the Kingdoms of it. Sultan of the Arabians, of Persia and Turkey. The Shadow of God on Earth. An Observer of the Commandments of God and his Prophets; and who at this time is a second Alexander, from whom do proceed many good things; who is Governor of all that sit on Tribunals, and Thrones, and of crowned Heads. Governor of Climates and Countries, Persecutor of rebellious Infidels, Hereticks, and Pagans; the Protector of the two places of Pilgrimage. The High-Priest of the two Sacred Temples; who is the Gatherer and Keeper of the Words of God; who defends the Needy with Justice, and furnishes them with rich Gifts. Ruler of Rulers: At this time Priest of those things which belong to God. Caliph's Vicegerent, who is the Prince of true Believers, Father of Victories. Constant in the Rule and Dominion God has given him, and he will make his Army and People Victorious; and God will exalt him above the Sign of Gemini. This is the Sultan's Title.

What reason there is for so many, so great and thundering Titles, and what the meaning of them is, even a blind Man may see. Yet as Horace says, Spectatum admissi risum teneatis amici.

The Saracens Feast after their Fast is over. A Prodigy of Nature betwixt Baruthum and Tripoli. A Diabolical Sect of false Christians at Tripoli.

Solemnity.* ON the 3d day having, as we had twice before, gone out of the City again, we saw all the People of the Town in the Fields at play at Sports; for the Saracen time of Fasting was just over with them, and they kept at this time, as it were, the Feast of the Passover, or Easter, drawing themselves up into Companies, and riding up and down. But we saw nothing worth noting at this Solemnity.

Setting our selves down upon a Sandy Hill hard by, the Venetian Consul at Tripoli, who perfectly understood the modern and antient State of that Country, observing us to be inquisitive to know all we could learn of it, he told us, that there was one thing very amazing and remarkable which we had not yet heard of; and therefore said he, this old Gentleman (pointing to a reverend old Man that stood by) and I will tell you the matter, which we were both eye-witnesses of. Between Baruthum and Tripoli is a Mountain so steep, and hanging over the Sea, that there's no coming at what I am a going to give a description of, but in Ships. At the foot of this Mountain is a large wide Cave, that continually vomits out cold Water; to which when you approach near you shall see a Hand reaching a Dish from the mouth of the Cave. And if your Curiosity is not herewith satisfied, and you attempt to come nigher; all of a sudden the whole Vision disappears. And if again you withdraw back, you shall see the same Hand and Vessel again very clearly. The Consul added moreover, that this Cave was perfectly inaccessible, the place was so steep and dangerous to come at.

The same Gentleman in the same place told us a thing more deserving severe Punishment than Observation, viz. That not far from Tripoli there was a Sect of People who boasted themselves to be Christians, but were more like Devils. For their custom is at a certain time to meet together in dark Caves, Men and Women promiscuously, and there to go together like Beasts, the Father with the Daughter, the Son with the Mother, and every every one take, without regard, the first they light on. And of the wicked Issue which such impious Encounters produce, they always save the Females alive, and prick the Males to death with Needles yearly, and with their Blood they offer Sacrifice. Good Lord, how abominable is the very thought of such a thing!

After this having hired a Ship, we thought to have failed to Cyprus, but the Wind hindered us: And besides, the Owner of the Ship was the occasion of Baumour staying longer too, for the Prince of Tripoli on some frivolous Pretences had twice imprison'd him, and exacted a grievous Fine of him, so that 'twas with much ado and intreaty, that the Venetian Merchants prevailed with the greedy Tyrant to set him at liberty.

C H A P. XV.

They pursue their Voyage. Mastick. History of a Shipwreck. Their arrival at Cyprus. Denomination of the Island. Salt-pits about the City, and Monuments of Antiquity.

ON the 6th day, having implored God's Assistance, we went on board and sailed the same Evening with a fair Wind towards Cyprus. We found in the Vessel, the Owner of a Ship and his Crew that had been shipwreck'd: He was of the Island Cbio, the only Place of all the Countries in the World that produces Mastick. The Genoeses possess so much of this Island, that they pay a great yearly Tribute to the Turk; for they have a Tradition, that as long as the Turks inhabit the Island, it will never produce any Mastick. This Shipmaster had loaded his Ship with Merchandize of several sorts, and was bound from Damiata (which was antiently called Helopolis) to Tripoli, and sailing one Holy-day was by the violence of the Winds driven upon a Rock hidden under Water, on which his Ship split, being leaky in several places: They made shift however to keep her three days from sinking, being all that time tossed among the Rocks; and they had certainly all perished by the cold, if God's Providence had not provided for them otherwise; for the Ship being miserably shattered before, was by a huge and mighty Wave that came on her, all split in pieces, and sunk to the bottom with all her Lading; the Men were all saved but one, who was swallowed up by the raging Sea as he was making ready to swim. When the rest got to Land, the poor Wretches pick'd up as much as they could of the Wreck the Sea had thrown out; and glad of their deliverance, came to Tripoli, where they no sooner arrived, but the Governor seized on all they had, adding Affliction to the Afflicted; and so merciless was he, that they had much ado to prevent their being put in Chains and imprisoned: And a doleful sight it was to see the poor old Man with his gray Beard, lame of his Legs, have neither Penny nor Pennys-worth; he who once carried others for Freight, now fain to be a Passenger himself in another Man's Ship, all nasty, and half starved with hunger.

On the 8th of February, about the 3d hour of the day, we arrived at Cyprus, and got into Harbour at Salina; here we staid many days for certain Reasons. This City was of old called Salamis, or Cyprus Salamina, on this occasion. Salamina is a ^{why call'd} certain Island in the Eubæan Sea, over against Athens, having in it a City of the same name, in which reigned Telamon the Father of Ajax and Teucer. But when Teucer returned from the Trojan War, and had not revenged his Brother Ajax's Death, being exil'd by his Father, he went to Cyprus, and called this City there after the name of his native Country.

In this City it was that Paul and Barnabas preached, as 'tis Acts 13. And there too it was that Barnabas suffered Martyrdom. There is near it a Lake of excellent Salt, which being coagulated by the heat of the Sun only, proves the best Sa't of any, and is exported in great quantities into Syria, Greece, Italy, and other Countries, yielding great Profit to the State of Venice.

Near the Harbour of Salamina is a Church, in one end whereof the Greeks, and in the other the Latins perform their Divine Worship.

Not far from this place, by the Sea, at the foot of a Hill, are to be seen the Ruins of an Amphitheatre; adjoining to it is a Cave laid with Pyramidal Stones, and and about it many huge Stones and pieces of Antiquity, and Pillars of white Marble, but the Inscriptions are totally defaced.

C H A P. XVI.

Nymosia or Nicosia, a City of Cyprus. Its Episcopal See. A Storm at Sea. A Pirat at Rhodes. Piscopia rased. Paphus; Its Founder.

THE third day of March, because our Ship was to be loaded with Corn in another part of the Island, leaving all our things on board, we travelled by Land, both for our Recreation, and to have the better view of the Island. The first place we came to the next day was Lymosin, of old Nymosia, and lodged in the Bishop's House; for this is one of the four Episcopal Sees that are in Cyrus. The first is in Leucosia, now called Nicosia. The second at Famagusta. The third in Paphus. Which Episcopal Sees are each of them double, so that in every one of them there's both a Greek and Latin Bishop. The same day about Noon our Ship arriv'd, so we made hast to get some Provisions, which we carried with us and went on board. Sailing from thence immediately, before we had got a mile off, the Wind rose and blew so hard, that we were forced to anchor under a Promontory; and there did we for three days together without intermission dance and caper, but not very merrily, having for Musick the loud noise of the Winds, the ratling of the Storm, and the roaring of the Sea. While we were thus circumstanc'd, there came up with us a Pirat Ship belonging to Rhodes, who asking us whence we came, and what we had on board? when they found that all belong'd to Christians, they took away from us some Oars they wanted, and left us.

On the 8th day about Noon, the Storm being over, we set sail, and lanching out into the main Sea, we sailed by Colossus a Village of Cyprus, remarkable for its great plenty of Sugar. We sailed by Piscopia too, a City which one of the Kings of England once ras'd to the ground, in revenge of his Sister's having been debauched, having left her there as he was going to Jerusalem.

On the 10th day we came to Paphus: This is a noble City, formerly the Metropolis of Cyprus, and the Palace of Venus; now a very desolate and ruinous place, as most of the Citys of Cyprus are, occasioned by the frequent Earthquakes that happen there, yet by the very Ruins it appears what once it was. In Paphus the Air is not very wholesom, nor indeed in all Cyprus, tho it abounds with Marjoram, Hyssop, and other wholesom Herbs. This City was built by Paphus, Pigmaleon's Son by Eburnea, who called it after his own Name, and consecrated it to Venus, to whom also they dedicate a very large Temple; to which, as some will have it, when Helen arrived from Greece, being stolen by Paris, she repaired, and gave occasion to the Trojan War. Others will have this to be done in Cythera, an Island mentioned before in my first Book.

C H A P. XVII.

Our stay at Corfico, a Village. Presents made to us there. Cyprus describ'd; its Situation, Fertility, Citys, Inhabitants. Their grievous Oppression.

ON the 11th day setting out from Paphus, we arrived in the dark Night at the Town of Corfico, which is situated in a very pleasant Valley, having a Prospect over the Sea as far as Cilicia, which is now called Scandilora. Here we spent several days, till the Ship was loaded with Corn and Silk. In the mean time we had Presents offered to us of Almonds, Peaches, and other Fruits of the same Year's which afforded us no less subject of admiration, than of pleasure and deliciousness, to consider the extreme coldness of the Weather in our Country at that very season.

Cyprus, a noble Island situated in the Carpathian Sea, in the middle of the greatest Bay of Asia, lying from East to West in a right Line between Cilicia and Syria, the most considerable and famous Island in the World, antiently abounding with Riches; too much addicted to (Luxury,

Luxury, and for that reason consecrated to Venus; is very large, and formerly had the Title and Wealth of a Kingdom. This Island is called Cethim in the Holy Scripture; is very fruitful of Corn, abounding with Silkworms, Silks, Oil, Sugar, and Wine. Here are very beautiful Hills, most pleasant and delightful Valleys, always resounding with the melodious singing of Birds: Here are warm Suns, shady Groves, dewy Herbs, green Grass, and soft downy Meadows to lie down and rest upon. Yet notwithstanding all this fruitfulness and pleasantness, neither its Citys nor Villages are much frequented, but as if it was barren and a desert place it is inhabited only by a few People that live in Cottages. It has no Citys but Nicosia and Famagusta; the former of which is famous for its largeness, and for the ruling Power of the Governor residing there; the latter is remarkable for its Harbour and Fortifications. Besides all the Inhabitants of Cyprus are Slaves to the Venetians, being obliged to pay to the State a third part of Baum- all their Increase or Income, whether the garten- Product of their Ground or Corn, Wine, Oil, or of their Cattel, or any other thing. Besides, every Man of them is bound to work for the State two days of the week wherever they shall please to appoint him: And if any shall fail, by reason of some other business of their own, or for indisposition of Body, then they are made to pay a Fine for as many days as they are absent from their Work: And which is more, there is yearly some Tax or other imposed on them, with which the poor common People are so fleeced and pillaged, that they hardly have wherewithal to keep Soul and Body together.

Slavery of the Inhabitants.*

We spent the rest of our time with a great deal of uneasiness in this Island, being forced to tarry till the Ship had taken in her lading of several sorts of Merchandize.

C H A P. XVIII.

Indian Rams. Calmness of the Sea. Birds pay Freight. Nature of a Cocala. Gulph of Satalia. What Helen did there.

ON the 28th day of March having a gentle Breeze, we weigh'd Anchor, and set sail from Cyprus before Sun-rising; and not being able to make much way, we diverted our selves with two Indian Rams that were in the Ship, who fought together continually: Each of 'em had four Horns, two in the Forehead exactly long and streight, only a little crooked at the ends, and almost meeting together in one place, and then parting again, and blunt and round at Points (such as the Grand Sultan's Crown, and his Caliph's, which we had seen in Cairo, as I mention'd before) the other two Horns were near the Ears, all plain and even, and much shorter than the first two.

On the 29th day there was so great a Calm all the day long, that the Sea seem'd immoveable and smooth as Glass. That day a Flock of Birds, which had ventured from the Land on the calm Sea, their Wings being tired, rested on the Masts of the Ship; which the Pilot of the Ship observing, took no notice till night came, and then made them pay for their Passage on the hot Coals. There was one Bird among them called Cocala, Bird Co all white, as big as a Goose; which fly- cala. ing aloft, and hovering above the Sea, spies the small Fishes swimming on the top of the Water, catches 'em in his long and crooked Claws, and tears 'em to pieces; this is his Food and daily Exercise.

On the 30th day, and the day after, we sailed over in very calm and clear Weather the Gulph of Satalia, which is likewise called Helen's Gulph; for in this place Helen, Mother of Constantine, whilst she was a coming from Jerusalem to Constantinople, happened to be tost in a grievous Tempest; and 'tis reported, that by throwing into the Sea one of the Nails that had pierced the Feet of Christ, the Storm immediately ceased, and the Sea grew calm. The Mariners are so much afraid of this Gulph, that they shrink at the name of it.

C H A P. XIX.

Danger at Sea. Arrival at Rhodes. Its Situation. Colossus of the Sun there. Inhabitants. Fortification. Victory. Sultan's Exactions.

ON the 1st Day of April we labour'd in a contrary Wind, but on the 2^d Day we came within view of the Castle Rhodzi (which stands on a very high and steep Rock near Rhodes) as our Men were tacking the Ship, there arose such a strong contrary Wind that it split our Main-sail from top to bottom; then we gave our selves up for lost. For sometimes we were tossed up to the Skies by a great Sea, and when that was gone we all of a sudden were let down again to the lowest deeps. There was nothing to be heard but loud Cries, Prayers and Lamentations, one despaired, and another gave Exhortations; in a word we were all in a frightful consternation. In this extremity all of us at once endeavour'd to hawl in the torn Sail, and with much ado got it into the Ship, for before it flew abroad in the open air; and having hoisted another Sail in the room of it, we got her before the Wind again, and so steer'd her with more ease, which revived us, giving God thanks for our Gracious Deliverance. In a little time the Wind calmed a little again, and we discovered the Island Rhodes, which gave us hopes of faring better in a little time.

On the 3^d Day at the Mouth of the Harbour we met a Ship of Rhodes, going to Turky a Pirating. They told us that about eight Days before five Turkish Frigats (which are commonly called Fuste) had engaged them under the foresaid Castle of Rhodzi, but that by the Valour of the Rhodians they were defeated, and forc'd to retire with dishonour and loss. After we had parted with them we came into the Harbour of the famous Rhodes, and having cast Anchor there we furled our Sails. We went out of the Ship, and into the City, which is very much renowned both for its Strength and famous Exploits. This City was often besieged by the Sultan of Egypt, and also by the Turk, both bitter Enemies of Christianity. They have endeavoured with all their Forces to destroy it; but notwithstanding all their Stratagems, and formidable Armies, they were still defeated, and received more mischief than they were able to give. At last they were forc'd after all their art and obstinacy to leave it free; and on this day 'tis one of the greatest

This Island, as Pomponius Mela witnesseth lib. 2. is in the Province of Lycia, and is the first of the Cyclades to such as sail from the East. In the City of Rhodes, besides other remarkable things, there was a vast Colossus of the Sun made by Colossus Chares a Lydian, the Scholar of Lisippus, of the Sun, seventy Cubits high, as Pliny reports; very few Men could grasp the Thumb of it, for the Fingers of it were bigger than ordinary Statues. When any of the Members happened to be broke off, there appeared vast hollow places, wherein were huge Stones in the inside, which the Founder had put there to make it stand the firmer. It was twelve Years making, and cost 300 Talents, which they bestowed upon it out of the Treasure that King Demetrius left. This Colossus is justly reckoned one of the Seven Wonders of the World, and was the occasion of the Rhodians being called Colossians, to whom there is a Canonical Epistle of St. Paul extant by that name. Its Circumference is 920 Furlongs. It was once called Ophyusa, afterwards Staclia, and then Tecblen, because it was inhabited by Tecblenites. Solinus says of it, That the Weather is never so cloudy but Rhodes is always in the Sun, therefore it was consecrated to the Sun. Its Inhabitants do now live in Towers for fear of Pirates; they carry Corn and other Victuals to Rhodes, and lay 'em up in Cellars, and other places under Ground, fitted for that purpose, and take it out again as they have occasion, as out of a Store-house. And if at any time an Enemy invade them on a sudden, they make Signals with Fire on the top of their Towers, which they have in every Village, which alarms in a moment of time the whole Island, so that they immediately meet and consult what is necessary to be done.

The City it self is encompassed with three Ditches, which are large and very deep. And then again there is a very strong Wall to every Ditch, planted full of great Guns and small Arms of all kinds. The Fortifications, Towers, and Breast-works are so strong, that they seem to be made of Iron, and wrought by the hands of the Cyclops. The Inhabitants have have no dealings, no correspondence or friendship with Infidels ; but maintain a constant War sometimes with the Neighbouring Turks, and sometimes with the Moors, Africans, Egyptians, and other Enemies of their Religion. And this same Year, a little before we arrived, a Ship of Rhodes of a small size happened to engage with another of a much larger Bulk, which had on Board 500 Africans, and 200 Jews, which after a long and bloody dispute they at last defeated, took and plundered, bringing her in Prisoner to the Harbour of Rhodes.

So soon as the Sultan had an account of it, he immediately dispatched an Embas-sador (whom we saw while we were there) first to demand with Entreaty, and afterwards by Threats, the delivery of the Ship with all the Prisoners and Goods. But the Great Master of Rhodes, neither moved by fair words, nor daunted with threats, would grant none of their Demands. Nay, he put the King of Tunis's own Brother, and the Great Men he had with him in Chains, and appointed a Guard to watch them. The rest of the common sort that he had taken Prisoners on board the Ship he ordered to dig in the Ditches of the City, and to other hard Labours.

C H A P. XX.

Philermo. Rhodian Mills. Peter's Garison. Dogs there of a wonderful Sagacity. Islands Cyclades. Danger of Sailing in the Aegean Sea.

THE 7th Day the Ship detaining us, we went on foot to Philermo, about five Miles from Rhodes; there's a very high Hill, and upon it a Temple dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, where we heard Sermon and Prayers. There had been here formerly a large well fortified City, now only a small Castle, but strong. From thence we went back to Rhodes again. In the Port of Rhodes there are thirteen great Towers, containing Windmills built by the Genouese Captives for the punishing of Traitors, and for a publick good. In the Castle of Rhodes the Great Master of the Johannites has his Residence, having many more Islands round about subject to him, and especially a Fort placed in the Confines of Turky, called St. Peter's Fort, where 'tis reported, there are a great number of Dogs kept, and (which is wonderful, and almost incredible) they are so sagacious and well-bred up, that being let loose in the Night-time into the Enemies Country, whomsoever of the Infidels they meet with, they instantly assault and tear to pieces ; but the Christians they know by the Scent, and without offering them any violence, they very kindly conduct and protect them on the way till they come to the Fort aforesaid. They report of these Dogs too, that at the ringing of a Bell, they all meet in a moments time, and receiving their Meat do march out every one into his Quarter to the abovesaid purpose, like so many Scouts or Spies. The Christian Prisoners that are kept in slavery by the Turks, sensible of this, do as often as Providence puts an opportunity in their way, steal out in the Night-time towards this Fort, and meeting the Dogs there, are by them safely guided home to their Friends. For even whilst we were there, we saw one that had made his Escape out of Russia in that manner. The same Evening having taken some Refreshment, and got some Provision for our Voyage, we went on board our Ship again, and weighing Anchor immediately, we sailed from that place with a very small Gale of Wind.

On the 8th Day we sail'd among the Cyclades that are scattered in the Sea, not without fear of Pirates and dangers of the perilous Sea. For we stood on our Watch Night and Day, and always armed, being ready upon the first appearance of danger to ingage.

The Islands Cyclades are situated on the Aegean Sea, now called the Archipelagus, and are so called because they lie round in the form of a Circle. They are seventy four in number, all of 'em placed between the Aegean and Mææan Seas. In the middle of them is Delos, called also Ortygia, from the Quails first seen there, and Pyrpile, because Fire was first found there ; by some 'tis called Asteria, by others Cynthia. Of the Cyclades the first is Rhodes towards the East : Towards the South Carpathos : To the North Tenedos : And to the West Cythera. But the Aegean Sea is so dangerous to Mariners, that 'tis believ'd there is no place in the Universe more subject to Earthquakes, Thunder and Lightning, than it is.

Good Fri-

ON the 9th Day, having by God's goodness got clear of the Cyclades, we came within sight of Crete near the Promontory of Samonium or Salamon, where we being becalm'd, could make but little way by plying our Oars.

The next Day our Pilot putting his Finger in his Mouth, and then holding it out in the open air, prognosticated to us that we should have Wind very speedily, which indeed proved accordingly; but there was but very little of it, so that it could move nothing with its force.

On the 11th we gained our desired Harbour, and having there tarried several Days, we saw the Catching of the Lampreys, or Remora's, in Latin Echini or Echeneides.

They are caught thus: They who are most expert in swimming do strip themselves, and carrying in their hands sharp Knives, wade in the water along the rough stony Shore, where these Fishes haunt, at the same time looking steadily to the bottom to see if they can discover them by their sight; and if they can't, they feel 'em with their Feet: they are readily spy'd with the Eye, because of a black colour, and felt because of their being rough and prickly. So soon as they either see or feel 'em, they clap their Head under Water, and turning up their Heels, they rest themselves on one hand, with the other in which they have the Knife, they pluck them from the Rocks or Stones, and bringing 'em to the top fling 'em into a Basket that they keep swimming close by 'em. They are eaten raw, pouring the waterish Liquor out of 'em.

On the 22d of April, which happened that Year to be the Vigil of Easter, we had bad News from the Isle of Chios, that three Galleons of the Rhodians were intercepted by the Turks and taken. But the Day before, which was Good-Friday, we saw a very cruel and bloody fight: There were almost 300 Cretans all in a Company, Latins and Greeks, who in a Disguise had their Face and all their Body covered except their Back. They went through all the Streets of the City, lashing and whipping themselves most unmercifully, insomuch that their Clothes, Scourges, and Flesh were bloody; nay, the very Stones of the Street were not only stained, but run down with Gore. They told us that there were some among them who voluntarily and superstitiously inflicted this Punishment on themselves in recompence of the Passion of Christ. But the most part of them were hired by others to undergo the severity: It being customary that the Seniors and better sort of this Country, when by reason of Old Age or Infirmary they are not able to inflict this severity, nor endure it on their own Bodies, do hire others to do it for 'em. And there you might see young Striplings, for the lucre of a little Money, madly and furiously lashing and whipping their own Bodies, as if they were so many Blocks of Wood, or Statues without life or feeling, the Blood streaming from every lash they gave, and all about them stained with it. For what will not a blind and vain Superstition do? Besides, the City was all in confusion, Old and Young, Men and Women going up and down, bawling out ever and anon, some in Latin, some in Greek, every one in his own Language, Misericordia, misericordia.

On the 24th Day we had better News than the former, viz. That one Galleon of Rhodes had met with the seven Turkish Brigantines or Sloops which a while before had taken and slain some of their Men; that they engaged them, and by a contrary fortune had recovered all the Goods, and many of the Prisoners: For which remarkable Victory a Publick Day of Thanksgiving was straight appointed and ordained to be strictly observed over all the Island.

The Dolphins described: Their appearing Ominous to Mariners. A great Storm at Sea followed. Miserable Life of Sailors. A Jest of a Mariner. Our stay at Candia. The Nature of the Island.

ON the 25th day we failed out of the Port of Candia, and launching out some miles in the main Sea, we were becalmed, so as we could not move either backwards or forwards: We had presages of this Disaster, by some Dolphins that appeared to us within a stones throw of the Ship tumbling in the Sea. They were enticed to come very near us by our singing and whistling, so that we could see them very plain. The Dolphin is a Sea-fish, the swiftest, not only of Fishes, but also of Beasts, it swims almost as fast as a Bird can fly; and if it was not for his Mouth that is so very large, that it reaches almost to his Belly, no Fish could escape his swiftness; but Providence has thwarted Nature in this, for he can't catch any thing but when he swims on his back. They have a Tongue (contrary to the nature of Sea-Animals) that they can move as they list, and make a noise or sound resembling the sighs or groaning of a Man; they have broad Backs, and their Back-bone is edged like a Knife: They have flat Snouts, whence they are called Simo's. They are extremely delighted with Musick, especially with singing in a Consort. The Dolphin is not afraid of a Man; it comes and meets ships, as Histories relate, and particularly in the case of Arion the Musician. It mightily loves Boys and Children, which Appion says he was Eye-witness to at Puteoli, and Theophrastus says the same so. But the seeing of these Fishes proved very unlucky, and almost fatal to us.

The Mariners have a common Observation, that on whatever side of the Ship they observe the Dolphins to tumble in the Sea and shew themselves, from that corner they expect the Winds, Tempest and Storm; and 'tis observable that they never appear but in a calm Sea, or inclining to a calm.

While we had for some time thus struggled in the calm Sea (as it frequently happens, that an alteration to the better is commonly the beginning of Misfortunes) all on a sudden there arose a violent Hurricane, and a strong contrary Wind: The Seas swelled prodigiously, and we were surrounded with a dark Mist or Fog, in so much as we could neither sail on, nor lower our Sail. Here being forced back with the Winds the same way we came, no small fear seized us, every one expecting nothing but present Death, and revolving with themselves what Sea-Monster they should become a Prey to.

The Ship reeled to and fro like a Drunkard, sometimes sunk quite under the Waves; by and by it recovered it self again, and all of a sudden was overwhelmed with the Rains that fell down, and the Seas that broke against her: Sometimes you would have thought that the Ship was really sensible of Danger, and fear'd the mighty Billows that were ready to overset her, by nimbly avoiding her force, and escaping. But because the Mercies of the Lord are manifold, the Storm turn'd to a Calm at last, and we got into a certain narrow Bay of Candia, ^{Trafchea & Bay of Candia.} called Trafchea, where we came to an Anchor and staid all that Night, being all the while almost grievously tost with the Wind and the Rains. What state of Life, friendly Reader, can be harder, think you, than that of Mariners? How many heats and colds must they endure? How often must they be frighted with Thunder and Lightning, and daily, nay hourly, exposed to the violence of the Winds and Rains? How often must they be tormented with Hunger and Thirst, and poisoned up with Dirt and Nastiness, their Lodging being no better than a Prison, having little or no Furniture, and if any, very nasty, hard Bedding, coarse Diet, and such as require Iron Teeth to devour it, stinking Drink, dirty Clothes, Inconveniences of all sorts, restless Nights, and ever unquiet and in the open Air? Not to mention their perpetual Banishment from their native Homes, being Exiles, Wanderers, Stragglers, in perpetual motion; deprived of all the Enjoyment and Society of a Wife and Children, than which there is not in the World a greater pleasure. Who would not judge such to be the most abject and most miserable of all Mortals? I omit Dangerous Scylla, Caribdis, Malaea, Syrtes, Simple-Places for Sailors. gades, and many other places dangerous to Sailors. I omit also the Storms and Tempests

Baumgarten. Tempests (than which nothing is more dismal to see) wherein they are daily exposed to the greatest Dangers, their Ships and themselves shaken and tost, and at last frequently drowned. O the foolish and unnecessary Devices of Mens Covetousness, who not contented with what may be had on Land, dare trust their precious Lives to a feeble and brittle Board, within four or five Inches of Death, being in the mean time secure, jovial and merry. A Sailer being once asked where his Father died? he answered, At Sea. And the same Person asking him where his Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and the Father and Grandfather of his Grandfather died? the Sailor replied as before. And are not you afraid, said he, to go to Sea? The Sailor answered Nily, And where died your Father? In his Bed, said the other. Where died your Grandfather, continued he? A Bed too says t'other, and so did all my Ancestors. Then, says the Sailor, 'are not you afraid to go to bed? So much for Sailors.

On the 26th day at Sun-rising, because the Wind proved contrary, and the City Candia being hard by, we were driven into the Harbour again by a mighty Storm of Wind and Rain. Moreover, not forgetting the danger we had been in, we paid the Ship's Master for our Passage, and went to our old Lodging to give God thanks for our safety. After this we bargain'd with a large Ship to carry us to Venice, and staid till she had taken in her full Loding. In the mean time we got acquainted with many Noble Venetians, and several Grecian Gentlemen, by whom we were very kindly and honourably entertained.

C H A P. XXIII.

Our departure in another Ship from Candia. We are again distressed at Sea. News from Rhodes. A Storm and Earthquake. Malvasia a Castle there. Lacedemonia. Corinth. Patros.

ON the 23d day our Ship having taken in her Lading, having first gone to Prayers, we got out of Harbour; and all our Sails being spread, we sail'd but slowly, the Wind being, tho fair, but moderate. But he that puts his trust in the Winds, must himself be as inconstant as they; for a violent contrary Storm arising, drove us back from our intended Voyage to a corner of Candia, Trafchea, the same place where we avoided the late Storm. Here furling our Sails, and letting go our Anchors, we staid two days waiting for a fair Wind. In the mean time two Venetian arm'd Galleys standing towards us, having had the same Fate, told us, That the Rhodians had intercepted thirty Sail of Turkish Ships of several sorts, full of Guns, Scaling-Ladders, and other Instruments for storming and taking of Towns; and said moreover, that they saw the Express and the Letters sent to the Governor of Candia about it.

On the 26th having got a moderate Gale, we moved from thence; and not steering directly forward, but as the Wind served us ploughing the Sea, we went those Islands to the right of us, viz. Paros, whence Parian Marble is named, Policandrum, Promontorium Cervi, Naxos, where Homer was bury'd, Milo consecrated to Cybele, Falconaria, and several others.

On the 29th having happily arrived at Bellapola, before we could well let go our Anchors, whilst our Ship's Crew were employed in lowering and handing the Sails, of a sudden there came a great Storm and a dreadful Tempest, which seem to raise the Sea from the very bottom, and tossed up the Foam and Froth in the Air like Feathers. The Yards and Ropes caused a most frightly ratling and noise; and if it had not been our good fortune to be in a place where our Anchors held, we had been certainly cast away. And this was the day on which, as shall be said afterwards, the City was shaken, and a great part of it destroyed by a terrible Earthquake.

On the 30th having a moderate and fair Wind, we moved from thence, and had in our view Peloponnesus, which is now called Morea; we passed a Castle too, called Napoli de Romania.

On the 31st we sailed about Malvasia, we were becalmed. Malvasia is a City or Town belonging to the Venetians, whence Vines were first transplanted into Crete, which produce that Wine that we call Malmsey-Wine. Malvasia lies from Napoli de Romania at 70 miles distance. And there are the two only places of of strength the Venetians retain in all the Morea, the Turk being Master of the rest. But because the Morea has been already described, I need not now repeat a description of it; only this I may add, that Lacedæmonia, of old the Eye of Greece, is situated betwixt the Promontory of Malea and Malvasia, towards the Ægean Sea. But Corinth, which Horace calls Bimaris (i. e. lying between two Seas) looks to both the Ionian and Ægean Sea. Patros borders upon this City, the place where St. Andrew was crowned with Martyrdom. Argos and Mycenæ were in former times remarkable Cities in the Morea.

Provision got at Cythera. Danger about the Promontory Metapano. Promontory Malea. A Partridge lost. Islands Strophades. Original of the Name Zazinthos.

ON the first of June we came to the Promontory of Malea, having it on the right hand, and Cythera which is right against it on the left. The Sea was then calm, which the Sailors call Bonaza commonly. We sent our Boat with some Men to the Island Cythera, who having got some Provision, brought likewise with them two Deers, three Goats, and Wood and Water: whether they bought them with their Money, or purchased them otherwise we knew not; but they no sooner brought them aboard, but there arose a contrary Wind which fatigued us extremely: For having several times attempted to put out to Sea, and to get clear of the Point of the Promontory Metapano, being drove back by the Winds, we were fain to make our way under the Rocks. But not daring to stay there because of the Danger, we put out to Sea again, and by steering different Courses backwards and forwards, and failing sometimes with, and sometimes against the Wind, we spent the time to no purpose; for it is always very dangerous failing there, for which reason this place is accounted one of the most dangerous places of the Sea.

Malea (which the common sort call Caomaliæ, as Servius relates, is a Promontory of Laconia, which is stretched out into the Sea for the space of fifty miles, where the Current is so violent, that it seems to pursue those that sail there. It took its name from Maleus a King of the Argives, who built upon it a magnificent Temple for Apollo, which he also called after his own name. On the Ruins of this Temple there is at this day a Chapel built to the Honour of Michael the Archangel. Here we could not but laugh at the foolish Superstition of the Sailors, who say, when the Wind blows from that place, that 'tis occasioned by the violent Motion of Michael's Wings, because, forsooth, he is painted with Wings: And for that reason, when they sail by Michael, they pray to him that he may hold his Wings still. It happens sometimes that 'tis two or three Months before such as sail from the East can get clear of this Promontory; but by the singular Goodness of God, we past it very quietly, which made us labour stoutly lest we should be forced back again to struggle longer with it.

On the fourth day, by the favour of a South Wind, we joyfully past a great many Promontories, with which Peloponnesus is divided as with so many Fibres. Sailing by Chorona a City of the Morea, we lost a Partridge. This Bird had been carried from Chorona to Candia where we bought it; and by our carelessness being suffered to fly out of the Ship, smelling its own Country, and endeavouring to get thither, was drowned before it could get so far. The same day about Sun-setting we sail'd by Modona and Lepantum, both Cities of Peloponnesus.

On the fifth day in the Morning we sail'd by the Strophades, which are commonly call'd Strivali. These Islands (as Pliny witnesseth in his Fourth Book of Nat. Hist. and Virgil in his Third Æneid) are situated in the Ionian Sea against Cephalonia, first called Plotæ, afterwards Plotæ Strophades. Of which Virgil,

*At length we land upon the Strophades, Safe from the Danger of the stormy Seas.
Those Isles are compass'd by th' Ionian Main,
The dire Abode where the foul Harpies reign:
Forc'd by the winged Warriors to repair

These Islands are two in number, the one greater, and the other smaller. In the former is excellent Pasturage for Cattel; in the latter a very fine Greek Monastery. The same day we had a fair Wind, set our Sails, and went merrily on whither the Wind and our Pilot directed us.

Then we discovered woody Zacynthus, Zacynthus which is now called Alfanto, a small but pleasant Island. Zacynthus has one City of its own name, with a fortify'd Castle, both seated on a rising ground.

When we endeavoured to leave Zacynthus on our right hand as we sailed by it, a contrary Wind arose, which obliged us to leave it on our left, and there we lay at Anchor all that Night waiting a fair Wind.

On the sixth day, having suffered the same Fortune as before, we fastened the Ship at the very Mouth of the Harbour of the City, and sent out our Boat, but had much ado to get any Provision.

C H A P. XXV.

Castle of Tornez. A Gun lost. Island Itaca. Dulichium. Leucada. Nicopolis. Promontory of Acarnania. Paxus. Antipaxus.

Castle of Tornez.

ON the seventh we weighed Anchor, and sailed towards the Castle of Tornez, hoping there to find a fair Wind; which not happening according to our mind, we put out our Lead to sound the Bottom, and found it 25 Fathom, which we were very glad of, and so let down our Anchors, and rode there. Here we kill'd the Deer we got at Cythera, and dividing it in equal Portions among the Men, feasted upon it, and so past the time very merrily in eating and drinking, for the whole lading of the Ship almost was Malmsey Wine. The Castle of Tornez is seated on a very high Hill in Peloponnesus, which the Venetians shamefully surrendered to the Turks, by virtue of an Article of a Treaty they made with them.

The eighth day the Wind not serving, we came again to the Port of Zacynthus, where a great number of our Men went on shore to the City and Castle, and brought with them some Provision.

On the tenth looking from thence, we sailed between Celaphonia (but truly called Cephalonia) and Zacynthus, which are very near one another, and both belong to the Venetians: There we met a Cretan Ship, which perceiving us to be Friends by the ordering of the Ship and Sails, they saluted us very kindly with loud Shouts, and hoisting up their Flags. And while they were discharging a great Gun, that it seems had not been well enough fix'd in its place, so soon as it was off, the Force of the Powder drove it quite over-board, so A Gun lost as it was never seen again. And thus seeking to put an Obligation on us, they did themselves a Mischief. Presently after there came another contrary Wind, which forced us back to the left side of Cephalonia, for that we lost as much of our way this Night as we had got the day before.

On the twelfth we past by an Island commonly call'd Vallis de Compare, by the Latins, Itaca. This, as Pliny in his 4th Book of Nat. Hist. has it, is situated against Leucada and Achaia, and was the celebrated Dominion of Ulysses, in which there's a Mountain called Neritos, whence the whole Island is called Neritos Island.

Virg. Aeneid. 3.

Amidst our Course Zacynthian Woods appear ;

And next by rocky Neritos we steer.

Near this Island is another call'd Dulichium, having on the East side Strophades, and on the West Itaca. The same day we past the Island Leucada, in which is a Castle called S. Maura, which was given up to the Turk by the Venetians, in a Capitulation they made with them, in the same manner as Tornez was. The Island Leucas, according to Pomponius Mela, lies right against the Bay of Ambracium, where also there's a City of the same name, which Augustus nam'd Antipaxos, having obtain'd there a Victory over Antibon

Anthony and Cleopatra, which Island has a very high Mountain of the same name. Leucas was once join'd to the Continent, as Ovid says, Metamorph. Lib. 15. It is a small Channel, and hardly capacious enough to admit of two Gallies at once, that parts Leucas from the Continent. Then also we past a Promontory of Acarnania, which is now called a Dutchy. Baum-

The 13th we past by Paxus and Anti-paxus Islands, known only for their names, being but very small. Then we came within sight of Corcyra a small Creek, and were forc'd there to anchor all Night for the calmness of the Weather. Paxus and Antipaxus

Corfu. The Venetian Admiral and 3000 Men drowned. An Earthquake in Candia. The Damage done by it. Story of a Genoese Traitor.

ON the 14th in the Morning we arriv'd at Corcyra, or Corfu, and making fast our Ship in the Harbour, we went into the City, where we made much of our selves for a considerable time, eating and drinking of the best we could have for our Money.

On the 15th while we were here, there came in a Brigantine, that brought the sad News of the Venetian Admiral's being cast away in a Storm, (just when he had discharged that Office his appointed time, and was on his return to resign his Commission) with two great Gallies, one Ship, and ten other smaller Vessels of several sorts; of 3000 Men he had with him, six only were sav'd, the rest with the Admiral himself were all drowned.

On the 16th (as human Affairs are always fluid and uncertain) there arriv'd another Brigantine, with little better News, viz. That the City Candia on the 29th Day of May was almost totally destroy'd by an Earthquake, most of the Buildings both Sacred and Private being either quite overthrown, or so shattered and broken that none durst inhabit them; that above 600 People had been destroyed by it, among whom the Chancellor, a very worthy Man, and to whom we were extremely obliged, besides many other Noble Persons both Greeks and Italians, Citizens and common People. And not only Candia but several other Cities and Towns in the Island felt the dire effects of this Earthquake, particularly Sittia, where the Cittadel and most of the Houses fell to the Ground. And truly the Inhabitants were sensible of it all over the Island. Another Island hard by named Santorini, was so split and cleft in the middle, that it became two Islands, which in some measure confirms the Opinion of the Antients concerning Sicily and Italy; viz. that both formerly had been one Land.

The Italian Shore,
And fair Sicilia's Coast were one before.
An Earthquake caus'd the Flaw. The roaring

The Lands retire, the rushing Ocean rides.

On the 17th another piece of bad News was brought of a wicked design that was enterprized, but by the Providence of God not brought to perfection, of a Genoese Traitor.

This Fellow having long lived among the Turks, did acquire their Language and Manners perfectly, and being drunk with the Poison of Malice went to the Turk, and proffered to deliver Rhodes into his hands without the expence of any of his Subjects Blood. The Turk believed, and encouraged him to it with fair words, gifts and promises, to go on with the Design. He taking upon him a Turkish Habit immediately went to Rhodes, as if he had been a Prisoner of the Turks, and having falsely told them that he was among the Turks Counsellors, he pretended to discover many of the secret Counsels of the Turks. In short, he had such a faculty of Discourse, and so great a power of perswading, that they really believed what he said to be true, and received him among the chief Men of the Rhodians. Now he had ordered before, when he was in Turky, that there should be sent to him twenty Barrels or Vessels with Caviare, which is much used there, in the middle of which Casks there should be put Swords, Darts, Arrows, and other Weapons. And he had laid his design so, that in the Harvest time when most of the People of the City were gone out to their Harvest into the Fields, he would take his opportunity, and set at liberty all the Turks, Saracens, Africans, Jews, and others that were kept Prisoners there, and so arm them with these Weapons; by which means they might easily put all the Inhabitants to the Sword, seize the City, and send to the Turk, who was to lie with an Army not far off, expecting the issue. But God turned this mischievous Design on the head of the Traitor: for in the mean time another who had really fled from the Turks, coming to Rhodes, and had privately certain intelligence of the whole matter, discovered it to the Great Master of Rhodes, shews him the Projector of the Villany, and gives him information of several Prisoners who were privy to it; several of whom being put to Torments, confessed the matter, nor did the Traitor himself deny it. Many of the Conspirators were put to death, and the rest put in Fetters, and closer Prison. The Traitor himself they reserved to be tortur'd with more exquisite Punishments, because these Arms were daily expected, which were concealed in the Caviare. This Caviare is a certain Meat or Sawce prepared of the Intrails of Fish.

C H A P. XXVII.

Country of Epirus. Mountain Dodone. Casope. Velona Hydruntum, ruin'd by the Turks. Dyrrachium. Scutaris, &c.

Castle of the Great Men of Corcyra.

ON the 18th, which was the Feast of the Holy Trinity, loosing from Corcyra we sail'd close by a Rock near Corcyra, upon which is erected a Castle full as big as the Hill it self; to which Castle the Great and Wealthy Men of Corcyra are wont to retire in the time of a Pestilence, and sometimes to divert themselves.

*The sight of high Pheacia soon we lost,
 And skim'd along Epirus Rocky Coast.
 Then to Chaonia's Port our course we bend,
 And landed, to Butrotus heights ascend.*

At this last place our Men having purchased for us some small Fishes caught in the River running by it, and some Eggs, returned to us again, and having made the Ship fast, because of the boisterous Wind that blew, we staid there two Days.

Epirus. Epirus (in which is Butrotus) in Latin is call'd the firm Land. This Country of old was call'd Molossa; afterward from Choon, Helen's Brother, 'twas call'd Chaonia. In it the Mountain Dodone, the Wood and Temple of Jupiter, made famous by the Verses of the Greek and Latin Poets, were remarkable. To this Temple they feign'd that two Doves were wont to resort, which gave Responses from Heaven, one of which flew to Delphos a City in Bæotia, and there made the Oracle of Apollo Delphicus renowned. They gave out that the other flew to the Temple of Jupiter Ammon, which prophesied and delivered Oracles at Chaonia; the Devil being industrious to find a new Theater for himself.

This City is very poor and almost ruin'd, being under the Dominion of the Venetians, who squeeze out of their Subjects all their Substance, and carry it to Venice.

On the 21st Day with a gentle East-wind, we weigh'd from thence, and came near to Casope, a Town of Corcyra, of old a Colony of the Epirots. From thence putting out to Sea to the right-hand, we pass'd by Ceraunia, which I made mention of in the first Book, whence we had a very short and speedy passage to Italy. We sail'd by Sasyno too, and the two Merlera's, Phanon, and several other Islands.

On the 22d Day we sail'd with a very fair Wind, and quickly lost the sight of several Towns on our right-hand, one whereof is call'd Velona, situated in Albania. Bajazet the first King of the Turks, conquered this City, and Amurath subdued it afterwards when it revolted. Out of this Town the Turk march'd An. 1480. when he took Hydruntum a City in Apulia, having put to the Sword many thousands of Men, and levell'd it to the Ground. Next to it we saw Dyrrachium in Epyrus, built in the time of Ancus Marcus the 4th King of the Romans, which had formerly been call'd Epidamnus. For, as Pomponius Mela relates, when this Town had been the common Port to all Greece, and that Name seeming to portend some loss or misfortune, abandoning the old, it took a new Name, viz. Dyrrachium. This they call likewise Epidaurus, and it is now subject to the Venetians. Then we sail'd by Scutaris, once Cozora, seated in Albania, which also the Venetians surrendred to the Turks in a Capitulation. After this we saw and lost sight of Budua, and E-thera Cities of Dalmatia.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Ragufium a City of Dalmatia. Island Meleda. A Sea-Dog. City Lesina. Island Lissa; great plenty of Fish here, which yields the Venetians Tribute. A new Admiral.

ON the 23^d about break of Day, we sailed by Ragufium, one of the principal Towns in Dalmatia, which for its magnificent Buildings, both private and publick, excels all the rest, having a very convenient Harbour secured by a Chain. It is a free State, and govern'd by its own Senators, as Venice is. The same day and the next we sailed by several other Islands belonging to the Ragufians, not far from the Continent, viz. Calamutbo, Island de Medio, Zupana, and some others.

After this sailing under the Island Melida, by the violence of the Winds we were driven into a certain Harbour, where we saw Fish as big as Cockboats tumbling in the Water; and when some of the Sailers went out of the Ship to cool themselves with swimming, one of them spied from the Topmast a Sea-dog, which alarmed the Swimmers so, that they immediately came aboard, and with flinging Stones at him drove away the Sea-dog.

From hence on the 26th we sailed between Melida and the Continent; and then steering our Course to the right of the Island Augusta, we fastened the Ship among the Rocks of the Island Corfula.

On the 27th sailing between Lesina and Corfula, in no small danger both from the Rocks and Storms, we put into the Harbour of the City Lesina; for not many days before a Ship laden with Corn had been cast away there.

On the 28th day we went into the City, made much of our selves, and set out our things in the Sun-shine to dry. The Town it self has no Wall about it, but it hath a Castle, which by reason both of Situation and Fortification, is impregnable. In the Harbour of Lesina we saw such a prodigious swarm of Fish, as no other place could produce. Within view of Lesina is the Island Lissa, where all sorts of Fishes are taken in such plenty, that they are able sufficiently to furnish such as sail from Venice, Apulia, Genoa, Crete, Corfu, Cyprus, Rhodes, and other Strangers: And they say that there arises a vast Income to the Venetians yearly out of the Duty imposed on Fish alone.

In the Evening of this day arrived an armed Galley of Lesina, bringing the new Admiral, with beating of Drums and sounding of Trumpets. After which there arrived another Galley like the former, with three Brigantines, in the dark Night, in the same Harbour.

C H A P. XXIX.

Port of Sessula. Cahocista Promontory. A Storm. A Quarrel among the Sailers. Rubinum of Histria. Return to Venice. Another Earthquake in Candia.

ON the 30th day of June we left Lesina, and sailed by the Islands Bracia and Solta; and afterwards we were driven by the Wind into a Port called Sessula. This Port is in figure like a Hemisphere (or half-circle) a very convenient Harbour for Shipping, and so safe that Ships can ride here without Anchors: It is 18 Italian Miles from Spalatum a City in Dalmatia.

On the first of July we sailed from Sessula, and passing by St. Andrew's Rock, came in sight of a certain Promontory they call Cahocista, about which place the Sailers, by an old and inbred custom, do pay their Debts, if they owe one another any thing. There are not far from this Promontory many craggy Rocks that make it dangerous sailing here.

The second, third, and fourth days we were becalm'd, and could not stir by help of Wind or Oars; besides, our Provision fell short, the Wood we put on the fire vanished into Smoke, the Sun scorched us severely, and in short, we were grievously distress'd. However, we made a shift to sail by the Castle Sibinigo.

On

On the fifth day as we were failing out of a certain Harbour, the Winds rose, and there came on a terrible Storm, which split in two our Sprit-sail, which they call Trincketo, and much ado we had to mend it again.

On the sixth day having met with the like bad Weather, we sail'd by Offera, and saw as we failed the Mountains of Ancona over against it. The same day the Master of the Ship, the Pilot, and most of the Sailers, being madly drunk, rose up in arms one against another, pulling and lugging one another by the Hair, and throwing down Stones from the Round-top; some engaged with Swords, and run one another through the Legs and Arms, in the mean time exposing the Ship to manifest dangers. At last when they thought they had enough, they began to steer again, and in a very little time we got clear out of sight of Pola.

On the seventh of July we arrived at Rubinum in Histria, where being unwilling to trust our selves any longer in this drunken Ship, we paid for our Passage, and having got our things out, hired a Boat to carry us to Venice.

The eighth day, the Weather promising very fair, we went on board our Boat, and setting up a Sail, and plying our Oars, we had a very safe and speedy Passage to Venice, Mistress of the Seas; for about six a Clock our Watchman from the Mast-head cried out aloud to us, that he discovered the Towers of the City and Tops of the Churches. We no sooner heard the name of this desirable and welcome City, but we all at once joyfully cried aloud, Venetia, Venetia. After Sun-setting we entred into the wish'd-for City, where being welcomed with the utmost Expressions of Joy by our Friends and Acquaintance, we spent a great part of that Night in their Company; for it was not enough to them to hear us once tell how we did, but they ask'd us a thousand Questions of what we had done and suffered, and seen and heard, and they listened very attentively while we told them.

The day following we went to Church to give God Thanks; and having offered up our Prayers, bestowed our Charity upon the Poor.

On the 26th one James Todeschin a Venetian Factor, whom we had formerly been acquainted with (having gone Passengers in the same Galley with him to Alexandria) told us that Candia had again suffered very much by another Earthquake that happened there on the 9th of July; and that what the former Earthquake had left standing of the Town, had been destroy'd by the second: That the stately Tower which guarded, and was an Ornament to the Harbour, and many more fine Buildings had been thrown down: And that the Capitan himself, and several other Persons of Note had lost their Lives by it.

Their Journey from Venice to Kueffstein Home.

They give Thanks to God.

ON the 29th of July, leaving Venice with a Resolution to return home to our own Country, the first place we came to was Margera; and here we hired Horses, which they commonly and truly call Martyrs, and came to Tervisum; from thence to Velteres, next to Trent Bulsanum, Brixina, Oenipons, Hallas, Schwarz, Rotemburg, and at last into our dear little native Country Kueffstein, a small Town, but very pleasant and well fortified. Here we were received very affectionately, and welcomed by all the Town, in a splendid and triumphant manner. We gave our most hearty Thanks, in the best manner we possibly could, to the Immortal, Holy, and most Gracious God, by whose merciful Providence we escaped so many Dangers of Sea and Land. To the Eternal Trinity be Eternal Thanks.

Advertisement to the Reader.

MR. Henry Brewer, one of the Directors of the Dutch West-India Company, having in the Year 1642. frequently urged the settling of a Commerce with the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Chili (who were then declared Enemies of the Spaniards) the said Voyage was resolved upon accordingly: And Mr. Brewer offering his Service, was pitch'd upon as Commodore of the Ships intended for that Expedition. Accordingly he set sail with three Ships from the Texel 1642. and arriving the 22d of Decemb. at Fernambuco in Brazil, pursued his Voyage from thence Jan. 15. 1643. with five Ships, viz. the Amsteldam, Flissingen, Concord, Orange-Tree, and the Dolphin-Yacht; and arriv'd the 30th of April upon the Coast of Chili. They met with no small Difficulty before they could discover the real Inclinations of the Chileses towards them. During which Mr. Henry Brewer died, Aug. 7. 1643. of a lingering Disease; and his Corps was buried, Septemb. 16. at Baldivia, pursuant to his own Directions in his life-time. Mr. Elias Herckeman being by Commission appointed his Successor, knew so well how to insinuate himself with the Chileses, that they shew'd a great deal of readiness to comply with his Demands, offer'd all the Service they were able to perform, and what Provisions they stood in need of; and at last entered into an Offensive and Defensive Alliance with them against the Spaniards. But the General coming ashore, Sept. 23. with most of the Officers, in order to mark out the place for a Fort, agreed to be built near Baldivia; they found the Chileses not in a condition either to furnish them with sufficient Provisions, or to give them any real Assistance till about three months after; which made them resolve in a Council of War, Octob. 18. to quit that Coast. Accordingly the General took his leave of the Chileses the 19th, who alledged their Inability of not furnishing Necessaries, by reason they had not notice given them of their coming; promising, that if they could return in two Years time, they might be assured of all possible Assistance. Hereupon they set sail from that Coast Octob. 28. and about the end of December following, arrived safely with the remainder of this Squadron at the Recief in Brazil.

An Account of a Voyage to the Coast of Chili, performed by Order from the Dutch West-India Company, in the Years 1642, and 1643, under the Command of Mr. Henry Brewer their General.

IN the Year 1642, it was resolved in a Court of the Directors of the West-India Company in Holland, to send some Ships to the Coast of Chili, a Country of America bordering upon the Kingdom of Peru, to endeavour the settling a good Correspondency with the Chilefes, the better to annoy the Spaniards on that side.

Among the Directors of the said Company, there was one Mr. Henry Brewer, who knowing the Chilefes to be at enmity with the Spaniards, did not only encourage this Undertaking, but also offered himself to go in Person to accomplish it. Pursuant to this Resolution, Mr. Brewer, with several other Gentlemen, were ordered first to steer their Course to Brasile, to consult with his Excellency Earl Maurice of Nassau then Governour there, how to put their intended Design in execution.

Accordingly the beforementioned Mr. Henry Brewer, being constituted Commander in chief, set sail from the Texel with three good stout Ships on the sixth day of November, in the Year 1642, and with a prosperous Gale arrived the next following 22d of December safely at Fernambuco, where he was welcomed at his landing the same evening, under the discharge of the great Artillery from all the Forts and Batteries.

After some time spent in Consultations about the prosecution of their intended Design, it was resolved at last to send five Ships well equipp'd, with Men and other Necessaries, to the Coast of Chili; to wit, The Amsterdam Admiral, which was to carry the General; the Flistingen Vice-Admiral, in which was to be Counsellor Elias Herkeman; the Concord, in which was to be Counsellor Elbert Crispin; the Orange-Tree, and the Dolphin Yacht: which five Ships put to Sea on the 15th of January, in the Year 1643.

The next following day, being the 16th, the Allowance was settled among the Seamen in the following manner: A good Cheese to each for the whole Voyage; three pounds of Bisket, half a pound of Butter, and a quartern of Vinegar, per Week; about a pint of fresh Water per diem; every Sunday three quarters of a pound of Flesh; six ounces of salted Cod every Monday and Wednesday; a quarter of a pound of Stock-fish for every Tuesday and Saturday; gray Pease, and three quarters of a pound of Bacon, for Thursday and Friday: besides this, as much Oatmeal boil'd in Water as they could eat.

On the fifth day of March we got sight of the Straits of le Maire; the Western Shore (which is called Mauricius Land) was all covered with small round Hills; but upon the Eastern Shore (commonly known by the name of Staaten Land) they discovered many Precipices and high piquet Mountains covered on the tops with Snow. It happening to be a very clear day, we had the satisfaction to behold, that this Staaten Land, which hitherto has always been taken for a part of the Continent, was an Island of about nine or ten Leagues long, destitute of any convenient Bay or Port fit for Anchorage; of a barren Soil, producing nothing but some few Trees: The Shore surrounded with many Rocks, and so boisterous a Sea, that there was no landing but with a great deal of danger. We were four days together endeavouring to pass these Straits; but finding it impossible by reason of the boisterousness and changeableness of the Winds, we were forced to change our Course on the 9th of March, and resolve to sail round about the said Island. The Weather continued so stormy, that we were several days (during which time we saw many Whales) before we could get clear of the Island, and did not come to Valentines Bay till the 18th of March, where we came to an anchor the same Evening.

Description of valentines Bay.

Valentines Bay is situate on the Western side of the Straits called Mauricius's Land, under 54 Degrees and 4 Minutes, where there is pretty safe Anchorage in several Places for ten or twelve Ships, there being nine or ten Fathom depth, a black Sand; but by reason of the nearness of the Mountain, subject to Storms, and changeableness of the Winds. The Shore is full of Rocks, but covered with a muddy Earth, in some places ten foot deep: There is good store of fine Springs and Fuel here, but no Wood fit for building, or any other use. It affords a kind of Currants both black and red, which were then just come to maturity; as also a Herb not unlike our Parsley; Muscles and Snails in great abundance: and the Seamen shot some wild Ducks, not unlike ours, but that their Bills were not so broad, and their Feathers distinguish'd by various colours. Fish they met with none, but saw among the Rocks several Sea-Lions and Sea-Dogs, about the bigness of a good European Calf, some of a grayish, some of a brownish colour, making a noise not unlike our Sheep; and at the approach of our Men they betook themselves to the Sea. They could not get sight of any of the Inhabitants, it being very probable that being terrify'd at the discharge of our Cannon from the Ships, they had sheltered themselves in some more remote places. Their footsteps, which appear'd to be seventeen and eighteen Inches long, seem'd to intimate that they were strong and robust. Their Huts were very artificially twisted, and made up of Straw and Grass in the form of our Souldiers Tents: they afforded nothing within but Muscleshells, which probably may be their daily Food.

Our General ordered the Dolphin Yacht to sail again towards the Island of the Staaten, to endeavour to make some discovery, and gave them some Pigs to be put on shore there.

On the 25th of March it was resolv'd to continue our Voyage towards the Coast of Chili.

On the 30th the Ship called the Orange-Tree having lost her Mast, was forced to stay behind; and having heard no tidings of her afterwards, it was concluded she was returned to Fernambuco. 1643.

Whilst they were steering their Course towards Chili, we met with very bad Weather; so that after having weathered several great Storms mixed with Hail, at last we got sight of the Coast of Chili on the 30th of April.

On the 1st of May they perceived a great smoke near the Sea-shore, which made the General order the Dolphin-Yacht to approach as near that way as she could, and to endeavour to get some Prisoners, from whom they might have some information concerning the Place. Accordingly the Yacht approach'd as near the Shore as was possible, and hoisted up her white Flag to see whether any body would come on board: some few on Horseback, attended by several Foot men, came in sight of them upon the Shore, but soon retired into the adjacent Woods; and the Sea running so high at that time that they durst not venture to land, they return'd, and gave the General an Account of what they had seen.

The said Yacht being again ordered to sound the Coast thereabouts, spent eight days before they could meet with a Bay fit for Anchorage, so that it was the 9th of May before the Fleet cast Anchor in a Bay which they call'd Brewer's Harbor. They all put out their white Flags as a signal of Peace, but no body offering to come aboard, it was resolv'd that the Yacht should sound the entrance of a small River which was thereabouts.

The 10th of May it blew so hard that the Yacht durst not venture to go, and the Ship Flistingen was forced from her Anchors among the Rocks, and they were obliged to cut down her Main-mast.

On the 11th, the Weather being pretty fair, Mr. *Elbert Crispin*son, one of the Counsellors and Assistants to the General, and Major Blewbeck, with 25 common Soldiers, came on board the Yacht, and passing within the River's Mouth, came towards Evening to an Anchor at 12 Fathoms depth.

On the 12th, the Major with some Soldiers went higher up the River to see whether he could meet with some who could give him intelligence of the Constitution of the place they were in. Being returned, he gave an account that after he had sail'd about two Leagues up the River, he had met with two small Boats not unlike those of our Watermen, but somewhat flatter; and not far from thence with two Houses built on the top top of a very high Hill; the Houses were covered with Reeds, and a great Wooden Cross stood at the Entrance of them: he discovered also at a considerable distance about four or five on Horse-back, two of whom came down to the very Bank, but retired soon after into the Woods. The Major took a small White Flag, a Knife, and some Corals; these he left upon the Bank near that place where he had seen the Horsemen, crying out to them as he went aboard, That they were Friends, and they needed not fear any thing. Upon this two on Horse-back, and three Footmen came and took up the things, which they carry'd to the rest, who being at some distance on the top of a high Hill, immediately after sent back one of the Horsemen to throw them into the Water, which he did before our Eyes. In the Afternoon we perceived several more both on Foot and on Horseback to approach the Banks of the River, but so as not to give the Major and his People the least opportunity to speak with them; so he left again a few Corals near the place where he had laid them before, and so went aboard again.

On the 13th they saw a great number of People appear upon the Banks of the River, some being in Black, some in Red, others in White; the Major landed again in the same place where he had left the Corals the day before, but could not perceive that they had been touch'd by any body; and perceiving a great smock at some distance from thence, he ordered his Long-boat to row that way immediately: they saw there two Houses, but no Inhabitants; tho the vast number of Oxen, Horses and Sheep, which were feeding in the circumjacent Plains, were sufficient to give us to understand that the Country was not destitute of them, but that they were retired to some places of safety, which together with the large Wooden Crosses standing at the Entrances of their Houses, gave us all the reason in the world to believe that this Country was under the Subjecti- on of the Spaniards; tho at the same time those we had seen near the shore had appear'd in the dress of the Chilese. The Grounds all thereabouts were very well cultivated, and irrigated with many Rivulets, which flowing from the tops of the Hills, did exonerate themselves in the Bay.

On the 14th the Yacht return'd to the Fleet, and after they had given an ample account of what they had observed, it was resolv'd, that the Major should be sent back again up the River, with a whole Company of Souldiers, to bring certain intelligence, either by fair or foul means. Accordingly they came on the 16th of May (after they had been struggling for some time with the contrary Winds) to the same place where they had seen those Horse-men before, and discovered in an adjacent Plain abundance of Horse-men, at the head of whom appeared one with a Lance in a threatening posture. Those in the Yacht put out the White Flag again as a Signal of Peace, and saluted them with two Cannon-shot; but those that were on shore, call'd to them in a Language they did not in the least understand; till some of them at last began to cry out in Spanish, Ha connodos hyos de pontos; You don't come here with any good intention: Which being a convenient argument to those in the Yacht, that they were no Indians but Spaniards, they put out the Red Flag as a Signal of War. The next thing they did was to Cannonade the Woods, under favour of which the Major having landed his Men, march'd in good order up the same Hill, where they had discovered the two Houses before, which they found desolate, the Inhabitants having left their Habitations at our approach. The same Afternoon a Detachment was sent deeper into the Country under the Command of a Lieutenant, who brought back an Old Chilese Woman with two Children, whom he had made Prisoners, but she could not well be understood by any body there. There were also several Ambushes laid, under the Command of the two Captains Osterman and Flori, the last of which had the good fortune to surprize a Chilese; but neither he nor the Old Woman understanding the Spanish Tongue, they were useless for to make any discovery by them. Some of the Seamen had also got ashore, and lost one of their Comrades, from whom without question the Spaniards got intelligence of the design of the Hollanders.

On the 19th of May it was resolv'd in a Council of War to send the Major with a Company of Souldiers towards the Channel of Oserno, and the Gulph of Ancud, to endeavour to take some Prisoners in some of the Islands thereabouts, by whom they might be inform'd concerning the present condition of the City of Castro. Pursuant to this resolution the Major went on board the Yacht, and for their better conveniency took a great Boat along with him;

they came to an Anchor towards Evening near the Shore; and because the great Boat was somewhat behind, they set up a Lanthorn upon the Stern of the Ship, and gave them the Signal by the discharge of several Cannon: but having received two or three Cannon-shot from the Shore, they took in their Lanthorn as soon as the Boat was come up with them. It was resolved to send the Mate of the Yacht with some Seamen, and sixteen Musquetiers, under the Command of Lieutenant William van Bergen, to sound the Bay, and to get what Intelligence they could ashore, which was put in execution accordingly; and those in the Yacht hearing very brisk firing near the Sea-side, were of opinion to send six Musquetiers more under the Command of a Serjeant to their assistance: but whilst they were busy in preparing themselves, the Lieutenant returned, and gave an account how he had discovered a great number of Houses behind an adjacent Hill, where he had heard them sound the Alarm both with Drums and Trumpets, that he had been fired at briskly by some of them, and had returned them the same; in the mean while that the Mate had been sounding the Coast, which he found from nine to eighteen Foot deep: thus they continued till break of day.

The 20th, after they had put up the Red Flag, the Lieutenant was ordered to land with fifty Men, within half a Musquet-shot from the before mentioned Houses, being followed by the Major with sixteen Musquetiers in a lesser Boat: he ordered the Ensign, that as soon as the great Boat had landed the Lieutenant, he should send all the remaining Souldiers to their relief. He was no sooner got ashore but he put his Men with all possible diligence in a fighting posture, whilst the Enemy both Horse and Foot to the number of ninety were marching from the Town towards them, but met with so warm a Salute from the Cannon of the Yacht, that the Horse scamper'd off immediately to the Woods, and the Foot fell down upon the Ground, and so likewise made towards the Hedges and Bushes. The Major having in the mean while had sufficient time to put his Men in Order, march'd up to the Enemy: The Lieutenant led the Van with some Fusileers, who as they advanced to the Wood had six Men wounded by the Enemy's fire; but then they entred the Wood, and soon put them to the rout, leaving six of their Men dead, and sixteen Horses, which were taken by the Hollanders, behind them. From thence the Major directed his March towards the Hill, from whence they had cannonaded the Yacht the Night before; but meeting with no Cannon there, he concluded they had thrown them into the Sea. He mounted some of his Men upon the Horses; and so searching all the corners of the Wood they met with a Chilefen, whom they made a Prisoner; and having discovered several Troops of Horse and Foot posted in a Plain behind the Wood, he dispatch'd the Ensign to the General, to give him an account how matters stood with them. In the Afternoon the Lieutenant was commanded with sixty Men towards the Wood, and took the Chilefen along with him, to try whether they could find out some of the Enemy's Treasures, which they believed to be hidden thereabouts, but were not advanced very far, when they met with the Enemy drawn up in order of Battel in a small Plain: they attack'd them so successfully, that they forced them to retreat into the Wood, leaving their Commander in Chief, Andreas Munes Ifferera, among the Slain, and their whole Baggage to the Enemy. Thus the Dutch became Masters of Carel Mappa, ^{which is taken by the Dutch} a Fort built near the Sea-side, surrounded with strong Palisadoes, and defended by a Garison of sixty Men, and two Pieces of Ordnance. The Spaniards have another Fort about four Leagues further, called St. Michael de Calibuco, in which there is commonly a Garison of forty Men, and one Piece of Ordnance; they both are Frontier places, built against those of Oferno and Coneo, with whom they are constantly at Enmity.

The General had no sooner received intelligence of what was pass'd thereabouts, but he resolved to come thither in Person, and took the two Companies commanded by Capt. Oferman and Flori along with him. They arriv'd in the Ship call'd the Concord on the 21st, and continued there till the 24th, when Orders were sent us to prepare every thing for our departure.

On the 25th Carel Mappa was burnt to the ground by the General's Order; and after we had destroyed all thereabouts, and even kill'd our Horses, we reimbark'd to pursue our Voyage towards St. Michael de Calimbuco, situate in the Gulph de Ancued; but the Harbour being of very difficult access there, by reason of the Creeks and Sands that surround it, it was resolved to leave it unattempted, and to continue our Course to the Fort of Castro.

Ac-

Accordingly we pursued our Voyage on the 29th, when we came to an Anchor towards Night betwixt two Islands, at 14 Fathoms depth. Some of the Men got ashore to take some Cattel, but met with nothing but one Sheep which they found tied to a Tree.

On the 30th we came to an Anchor near another Island, and not knowing what place it was, the Major in person went ashore, with both the Captains and all the Souldiers, to endeavour to take some Prisoners, but could meet with none of the Inhabitants, who were fled, leaving their Sheep behind them; of which they took a good number, and among them three Camel-Sheep, whose Necks are near four foot long; their Wool is very fine, but their Flesh not fit to eat.

The Sheep are thus described by the Spaniards: Among other Qualifications belonging peculiarly to the Sheep of Peru, Brewer. this is very remarkable, that they are able to carry a Burden from 50 to 75 pounds weight with ease, just as Camels do, whom they resemble much in shape, except that they have no such bunches upon their Backs. They are able (if the Spaniards may be believed) to carry a Man four or five Leagues a day. When they are tired, they lie down upon the ground, and are not to be raised again by beating, or any other way, but must be unloaded. If their Riders force them by beating, or otherwise, beyond what they can bear, they turn their Heads, and blow their stinking Breaths into their Faces. It is a very useful Creature (especially those call'd Pancos) they eat and drink very little, sometimes they don't drink in four or five days.

The rest of the Sheep were both in bigness and otherwise like our European Sheep, and proved very beneficial to us.

On the 6th of June the Fleet came within sight of Castro, and discovered the Enemy, both Horse and Foot, upon the Hills near the Shore. The Major, by order from the General, landed with all the Soldiers, the Lieutenant leading the Van; so they march'd in good order towards the City, which they entered without any resistance, the Inhabitants being all fled, after they had laid most of the Houses in Ashes, had untiled the Churches, and carried their Ornaments, and all their other precious Moveables and best Household-goods along with them into the Woods. Several Parties were sent abroad to endeavour the taking of some Prisoners; but in vain, they having got the start of us, and being better acquainted with the by-ways than it was possible for us to be without a

Brewer. Guide. The Soldiers found a Chilese in a Ditch, whom we suppos'd to be lately kill'd by the Spaniards, with an intention to shew him after our retreat to the neighbouring *Chilese*s, to deter them from joining with us against them: but the Dutch Officers took care to have him buried before they left the place, thereby to disappoint the Spaniards Design against them. The Seamen got abundance of very good Apples, and the Soldiers tarried ashore all Night, in hopes to meet with some Cattel the next Day.

On the 7th of June the General finding that there was but little prospect of getting any Prisoners, order'd the Country thereabouts to be laid desolate, and that we should set sail again the next day.

Description of Castro.

The City of Castro was formerly a magnificent place, full of very stately Buildings, but is now laid desolate; it is pleasantly situate upon a high Hill, surrounded with all sorts of fruitful Trees, and many fine Springs; the Grounds thereabouts are very well cultivated, and at the time of our arrival the Fruits of the Earth were for the most part as yet standing in the Fields.

On the 8th being becalmed, we were forced to come to an Anchor at Night not far from thence; and the Major going ashore with some Soldiers, brought back a Booty of above a hundred Sheep, and twelve Hogs, and set fire to some Houses near the Sea-side.

On the 13th we came to an Anchor near an Island; the Major being again order'd to land some of his Men, the Lieutenant took a young Chilese, and some of the other Soldiers an old Castilian Woman of 75 Years of Age, and such a vast number of Sheep, that they were forced to leave many behind.

On the 16th we came back to the Channel of Oforno, which we pass'd, and arrived on the 17th safely at Brewer's Harbour. Our General was fallen sick in this last Voyage, and continued so till his death.

The General falls sick.

On the 21st it was resolv'd in a Council of War, to send the Ship the Concord, and the Dolphin Yacht, forthwith to Baldivia, and that the Yacht should come back to give an Account to the General concerning the Situation of that Harbour, and the Constitution of the Inhabitants, their Government, and what Enemies we were like to meet with there: After which the two Ships, the Amsterdam and Flislingen were to follow them thither. But it happening to blow very hard for a considerable time together out of the North, they were forced to stay till they were all ready to sail.

On the 23^d it was resolv'd, that Provision beginning to fall short, each Man should have no more than two pounds and half of Flesh for his weekly Allowance.

On the 2^d of July complaint being made, that there were many among the Seamen and Soldiers, who made it their business to steal Bread, Meat, and Tobacco from the rest, a strict Order was issued against it, forbidding the same under pain of Death.

On the 8th it was resolv'd, that seeing there was no going out to Sea from Brewer's Harbour, by reason of the strong North winds, we should return to Carel-Mappa.

Accordingly we arrived on the 11th before Carel-Mappa; some Soldiers being landed to fetch Cattel, they found that the Spaniards had been thereabouts since our retreat, because they found abundance of empty Chests in the Woods, which they had dug from under the Ground where they had been hidden before.

On the 16th the Lieutenant of Capt. Flori, whose name was Rembach, was ordered with thirty Soldiers to go out upon Parts deeper into the Country. He return'd on the 17th, bringing along with him three Spaniards, whom he had taken near a place called Las Babias, about three Leagues from Carel-Mappa, where they kept Guard with three more that made their escape, to keep a watchful eye over the Ancacos, or the rebellious *Chilese*s. One of them was call'd Juan Mascareguas de Sosa, a Portuguese by extraction, but born at St. Francisco de Quito in Pern. He told us he was about threescore and eight Years old, of which he had served forty in Chili; to wit, seven Years in the Fort of Conception, and three and thirty at Carel-Mappa, where he had served as a Sergeant. That since his arrival in Chili, he was not acquainted with any of the Spanish Garisons there, except with those two before-mentioned, and with Castro and Arauco, which as he said was defended by a Fort Royal call'd St. Philippo, about a Cannon shot from the Sea-side, in which the Spaniards us'd to keep a Garison of 500 Men; and that at some farther distance from the Sea there was another Fort, but of no great consequence. He further told us, that this was their Winter, but that the worst was past; besides, that they had had no extraordinary great Storms of late, which sometimes were so violent thereabouts, as to tear up Trees by the Roots, blow down the Houses, and to shake the very Mountains: That in August the Wind used to begin to blow from the West, but did not continue there very long: That there was vast store of Gold in Oorno, and rather more in Baldivia, but that they wanted Miners to dig it: That the Indians wear pieces of it of half a finger's length for Ornament, which they fasten upon strings, and wear about the Neck and Head; but that there was no Gold to be seen of late Years in Castro, because the Indians had not dug in the Mines these 40 Years, since their last Revolt.

He also related that the present Governor of Castro was a Native of Oorno, of Spanish Parents, his name Don Ferdinando Alvaredo, a generous and quiet Person; who being but lately come to Castro, had not had the opportunity as yet to enrich himself, his yearly Salary not exceeding a thousand Patacoons; and the whole Cargo he brought along with him thither upon his own account, consisting only in 40 Pipes of Wine, and some Woollen and Linen Cloth.

He gave further an Account, that it was near 48 Years since the Spaniards were chased out of Baldivia: That sometime after they had sent another Governor thither, with 300 Castilian Soldiers, but most of them perished for want of Provisions and other Necessaries, the rest with their Commander escaping, not without a great deal of danger, to Oorno: That about sixteen Years before a Spanish Ship coming from Lima, had landed some Men thereabouts, under the Conduct of Pedro Rycquo Marseillan, and had made great Booty, so that many of the common Soldiers got from 6 to 20 pounds weight of Gold. He assured us further, that in the Fort Conception, not above a League distant from thence, there were not above a hundred Soldiers, and about 200 Inhabitants, very slightly fortified, but the Harbour inaccessible to Ships of any Burden or Bulk; and that Imperial was quitted by the Spaniards, the place lying quite desolate.

The Spanish Woman whom they had taken in one of the Chilense Islands, was called Loyza Pizarra, Widow of Feronimo de Tinchillo, a Native of Oorno, which she had been forced to quit in the Year 1599, at the time of the Rebellion of the Chilenses, since which time she had lived at Quintan; she declared, That about 40 Years ago, before the Indians revolted from the Spaniards, the last lived in great splendor in Oorno, the meanest Spaniard having three hundred Indians for his Vassals, who were obliged to pay their Lords a certain weekly Tribute in Gold: But that the Indians being quite tired out with this slavery, and other intolerable Impositions, had taken up Arms in the Year 1599, and besieged the Spaniards so closely in their Forts, that after they were driven to such extremity as to eat the Barks of Trees, despairing of Relief, they were forced to capitulate with the Indians; according to which they were to retire to Carel-Mappa, and Calimbuco, where they arrived at last with the miserable remainders of their Forces, after they had been travelling a whole Month, and undergone incredible Fatigues by the badness of the ways and the season; besides, that they had been forced to carry their Canoos, or little Boats upon their Backs, for the conveniency of their passage over three several large and rapid Rivers: Since which time they had fortified Carel-Mappa, and Calimbuco, to prevent the Incursions of those of Oorno into the Chilense Islands under the Spanish Jurisdiction.

She related also, that the Island of Chili was divided into about a hundred Encomendorns, or Lordships, the chiefest of which had 28 or 30 Indians under them, the least five or six. These Indians are Slaves to their Lords, who imploy them in making of Quilts, cultivating the Ground, sowing Pease, Beans, Flax, Hemp, and such-like: As also to look after their Sheep (of which they have vast numbers) Goats, Hogs, Horses, and Cows, tho they have but very few of the last.

These poor Chilenses have nothing that they can call their own, the Spaniards allowing them nothing else but Food and Clothes; and they take care also that they be instructed in the Christian Religion. They have but one Privilege belonging to them, that they must not be sold, or be transported into another Country, but are to end their Days in their native Country. The Encomendorns are bestowed by the King upon such as have served him faithfully in the War, or otherwise, and are inheritable by their Sons or Daughters, and for want of them by their Widows; but after their decease return to the King.

She further added, that there was no Gold or Silver now to be found in Chilove; tho some years before a certain quantity of both had been dug out of the Mines

there: That since the year 1633. this had been quite given over, because a violent Plague had taken off at least one third part of the Inhabitants, and the rest finding no considerable overplus in the digging of the Mines had apply'd themselves to the manuring and cultivating of their Lands; so that of late there was no such thing as any Gold or Silver Coin or Oar to be seen among the Spaniards there; and if they were ask'd for any of that Metal, their Answer was, that they must go and look for it in Osoño and Baldivia, where it was in great plenty; that for this reason they carry on their Traffick by way of Exchange, so that the Ships coming every year from Conception and St. Jago (being only three in number) with Linen and Woollen Clothes, Oil, Flower, Wine, Pepper and Iron, carry back in lieu of them Quilts, Deal-boards, Flax, Hemp and such like. The Deal-boards were brought from among the Mountains about seven or eight Leagues distant from the Sea-side, where they are cut with Axes only, without any Saws, not without a great deal of Time and incredible Labour, but that both stand them there in little or nothing.

She gave an account that in the Month of March last past a Spanish Vessel call'd the St. Domingo was sent from Conception to reinforce the Garisons of Carel Mappa and Calimbuco with 30 Soldiers; in which Vessel her own Daughter was come over, and had brought Letters to several Persons there, which all agreed in this, that those of Osoño, Baldivia, Imperial, Villanca, Tucapel, Auraco and Puereñ, who for several years last past had liv'd in a good Correspondence with the Spaniards, had now taken up Arms against them, which had made the Governor of Conception to cause several of their Hostages in his custody to be beheaded there; that about three weeks before the arrival of the Dutch Fleet in those parts, the Spaniards had made an Incursion out of Carel Mappa into the Territories of those of Osoño, where they had taken 30 Prisoners, for whom they expected a considerable Ransom; but during the general Consternation they were put in at the arrival of the Dutch, they had found means to make their escape. This is the whole substance of what was depose'd by the Spanish Woman.

Our Soldiers had among the taken a Chilese, with his Wife and Child; these were set at liberty on the 18th of July, under condition that they should undeceive their Countrymen of what had been insinuated to them by the Spaniards concerning the Barbarity of the Dutch, and to assure them that they were their Friends, and Enemies to the Spaniards. 1643.

On the 19th the Major was sent ashore again with some Prisoners, who promised to shew the place where some Silver was buried deep under ground; they return'd on the 20th, and brought a Chest along with them, in which were 325 Reals or Pieces of Eight, and 25 Pound weight of Plate. The same day came on board of us six Chilese, among whom were two Casiques (or Leaders) who assur'd us, that having understood that the Hollanders were their Friends, and were come to assist them against the Spaniards, they had been extremely rejoiced at so welcome a piece of News; upon which they were told, that we had brought good store of Arms along with us to exchange them with those of Osoño, Baldivia, and others desirous of our Assistance, for such Commodities as their Countrys afforded; by which means they might be enabled to carry on the War the more vigorously against the Spaniards; and that we were ready to assist them to the utmost of our power. The Chilese return'd this Answer, that many of them had some time ago taken a Resolution to retire towards Osoño and Baldivia, to shelter themselves against the Tyranny of the Spaniards; and that nothing else had made them delay this their Resolution, but the hopes they liv'd in of being shortly reliev'd by the Dutch Fleet; that therefore they intreated them to receive them with their Wives and Children into their Vessels in order to transport them to Baldivia, the Ways thither by Land being at present, by reason of the Spaniards who would observe their Motions, and the great Rains which had swell'd the Rivers, impassable for Women and Children. Our General was so generous as not only to grant them their Request, but also presented each of them with a Half-pike and Sword, so that they parted from us extremely well satisfied, and gave so advantageous an account of their good reception, and the great quantity of Arms brought by the Hollanders for the use of the Chilese, that there past not a day but many of them came to visit us aboard our Ships, whilst the rest were providing themselves with Provisions and all other Necessaries for their intended Voyage to Baldivia. They find some Silver.

On the 21st some Chilese came aboard to discover a certain place near the shoar, where the Spaniards had buried

3. one of their Brass Cannon, which being dug up was found to be eight foot long. The same day it was resolv'd in the Council of War to lay up our Ships for the Winter-time in Brewers Harbour, considering that the General's Sickness increased daily, and the danger there was of the Tempests, which commonly rage most violently on that Coast in the Month of August, and had about eight years before continued for forty days together with such fury as to shake the Earth and adjacent Mountains, and had torn vast numbers of Trees up by the Roots.

On the 28th two principal Casiques (or Chief Captains) came aboard of us from Carel Mappa; one was call'd S. Don Diego, the other Don Philippo, who both commanded about Carel Mappa: they testified their satisfaction at our arrival, and the assurance they had receiv'd of the good Inclinations of the Dutch towards their Nation, and of the Enmity they bore to the Spaniards; they assur'd us that they were glad to understand they had brought so many Arms to exchange with them, offering at the same time their Service against the Spaniards, whose Yoke they were resolv'd to shake off: As a Confirmation of which Don Philippo produced a Spaniard's Head, whom he said he had slain about fourteen days before, the scent of which was very offensive to our Nostrils. They further added, that they were resolv'd to retire to Oferno and Baldivia, for which purpose they had already brought together 200 Chilefes. Our General confirm'd them in their good Intention, desiring them to make all possible haste, to be there before our arrival; and for an Encouragement they were presented with 18 Swords, and as many Pikes, besides five Musquets, with necessary Powder and Ball, in lieu of which they promised to send us five Cows, which they perform'd accordingly, the Boatswain with some others being sent to Carel Mappa to fetch them, and at the same time to deliver a Letter to the Governor of Castro about a Seaman, who had been taken by the Spaniards on the 14th of May, as we told you before.

On the 6th of August 18 Chilefes came in a Canoo from Dolphins-ferry towards us, desiring to be transported to Baldivia, which was readily granted.

On the 7th Mr. Henry Brewer our General died betwixt ten and eleven a Clock in the Forenoon, after a very long Sickness: his last Request was, that his Corps should be interred in Baldivia; accordingly his Entrails being taken out and buried on the 15th near Brewers Harbour, the Carcase was embalm'd in order to be transported to Baldivia.

On the 9th the Boatswain who had been sent to Carel Mappa return'd, and gave an account of a very strange Adventure that had happened to them. They were forced by a violent Storm to shelter themselves with their Boat under an Island call'd the Horse-Isle; and the Boatswain ordering some of the Seamen to put her into some convenient place for safety sake, seven of them who endeavour'd to execute his Orders, were on a sudden carried by the Tempest into the open Sea, where they were soon swallow'd up by the Waves in the sight of their Comrades, who beheld this miserable Spectacle from the shoar-side. But their greatest grief was, that they did expect a worse Fate themselves in an Island, where they saw themselves destitute of all means, either to sustain themselves, or to hear any tydings of their Country-men. As they were roving about, they found a small Cottage and six Sheep near it, with a good quantity of Pattateses (a Root not unlike our Potatoes, of which they make Bread in those parts) which was no small comfort to them in their Affliction. They husbanded their Provisions with all possible care, but the Sheep being all consumed, and they reduced to the last extremity, the Boat belonging to the Ship Amsterdam happened very luckily to land in the same Island, without having the least suspicion of there being there, they being given over for lost a considerable time before: by which Accident they were reliev'd very seasonably, when they began to prepare themselves for Death, which they look'd upon as unavoidable.

On the 10th some Soldiers straggling about the Country, found in a Wood a Letter affix'd to a Tree, being an Answer of Ferdinando de Alvarado Governor of Castro, to a Letter writ on the 29th of July last past by Mr. Herckeman: The Letter was writ in Spanish, and had the following Direction; To Mr. Elias Herckeman Lieutenant General of the Dutch Ships now at Anchor in the English Harbour, whom God bless.

My Lord, Lieut. General;

I Receiv'd yours, out of which I perceive your Intention of exchanging one of your Seamen call'd John Lomberts, with one Doni a Spaniard; I am not at the least surpris'd at your request, it being no more than what is allowable by the Custom of War ; if you will be pleased to send me the said Doisi, I promise you upon the word of a Cavalier, that I will intercede in the behalf of the other Prisoner with the King ; if the said Prisoner were as yet in my Custody, I would have sent him to you immediately, but it is near a Month ago since I sent him in an Advice Boat to the Marquess de Bayde Governor of Concepcion Fort, where I believe him to be very well used. If you had been in my station, you would have done as I did, it being my Duty so to do, which I don't question you will accept of as a sufficient reason, being my King's and natural Liege Lord's Subject, for whom I am bound to sacrifice my Life. God bless him.

On the 12th the Boat of the under Commander was sent to Dolphin's Ford with ten Soldiers, because the Spaniards appear'd as yet sometimes thereabouts ; they return'd the next day, and brought a good number of Chilese along with them ; these were followed by more every day.

On the 18th Mr. Elias Herckman open'd his Commission in the presence of the Council and all the Captains, by which he was constituted Commander in Chief of this Expedition : on which occasion he received the Congratulations of all there present, and was saluted with six Cannon from each Ship.

By this time a great number of Chilese being ready to embark for Baldivia, were put on board our several Vessels. Don Diego and Don Philip had prepar'd themselves to go with their Followers by Land ; but having received certain Intelligence that the Spaniards kept a strict Guard on all the PASSES, they desired likewise permission to come on board us to pursue their Voyage, which was granted to their entire satisfaction ; so that there were in all 470 Chilese, who had provided themselves with all Necessaries, such as Barley, Pease, Beans, Potatoes, Sheep and Hogs. Before we set sail, there was one among them who propos'd, that since it could scarce be advisable to come in so great a number to Baldivia without giving notice of it before hand, for fear they should be taken for Enemies, he would venture to make his way by Land notwithstanding all the Precaution of the Spaniards, provided there were two more among them who would accompany him in this Journey ; and there being two brave Fellows ready to undertake it, they accordingly proceeded forthwith on their Journey by Land to Baldivia.

On the 21st the Weather being very fair, and the Wind blowing a favourable Gale from the South East, the Signal was given to hoist up our Sails, and we directed our Course to the North-West by North, being under the Elevation of 41 degrees and 27 min.

An Account or Description of Brewers Harbour, and the circumjacent Places on the Coast of Chili.

THIS Harbour or Bay, which by some is call'd Chilova, by others the English Harbour, and by us Brewers Harbour, is situate 41 degrees 30 min. beyond the Line, a very convenient Harbour for Anchorage, Fishing, and going out into the open Sea. There is great plenty of Wood for firing, and fresh Water, as also of Fish ; about the Full Moon you meet with very large Crawfish and Muscles, but not quite so big as those found in the Straits of Le Maire, where they are near a foot long and a hand broad.

The Country thereabouts and the adjacent Islands abound in Cattel, such as Sheep, Hogs, Horses, and Goats ; have also plenty of Fowl, the Grounds being likewise fertile in Wheat, Pease, Beans, Turnips, Potatoes and Flax ; but it often happens that the Fruits of the Earth are spoiled by the Storms before they come to maturity.

Their Potatoes are some round, some of an oval Figure, of all sorts of Colours, red, white, and yellow, but most generally white ; they roast them, and use them for their ordinary Food.

The Spaniards affirm that there are several Rivulets thereabouts which flow in the day-time, and are quite dry'd up in the night ; which seems strange to those who don't guess at the true Cause, which is, that the Sun melts the Snow upon the Hills in the day-time, which ceasing in the night, the Rivulets also cease to run.

The Men in those parts are not very tall, but very strong and well set, resembling the Inhabitants of Brasil ; they are of a dark brown Complexion, their Hair coal black, cut short to their Ears ;

they pull out the Hair of their Beards, and tie a broad Ribbon about their Heads.

Their Apparel is very mean, but very neat; the Men wear a kind of wide pleated Breeches like the Dutch Seamen, and about the Waste a Ribbon in the nature of a Girdle: they don't use either Shirts or Waistcoats, but only a piece of the same stuff they make their Breeches of, of half a yard square, in which they make a hole, and putting their Heads through let it hang down over their Shoulders, their Arms and Legs being left bare, without either Hat or Shoes: their Weapon is a pretty long Pike.

Their Women are not so tall as the Men; they wear only a piece of Stuff fastened to their Middles, and another about their Neck, which hangs down backwards, their Heads, Breasts, Arms and Legs being quite bare. Some among them twist their black Hair with Ribbons of divers colours, others let them hang carelessly down their Backs. Notwithstanding their Clothes are not very well fitted for the coolness of the Climate, yet they are commonly extremely healthful, which we made frequent Observations of whilst they were on board us, when we saw sometimes their Women go about their business in half an hour after they were brought to Bed, with their Bantlings upon their backs; their Breasts are so long, that they can throw them over their Shoulders when they suckle their Children: They are very seldom idle, but constantly employed ployed in weaving Stuffs for their wearing Apparel.

The Inhabitants of Chilova it self were then not above 200 in number, because a few years before, to wit in the Years 1637 and 1638, two thirds of them had been swept away by the Plague.

Most of the Inhabitants of Chili are subject to several Lordships of the Spaniards, some of them having 40, 50, 100, nay 150 Vassals under their Jurisdiction; but they can't sell them, or transport them to any other but their native place.

The Lords employ these Chilefes in cultivating the Ground, and other servile Works, as has been told before.

Their Habitations are very mean and low, without any Windows, except the hole which passes for the Chimney.

There is no Gold or Silver to be found or dig'd here now; partly because the Chilefes are very hard to be brought to digging in the Mines, partly because the Mines turn but to a slender account.

Every Year in the Months of February, March and April, there commonly arrive three Ships from St. Maria and Conception laden with Wheat, Wine, Clothes, and all sorts of Iron-work, which they exchange for Deal-boards, Tents and Quilts; there is also every Year a Vessel sent from Lima a cruising thereabouts, to see whether any foreign Ships are in those Seas.

The Naval Force of the King of Spain at Lima consisted in six or seven Men of War, the biggest of which carried 46 Guns, the rest from 24 to 30 Guns, besides abundance of Merchant-men. Lima is the only place hereabouts where they build any Men of War; in the Harbours of Valgarise and Conception there are no Men of War, but only some Merchant-men and other small Craft.

On the 24th of August our Fleet came to the mouth of the River Baldivia, the Entrance of which they found about a League over: after we had sail'd about half a League within the mouth of the River, we let fall our Anchors, there being three several Branches, which made us uncertain which to chuse; at last we entred the middle Branch, where we got upon the Sands, and so were forced to tarry there till next Morning.

On the 26th ten Inhabitants of Baldivia came with three Canoos, (cut out of the Trunks of Trees) aboard us; their Chieftain brought along with him a small Vessel laden with all sorts of Merchandizes to exchange them with us, they seem'd to be mightily surprized at our Ships, and that we had such a quantity of Arms and Men on board.

On the 28th the Ship call'd the Concord, and the Dolbin Yacht being got clear of the Sands, came to an Anchor before the City of Baldivia. This City was inhabited by the Castilians till the Year 1599, when the Chilefes chased them from thence, burnt the Town, and kill'd all the Spaniards. The Governour they pour'd melted Gold down his Throat whilst he was alive, they used afterwards his Skull for a drinking Cup, and made Horns out of the Bones of his Legs. There were as yet remaining some Ruins of their antient Gates, which appear'd to be very high and strong; it had contained formerly about 450 large Houses, was divided into several large Streets, besides Lanes, and had two stately Market-places; but when we saw it, it was quite desolate, full of Bushes and Weeds, resembling more a Wilderness than a City: We saluted the place, each Ship with six Cannon; the Indians came aboard in whole troops, and were much surprized at our Ships; the worst was, that we found them much inclined to Stealing, especially of Iron, tho they spared nothing that came in their way, even to the Compasses themselves, which they took out of the Cases; so that the next time we were better aware of them, and kept every thing under Lock and Key.

There appear'd at the same time about 300 more upon the Shore, all well arm'd with Pikes 18 Feet long, both Horse and Foot; some of the Castiques beg'd heartily of Mr. Crispinson that he would order his Souldiers to be drawn up in order of Battel in their presence, to instruct Chilefes in the Warlike Exercises, of which they were altogether ignorant, and for want of which they were not in a condition to cope with the Spaniards: but he excused himself upon that point; because the General with the other two Ships were not come up with them as yet, but hoped they would be by next day. In the mean while those Chilefes whom we had brought along with us from Carel Mappa and Castro, were busy in unloading their Baggage, and landing their Men.

On the 29th the General Herckeman finding that the two Ships the Amsterdam and the Flissingen could not so soon get off of the Sands, caused two Companies of the Souldiers to be embark'd in the Yacht, and landed them near the City

Are Vassals to the Spaniards.

We proceed on our Voyage.

Come to Baldivia.

City of Baldivia, where they found about seventy Chilefes standing at their Arms, the rest to the number of 200 being march'd away the day before, with an intention to return in a few days. The General made an Harangue to them, addressing himself to their Chieftain, who was a Baldivian. He told them that the reason of their coming to this place was, to make them sensible that since the Dutch had got a firm footing in Brasil, they should be in a condition to assist them with Arms, and all other Necessaries against the Spaniards. He delivered at the same time his Credentials from the Prince of Orange, which being interpreted to them by one of the Spaniards, who was a Prisoner among us, they seem'd to be extremely well satisfied. He likewise presented the Casique with two Swords and a Pike in the Name of the Prince of Orange, which he received with a most profound respect. After several other Discourses, they parted towards the Country, (the City being not inhabitable) with a solemn promise to return suddenly, as soon as those of Osono and Conco could join them, when they would agree upon the Articles, which were to be the Conditions of the future Confederacy. We were very sensible, that unless those Chilefes that came from Carel Mappa had assured them that the Hollanders were Enemies to the Spaniards, we should never have been able to bring them to any compliance or conference with us, especially since there was not one among the Chilefes who understood the Spanish Tongue.

On the 30th a certain Casique, attended by eight Chilefes, came aboard us, to let us know, that he had been inform'd by some Chilefes who lately were come by Land from Conception, that there lay two stout Spanish Ships ready to sail to Baldivia. Our General desired to see those Chilefes, partly to shew them his acknowledgment, partly to learn from them the posture the Enemy was in, in that place. They gave further information, that a good number of Chilefes of Conco and Osono were upon the Road, and that they would be at Baldivia in two or three days; that the Governour of Castro had caused many of the Casiques to be hang'd upon suspicion that they intended to make their escape; which had so exasperated the rest, that they were all fled to Osono and Conco, with an intention to follow the others to Baldivia.

On the 2d day of September the General went ashore to view the Ground where to build a Fort. The same Afternoon arrived above a thousand Indians of Osono and Conco to be present at the conclusion of the League, which was concluded the next following day.

On the 3d of September all the Souldiers were landed with their Baggage, and about thirty Canoes brought us some Cattel, and abundance of Shitie, which the Chilefes use for their Drink, and is prepared thus: They take a good quantity of the Root Inilie roasted in the Sands, which their Wives chew for a considerable time, and then throw it into a Vessel with Water, adding to it some other Roots peculiar to that Country; after it has stood two or three days, it works like our Beer, some of it being Red, another sort White; but resembles in taste our Milk when sowed: they exchanged it for old Iron.

The same Afternoon our General Herckeman made another Harangue to the Casiques of Osono, Conco, and Baldivia, being attended in the Field by about 1200 Chilefes: He told them, that the chief motive of their Voyage to Chili was the Renown of their brave Actions, which had reach'd as far as the Netherlands, and how bravely they had defended themselves against the Spaniards ever since the Year 1550. That the Hollanders having been at War with the Spaniards upon the same score of their Liberty for eighty Years last past, had carried on the same with such success as to have extended their Conquests to Brasil, from whence they might in less than two Months time sail to Chili; whereas before, by reason of the vast distance of their Country, and that the Enemy's were betwixt them, they could not come to them so soon nor so well as they could have wish'd: But that things being now in a better condition, they were come on purpose to enter with them into a Confederacy; for which end they had brought along with them good store of Arms and Cannon, Musquets, Pikes, Swords, Powder and Ball, which they were ready to exchange for the Products of their Country, to enable them not only to defend themselves against the Spaniards, but also to act offensively against them.

Which done, a Letter from the Prince of Orange was delivered to each of the Casiques, which they receiv'd with a great deal of Reverence, kiss'd the same, and told

Brewer. told the General, That they look'd upon themselves as the most fortunate People in the World, that they should come from so far distant Countrys to furnish them with Weapons.

Our General, to found the bottom of their Inclinations, then propos'd to them, That being in want of Provisions, he desir'd they should send on board us Hogs, Sheep, Cows, and other Provisions, in lieu of which they should have Arms and other Merchandizes; but if they were not willing to comply with his desire, they would be necessitated to leave this Coast. The Chilese answered with one voice, That they were ready to do what we ask'd, their Country being plentifully furnish'd with Cattel, provided our Fleet would not stir from thence.

Enter into a Confederacy. The General and his Counsellors looking upon this Declaration as a full assurance of their good intentions, offer'd in the Name of the States and the Prince of Orange, to enter with them into a Confederacy against the Spaniards. Which being readily accepted by them, an Offensive and Defensive Alliance was concluded, by virtue of which they were to assist one another against any Aggressors.

They could not however be prevail'd upon to have the Articles drawn in Writing, this being, as they alledged, against their custom; their mutual Promises being look'd upon among them as the strongest Tie, and that as a pledg of it they would keep the Prince of Orange's Letter.

It was then propos'd that it would be absolutely necessary for their mutual security to build a Fort near Baldivia, which might serve them for a safe Retreat upon all occasions; which they willingly assented to, leaving the whole management of it to the General and his Counsellors.

Matters being thus far brought to a happy end, some of the Hollanders began by degrees to sound their Inclinations, whether they would not be willing to exchange some Gold for Arms, (this being indeed the main motive of our Voyage) because they had been credibly inform'd that there was great plenty of this Metal there. The Casiques hereupon declared unanimously that they knew of no Gold Mines there, neither was any Gold in use, or wrought among them; that they remember'd very well that formerly they had been forced to carry Runs to the Spaniards in Gold, for it with the loss of their Noses and Ears, which had created in them such an antipathy against this Metal, that they could not endure ever since to hear it named among them, much less that they should either value or covet it.

The General gave them for answer, That neither he nor any that belonged to him were come thither to exact any Contributions from them, but were ready to pay them for it with Arms, and such other Merchandizes as they had brought along with them. Neither did they desire to oblige them to any certain quantity to be delivered Monthly, but every one should be at his own liberty to exchange what he pleas'd. The Casiques then look'd stedfastly upon one another, without returning one word in answer.

We had at the same time certain Intelligence that there were very rich Gold Mines thereabouts; which gave us some reason to hope, that considering the eagerness of the Chilese after our European Weapons, they would by degrees be prevail'd upon to exchange it for them: but knowing them to be a barbarous and unpolish'd People, we thought it not convenient to urge them any further upon that Head for the present, lest they should imagin we would serve them for their Gold sake as the Spaniards had done.

On the 7th it was resolv'd in the Council that Mr. Crispinson should sail forth with the Ship Amsterdam to Brasil, to give an account to the Government there concerning the state of Affairs in Chili; accordingly Mr. Crispinson went the next day aboard the said Ship, and after having made an Inventory of what was to be found there belonging to the late General Brewer, return'd to Baldivia.

On the 11th a certain Chilese came to us, whom we look'd upon as a Spy, to discover our intentions, whether we were real Enemies of the Spaniards; he pretended a great deal of simplicity in all his actions, and would needs speak with the General himself, being prosecuted by his Countrymen the Chilese: He told us, he was come in six days from Manckmes, that he had been at Conception to trade with the Spaniards about some Iron, that two Ships lay ready there to sail with the first fair Wind to Carel Mappa and Castro; that the Indians about Arauco had lately revolted against the Spaniards, and that two of their principal Casiques were retired towards Imperial to carry on the War against them.

The Dutch Inquiry after Gold to no purpose.

A Chilese Spy.

On the 16th in the Afternoon the Body of the late deceased General Brewer was magnificently (considering our present circumstances) interred at Baldivia.

The same day Mr. Crispison took his leave of the General, and the other Counsellors, in order to embark aboard the Ship Amsterdam, bound to Fernambuco in Brazil; leaving with us the Ships, the Flissingen, the Concord, and Dolphin Yacht, with 180 Seamen, and three Companies of Soldiers making 290 men, commanded by Major Blewbeck, by Capt. Osterman, and Capt. Flori. Our General then went aboard the Concord.

On the 23d the General went ashore with all the Officers; and a place being mark'd out to erect a Fort, they began to work upon it immediately.

On the 24th the General thought fit to send the Boatswain of the Concord to Mr. Crispison on board the Amsterdam, riding then at Anchor in the River of Baldivia, where she was taking in her Ballast, with a Letter containing that Courewang the chief Casique or Captain of Villaricea was come with 200 Men, to give him a Visit a second time; that he intended to send the Ship the Concord, and the Dolphin Yacht against Osfober, (if nothing prevented his design) to the Isle of St. Mary, to make themselves Masters of it; that he intended to have done it before, if he could have spared so many Men, who were now busy in working on the design'd Fort at Baldivia: That he did not in the least doubt of the success, but much questioned whether any of the *Chilese*s would be prevail'd upon to transplant themselves thither from the Continent to cultivate the Ground; because the Spaniards in Conception, and some other neighbouring Garifons might easily intercept their passage, and make them their Slaves: That those of Osorno, Conce, Baldivia, Imperial and Villaricea, were all unanimous in perswading him to chase the Spaniards out of Arauco, Penco, and Bio Biv; and offered their assistance in this Expedition: That if these places were taken, it would be no difficult task to attack them in Conception itself, and consequently to deliver a great part of Chili from the Spanish Yoke, or at least to restore Chilova to its antient Liberty; he being assured that the whole force of the Spaniards in Chili consisted only in 1500 Disciplin'd men, to wit, 300 in Vale Parayso and St. Jago, 300 in Conception, 100 in La Zarena, 100 near the River Bio-Biv, 60 in Jumbel, 300 in Arauco; 120 in Chilova, Carel Mappa, and Calimbuco; without reckoning the Spanish Inhabitants, who were more numerous: That he was fully perswaded, that in case ten Ships, and three Yachts with 800 Soldiers (Seamen, Cannon and Ammunition in proportion) were sent to his assistance, he did not question to make himself Master of these places, with the assistance of the *Chilese*s, without the least fear from the Enemies Naval Force at Lima: That this might serve as a means to encourage those of Peru to a Revolt against the Spaniards; it being unquestionable that the Indians had conceived a general hatred against the Spaniards, and had a strong inclination to, and great confidence in the Dutch, as was evident from thence, that 470 *Chilese*s had voluntarily embark'd themselves with their Wives and Children aboard their Ships, to be transported from Chilova to Baldivia, where both they and the Dutch were met and congratulated by the Casiques of Baldivia, Osorno, Conce and Villaricea, in the presence of 1200 of their best Men, who had shewn a most particular respect for the Prince of Orange's Letter, and look'd upon it as their greatest happiness, that they should come from so far distant a Country to their assistance; desiring the Dutch to continue on their Coast, and promising to furnish them with all manner of Necessaries.

He gave him also an account, how he had been credibly inform'd, that the Indians of Rio de la Plata had lately murdered several Jesuits, which he look'd upon as the forerunner of a Revolt to shake off the Spanish Yoke; that he desired this might be taken into serious consideration in the Council of Brazil, to send them what assistance they were able to encourage their Undertaking, it being not improbable that when the War should be once kindled on that side, the Flame might spread all over the Spanish Indies, and consequently fly over Chili, as far as to Mount Potosi.

On the 26th the General went again ashore, to confer with the Casiques, who were arrived the day before; they told him, that it was impossible for them to furnish any quantity of Cattel, Sheep or Swine, till about four or five Months hence, which was very surprizing to the General, especially when he found that those of Osorno and Conce confirm'd what the others had said, knowing the Provisions began to be scarce aboard; for which reason he dispatch'd an Advice-boat to Mr. Crispison to give him notice of

W this unexpected change, but too late, Brewer. the Ship Amsterdam being gone to Sea some time before. On the 27th the General went ashore again, and brought along with him some Casiques, who were very well entertained aboard our Ship the Concord; he took this opportunity to talk to them once more concerning the promised Provisions, whether they could not procure them sooner, and they should have some of the best Arms in lieu of them; but they would not engage to furnish us with any till after the expiration of two Months, and so left our Ship.

On the 5th of October, came aboard us Manquiente the Head-Casique of Manquiente; he did not return till the 7th, and at his departure was saluted by the General's order with one Cannon: he presented the General with 26 Sheep, two Hogs, and eight Cows; and was presented by him with some Glass Beads, two Hatchets, and some other Toys. He promised to come aboard again within eight days after, and to bring us more Cattel of all sorts, and some Gold, to exchange it for some Weapons, which he admir'd much; especially since (as he said) his Vallals were more ingenious and industrious in Ironwork than the other *Chilese*s, which they use to purchase for Gold from the Spaniards at Conception, and for the future would willingly exchange from the Hollanders.

Deliverance of a Spanish Prisoner.

On the 11th the Secretary of the General gave him a Relation of an odd Accident which happened not long before. As he was walking upon the Banks of the River, he saw a good number of *Chilese*s in arms, who were carrying away one of our Spanish Prisoners, whose name was Antonio Zanchies Zimes. They threatened him very hard, and were upon the point of sacrificing him to their Resentment, because, as they pretended, he was the occasion that the Dutch had erected a Fort near Baldivia, they being persuaded by him that there was a great deal of Gold among them. He denied the thing, alledging that he was taken and brought a Prisoner hither by the Dutch; but in vain, for they were just a going to kill him, if the Secretary had not come very opportunely, and had satisfied them that he was not guilty of what they had laid to his Charge.

The same Day the before-mentioned Casiques, and some *Chilese*s, brought us twelve Sheep and one Hog; in exchange of which they had four Hatchets, two Knives, and some Corals. One of these was a Deputy of the Casique Tunomanqu from Imperial: He brought advice that 2000 Spaniards were rendezvousing near that place, with an intention to march by land to Baldivia; and that if the General with some of his Men would follow his Directions, he would put them in a way to get a good Booty. But the General, who began to be mistrustful of them, excused himself; and to try their Inclinations, ask'd them whether they were willing he should leave that Coast? Upon which Cbeculemo answered, That he would advise him to stay, and to fortify himself well near the Sea-side; he gave us likewise this Caution, not to send any of our Men along with the other Casiques, for fear they should be had into an Ambush, from whence there would be no retreating. And so they departed towards Evening, and were saluted at their request with one Cannon.

On the 12th some more Canoes came aboard, with two Casiques of Baldivia; they brought some Sheep, which they exchanged with the Seamen. They gave an account that two hundred Spaniards were arrived lately with thirteen Ships at Imperial, and that they intended to come to Baldivia. The same day towards Evening the before-mentioned Spanish Prisoner Antonio Zanchies discovered to our Fiscal, whose name was Cornelius Faber, that one day as he was taking a walk in an adjacent Wood, he was met by some of our Soldiers (but of what Company he knew not) who persuaded him to make his escape with them to the Spaniards in Conception, telling him there were fifty more who had taken the same Resolution. He having promised them to comply with their Request (for fear of being murdered by them if he refused) they appointed a certain day when they were to meet in the same Wood again, and so left him for that time.

On the 13th it was resolved in a General Council, that considering Provisions began to be scarce, and that they could expect no Supply from the *Chilese*s (which was also uncertain) till about five Months after, it would be convenient to prepare every thing for their return to Brazil.

On the 14th the before-mentioned four Soldiers appeared at the appointed time in the Wood, in hopes to meet with the Spaniard; and when they found him to fail in his Promise, resolved to proceed alone in their way to Conception, for fear they should be severely punished if they

two Chilese Horsemen brought advice that they had met four Soldiers making the best of their way, but did not know whither they were bound, but they shew'd us which way they had taken. Whereupon an Ensign, call'd Otto ler Yelle, with two Serjeants and thirty Fusileers, was sent in pursuit of them, with orders to kill two of them wherever he could meet with them, and bring the two others alive into our Head-quarters.

On the 15th as we were busy in preparing our selves for our intended Voyage, word was brought to the General, that some of our Men being gone ashore to exchange some Toys for Cattel with the Chilese, they had refus'd to let them have any, under pretence that they had Orders to the contrary from their Casiques. Whereupon the General immediately summon'd another General Council, in order to put the Resolution taken on the 13th last past, concerning our departure, in execution. Pursuant to which a certain Writing was drawn, which was to be subscribed by all the Officers of the Ships: Whereas it was resolved in Council, on the 13th last past, that considering we stood in want of Provisions, and the Chilese shew'd but little inclination to furnish us with any, or to dig in the Gold Mines, we should prepare for our departure, that we might reach Brasil before all our Provisions were spent, and prevent any Succours to be sent from thence to our assistance. We the under-written Officers of the Ship N. confess by these Presents, that we don't only approve the said Resolution, but also judge it absolutely necessary to begin the said Voyage to Brasil. In the Ship N. the 18th of October 1643. Brewer.

On the 16th the Ensign return'd to the Garison, having according to order shot two of the Deserters upon the spot, and brought the other two to our Quarters.

On the 19th the General went once more ashore to take his last farewell of the Casiques, who for that purpose were assembled in an adjacent Field. They excus'd themselves that it had not been in their power to furnish us with sufficient Provisions; and in case they had had any notice about twelve months before of our Design, they would have taken effectual care to provide us all we could expect; it being their custom not to sow any more Corn, Pease and Beans, than for their own consumption, for fear of the Spaniards, who used frequently to take away all they could meet with; and that if our General would promise to return in two Years time, or thereabouts, they would lay up Provisions accordingly. Towards Evening the General return'd aboard with all the Soldiers, who had their Quarters assigned them in the several Ships.

Brewer. A Description of the River of Baldivia, and the circumjacent Country, under 39 deg. 59 min.

The River or Harbour of Baldivia, is situated under the elevation of 39 deg. 40 min. to the South of the Equinoctial Line, in a large Bay. At the mouth of this River is a small Island, which if it were fortified would command its Entrance, all Vessels being obliged to pass and repass not above a good Musket-shot from thence.

The People of Baldivia, Osono, and Conception, do much resemble those of Chilova, except that they are fatter and more corpulent, because they spend most of their time in eating and drinking, dancing and feasting, leading an idle Life, without Religion. Every one has as many Wives as he pleases, whom they buy from their Parents, and are obliged to cultivate the Ground, unless perhaps one or two who are their Favourites, the rest being no more than their Slaves, who are to attend their Husbands Pleasure; some of them have fifteen, sixteen, or twenty Wives at their devotion. They don't differ from the Chiloveses in their Habits; they also pull out the Hair of their Beards, and cut the Hair very short upon their Heads, to prevent the Enemies from laying hold by it. They are so much Strangers to the Spanish Tongue, that we could not meet with one among them who understood the least of it.

The Country abounds in Sheep, Cows, Hogs, Goats, Tame-fowl, and Horses; and produces good store of Pease, Beans, and and some Wheat; as also very good Apples, and several other sorts of Fruits. Their Weapons are long Pikes, about 14 or 15 foot long; some tipp'd with Iron, others only sharpened at the end; sometimes you meet with some Spanish Stocades, and Armours among them which they have taken from the Spaniards. They are good Horsemen, and manage their Lances with great dexterity on Horseback.

On the 26th a Court-Martial was summoned on board the Concord, to try the Deserters and their Accomplices; six of whom were condemned to be shot to death, and six others to undergo the Strapado; which was executed accordingly, one of the six being only saved, who was pardoned after his five Comrades were shot to death, and he stood at the Stake in expectation of his Fate. Scarce was the Execution over, when several Chilefes, and among them a Casique of Canten or Imperial, whose name was Canmanqui, and another call'd Casique Nicolanta of Calisaly, presented a Camel-Sheep to the General, and seem'd to be much concern'd at our Resolution of leaving their Coast; they were told that it was occasion'd by their want of Faith in not sending us Provision: so they departed without making the least reply; and we made a Present to them of two rusty Swords. The Chilefes call these Sheep Chilumuck in their Language, which is as much as to say a Province: They never kill them but against an extraordinary Feast; and when they are in the height of their Mirth, they take the Heart, of which each there present bites a piece as a token of Friendship, and their Fraternity.

On the 27th the following Allowance was settled for our intended Voyage: A quart of Oatmeal for eight Men per diem; a pound and a half of Stock-fish, four pounds of Meat; besides for each Man four pounds of Bread, and three pounds and a half of Bisket per week, a quarter of a pint of Oil, as much Vinegar, and a quart of Water per diem.

On the 28th we got out at Sea, and continued our Voyage till the 21st of November, when we repass'd the Straits of Le Maire, without discovering any Land; so that having no opportunity of getting fresh Water, the daily Allowance of Water was increased to one pint and a half till the first day of December, when by order from the General they were told, that if we did not meet with contrary Winds, they should receive their former Allowance.

On the 28th of December we discovered the Coast of Brasil about six Leagues at Sea, and not long after met with a small Vessel, the Master of which the General, that the Ship call'd the Jordan, that had left us on the 25th of September last past near Baldivia, was arriv'd with Mr. Crispensen about three Weeks before; and the Orange-Tree but fourteen days ago, they having met with many and great Tempests at Sea: That the Ship Hollandia was ready to sail to Baldivia to our Relief; and that a Yacht call'd the Hunter was to be sent to Holland to give an account how Matters went with us. We came the same Evening to an Anchor in the Harbour of Fernambuco.

A short Account of the Island of Formosa in the Indies, situate near the Coast of China ; and of the Manners, Customs, and Religions of its Inhabitants. By George Candidius, Minister of the Word of God in that Island.

The P R E F A C E.

AFTER the Dutch had establish'd themselves in the East-Indies, they made it their chiefest Care to settle a good Correspondence in China, both to carry on their Traffick in those parts, and to annoy the Spaniards their Enemies, who carried on a considerable Commerce with the Chineses from the Philippine Islands. But tho several Treaties were set on foot for this purpose, the Chineses could not be brought to any reasonable terms, till such time that the Dutch equipp'd a good Fleet, which was sent to the River Chincheo one of the principal Rivers of China, where they built a Fort in one of the Islands called Pehou by the Chineses, from whence they intercepted the Chineses trading to the Philippine Islands, and committed many other Hostilities, as is evident from the relation of the Voyage of Capt. William Bontekuh. The Chineses being at last tired out by these Inconveniences, began to hearken to their Propositions, pursuant to which it was agreed, that the Dutch should rase their Fort in the Island of Pehou, as being too near to the Coast of China ; in lieu of which the Harbour of Tagowang in the Isle of Formosa, 10 Leagues further from the Coast, should be assign'd them, where they should have the liberty of erecting a Fort at pleasure, and whither the Chineses were to come to traffick with them. The Dutch were willing enough to accept of this Offer, because the Chineses had block'd them up in their Fort with 4000 Men, and 150 small Vessels at that time, and great Preparations were making in China, to sink several thousand Vessels at the entrance of the Harbour, to render it uselefs. Accordingly the Dutch caused a strong Fort to be built in the said Isle of Formosa (call'd by the Chineses Paceande) a Description of which Island being come to our hands from a Person who had been several years a Minister among the Dutch there, we thought we could put no greater Obligation at this time upon the curious World, than to impart to them so authentick a Relation.

A short Description of the Isle of Formosa, by George Candidius Minister of the Word of God there.

THIS Island is situate in the 22d degree of Northern Latitude, its Circumference 130 Leagues ; 'tis very populous and full of large and fair Villages, having no peculiar Language of their own, neither are the Inhabitants govern'd by any King or Prince, whom they acknowledg for their Sovereign, being constantly at War with one another. The Country abounds both in Cattel and Fish ; there are also several kinds of wild Beasts here, among the rest one with Horns like a Stag, call'd Olavangb by the Inhabitants ; some Tygers, and a certain Creature call'd by them Timney, not unlike a Bear, but much bigger ; its Skin is in high esteem among them.

The

The Country is very fertile, but is not much cultivated; most of their Trees grow wild, tho there are some few that are planted and bear Fruits: There is also some Ginger and Cinamon there; and many are of opinion that this Isle is not destitute of Gold and Silver Mines. Thus much of the Country in general; the Manners and Customs of all the Inhabitants I will not pretend to enlarge upon at this time, as being unknown hitherto, but will confine my self to those whose Manners, Language, Customs and Religion I am satisfied in by my own Experience: These being comprehended within the compass of eight Cantons, or large Villages, are call'd by the following Names, Linkan, Mandaw, Soulang, Backelany, Taffacan, Tifulucan, Teopan and Tefurang: All these agree in their Manners, Language and Religion, are situate along the Sea-shoar within two days journey of the Fort; the last, which is also the farthest, lying only among the Mountains, about three days journey from us.

The Inhabitants appear at first sight to be very wild and barbarous, the Men very tall and strong limb'd, beyond the size of other Men; they are of a dark brown Complexion like most of the other Indians, they go naked in the Summer; their Women are low of stature, but very strong and fat, their Complexion inclining more to an Olive Colour: they wear Clothes, and don't discover their Nakedness, unless when they wash themselves, which they do constantly twice a day in warm Water.

This Nation is very good natur'd, affable and faithful; they have always been courteous to us; they are not addicted to stealing, but if they meet with any stolen Goods they will not rest satisfied till they have seen it restor'd to the right Owners, unless it be in the Canton of Soulang, where live abundance of Robbers and Thieves. They are very trusty to one another, and will rather suffer Death than betray their Accomplices, and have a good natural Understanding, and a very strong Memory. Most of the Indians are addicted to begging, but this Nation exceeds them all in this quality; the best is, they are satisfied with a very small matter.

in way King.

Their chief business is Agriculture, they sow Rice; and tho they have plenty of very rich Grounds, so as that it is believed, that these eight before-mentioned Cantons could be able to maintain 100000 Men more, yet they don't cultivate any more than they think will just suffice for their present Maintenance, so that sometimes they happen to fall short. The Women are to cultivate the Ground, and to do all the servile Labour; they use neither Horse, Oxen or Plough: if the Rice happen to come up thicker in one place than in another, they transplant it, which is not perform'd without a great deal of Labour and Pains; they know nothing of Scythes nor Sickles, but make use of an Instrument like a Knife, wherewith they cut their Corn halm by stalk by stalk; neither do they thresh it, but the Candis diu. Women hang in the Evening two or three small Bundles over the fire to dry, and rise early in the Morning to stamp it for their use the next day, and this they repeat every day throughout the year. They sow likewise another Seed not unlike our Beans; they plant Ginger, Sugar, Rice and Water-Lemons, and some other Fruits unknown to us. They have no Wine or other strong Liquor, such as flows from the Trees in some other parts of the Indies; but they make in lieu of that another sort of Drink, both pleasant and no less strong than other Wine, which is made by the Women in the following manner: They take Rice which they boil up a little, then they stamp it till it becomes of the substance of a Paste; afterwards they take Rice Flower, which they chew, and afterwards put into a Vessel by it self, till they have a good quantity of it: this they use instead of our Leaven, and mix it among the before-mentioned Paste, and work it together till it be like a Baker's Paste; this they put in a large Vessel, and after they have poured Water upon it, they let it stand thus for two Months. In the mean while the Liquor works up like new Wine, and the longer they keep it the better it is, and will keep good many years; it is a very pleasant Liquor, as clear as fair Water at top, but very muddy to the bottom, which they eat with Spoons, or else they put more Water upon it. When they are to go abroad into the Fields, they take some of the muddy part in a Vessel of Cane along with them, and in another as much Water as they have occasion for; a little quantity of the uppermost fine Liquor serves to refresh themselves. When the Women have any leisure, they go abroad a fishing in their little Boats (which they call Champanes) for next to their Rice they esteem Fish their best Food; they salt their Fish with Scales, Guts and all: when they take them out of the Salt, they are commonly full of Maggots, but this is not in the least nauseous, but rather pleasing to them.

Candians. The Men lead generally an idle Life, especially the young ones, from the Age of 18 till 24; the old ones of 50 and 60 years are the only Persons who are abroad with their Wives in the Fields, where they have small Huts, in which they sleep and dwell, and come scarce once in two Months to the Village. Their greatest Pastime is hunting and fighting; they hunt three several ways, either with Nets, with small Lances (call'd Asegays) or with Bows and Arrows; their Nets are again of two different kinds, some they spread cross the Roads or By-ways where they know the Stags and wild Boars usually pass, and so they force them into the Net, which is made of Canes twisted together; or else they lay Traps, which they cover with Earth, in those places where they know the Deer or other wild Beasts come in great numbers; and if one of them happen to touch but the Trap, they are catch'd. When they go abroad a hunting with their Lances, a whole Village, or sometimes more, meet together, each having two or three Lances; they carry likewise a vast number of Hounds into the field to put up the wild Beasts; then they make a great Circle, sometimes a whole League in Circumference, and such Beasts as once are forced within this Circle scarce ever escape with Life. Their Lances are about six foot long, made of Cane, have a Bell at one end, and a small Rope fastned to the other where the Iron is, which has three or four Hooks to prevent its being torn without great difficulty from the Wounds of the Beasts: This Iron is not so well fastened to the Wood of the Lance, but that it falls easily out, when the Beast is running away, and being entangled in the String, prevents its running so fast as it would do otherwise, the Bell being at the same time a sure signal to them whereabouts the Beast is. With their Bows and Arrows they hunt in the following manner: Two or three of them go abroad together, and when they discover a troop of Deer or Stags, they pursue them (for they are very swift on foot) and let fly their Arrows among them till they have kill'd one or more; thus they kill abundance of them throughout the year: they seldom eat their Flesh, but exchange it with the Chineses for Linen, Wood, and such like Commodities; the Entrails alone they keep for their own use; if they can't eat them fresh, they freeze them just as they take them out, and then they cut a piece of them immediately after they are kill'd) warm out of the side or otherwise, which they devour raw, so that you may see the Blood run along their Chops; sometimes they devour the young ones with Hair and all, immediately after they have cut them out of their Mothers Bellies. This is one of the Mens Employments.

Their second Exercise is, when they go abroad a fighting, which is perform'd in the following manner: If a difference arises betwixt two or more Cantons, they denounce War to one another; which done, twenty or thirty join in Company, or more if they please, and row in one of their Boats near to the place, where they hope to meet with the Enemy, and stay there till night (for it is to be observ'd, that their Wars are carried on by Treachery only) then they search the Fields thereabouts to see whether they can surprize some of them in their Field-Cottages (where, as we told you before, those advanced in years sleep most commonly) if they meet with any, they are sure to kill them immediately without any respect to Age or Sex: afterwards they cut off their Heads, Arms and Legs, nay sometimes they cut the whole Carcase in pieces, that every one may have a share to carry home to his Village; if they are in haste to get off, they take only the Head along with them; and if pursued, are sometimes contented with the Hair as a token of Victory. If they happen to meet with no body in the field, they make up to the next Village, where they surprize the first House they meet with, kill all that comes before them, and away with the Heads, Arms and Legs they go before the Village can be rais'd; for they have a certain Signal to alarm the rest when an Enemy is at hand, so that if they don't retire speedily, they often pay for it with their Lives before they can save themselves by flight. If they think themselves strong enough, they are the first who sound the Alarm in the Village to draw out the Enemy into the open field, where they fight it out stoutly, till one party is worsted, which is commonly done as soon as a few Men are kill'd; for the loss of a Man is look'd upon with them as much as among us Europeans the loss of an Army is. Their chief Weapons are Lances, but somewhat different from those they make use of in hunting; for the Irons are without Hooks, and without Bells, and the Iron very well fastned to the Pike: they also fight with Swords, and have long and broad Shields to cover the greatest part of their Bodies. They also use sometimes Japoneſe Scimeters, Bows and Arrows. They go to the War without any Commander or Leader, the only Title to a Command among them being the Heads of their Enemies; for if any one can ſhew ſome of them, he is ſure never to miſs of twenty or more who will follow him, and acknowledg him for their Head; neither is it much inquired into whether he has ſlain the Perſons with his own Hands or not, provided he can but produce the Heads, his Title ſtands good among them. They are not altogether without Stratagems in their Wars, they ſometimes divide themſelves in ſeveral Bodies, and whiſt one is engaged with the Enemy in the Field, the others fall into the Village, and ſurprizing thoſe within their Houſes, carry off a few Heads; which done, they draw off, and attribute to themſelves the Honour of the Day. Sometimes they take a great number of Canes, pointed at one end, of about a yard in length; theſe they ſtick pretty deep into the ground, bending that way with their Points from whence they expect the Enemy; who being eager in the purſuit, and very ſwift, are apt to run upon them, and being wounded are forced to deſiſt: this is done in the Night-time.

Sometimes they deceive their Enemies under the ſpecious pretence of Friendſhip, as it happened whiſt I was there: You muſt know, that about three Leagues from Formoſa, there is another Iſland call'd in their Tongue Tugin, by us the Golden-Lion Iſland, becauſe a certain Ship call'd the Golden-Lion being driven upon their Coaſt by Tempeſt, they kill'd the Captain and moſt of his Crew. This Iſle is in perpetual enmity with ours, they being a People ſo jealous of Strangers, as not to ſuffer them to ſet a foot on their Shore. 'Tis true, they have ſome Traffick with the Chineſes, but they don't come aſhore, but remain in their ſmall Veſſels: The Iſlanders come out to them in their Boats, and ſo exchange their Commodities, taking with the right hand what they are to have, whiſt they give with the left their Portion to the Chineſes: and they are ſure not to let go their hold, before they are well ſatisfied in the other, ſo jealous they are of one another. Not long ago about 60 Men belonging to the Canton of Soulang, ſail'd thither diſguiſed like Chineſe Merchants, under pretence that they came to exchange ſome Commodities with them; whereupon ſome of the Iſlanders coming out to them as is uſual, they took hold of one's Arm, which he was ſtretching out to lay hold of what they offered him; and ſo forcing him into their Veſſel, cut him in pieces, which they brought home as a Token of a moſt ſignal Victory. So much for their manner of making of War.

After they have brought home one or more Heads of their Enemies, nay if it be but a handful of Hair upon a Lance, they enter their Village in triumph. The Head they fix on a Pike, which is thus expoſed to the ſight of all the Inhabitants, who dance and ſing to the praiſe of their Gods, and wherever they paſs by they are entertain'd with ſtrong Liquor. Afterwards the Head is carried to the Temple belonging to the Family of him who has gain'd the Victory (for to ſixteen or eighteen Families there appertains a Temple, where alſo the young Folk ſleep anights) there it is boil'd all to Rags; the Bones are dry'd again, and dipp'd afterwards in ſtrong Liquors: they offer Sacrifices of Hogs to their Idols, and feaſt for fourteen days without intermiſſion. Theſe Heads, Weapons, Arms, or Legs of their ſlain Enemies, are as much eſteemed among them, as in Europe Gold, Silver, and precious Stones. If a Fire happen to break out in one of their Houſes, they leave all and take care to ſave ſuch a Head; for he that can boaſt of ſuch a Victory, is reſpected by all; ſo that for the fourteen days after ſcarce any body dares to approach him.

All theſe Villages in general acknow-and below both the Temples, as a Token that they have born this Office. Their Authority is kept within very narrow Bounds, for they have no Authority of making a deciſive Decree, but in Matters of any moment they are obliged to ſummon

 the whole Village to appear in a Temple, where they propoſe the Matter to the People, and endeavour with various Arguments (of which they treat with a great deal of Elocuence.

Candian.

Their Government.

Candidus. even to admiration) to persuade them to what has been consulted in the Council before-hand: if they accept of it, it is valid; if not, it has no force. Their chief Authority consists in this, that when their Priestesses (for Priests they have none) think fit to enjoin any thing to appease the Anger of their Gods, to see it put in execution, and to punish the Transgressors: But this Punishment does not extend to Imprisonment, much less to Death, but only to an inconsiderable Fine, perhaps of one of their Sutes of Clothes, of a Waistcoat, a Buck-skin, a small quantity of Rice, or a certain measure of their strongest Liquor. There is a certain time in the Year appointed for the Men to go quite naked, else, they say, the Rice will not thrive for want of Rain. Now if it happen that a Member of this Council meets any one during that time who appears in his Clothes, he has a power to take them away, or to make him pay a Fine of a Buck-skin, or such-like: For which purpose they watch them towards the Evenings, and in the Mornings, in those places where they must needs pass, going to and coming from the Village. Of this I saw once an instance my self; for as I was coming one day from the Village of Sincan to the Village of Mattan, I met with some who were returning home out of the Fields: one of them having some Clothes about him, and seeing at a good distance some of those Counsellors, desired me to take his Clothes till we were past them; which I did accordingly. As we came near to them, one was very pressing with me to tell him to whom those Clothes I carried belonged; which I refused to tell, and so we went into the Village, where I restored them to the Owner, who was very thankful to me.

At certain times of the Year they are allow'd to wear Clothes, but nothing made of Silk, unless they will run the hazard of having it taken away by these Counsellors. If their Females are excessive in their Clothes upon their Festivals, they have power to punish them, or to cut their Clothes in pieces. These Counsellors are also confined to certain Rules of Abstinency; when the Rice begins to ripen, they must not drink to any excess. They must not eat any Suet or Fat, for else, as they pretend, the Deer and Wild-Boars would consume the Rice. If they happen to transgress in any of these Points, they are despised by the rest.

There is no Punishment appointed here-for Thieving, Fornication, Adultery, or Murder: in these Cases every one is his own Judge, and gets the best Satisfaction he can. If any thing be stolen, and the Thief discovered, he that has lost his Goods, goes with his Friends to the other's House, where he takes as much as he judges to be an Equivalent for what he has been robb'd of; if the Thief makes any resistance, they fetch it out by force. So if any one finds another Man to have an amorous commerce with his Wife, he makes himself amends, by taking two or three of his Hogs. If any one be kill'd, the thing is made up among the Friends of both Partys, who are commonly satisfy'd with some Hogs or Buckskins, to discharge him who has committed the Fact.

Tho there be no such thing as different degrees of Dignities among them; nay, tho their Language does not so much as afford a word by which you might express what we call by us Master or Servant, they are nevertheless not void of all respect to one another: And it is very observable that they don't measure their Esteem by Riches, but by the Age. If a young Man meets another pretty well advanced in Years, he goes out of his way, and turns his back to him till he be past by. Nay if they happen to talk with one another, the younger will be sure not to turn about till they have done: If an aged Person bids a young one to do a certain thing, he never dares to refuse it, tho it were to go two or three Leagues. When old and young People are mix'd in company, the latter never attempt to speak; and at a Feast those advanced in Age are always first served.

Their Men are not at their own liberty to marry when they please, no Man being allowed to marry before he comes to the Age of 21. And tho, as I told you before, they have no certain computation of Time, yet they have a way of putting such as are born in the same Year in one Class, which they call in their Tongue Saar Cassimang; so that those who don't belong to the same Cassimang, must not marry with the rest.

They have a custom of clipping the Hair of young People up to the Ears, till they are sixteen or seventeen Years old; after which time they give it full liberty to grow, as the Glanses do; and when it is come to a certain length, they judge them fit for Marriage. But their Women are not restrain'd to any certain time, but may marry when they see come come to maturity. Their Courtships they perform in the following manner: If a young Man fancies a young Woman, he sends his Mother, Aunt, Sister, or some other Friend to his Sweetheart's Habitation, who bring along with them the Presents usually offered upon such occasions, to obtain her Parents or Friends Consent; If they accept of them, the business is done, and the young Man has free admittance the next Night, without any further Ceremony.

These Presents differ in Value, according to the Persons that give them: The richer sort give commonly seven or eight Coats, with as many Shirts; three or four hundred Arm-rings twisted, of Reed or Canes; ten or twelve other Rings, which they wear on their Fingers; these are made either of Metal or white Hartshorn, four or five inches in circumference, and tied to their Fingers with red Dogs-hair; four or five Girdles made of coarse Linen-Cloth; ten or twelve Waistcoats made of Dogs-hair, call'd in their Language Etharno; twenty or thirty Chinese Waistcoats, each of which costs about half a Florin; a bundle of Dogs-hair, as much as a Man is able to carry, which is a Commodity mightily esteem'd among them; a Cap made in the form of a Miter, made of Straw and Dogs-hair, very artificially twisted together; four or five pair of Breeches of Buck-skin: all which together do not amount to above the value of ten pounds Sterling. This is for the Rich, but the poorer sort come off with less.

Man and Wife do never habit here in one House, but each lives in a House by it self: the Wife always eats, drinks, and sleeps in her own Habitation, whether the Husband has the privilege to come in the Night-time; but he must be careful either not to come before they are all in Bed, or if he does come before, he must not come near the Fire to be seen by any body, but to bed he sneaks; and if he wants any thing he dares not call, but by coughing or otherwise gives the signal to his Wife, who steals to him as soon as the rest of the Family are gone to sleep. They make use of no Pillows; their Bolsters are pieces of Wood, and their under-Beds the Skins of Stags or Deers. The next Morning before break of day, the Husband must retire again, and not appear near the House in the Day-time, unless he be sure his Wife be at home alone, and then he must not venture in without desiring first admittance: If the Woman be in a good humour, she gives him leave; if not, away he goes again. The Wife has her own Grounds and Family, and so has the Man; the Man does not provide for her, nor she for him. The Children are kept by the Mothers till they are three Years old, and then they are sent home to the Father. But one thing is very remarkable in them, that their Wives are forbidden to bring forth any live Children, till they are 36 or 37 Years of Age; wherefore they are oblig'd to kill their Children in the Womb, which they do thus; One of their Priestesses is called in, who lays the Woman with Child upon a Bed, and squeezes her so long, till the Child is forced thus from her, which puts them into more violent Pains, than if they brought forth a Child according to the regular Course of Nature: They declare, they do this not for want of tenderness to them, but because they are forced to it by their Priestesses, who persuade them that they cannot commit a greater Crime, than to bring Children into the World before the Age of 36, by which means many thousands are lost in a Year. I remember a certain Woman there, who told me her self, that she had thus been forced to miscarry sixteen several times, and she was then big with the seventeenth, which she promised she would bring forth alive. When they are arrived to the Age of 36, or 37, they then first begin to bring Children into the World as our Women do, and from that Age till 50. They cohabit together in the same House, tho at the same time they are but seldom at home, but live for the most part abroad in the Fields, where they have little Huts made on purpose to sleep in.

They may be divorced from one another at pleasure, with this difference only, that if the Husband can't alledge any real cause of Divorce, the Wife keeps the Presents he made her before Marriage; but if he can prove either Adultery, or any other Misdemeanour against her, she is forced to leave all behind her. The Women have the same liberty allow'd them in respect of their Husbands. Hence it comes, that you may see a Man here have every Month a new Wife; some have two or three at a time, but these are but few, and are not much esteemed of by the rest, who generally have no more than one at a time. They are for the rest very lascivious, and will frequently follow other Women besides their own Wives, provided it may be done in private. They are very careful

Their Divorces.

Candids. not to intermarry with those that are ally'd to them by Consanguinity, are jealous of their Wives, and take it very heinously if any body enquires after their Health, or whether they be handsome, or so, especially if it be done in the presence of Strangers. Young Men that are unmarried have their peculiar places to sleep in. I told you before that a certain Temple belongs to fifteen or sixteen Families: here it is they have their Beds, where all the young Men, from the fourth Year of age, sleep in the Night-time.

Their Houses and Furniture.

Their Houses are very stately and lofty, beyond what is to be observed in any other part of the Indies, are all built upon a small Eminency, their Floors are of Cane; their Ornaments both within and without are the Heads of Boars and Stags; their Furniture is Chinese Linen, (which they exchange for Rice and Venison) Buck-skins, which pass among them at the same rate as Gold and Silver in Europe; some Instruments belonging to Agriculture, Lances, Shields, Swords and Bows: but their best Ornaments were the Heads of their Enemies. Their Eating Vessels or Dishes are all of Wood, not unlike our Hog-troughs; their Drinking Cups, some Earthen, some of Cane; all their Victuals are nastily drest except Rice: they have neither set-Festivals, nor any other Days appointed for their Devotions; besides, that they meet at certain times of the Year to be merry, when they dance with their Wives, who then appear in their best Apparel.

Their best Stuffs for Clothes and other Ornaments are made of Dogs-hair, which are pull'd out of the Dogs-skin whilst alive; these they dye Red and of other Colours, and use them as the Europeans do Wool.

Their Burials.

Their Burials differ from all other Nations, for they neither bury them, nor burn them, as most of the Pagans do throughout the Indies. They lay the dead Carcase upon a Table of about three foot high from the Ground; round about which, at a convenient distance, they make a moderate fire, in order to dry by degrees the moisture of the Corps: in the mean while they feast and dance, kill abundance of Hogs, and drink briskly of their strong Liquor. The Women have a very odd way of Dancing at this time; for they take several Trunks of Trees hollowed out within, these they lay before the Mourning House, and four or five of them at a time (after they have been summon'd together by Beat of Drum, made likewife of the Trunk of a hollow jumping upon it with their Backs turn'd to one another, they make a strange sort of a noise, which serves them for their best diversion for about two hours in a day: this is continued successively for nine days, when the Corps being well dry'd, and wash'd in the mean time once a day, is wrapt up in Mats; and being laid up upon a pretty high Stage in one corner of the House erected for that purpose, it continues there three whole years; after which they take the remnants, which are nothing but the Bones, and bury them in a certain place of the House.

I can't forbear to mention here, how I once saw them my self handle one of their sick Men, in the Canton of Tbesany: this Man being very ill, and complaining of a most violent pain all over his Body, they ty'd a Rope about his Neck, and so drawing him up quite to the Ceiling, let him fall again all on a sudden to hasten his death.

Before we conclude, we must also not pass by in silence their manner of Worship, or Religion. They are not acquainted with any thing like Books or Writing, all that they know of this kind being transmitted to them from their Ancestors by Tradition. They believe the Immortality of the Soul; which questionless has introduced this Custom among them, that as soon as any Person dies, they erect a small Hut before the Entrance of the House, adorned with Green Boughs and Flags; in the middle of it they put a Vessel full of fair Water, with a Cup by it to fill it out; this is intended to purify the Soul from all Excrements: This is practis'd by every body; but there is not one in a hundred who can give a reason for it, unless it be a few of the antient and most understanding among them, who did alledg this Custom for their opinion of the Immortality of the Soul to me; and at the same time affirm'd to me, that it was a very antient Tradition among them, that such as had not lived well, would be precipitated in a deep Hole, full of dirt and filth, where they would be forced to undergo great torments; but that such as had led a good life, would dwell in a very pleasant and plentiful Country. Their opinion is, that cross this great Hole there is a Bridg, which the Souls must pass over, before they can enter into this pleasant Country; and that when those that have not lived well, are likewise to pass that way, the said said Bridg gives a turn and precipitates them into the Hole. The Sins which are supposed to deserve this punishment are far different from what is believed among Christians as to this point, as having not the least reference to the Ten Commandments; they consist only in a neglect of their Superstitions; such as to have neglected the certain Seasons of the Year, when they were to go naked, or to abstain from wearing of Silk; to have brought forth live Children before the age of 36; to have catch'd Fish or Oysters out of season; to have despised the Observations made of the flying of the Birds, and such like: tho at the same time they don't encourage Lies, Murder and Thefts, yet they are not accounted Mortal Sins. When they are to confirm any thing by a Solemn Oath, they break a piece of Straw-stalk betwixt them, which is look'd upon as a thing so Sacred, that they seldom forfeit it. Drunkenness as well as Fornication is accounted no sin neither in Men and Women; tho as to the last they are very cautious not to do it in publick. And it is worth observation, that a Stranger will find it a hard task to perswade a Woman here to lie with him; tho at the same time they are of opinion (as I have heard them confess my self) that their Gods take a great deal of pleasure in Fornication; for which reason it is, that Parents never take any notice of it in their Children, but rather sport with it, and look upon it as a thing allow'd to young People, they being not to marry till they have attain'd to the 21st Year of age.

They know nothing of the Resurrection of the Body; instead of one God, they acknowledg many, unto whom they offer their Prayers and Sacrifices. One of these Gods is called Tamagisanbay, his residence being in the South; he is reputed to make them handsom and vigorous. His Spouse, they say, dwells in the East, being call'd Taxanpada. When a Storm of Thunder arises in the East, they say this Goddeffs is attending her Husband, because he sends not Rain; and the Husband being over perswaded by his Spouse, furnishes them with wet Weather. These are the two Favourite Gods of the Women. They have also another, whose Residence being in the North, is very hurtful to Mankind: they say, that after the God Tamigisanbach has made them beautiful, this God renders them deform'd by the French Fox, and such like Distempers; wherefore they adore him, for fear he should hurt them, and offer their Sacrifices to Tamigisanbach to bridle his malice, he being the Supreme Governour of the rest. They pray likewise to two other Gods, as often as they go into the War; one's name is Talafula, the other's Tapaliap; these two last are in greatest esteem with the Men: besides these they have several other Gods, too many to be named here.

All other Nations, as far as ever I knew, make use of Men for their Priests, to sacrifice and attend the other Rites belonging to their Divine Worship: these People are the only one who have Women for their Priestesses, whom they call Inibs. Their publick Service is performed by Praying and Sacrificing; the last is performed with the slaughter of a great number of Hogs, by offering Rice and strong Liquor in the Temples to their Gods; after which one or two of their Priestesses makes a long Oration to them, and whilst they are talking turn the eyes in their heads, make many Exclamations, till their Gods (as they say) appear to them; at which time they fall down upon the Floor in an Extasy, like dead: several Persons are employ'd to recover them; which being done, at last they tremble as if they were in the greatest Agony in the World, whilst the People send forth miserable crys and lamentations. After they have continued this for an hour, the Priestesses get on the top of the Temple, strip themselves stark naked there in the presence of the whole Congregation (who are for the most part Women) they shew their Nakedness to the Gods, pointing with their Fingers at, and clapping with their Hands upon it, whilst they address their Prayers to them in a long and tedious Harangue: the whole Ceremony is concluded with taking a large Dose of their strong Liquor. These Inibs or Priestesses are also sent for some times into private Houses, where they perform certain Ceremonies belonging to their Function; they also pretend to banish the Devil, and to foretel things to come: when they banish the Devil, they do it with their Japonesse Scimeters, with a hideous clamor, and doleful noise, by which they say, they frighten the Devil, who drowns himself in the next River.

Some Curious Remarks upon the Potent Empire of JAPAN.

JAPAN is Generally esteemed to be an Island, tho this is call'd in question by some. From the Province of Oceanto, the most considerable of the whole Empire, where is also the Imperial Residence, Jedo, is accounted twenty seven days Journey to the North-East to the Lands-End, call'd Sungay: from thence you may cross the Sea for eleven Leagues to the Country of Jesso, abounding in rich Furs, but for the rest barren, and full of inaccessible Mountains. Its Circumference is not known hitherto, tho the Japoneses have several times endeavour'd to find it out, but in vain, being forced to desist from that Enterprize, for want of Provisions and other Necessaries. In some places they met with Inhabitants, who are Hairy all over; the Hair of their Heads and Beards exceeding the rest in length, resembling the wild Chineses living in the North parts of that Empire. This Sea does neither ebb nor flow, but is rather a Lake enclosed betwixt Japan and Jesso, being 40 Leagues in Circumference; washing the high Mountains in the Desarts of Japan, near the Province of Ochio, the the Sea-shoar of which is as yet undiscovered.

The two Islands call'd Chickock and Saycock, the two biggest lying near the Continent of Japan; the first is under the Jurisdiction of a King and three Lords, the second is bigger than the former. The Empire of Japan it self, call'd by the Inhabitants Nippon, is opposite to these two Islands and the before-mentioned Country of Jesso, and is divided into six Provinces, viz. Dewano, Jetchesen, Jamayssiro, Jethengo, Quito and Ocbio. Out of these Provinces and the Lordships belonging to them, the chief Men of the Empire draw their Revenues, as you find them specified in the following Pages.

A List or Account of the Revenues (without reckoning those belonging to the Emperor himself) of all the Kings, Dukes, Princes and Lords of the Japanese Empire, together with the Names of the Lordships, Cities and Castles from whence they arise; calculated according to the Value of the Japanese Cockiens, each Cockien making four Rixdollars, or 18 s. Sterling.

Besides which the Emperor of Japan allows for his and his Sons Tables, and to the rest of his Officers belonging to his his Court, the yearly Sum. of 4000000 Coekiens.

What is allowed to the Soldiers, and the Nobility that serve in the Army, according to their different Qualities, amounts to 5000000 Coekiens.

The total Sum of the Revenues belonging to the above-mentioned Ministers of State, amounts to 28345000 Coekiens. Besides these, all the Foot-Soldiers, being not Gentlemen, such as Musqueteers, Pike and Bowmen, and such-like (of whom there is a vast number) are likewise paid out of the Emperor's Revenues; for which the Imperial Rents coming from the Gold and Silver Mines are assign'd in particular.

Those Soldiers, who are Gentlemen, serve all on Horseback, each of them being obliged to keep five, ten, or twenty Servants, according to their different Qualities and Estates: These Servants are obliged to fight upon occasion as well as their Masters.

These following Qualifications are required in one who will serve as a Gentleman on Horseback under the Imperial Standard: He must be very nimble and active, very well instructed in the Exercise of Arms, not ignorant in Books; and above all must have the reputation of being a Man of Honour. Nothing is more surprising, than to see so many hundred brave chosen Fellows, as attend the Emperor when he goes abroad as his Guard, all clad in black Silk, to keep their Ranks to an admiration; and neither they, nor his Halbardiers who surround his Person, speak one word; nay, tho he passes through a great City, there is not the least noise of Men or Horses to be heard, at a considerable distance from the place where the Emperor is. The Streets are very well cleansed, and covered with Sand; no body dares so much as to open a Window, much less to stand at his Shop or House-door, as his Majesty passes by, but must either remain at home, or else kneel down in the Street. His Nobles, Generals and Colonels, follow his Majesty at the Head of several thousand Men, Horse and Foot, in his Progress; but they must keep at a distance, and not come within his sight.

A Gentleman who has a yearly Revenue of a thousand Coekiens, is obliged to maintain for the Service of the Country, twenty Foot-Soldiers, and two Horsemen. So that the number of Forces which the Kings, Dukes, and Lords are obliged to bring into the Field, amounts to 368000 Foot-Soldiers, and 36800 Horse: Besides which, the Emperor maintains 100000 Foot-Soldiers, and 20000 Horse, at his own Charge, who keep Garisons in the Frontier, and other strong Places and Castles of the Empire.

From Jedo, the Imperial Residence, to Miaco, is 135 Leagues. His Majesty goes once in five, seven, or nine Years to this last place, to pay his Reverence to Day-ro: This Journey is perform'd in 28 Stages, in each of which there is a Royal Palace, furnish'd with every thing necessary to entertain the Emperor and his whole Court. But among these 28 Palaces, are reckoned 20 strong Castles, provided with good Garisons.

There are twelve several Sects in Japan, each of which is instructed by Priests of their own. Eleven of these Sects are forbidden to eat any thing that has been killed; they are also to abstain from Women, but may commit Sodomy. The twelfth Sect may marry, and eat what they please.

There is another thing worthy our observation, which is, that whenever one of the forementioned Kings, Dukes or Lords, happens to die, their Servants (to testify their Love to their deceased Masters) rip up their Bellies with a Knife to accompany them, as they say, to the other World; and to testify to the World, that they will never shrink from the Duty and Obedience due to their Lords, but will serve them with the same faithfulness even after their Death.

Perform'd by the Famous
Capt. John Monck,
In the Years 1619, and 1620.

By the special Command of CRISTIAN IV.
King of Denmark, Norway, &c. to Hudson's Straits,
In order to discover a Passage on that side, betwixt Greenland and America to the West-Indies. With a Description of the Old and New Greenland, for the better Elucidation of the said Treatise.

at Frankford upon the Maine, 1650.*

The P R E F A C E.

THERE are four principal Points worth the curious Reader's Observation in the following Treatise; (1.) A Description of the Old and New Greenland, their first Discovery, Names, Fertility, Living Creatures, &c. among the last of which those which produce the noted Unicorns, being none of the least remarkable, I had the curiosity to get an exact Draught thereof from my Brother Mr. Michael le Blou, who living at Amsterdam, purchased the same from the Greenland Company. This Horn was found on the Sea-shore, with part of the Body of the Fish; the Head of which, together with the Horn, being cut off, was brought intire to Amsterdam; the Horn being so white that no Ivory was to compare to it; tho we were obliged for want of sufficient extent of the Paper, to represent it in the annexed Draughts in several Pieces. The whole length of the Horn is 4 Foot 9 Inches; the Head 1. Foot and 10 Inches, making together 6 Foot and 7 Inches. (2.) An account of divers Voyages, made by the Command of Christian IV. King of Denmark, &c. for the Discovery of a Passage betwixt Greenland and America to the East-Indies; the success of which proved very unfortunate, as will be evident from the ensuing Treatise. (3.) A representation of that part of Greenland known by the name of Spitzbergen. (4.) A succinct account of that monstrous Fish call'd the Whale, and the manner how it is taken, having not been treated of so circumstantially, as far as I know, by any other Author before: The whole of which I have comprehended in several Draughts, mark'd with A.B, C.D. E. F. and G. Farewel.

Advertisement concerning the Map of GREENLAND.

 HIS Map is regulated according to four several Elevations, which were best known to us; to wit, of Cape Farewel, of Iceland, of Spitsbergen, and of that place in Christians Sea, where Capt. Monck pass'd the Winter in his Voyage, which in this Map is to be found under the name of Monck's Winter-Harbour. The Longitude of Places is taken from the Meridian fix'd to the Isle call'd Insola del Ferro, one of the Canary Islands, in which we have follow'd the Footsteps of the most and ablest Mathematicians of Europe. The Longitude of Monck's Harbour is remarkable above the rest, by an Eclipse of the Moon mentioned in Capt. Monck's Relation, to have appear'd there in the Year 1619, the 20th day of December, about eight a Clock at Night. The same Eclipse did, according to the best Computation, appear at Paris in the same Year on the 21st day of December about three a Clock in the Morning; from whence it is evident, that there was no more than seven Hours difference betwixt them. Now if you allow fifteen Degrees to each Hour, it is plain that the Difference betwixt the Meridian of Paris, and the Meridian of Monck's Harbour, is of 105 Degrees: And supposing Paris under 23½ Degree of Longitude, the beforementioned Harbour must consequently be put under the 278½ Degree, or 81½ Degrees beyond the Canary Islands. And supposing twelve French Leagues to make a Degree (for two of those Degrees make but one in the greater Circles) the Product will amount to 1260 Leagues, the true distance betwixt Paris and this Harbour.

The Southern side of Greenland is represented in this Map as if it were composed of two Islands: in which we have followed a Map composed by the direction of a certain Master of a Ship living at the Briel in Holland; who having made two several Voyages, to wit, in the Year 1624, and 1625, to Greenland, styles it an Island, tho' it be uncertain whether it be an Isle, or composed out of several Islands; or whether it be annex'd to the Continent.

The Coast from Cape Farewel to Hudson's Straits, and so further to Monck's Harbor in Christians Sea, is taken from a Map drawn by Capt. Monck's own Hands; which we were the more willing to follow, because it agreed with Hudson's Map (who was the first that entred those Seas) I will not pretend to determine whether the Western Coast betwixt Davis's Straits, and Monck's Harbour, is really a part of Greenland; it being not impossible but that this Country may be separated from the Continent of Greenland, either by some other Channel, or perhaps by an Inland-Sea, and that consequently it may be annexed to America: And in Denmark they are not so very positive as to this Point, as they are in relating of the Coast from Cape Farewel to Spitsbergen, which they unquestionably account a part of Greenland. What Account they make of it in England and Holland I am not able to tell, my Intention being only to inform the Reader of what I could find out in Denmark.

GREENLAND.

Situation.

GREENLAND is call'd that Country lying to the utmost point of the North, which extends from South to East, from Cape Farewell through the Mare Glaciale, or frozen Sea, as far as Spitsbergen and Nova Zembla. Some are of opinion, that it adjoins to the Great Tartary, but without any certain reason, as shall be shown hereafter. To the East it borders upon the frozen Sea, to the South upon the Ocean, to the West upon Hudson's Straits, by which it is separated from America, and its Bounds to the North are unknown hitherto. Some are of opinion, that it is upon the same Continent with America, because the supposed Straits, call'd Davis's Straits, have since been found to be no more than a Bay; but Capt. Monck who attempted the same Passage, gives us great reason to believe that it is separated from America, as will appear from his own Relation.

Two different Chronicles of Greenland.

In this present Description of Greenland we have followed the footsteps of two Chronicles, one of which was very antient, and written in the Iceland Tongue originally, but translated into Danish; the second being a Danish Chronicle of a newer date. The Author of the Iceland Chronicle was one Snorro Storleson, who in his life-time was a Judge in that Country. The second is composed by a Danish Minister, call'd Claudius Christoffersen, who about twenty years ago writ the same in Verse.

The Danish Chronicle makes the first Inhabitants of Greenland Armenians, who being by Tempest forc'd upon that Coast, settled and continued there for some time; till afterwards passing over to Norway, they fix'd their Habitations among the Rocks. But this favours much of the Antients Fables, who used to fetch their Origin from far distant Countries; it being much more probable that the Norwegians were the first Inhabitants of Greenland, which they possess'd themselves of in the following manner.

First discovery of it.

A certain Norwegian Gentleman of considerable Quality, call'd Torwald, and his Son Erick, having committed several Murders, were forced to fly to Iceland. Torwald died there soon after; and his Son Erick, surnamed Red Hair, being of a turbulent Spirit, and being prosecuted on the account of another Murder committed there, went to Sea in quest of a Country, which lying West off of Iceland, was call'd Gundebiurn; he was not long at Sea before he discovered two Promontories, one of which jetted out into the Sea from the Continent, the other from an Island very near to the shoar. The Promontory on the Island was call'd Witsercken, that on the Continent Warf; betwixt both is a good Bay, where there is safe riding at Anchor: unto this he gave the Name of Sand Stafn. The Promontory of Witsercken exceeds the other both in height and circumference. Erick Red Hair call'd this Promontory of the Island Muckla Jockel, which is as much as to say, the great Ice Shoal; afterwards it got the Name of Blowsercken, which is as much as Blewshirt; and lastly it was call'd Witsercken, or Whiteshirt, questionless from the colour of the Ice and Snow, which covers a great part of it all the year round. Erick's first landing place was in the Isle which he call'd Ericksfund, where he pass'd the first Winter.

The next Spring he passed over to the Continent, where meeting with some Grasse he gave it the Name of Greenland; the place where he landed was call'd by him Ericksforden, near which he built a Castle call'd Osterburg. About the fall of the Leaf he built another towards the West, unto which accordingly he gave the Name of Westerburg. The next Winter he pass'd over to Erickun, and the next following Summer again to the North of Greenland, where he met with vast Rocks, which he call'd Snowrocks; and not far from thence with a very good Harbour, which by reason of the great number of Ravens he saw thereabouts, he gave the Name of Ravensforden. This Harbour lies directly North from Ericksforden, which is to the South, being separated from one another by a Branch of the Sea. Erick after he had continued three three years in those parts, took a Resolution to go over into Iceland, where he gave such an advantageous account of the good Pasturage, and plenty of Cattel, Fish and Fowl of his new found Country, that a great number of the Inhabitants embark'd themselves to follow him into Greenland.

Erick had a Son whose Name was Leif, he had follow'd his Father formerly into Greenland, and whilst he was in Iceland went over to Norway to give an account to Olaus Trugger, who (as the Iceland Chronicle relates) then reign'd in Norway, of the Condition of Greenland: This King, who had lately embraced the Christian Religion, took care to have Leif instructed in the Christian Doctrine; and after he was baptized, sent him back the next following Summer to his Father in company of a Priest, who was to propagate the Christian Faith in Greenland. Leif was joyfully received by the Inhabitants there, being surnamed by them the Fortunate, because he had happily escaped several Dangers; but he met not with the same reception at his Father's hands, because he brought along with him several foreign Seamen, whom he had sav'd from a Shipwreck; his Father not thinking it for his Interest to have the Condition of the Country discovered to Strangers. But the matter was composed at last, and the Father received Baptism with all that were under his Jurisdiction.

The Christian Religion received by Greenland.

Thus much is recorded concerning Erick Red Hair, and his Son Leif, and the Norwegians who made the first discovery of Greenland. The Iceland Chronicle mentions Torwald and his Son Erick to have left the Harbour of Jedren in Norway under the Reigns of King Hacon Jarls, surnamed the Rich, and of King Olaus Trugger, which is computed to have been near the year of Christ 982. But the Danish Chronicle, which goes back as far as to the year 779. seems to come nearer to the true Computation of Time; it being unquestionable that under the Reign of the Emperor Lewis, surnamed the Pious, (when the Danish Kings first received the Christian Religion) Greenland was already become famous; for in the Chronicle of Bremen there is extant a Bull of Pope Gregory IV. by which Ansgarius the then Bishop of Bremen was constituted Archbishop of the North, but particularly of Norway, and the Islands thereunto belonging, viz. of Iceland and Greenland: which Bull was written after the year of Christ 800, to wit, in the

The Danish Chronicle assures us that the Posterity of Erick and his Followers did multiply considerably in Greenland; and they advancing deeper into the Country they met with fertile Ground, good Pastures, and Springs of fresh Water. They divided it into the Eastern and Western Greenland, according to the situation of the two before-mentioned Castles: In the East Greenland they built a City call'd Garde, whither the Norwegians used to come every year to traffick with the Inhabitants. Afterwards they built also another City unto which they gave the Name of Ath, and (being great Zealots) laid the Foundation of a Monastery dedicated to St. Thomas, at a small distance from the Sea-shoar. The City of Garde was the Episcopal Residence, where the Cathedral was dedicated to St. Nicholas the Patron of Seafaring Men.

Mome
The Division of Greenland.

One Arngrim Jonas a Native of Iceland, has written a Treatise, which he intitles Specimen Islandicum, wherein he gives us a Catalogue of the Bishops of Greenland, from their beginning till the year 1389. And Pontanus in his Danish History takes notice of a certain Bishop of Garde nam'd Henry, who in the same year 1389. was present at the Assembly of the States of Denmark held in the City of Niewburg in the Isle of Fichnen. As Greenland had a dependency on Norway in Temporal Matters, so it acknowledged the Jurisdiction of the Bishop of Drunthheim in Norway in Spiritual Affairs, so that their Bishops used sometimes to come thither to confer with them concerning Matters of moment. Greenland was govern'd according to the Laws received in Iceland, under a Governor sent thither by the Kings of Norway, whose Names and chief Actions are related by Arngrim Jonas in his before-mentioned Treatise.

The Danish Chronicle speaks of a Rebellion which happened in Greenland in the year 1256. they refusing to pay the annual Tribute to Magnus the then King of Norway. But Erick King of Denmark sending a good Fleet to the Assistance of Magnus his Brother-in-law, the Greenlanders were so terrified at the sight of it, that they quickly sued for Peace, which was concluded in the year 1261. The same is made mention of by Arngrim Jonas, who inserts the Names of the three Plenipotentiaries of Greenland sent to conclude this Peace, by virtue of which they submitted to a perpetual annual Tribute to be paid to the Crown of Norway.

Monck. The Iceland Chronicle has a whole Chapter intituled, a Description of Greenland, containing a Summary account of what the Norwegians were possess'd of in that Country, but without any order or Chronological Computation. It runs thus : The City which lies most Easterly is call'd Scagenfiord, near an unaccessible Rock, the whole Sea-shore thereabouts being surrounded likewise with Rocks, which make the Harbour of difficult access, unless with a very high Tide ; at which time also, especially if it be stormy Weather, Whales and many other sorts of Fish are catch'd. A little beyond it to the East is another small Harbour, call'd Funchbudet, from a certain Gentleman belonging to Olaus then King of Norway, who suffred Shipwrack near that place. At some small distance from thence, opposite to the Ice-rocks, there is an Isle call'd Roansen, full of all sorts of wild Beasts, but especially of White Bears ; beyond which there is nothing but Ice to be seen.

On the West side is Kindelfiord, surrounded by a Branch of the Sea ; it has a Church call'd Kroskirck, the Diocess of which extends to Peterswyck ; near which is Wandelenburgh, and beyond this a Monastery dedicated to St. Olaus and St. Austin, the Jurisdiction of which extends as far as Bolten. Not far from Kindelfiord is Rempesingfiord, where there is a Nunnery, surrounded with many small Islands, in which you meet with many hot Springs, which rise to such an excessive degree of Heat in the Winter, that they are quite usefess, but are made use of with great success in the Summer season. Near this is Eynotsfiord ; and betwixt this and Rempesingfiord, a Royal Palace call'd Fos, with a large Church adjoining to it, dedicated to St. Nicholas. Near Limesfiord is a great Promontory, near which jets out a Neck of Land into the Sea, call'd Grantwig, where there is a Seat call'd Daller, belonging to the Cathedral Church of Greenland ; as does likewise Limesfiord, and that large Island which lies opposite to Eynotsfiord, unto which they have given the name of Reyatsen, from the Rain-deer which are there in great numbers. The same Isle produces also a certain Stone, call'd Talckstone, which is proof against Fire, and nevertheless so soft as to be frequently cut out into Drinking and Kitchen-Vessels. Further to the West you see another Island call'd Langen, which contains eight Farms. Not far from Eynotsfiord is another Royal Palace, nam'd Hellestatt, and next to this Ericksfiord ; and at the Entrance of the Bay of the Isle of Herricoen, one half of which belongs to the Cathedral Church of Greenland, the other half to the Church call'd Diurnes, being the first you meet with in Greenland from Ericksfiord side ; which extends its Jurisdiction to Midfiord, a Tract of Ground running North-west from Ericksfiord. To the North of it is Bondefiord, near which you may see many small Islands, and several good Landing-places. The Country betwixt Easterburg and Westerburg is destitute of Inhabitants, tho there remains as yet a Church call'd Strosnes, which was formerly the Cathedral of Greenland, where was also the Episcopal Residence. The Skreglingers, or Scherlingers, are in possession of the whole Country of Westerburg, tho we met with no People there, neither Pagans nor Christians, but with abundance of Oxen, Horses and Sheep. This was the Verbal account of one Iver Boty, who being a Steward of the Episcopal Court of Greenland, was sent by the Governour to chase the Scherlingers out of the Country, but met with nothing but Cattle, of which they took so much as their Ships were able to carry. Beyond Westerburg they saw a large entire Rock, call'd Himmelradsfield, beyond which no body dares to venture at Sea, by reason of the many Whirlpools.

Thus far the Iceland Chronicle. And because we are destitute of Maps, or any other History relating to this Country, we are obliged to acquiesce in what this Author has left us ; tho at the same time it is taken for granted by all, that the Episcopal Seat of Greenland was in the City of Garde, which this Author attributes to the Church of Strosnes betwixt Easterburg and Westerburg : for the Danish Chronicle lamenting the loss of this Country, says expressly, that if the City of Garde were yet in being, we should questionless not be destitute of some antient Records, which might give us a sufficient insight into the History of Greenland. Arngrim Jonas speaking of the Episcopal Residence, has these words, Fundata in Bareum (instead of Gardum) Episcopali residentia in sinu Eynotsfiord Groenlandiae Orientalis. I am apt to believe the forementioned Iver Boty was no very nice Historian, for he does not as much as tell us who were those Skreglingers, against whom he was sent ; tho it is very probable that they were the antient Inhabitants of the Country, who lived beyond Kindelfiord. 'Tis true, our Author affirms them them to have been in possession of the whole Country of Westerburg, which must be understood of some part only, the rest being inhabited by the Norwegians, who perhaps having made an Excursion from Kindelfjord, were put to the rout by the Savages; to revenge which the Governor or Judge (as they term him there) sent some Men and Ships to chastise their Insolence. It is more than probable that these Savages at the approach of the Norwegians left their Habitations, and sought for shelter among the Rocks; which has questionless misled our Author, to affirm there were no Men, but abundance of Cattel to be found there. From whence it also appears, that Greenland was inhabited before the Norwegians got footing there, who defended their Country against them. This is confirm'd by the Iceland Chronicle, where it is said, that all that part of Greenland which was possess'd by the Norwegians, was only accounted one third part of a Bishoprick, which are not very considerable in Denmark. The Danish Chronicle is more positive upon this account, for it is expressly said there, that the Norwegians were not possess'd of above a hundredth part of Greenland, the rest being inhabited by the Natives, distinguished into several Nations and Principalities, whereof very few were known to the Norwegians.

The Iceland Chronicle speaks very differently concerning the fertility of the Country. In some places it is said, that the Soil produces very good Corn, and Oak-trees bearing Acorns as big as our Apples; whereas in other places it is express'd that the Soil of Greenland is barren by reason of the excessive Cold, and that the Inhabitants don't so much as know what Bread is. The Danish History seems to agree with the last, when it relates of Erick Redhair, that at his first Landing he was forced to live upon Fish, the Soil not producing any thing for the sustenance of human life; tho at the same time it is to be observed, that the said Chronicle says in another place, that the Posterity of Erick being advanced deeper into the Country, met with very fertile Grounds, Pastures and fresh Water-springs, which were not discovered in Erick's time. What is alledged concerning the excessive Cold is of no great moment, it being evident, that that part of Greenland inhabited by the Norwegians lies under the same Elevation of the Poll with Upland in Swedeland, where grows abundance of very good Corn.

And the same Chronicle in a certain passage assures us, that it is not so cold in Greenland as in Norway, where also there grows Corn; and not only that, but in some places they sow and reap twice in a Summer, which tho it seems almost incredible, yet being confirm'd by Persons of unquestionable credit, can't be absolutely rejected, especially if we trace the true cause of it, which is, that these Grounds being Valleys enclosed within the Rocks, the Rays of the Sun reflecting from these Mountains upon them during the three Months of June, July and August, have such a powerful influence upon them, that in six Weeks time they sow and reap their Corn; and these Grounds being continually moistned by the melted Snow, which is conveyed thither from the Rocks, affords the Country-man another Harvest at the end of the other six Weeks.

It seems very probable that in Greenland as well as in other Countrys there are barren as well as fertile Grounds; tho at the same time it is unquestionable, that this Country is full of Rocks; and the Iceland Chronicle says that it affords great store of Marble of all sorts of Colours: but this does not hinder but that the Vallies afford good Pasturage for Horses, Deer, Hares, and Rain-deer, besides Wolves and Bears. There are also Martins to be found here, not inferior to some Labels, as also great store of the best Falcons, that were formerly in great esteem among Persons of Quality.

The Sea about Greenland affords some Fish, such as Sea-wolves, Sea-dogs, and Sea-calves; but especially Whales. I suppose the great White Bears ought to be numbred among the amphibious Creatures; for the Black Bears which are always ashore never eat any Fish, whereas the White ones are always to be seen upon the Ice, and live upon Fish; they exceed the Black ones in bigness, and are more Savage. The Sea-Dogs and Wolves are their best Dainties, especially the young ones, which the old ones cast upon the Ice, for fear of the Whales; they being their Enemies as well as they are to the Bears, who for that reason are very cautious of venturing far to Sea, when the Ice begins to melt; tho it happens sometimes that they are forced along with the great Ice-shoals upon the Coasts of Iceland and Norway, when being enraged by hunger they tear in pieces all that they meet in their way; of which there are many instances in those Countrys.

Monck. Greenland likewise furnishes us with those Horns which are commonly called Unicorns, of which there are several to be seen in Denmark entire, and many Pieces, great and small ones. These do altogether resemble those Horns which in other places are shewn for the true Unicorn; and that which the King of Denmark keeps at Fredericksburg, exceeds that of St. Denis in France in bigness: they are accounted an excellent Antidote, and are found on the head of a certain kind of Whales: concerning which I think it not beyond our purpose, to insert here a Letter of a certain Danish Gentleman, call'd Mr. Wormen, who had the reputation of a Person of great Learning.

Account of them. Being some years ago with my Lord Chancellor, I among other Discourses began to complain of the carelessness of Danish Seamen and Merchants, who all this while had not made the least enquiry after the Beast from which these Horns were taken, and they have brought of late years into Denmark; and how unaccountable a thing it was, that they should not bring some of their Flesh or Skin, from whence judgment might be given of their Nature and Constitution. My Lord Chancellor reply'd, Sir, they are not so careless as you imagin, and thereupon ordered his Servants to bring a large Scull, on which was fix'd a piece of a Horn of about four foot long. Being extremely glad to meet with such a rarity, this made me desire my Lord to send it to my house, that I might make my Speculations upon it, at my own leisure. The Scull appear'd like that of a Whale, with two holes or pipes, through which this Creature evacuates the Water which it has swallow'd before; the Horn (as it is call'd) being fix'd to the upper part of the left Jaw-bone. I sent for a Painter, who in the presence of several of my Friends, who were eye-witnesses that it was drawn exactly after the Original, made a Draught of it. I was at the same time credibly inform'd, that sometime before, such another Fish had been brought into Iceland; which made me write to Thorlac Scalorius, the Bishop of that Island, whom I had formerly known a Student at Copenhagen, to send me an exact Draught of it, which he did accordingly, and writ me word, that the said Fish was call'd by the Icelanders, Nar-wall, which implys as much as a Whale living upon dead Carcases; Wall signifying as much as a Whale in their Tongue, and Nar a dead Carcase. Thus far Mr. Wormen.

It is sufficiently known that the name of Unicorn is attributed to a Beast call'd Onik, and likewise to the Indian Ass by Aristotle; and Pliny gives us a description of a certain wild Beast, whose Head is like that of a Deer, his Body like that of a Horse, and his Feet resembling the Elephant's Feet, with a long Horn in the Forehead, very swift and strong; which probably is the same Creature, of which mention is made in the Holy Scripture in several places, but especially by Moses, who when he gives us an account of God's Attributes, compares him to the Unicorn, by reason of its Vigor and Cheerfulness: and it being evident out of several other passages of Scripture, where this Beast is described as a four-leg'd Creature, that it ought to be numbred amongst the Terrestrial Creatures, we must consequently suppose two kinds of Unicorns, to wit, the Land and the Sea Unicorns; as there are Sea-wolves and Sea-Calves. But it seems to be worth our enquiry, whether this Horn of the Whale may properly come under the denomination of a Horn, it being evident from the preceding description, that it resembles rather a Tooth, as being fix'd to the Jaw-bone. Arngrim Jonas in his before mentioned Treatise, call'd Specimen Islandicum, speaking of several things that were cast ashore, after a Ship, in which was a Greenland Bishop, had been shipwreck'd upon the Coast of Norway in the Year 1126, says among other things, several Whales Teeth of great value were cast ashore, mark'd with Danish Letters writ upon them with some glutinous matter, scarce to be effaced by the art of Men. These Whales Teeth are the same that are call'd Unicorns; tho in my opinion they should rather be call'd Teeth, they being fix'd to the Jaw-bone, and not to the front of this Creature, as has been mentioned in the preceding description.

They are however not inferior to those Horns, (both in respect of their shape and virtue) that are generally so much in request among the Physicians; and the Danes used in former ages to sell them at a very high rate; and being always very cautious of discovering to the World, that these Horns or Teeth belonged to a Sea-fish, which is the reason they were taken for the true Unicorn.

It is not many Years ago that the Greenland Company of Copenhagen sent one of their Factors into Muscovy with a good Cargo of these Teeth; there being one one among the rest of a considerable bigness: it was offered to sale to the Great Duke, who taking a Fancy to it, offer'd a good Sum; but had the cunning to let it be first examined by his Physicians, who all approv'd of it but one, who being more skilful than the others, assur'd the Great Duke that it was the Tooth of a Fish, and not the true Unicorn. So that the Factor missing his Aim, was fain to return into Denmark, where the best excuse he could make for himself was, to rail at the Doctor who had spoil'd his Market: But was answered by one of the Company, that if he had not been a Fool, he might have dazled the Doctor's Eyes by the means of two or three hundred Ducats, so as that he would not have been able to find out the difference. But it is time to return to Greenland.

Name of Unicorn common to several Creatures.

Psal. 29. Num. 23.

The Iceland Chronicle says, that the Air in Greenland is not altogether so sharp as in Norway; that it snows less there, and the Cold is not quite so violent; not but that it freezes there very hard, and is very tempestuous Weather: but these happen not very frequently, and continue not long.

The Danish Chronicle mentions such a Tempest as something extraordinary, which happened there in the Year 1308, when a Church in Greenland, call'd Seal-bolt, was burnt down to the ground by the Thunder and Lightning, which was followed by such a Hurricane, as tore to pieces the points of several Rocks, which threw out such a vast quantity of Ashes, as covered all the circumjacent Country, the Inhabitants being in great fear of being buried under them.

The next following Winter proved so excessive violent, that the Ice did not melt all that Year: which seems to intimate that there are sulphureous burning Mountains, as well in Greenland as in Iceland; of which the many hot Springs in Greenland, which are intolerable hot in the Winter, seem to be an evident proof.

The Summer Air is very clear in Greenland, both Day and Night; tho the last is no more than a medium betwixt both, like our dusky part of the Evening as long as the Summer lasts; as in the Winter the days are extremely short, the rest being Night.

The Iceland Chronicle makes mention of a certain Wonder of Nature, which ought not to be pass'd by in silence; This is a certain Meteor of an oblong square Figure, which always appearing at the time of the New Moon, gives a Light no less than if it were Full Moon; and the darker the Nights are, the more conspicuous it is. It constantly keeps its Course in the North, moves backward and forward, and leaves thick Vapours behind it; neither does it cease till the Sun rises, its Motion being so swift, as not to be imagin'd but by those that have seen it: It is commonly call'd the North Light, and there are some who assure us, that in very clear Weather it has been seen as far as in Iceland, nay in some parts of Norway it self. It is not improbable but that this Meteor may be of the same nature with that which appear'd in the Year 1621, on the 13th of September all over France; and was observ'd, among others, by that famous French Philosopher Gassendus, who styles it Auroram Borealem, or the Northern Morning-Light.

The Danish Chronicle mentions, that in the Year 1271, a prodigious quantity of Ice, with white Bears upon it, being forced upon the Coast of Iceland by a strong North-west Wind, they began to be of opinion that Greenland extended much farther to the North than they had hitherto believed; which made the Ice-Vain English send several Ships that way, but met with nothing but Ice. Since which time the Kings of Denmark and Norway have several times sent their Ships thither, but with no better success.

The eagerness of discovering the North part of Greenland, was occasioned by a certain Opinion they had, that there was good store of Gold and Silver, and precious Stones in those Parts: for the Danish Chronicle says expressly, that in former Ages some Ships brought great Treasures from thence; and that under the Reign of Olaus, surnamed The Holy, King of Norway, some Frieslanders attempting the discovery of the Passage thither, were at last by Tempest forced into a small Creek of the Northern Greenland; where being gone ashore, they saw not far from thence some miserable Huts, half under-ground; and a great quantity of metallick Stones, of which they took as many as they were able to carry. But whilst they were making the best of their way to the Sea-side, they were set upon by the Savages of the Country, who sallying out from their Huts, armed with Slings, Bows and Arrows, put them so hard to it, that they were glad to get aboard their Ship again, with the loss of one of their Comerades, who having the misfortune of being taken by them, was torn in pieces in their fight.

Monck. In the Iceland Chronicle, there is among the rest, a Chapter under this following Title, The Course taken by the Ships from Norway into Greenland.

What Course the Ships take from Norway to Greenland. The true Course to Greenland (as has been related by the Greenlanders themselves, or else by such as have often performed this Voyage) is from Northstat Sundmur in Norway directly to the West towards Horensfund, situated on the Eastern side of Iceland. From Schnecks Fokel, a noted sulphureous Mountain in Iceland, to Greenland, is seven days Voyage: The shortest Course is the Western Course; about half way you see Gundeburn Skeer. This was the true Course taken by the Antients, before the vast quantities of Ice that were forced that from the North, had rendred those Seas so dangerous, if not quite unpassable. Another Passage in the same Chronicle says thus: From Langenes in Iceland, which is the uttermost Northern Point of Iceland, to Easterborn, are eighteen Leagues; from thence to Walsbrette, is a Voyage of twice four and twenty hours. It is certain that the Voyages to Greenland have at all times been very dangerous, as is evident from the Voyage of Leif, and of the Bishop Arnold, who suffer'd Shipwrecks, and from the dangerous Undertaking of the Frießlanders. There is another Chapter in the Iceland Chronicle, under the following Title; An Account of Greenland, taken out of an antient Treatise, called Speculum Regale.

Three Monsters in the Seas of Greenland. Three very remarkable Sea-monsters (say they) were in former Ages observed in the Seas of Greenland: The first was called by the Norwegians, Hafstramb, appearing in the shape of a Man as far as the Girdle, with the same Eyes, Nose, and Head; the last of which was somewhat sharper on the top as the Head of other Men, with very broad Shoulders, and two Arms, but without Hands. It never appear'd above Water below the Girdle; and being transparent like Ice, it was always look'd upon as the forerunner of a violent Tempest. The second being call'd Margugwer, appear'd like a Woman, with large Breasts, long Hair, and Fingers at the Arms end, which were join'd together like Geese-feet. This Monster has been seen to catch Fish with its hands, and to devour them in an instant; this was likewise the forerunner of an imminent Tempest: And if the Monster did turn its Face towards the Ship, they look'd upon it as a good Omen, that they should escape the danger; but if it turn'd its back as it was going under Water, they gave themselves over for lost. The third was, properly speaking, nothing else but a Whirlpool, occasioned by the Hurricanes and Whirlwinds, which raising the Waves to a most prodigious height, such Ships as had the misfortune to fall in betwixt them, were commonly swallowed up in the bottomless Abyss of the Sea. The same Treatise mentions that the Ice-shoals sometimes represent various Figures of a dreadful aspect, and advises those who undertake the Voyage to Greenland, to keep to the South-west, before they attempt to get ashore; because that often-times all the Summer long there is a vast quantity of Ice near the Shore. It further gives this Advice to those who are got betwixt the Ice, viz. to put all their Provisions in their Chalops, which they may put upon the Ice, and stay either till it melts; or if they fail in that, they may draw them to the Shore upon the Ice.

Thus far reaches the History of the old Greenland, which is, in the Danish Chronicle, ended with the Year 1348, when an Epidemical Distemper swept most of the Greenland Merchants and Seamen away; since which time the correspondence with Greenland was first interrupted, and quite ceased at last.

There is an antient Manuscript Danish Chronicle, in which it is related, that about the Year 1484, under the Reign of King John, there were at Bergen in Norway about forty Seamen left, who once a Year sail'd to Greenland, and brought several good Commodities from thence; which they refusing to sell at a certain time to some German Merchants, they were by them invited to Supper, and all murdered at once.

But this carries but little probability along with it, the Greenland Voyages being too dangerous to be perform'd at so easy a rate, as is evident from what has been related before, and from what will be said hereafter upon this Head.

It is to be observed, that the Revenue arising from Greenland, was allotted for the Kings of Norway's Table; so that none were allow'd to sail thither without a Pass, under the forfeiture of their Lives. It happened in the Year 1389, when the States of Denmark were assembled in Finland, under the Reign of Queen Margaret (who united the two Kingdoms of Denmark and Norway under one Head) where also a Bishop of Greenland was present; that several Merchants and Seamen were accused of having been in in Greenland without Licence ; which being fully proved against them, they were in danger of having paid for it with their Lives, if they had not unanimously declared that they were forced thither by a Tempest ; so that upon their Oaths they were at last dismissed, after they had suffered great Hardship in Prison. But this ill Treatment, which was followed by a severe Proclamation, forbidding all her Subjects to traffick in Greenland without special Leave, had such an influence upon the Merchants and Mariners, that they did seldom attempt it afterwards. Sometime after the Queen equipped some Ships at her own Cost and Charge ; which being sent into Greenland, were never seen or heard of afterwards, being supposed to be lost among the Ice. This so terrified the rest of the Seamen who used to sail thither, that they shew'd but little inclination to venture on that Voyage any more : And the Queen being afterwards engaged in a War with Sweden, had more weighty Affairs upon her hands, than to trouble herself much about Greenland, which at last proved the occasion of the total loss of that Country.

The same Danish Chronicle further mentions, that in the Year 1406, the then Bishop of Druntheim in Norway, called Eskild, sent one Andrew to Greenland, to succeed Bishop Henry in his Function there if he were dead ; and if not, to bring him some Tidings from thence : for since the said Bishop had left the beforementioned Assembly of the Estates, they had not had the least news from him. But questionless the same Fate attended Andrew that had attended Bishop Henry, for neither of them was ever heard of afterwards, he being the last Bishop that was sent from Norway into Greenland.

The Danish Chronicle gives us a Catalogue of all the Kings who have reign'd since the Death of Queen Margaret, with an account of their Endeavours for the recovery of Greenland ; of which we will insert the chief Heads, forasmuch as they will give us a true insight into the Reason of the Loss of Greenland, which was so much frequented in former Ages.

Erick Duke of Pomerania succeeded Queen Margaret in the Throne ; but being a Foreigner, and consequently not well versed in the Northern Affairs, did not in the least trouble himself about Greenland.

King Christopher Duke of Bavaria, his Successor, bent all his Thoughts against the Hanse Towns, with whom he was engaged in War.

Among those of the Oldenburgh Line, which obtain'd the Royal Dignity in the Year 1448, Christiern I. spent his time in a Pilgrimage to Rome, where he obtain'd from the Emperor and the Pope, the Investiture of the Country of Ditmarsen, and a Bull to erect an University at Copenhagen.

Christiern II. obliged himself by his Coronation Oath, to endeavour the Recovery of Greenland ; but instead of bringing new Acquisitions to the Crown, he lost both the Crowns of Sweden and Denmark, being deposed by his Subjects ; which is the reason he is always painted with a broken Scepter.

Under his Reign one Erick Walckendor, a brave Danish Lord, was Lord Chancellor of Denmark ; who being after his Master's Disgrace constituted Bishop of Druntheim in Norway, bent all his Thoughts on the Recovery of Greenland. For which reason he search'd all the ancient Records, and advised with the oldest and ablest Mariners, who were supposed to have any knowledge of that Country : But whilst he was laying the Foundation of this Design, a Quarrel arose betwixt him and another great Lord in Norway, in the Year 1524. who being too powerful for him, procured his banishment to Rome, where he died.

Frederick II. Christiern's Uncle, being got into the Possession of the two Kingdoms of Denmark and Norway, was busy in persecuting those whom he believed to have the least kindness for Christiern ; which made him encourage the banishment of Walckendor, who was thereby disabled from prosecuting his Design of the Recovery of Greenland.

Christiern III. succeeded Frederick I. attempted the Recovery of Greenland, but without success, which made him recal the severe prohibition of going to Greenland without licence. But Norway being at that time reduced to great Poverty, and not in a condition to undertake such a Design, this Remedy proved likewise ineffectual.

King Frederick II. succeeded his Father in the Throne, and being willing to endeavour the recovery of Greenland, sent one Magnus Henningson to prosecute this design. If what is related in the Chronicle may be taken for authentick, there must be some fatality which prevented the discovery of Greenland at that time : for this Henningson, after he had been tossed up and down at Sea by Tempests

Monck. for a long time, came at last in sight of the Shore; but, to his great amazement, found his Ship to stop in the open Sea, where there was neither Ice nor Sands: So that after he found all his Endeavours of getting near the Shore, to be in vain, he was forced to return to Denmark, where he gave an account to the King of what had befall'n him, and laid the fault of his Misfortune upon the Magnet-Stones, which he believed to be in prodigious Quantities thereabouts, in the bottom of the Sea. If he had been acquainted with what is related concerning the Fish Remora, he might perhaps have come off better. This happened in the Year 1588.

Not many Years before, viz. in the Year 1577. Martin Forbisher an English Man, made the first discovery of that Country, which is now called New Greenland; and because his Account contains many remarkable things concerning the Inhabitants and their Manners, we will give the Reader some of the most material Passages of it here.

*Forbisher's Voyage to Green-
land.*

This Martin Forbisher set sail from England in the Year 1577, to endeavour the discovery of Greenland, which he got sight of at last; but by reason of the vast quantities of Ice, and the approaching Winter, not being able to reach the Shore, was forced to return home, where he gave an account of his Voyage to Queen Elizabeth, who then sway'd the Scepter in England.

Their Habitations.

This Great Queen sent him the next following Spring, with three other Ships, to pursue the former Design, when he got safely to Greenland. But the Inhabitants at the approach of the English leaving their Huts, retired among the Rocks, from whence several precipitated themselves into the Sea.

The English, after they had in vain endeavoured to mollify these Savages, went to their Huts, which were Tents made of the Skins of Sea-calves and Whales, fix'd to strong Poles, and sow'd together with the Sinews of Beasts: They had an opening towards the South and West, but were closely and very artificially join'd together to the East and North, the better to defend themselves against the coldness of those Winds. They met with no living Creature there, except an old Woman, with a Child in her hand, which they took from her, and she made a most miserable outcry for the loss of it.

From thence they sail'd along the Coast, where they saw a Sea-monster's

Head above Water, with a Horn about three or four foot long. They landed again, and found the Surface of the Earth Rocky, but very good Grounds beneath it; they also met with great store of glistering Sand like Gold, of which they took 300 Tuns along with them.

They used their utmost endeavours to enter into discourse with the Savages, who seemingly shew'd no great averſion to them, and gave them to understand, by certain signs, that if they would row up higher the River, their expectation should be answered: Accordingly Martin Forbisher got into a Boat with some Soldiers, and having ordered his Ships to follow ^{the} him, went up the River; and seeing a great number of the Savages posted among the Rocks, he did not think fit to expose himself by approaching too near the Banks. At last three among them, who appear'd somewhat better than the rest, having made a signal for him to land, he resolv'd to do it, all the rest being at a considerable distance; but his Boat scarce touch'd the Bank of the River, when the Savages began to appear in great numbers, which made him soon chuse the stream again. Nevertheless the Savages endeavoured to persuade them by signs to come ashore, throwing to them some raw Flesh. But finding the English mistrustful, they resolv'd to draw them thither by the following Stratagem: They laid one of their Men upon the Bank, who pretending to be lame, they supposed the English would come to take him, whilst they pretended to be retired at a further distance, being all out of sight behind the adjacent Rocks. But the English being aware of the Snare, discharged a Gun at him, which made him soon recover his Legs; and the Savages coming to his Aid, pelted the English in the Boat with Stones and Arrows, but were soon dispersed by their great Guns.

These Savages are very treacherous and ^{Na} barbarous, not to be mollified by fair ^{Co} Words or Presents. They are strong ^{of} and well set, of an Olive Colour; their Clothes being made of the Skins of ^{va} Sea-calves, sew'd together with the Sinews of Beasts. The Womens Apparel is not different from that of the Men, for they Th wear Breeches, with many Pockets in ^{poi} them, in which they carry their Knives, Needles, Yarn and Looking-glasses, which they either get from Strangers, or else are cast ashore by the Sea. Their Faces are painted with Blue, and some let their Hair grown very long, hanging down over over their Shoulders untwisted. Their Shirts are made of Fish-guts sow'd together with Sinews, their Garments loose fastned about the middle with a Girdle; they are naturally very nasty, and freely expose their privy Members. All their Riches consist in their Slings, Bows, Arrows, and Boats. Their Bows are very slender, and their Arrows thin, tipp'd at the end with a pointed Bow or Horn; they manage them with great dexterity, and hit the Fishes as they are swimming in the Water. Their Boats are covered all over with the Skins of Sea-Calves, and fitted only for one single Person. Their larger Vessels are made of Wood, and covered with the Skins of Whales, they are big enough to contain twenty Men at a time: Their Sails are made of the same Materials with their Shirts, and notwithstanding there is not the least Iron-work about them, are so strong, that the Savages venture with them very deep at Sea.

No venomous Creature is to be found here unless they be Spiders, and the Nats are very busy in the Summer-time; they have no fresh Springs, but this defect is supply'd by the melted Snow. They have Dogs of a prodigious bigness, which they use before their Sleds instead of Horses. But we must return to Denmark.

King Christian IV.
entered the de-very Greenland.

Among all the Danish Kings no body has been more zealous to promote the discovery of Greenland than King Christian IV. for which purpose he sent for an expert Seaman out of England, who being acquainted with those Seas, he gave him three Ships under the Command of Gotske Lindenau, a Danish Gentleman. They set sail from the Sound in the year 1605. in the Summer, and continuing their Course for some time together, the Englishman at last turn'd to the South-west to avoid the Ice, whilst the Admiral steered his course to the North-East, and arriv'd safely in Greenland. He had no sooner cast Anchor near the Shoar, but the Savages came with their Boats all about his Ship, and were welcom'd with some Wine, which however they did not relish very well; but seeing some Oil of Whales, they begg'd some of it, which being given them, they drank it off very greedily. They had brought along with them good store of Skins of Bears and Sea-calves, and several pieces of the Unicorn, which they exchanged for Needles, Knives, Looking-glasses, and such other Toys. They did not seem to put any value upon Gold or Silver, but were extremely fond of Iron, for which they would exchange their Bows, Arrows, Boats, Oars, nay their Shirts. The Admiral Gotske Lindenau tarried three days on this Coast, but durst not venture ashore. On the fourth day, being ready to set sail again, he detain'd two of the Savages who happen'd to be aboard of him, and were so outrageous that they were forced to bind them; the rest seeing their Companions in danger of being carried away, made a most horrible outcry, and shot at the Danes with their Arrows, but were soon put to flight by the discharge of a Cannon; after which the said Admiral return'd happily into Denmark.

The Englishman had in the mean while landed on the other side of Greenland, where he met with several good Harbours and plenty of Pasturage. The Savages exchanged their Commodities with him, as they had done with the Admiral, but seem'd more mistrustful; for no sooner had they got any thing from the Danes, but away they went in all haste to their Ships, as if they had stoln it. The Danes being desirous to take a view of the Country, went ashore well arm'd, and met with good Grounds, but rocky like Norway. The smell of sulphureous Vapours, which was not a little offensive to their Nostrils, seem'd to intimate that there were sulphureous Mountains not far from thence. They found also a certain Silver Oar, of which they carried a certain quantity into Denmark, a hundred weight of which yielded about twenty Ounces of Silver. As they were returning to their Ship, they took four Savages, one of whom was so refractory, that they were forced to knock him down with the But-end of their Musquets, which frightened the others into a more pliable Temper. But the Savages having taken the alarm, pursued the Danes to relieve their Companions, and had found means to cut off their Passage to the Ship; but by the help of their Fire-arms, and the great Cannons from the Ship, they soon cleared their way, and got safely aboard with the other three Savages, whom after their return into Denmark they presented to the King; they were found better proportion'd, and more civiliz'd than those that were brought over by Lindenau, from whom they likewise differ'd as well in their Manners and Languages, as in their Apparel.

The King being very well satisfied with Cccc 2 what

Monck. what progress they had made in this Voyage, did order the before-mentioned Lindenau in the year 1506. to go with five Ships a second time to Greenland. They set sail from Denmark on the 8th of May, taking along with them the same three Savages that were brought from Davis's Straits by the before-named Englishman, they being to serve for Interpreters; at which they seem'd exceedingly pleased, yet one of them died by the way. Lindenau taking the same course the Englishman had done, arrived on the third day of August with four Ships in Greenland, the fifth being separated from them by Storm. The Savages appear'd in great numbers near the Sea-side, but were as mistrustful of the Danes as they were of them, which made them sail in quest of another Harbour, which they reach'd soon after, but found the Savages of the same Temper with the others, appearing in a posture to fight them if they should attempt to land. The Danes who, by reason of the vast number of the Savages thought themselves no equal match for them, sail'd along the Coast; and the Savages would follow them at some little distance in their Boats, of whom they took six, and then carried them together with their Boats and Oars aboard their Ships.

Foolhardiness of a Dane.

One day as they were riding at Anchor in a certain small Bay, the Admiral Lindenau's Gentleman being a resolute Fellow, very earnestly desired his Master to give him leave to go ashore, to try whether he could treat with the Savages; or if that would not do, he did not question to make his way back again: which being granted, at last he went ashore, but had scarce walk'd a few paces, when the Savages falling upon him cut him to pieces in an instant. Their Knives and Cutlasses are made of Unicorn, so sharp edg'd by whetting them against Stones, that they cut as well as if they were made of the best Steel. Lindenau finding but little hopes of succeeding in his Enterprise, return'd to Denmark; and one of the Savages being not able to brook his Captivity, drowned himself. In his return he met with the same Ship that was separated from them before by stress of Weather; but another Storm arising soon after, they were again dispersed, and did not meet again till near a month after, when they pursued their Voyage to Denmark, and arrived at Copenhagen on the fifth day of October, after a second dangerous and troublefom Voyage.

Being sent a third time two stout Ships to Greenland, under the Command of Carsten Richartson a Holsteiner, who having aboard some of the most experienced Mariners of Norway and Iceland, set sail from the Sound on the 13th day of May, and got sight of Greenland on the 8th of June, but could not approach the Shoar by reason of the Ice, which lay heap'd up like Mountains, some Leagues deep at Sea; for it is to be observed, that there are some years when the Ice continues all the Summer long without being melted: which obliged the Holsteiner, who had been separated from the other Ship, and was afraid of being intangled in the Ice past retreating, to return to Denmark, where he notwithstanding his Miscarriage, was well received by the King.

The Savages which were taken and brought into Denmark in the two first Voyages, had liberty to walk about where they pleased, under the Guard of some Waiters. They liv'd upon Milk, Cheese, Butter, raw Flesh and Fish, according to their own Custom, being averse to Bread and boil'd Meat, but much more to Wine; the Oil of Whales being their beloved Liquor. They would frequently turn their Faces to the North, and fetch a heavy sigh. One time their Waiters being careless in observing them, some of these Savages got to their little Boats, and without more ado put to Sea, but by a strong Wind were forced twelve Leagues beyond the Sound, ashore in Shonen, where being taken by the Country People they were sent back to Copenhagen. This serv'd as a warning to their Waiters to be better upon their Guard for the future: but they pined themselves at last to death one after another.

At a certain time, when a Spanish Ambassador was sent into Denmark, there being five of those Savages as yet living, the King ordered that for the Diversion of the Ambassador they should row upon the Sea in their little Boats; these Boats were shaped not unlike a Weaver's Shuttle, being about ten or twelve foot long: they are made of Whale-bones of an Inch thick join'd together by the help of the sinews of Beasts, and covered all over with the skins of Whales: there is in the middle a hole big enough for one Man to put his Body in. Thus they go to Sea putting their Legs underneath; and if any space be left round their Body they stop it up with their Jackets which are made of the Skin of Sea-Calves, and that so tightly that no Water can enter; which done, they are proof against all Storms and and Tempests beyond what may be expected from Ships of a considerable bulk; for tho they are oftentimes turn'd topsy turvy, they always turn again upright. They make use only of one Oar, which they manage with the same dexterity as the Rope-dancers do their Poles, to keep an even ballance, and with this they row so swiftly, that (as it was try'd at the same time) they could keep pace with a Boat with sixteen Oars.

The Ambassador extremely well satisfied with this Spectacle, gave each of them a very good Present, wherewith they bought themselves Clothes made after the German fashion, and other Accoutrements, such as Boots, Spurs and Feathers, and afterwards offer'd to serve the King on Horse-back. But this gay humour was of no long continuance, for the desire of returning to their Native Country being soon reviv'd, two of those who had once before ventured to make their escape at Sea, and consequently were not in the least mistrusted of attempting so dangerous an Undertaking a second time, did once more attempt to reach Greenland in their Boats. They were pursued with all imaginable speed, but one was only overtaken, the other being questionless swallowed up in the Waves. It was observable in him who escaped, that whenever he saw a Woman with a Child in her Arms he used to fetch a deep sigh, which made the Danes believe that he had left a Wife and Children behind. The rest were more narrowly watch'd, which served only to increase their Melancholy, of which they dy'd one after another.

There remain'd however at last two alive, who liv'd near twelve years after all the rest of their Companions were dead: They were cherish'd with all the fair Promises imaginable, which seem'd to be some Comfort to them; but they could never be brought to the true understanding of the Christian Faith, being quite ignorant of the Danish Tongue. They were sometimes observ'd to lift up their Eyes towards Heaven, and to adore the rising Sun. One of them died whilst he was employ'd in Pearl-fishing at Coldingen. For it is to be observ'd that the Muscles thereabouts contain generally some Pearl dust, and among them are sometimes found Pearls of a good bigness. This Greenlander having given them to understand one day, that he was very dexterous at fishing of Pearls, the Governor of Coldingen took him along with him to make use of him upon that account, which the Savage perform'd with so much dexterity, that he seldom return'd without some good Pearls. The Governor, who was very avaricious, being over eager after such a Booty, would not stay till the next Spring; but forcing the poor Savage to dive in the midst of Winter under the Ice, no otherwise than if he had been a Spaniel Dog, he fell ill and died. His Comrade remaining now alone inconsolable for the death of his Companion, found means the next Spring to get to Sea in his little Boat unperceiv'd by any body; he was however pursued with all speed, but having the start of them was got thirty Leagues out at Sea before he could be retaken. They gave him to understand by certain signs, that it would have been impossible for him to have reach'd Greenland, but that he must have perished among the Waves; at which he made certain signs to shew that he intended to have run along the Coast of Norway to a certain height, from whence he would have cross'd the Seas, taking his Directions by the Stars. He was brought back to Copenhagen, where he died soon after with Melancholy.

This was the end of these unfortunate Greenlanders, who approach'd in Stature to the Laplanders, being well set, but short, of a swarthy Colour, with flat Noses and thick Lips. Their Boats, Apparel, and other Implements are to be seen to this day at Copenhagen, as also a Greenland Almanack, composed of 28 or 30 small Sticks fastened to a Leather String, by which they used to distinguish their time.

Since that time the King of Denmark did not think fit to send any more Ships at his own Charge to Greenland: But some Merchants of Copenhagen being join'd in a Company (in which several Persons of Quality had likewise a share) call'd the Greenland Company, they sent in the year 1636. two Ships to Davis's Straits, where they were no sooner come to an Anchor, but eight Savages came in their little Boats aboard of them. Whilst they were busy in laying out their Sea-Calves and Fur-skins, and several pieces of Unicorn, in order to exchange them with the Danes for Needles, Knives and Looking-glasses, it happen'd accidentally that a Gun was discharged aboard the Ship, which put the Savages into such a fear, that they all leapt over-board under Water, and did not so much as put out their Heads again till they were at least two hundred paces distant from the Ship; but being given to understand by certain signs

signs that they intended them no harm, Monck. they return'd and continued to traffick, as before.

How they traffick. Their manner of dealing is thus: They choose among the European Commodities what they like best, which being laid on one side, they lay down as much of theirs as they think fit to give in exchange, and this is continued thus till both Parties are agreed. They saw at the same time a dead Fish upon the shoar, with a Horn or rather Tooth on one side of his Head, which the Savages had broken in pieces, and sold them to the Danes. This Fish is of a prodigious Strength, and a declared Enemy of the Whales, just as the Rhinoceros is to the Elephant among the Terrestrial Creatures; for if he meets the Whale, he strikes his Horn into his sides as deep as it will reach. Some assure us, that it sometimes runs with such a force against the Ships, that thereby they become leaky.

How the Danes were deceived in their Expectation.

But the intention of the Danes was not so much to exchange their Commodities with them, as to take a full view of the Country; and the Mate of one of the Ships having taken notice near a certain River where he landed, that the Sand resembled both in weight and colour true Gold Sand, loaded his whole Ship with it, and with great Joy return'd straitways to Denmark, telling his Ship's Crew as they were under sail, that now they were all rich enough. The Lord High Steward of Denmark, who had a considerable share in the Ship, being surpris'd at the sudden return of this Ship, the Mate told him how he was freighted with Gold, which made the Lord High Steward send some quantity of it to the Goldsmiths of Copenhagen, to try whether they could bring any quantity out of it; but these being not able to produce one Grain from this Sand, he was so much exasperated at this Disappointment, that he immediately commanded the Mate to go out to Sea, and to throw his pretended Gold-sand into the bottom of it, without speaking one word more of it to any body. The poor Mate was forced to obey, but with so much reluctancy, that finding himself disappointed in the hopes of his supposed Treasure, he died soon after for Grief. Neither was it long before the Lord High Steward repented himself of his rashness; for some Sand altogether resembling this was found in the Mines of Norway, from whence several Persons who were well vers'd in the Separation of Metallick Bodies, drew a pretty quantity of very good Gold, which the unexperienced Goldsmiths of Copenhagen would not have done in this any more than in the before-mentioned Sand.

In this Voyage it was they brought that before-mentioned piece of the Unicorn from Greenland, which was to have been sold to the Great Duke of Muscovy; it is still to be seen at Copenhagen, and valued at 6000 Crowns. The Danes had likewise taken two Savages, whom they tied to the Masts till they were a great way at Sea, when they were untied again; but they no sooner found themselves at liberty, but leap'd into the Sea, in hopes, as may be supposed, to reach the shoar by swimming, which was impossible for them to do by reason of the great distance from thence.

This is all I have been able to meet with concerning the Old and New Greenland; of the Old Greenland formerly inhabited by the Norwegians; of the New Greenland, discovered by the English, Danes, and Norwegians, as they went in search after the Old Greenland. It is most probable that the Ice from the North-West has quite stop't up that Passage betwixt Iceland and Greenland, and that whilst the Mariners were endeavouring to make their way through this Passage, they were drove upon the Cape Farewel and Davis's Straits, or rather Gulph, and so discovered that part of the Country which now is stiled New Greenland.

It is evident out of the Iceland Chronicle, that betwixt Iceland and the Old Greenland there were several Islands and Rocks; as for instance, that which they call'd Gundebior Scheer, which strengthens our opinion, it being easy to imagine that the Ice might with less difficulty be heap'd betwixt those Islands; which being of such a thickness as not to be melted by the Beams of the Sun, has rendered the Sea betwixt Iceland and Greenland quite impassible, so that 'tis impossible to give an account of the Posterity of the ancient Norwegians who settled there: perhaps they bore their share in the Plague which raged so furiously in Norway in the year 1348. and almost depopulated that Kingdom. It is not altogether improbable but that Gotske Lindenaw, who in his first Voyage steer'd his Course to the North-East, may have cast Anchor near the Old Greenland, and that perhaps these two Savages were descended from the ancient Norwegians; but tho they differ'd from the other Savages that were brought over from Davis's Straits both in Manners and Language, yet had theirs not the least affinity with the Danish or Norway

Norway Tongues: The Danish Chronicle tells us that the three Savages brought over by the Englishman did talk so swiftly, that it was impossible for any body to distinguish one word from another, unless it were the two words Oka indecha, the meaning of which no body understood. Thus much is unquestionable, that what was call'd Old Greenland, was no more than a small Point of the Northern part of Greenland, viz. where it lay nearest to Iceland, and that the ancient Norwegians durst not venture very far into the Country, no more than those who have since discover'd the New Greenland. The Danes in their before-mentioned Voyage to Greenland, in the year 1636. did by certain signs enquire of the Savages, whether there were any considerable number of Inhabitants in the inland Countries there; upon which the Savages gave them to understand by signs, that there were as many People there as they had hairs upon their Heads, that they were very tall, arm'd with large Bows and Arrows, wherewith they kill'd every thing they met in their way. From whence we may draw this Conclusion, that neither these People nor their Country, no more than the Old Greenland, are in the least known to us at this time.

A particular Account of the Voyage performed by Capt. Monck.

C*Hristiern IV.* King of Denmark being desirous to find out a Passage betwixt Greenland and America, to facilitate the Voyage to the East-Indies, did order one Capt. Monck, a Person of great Bravery, to sail with two stout Ships to the Straits, which were not many years before discover'd by one Mr. Hudson an English-Man.

This Mr. Hudson having been several times before on the Northern Coasts, was at last prevail'd upon by some English Merchants to try his Fortune, whether he could find out a Passage betwixt Greenland and America to the East-Indies; accordingly he set sail from England with one Ship only in the year 1610. and passing along the Coast of Greenland was, what with the Fogs and what with Storms, forc'd into a strait Passage, which at last brought him into an open Sea; which made him begin to conceive certain hopes that he had been so fortunate as to be the Discoverer of the said Passage. But after he had for a considerable time cruised up and down this Sea, without being able to discover the desired Passage, he resolv'd (contrary to the opinion of the rest) to pass the Winter thereabouts, tho he was not sufficiently stor'd with Provisions for so long a time: and they must infallibly have perished for want of Food, if they had not met with several sorts of Birds, and among the rest with white Partridges, of whom they catch'd above a hundred dozen; and these leaving that part of the Country towards the Spring, they were in their stead supplied with Swans, Ducks, Geese, and other such like Water-Fowl, which were easily catch'd. Besides they met with a certain Tree there of a most miraculous nature, its Leaves being green inclining to yellow, had a strong taste of Spice, and being boil'd afforded a Balsamick Oil; the Decoction it self being a present Remedy against the Scurvy, the Sciatick, and other Distempers occasioned by cold and viscous Humours. The approaching Spring furnish'd them with such store of Fish, as would be sufficient to freight their whole Ship, if Mr. Hudson had not been more intent upon his intended Discovery than any thing else; which however being not able to effect, he saw himself under a necessity of bending his Course back to England. In the mean while there happen'd a Mutiny against the Captain, carried on by one Green his Clerk, who being educated by him, but by reason of his Misbehaviour threatned as well as some others of the Ship's Crew who had been wanting in their Duty, and dreaded the Punishment, did force his Cabin, from whence they took him and his Son, and putting them with seven more in a Chalop, committed them to the mercy of the Sea. In this place I cannot pass by in silence the Generosity of one Philip Staf, who being a Carpenter and a good Seaman, would not stay behind with those Villains, tho they press'd him earnestly to it, but rather chose to go along with his Captain in the Chalop than to tarry among those perfidious Wretches. What is become of them is unknown, tho it be probable that they either perished for want of Food, or else were

~ were murdered by the Savages. The same
Monck. fate attended the Ring-leaders of this mutiny, who were slain by the Savages; the rest arrived not till the following year 1611, on the 6th day of September in England, after they had suffered to the utmost extremity for want of Provisions, being forced to live upon Grass, and the Skins of Birds, the flesh whereof they had eaten long before.

But we must return to Capt. Monck, who set Sail from the Sound with two Ships, one man'd with 48 Men, the other with 16, on the 16th day of May in the Year 1619: He arrived on the 20th of June near Cape Farewell, being very Rocky, cover'd with Ice and Snow, and situate under $62\frac{1}{2}$ Degree. From thence steering his Course to the North-west, towards Hudson's Straits, he was much incommoded by the Ice, which however did him no considerable damage, he having Sea-room enough. Among other accidents that befel him, it froze so violently on the 18th of June at Night, and the Winds blew so hard and cold, that his Sails were rendred useles by reason of the Ice that adhered to them; yet the next following day proved so excessive hot in the Afternoon, that they were forced to lay by their Clothes, and to go in their Shirts only.

He did not arrive in Hudson's Straits till the 17th of July, which he call'd after the King of Denmark, Christiern's Straits. His first landing was in an Island, directly opposite to Greenland; and having sent some of his People to take a view of the Country, they found no Men, but by their footsteps were convinced there were some in this Island. The next following day they saw some of the Savages, who seeming to be surprized at the sight of the Danes, hid their Arms behind a great Stone-heap, and then advanced toward them in a friendly posture, but kept continually a watchful eye upon their Arms, for fear the Danes should come too near them. Notwithstanding which they found means to get betwixt them and their Arms, which they seized. The Savages seem'd to be exceedingly troubled at this loss, and in an humble posture beg'd the Danes to have them restored, without which they were not able to subsist, Hunting being their only Livelihood. They offered to exchange their Clothes for them, which moved the Danes at last to compassion; so that they not only gave them back their Arms, but also presented them with several Toys, which they received very thankfully, and in lieu of them brought the Danes several sorts of Fowl and Fish. One among them having got a small Looking-glass, and seeing himself in it, was so overjoyed, that he put it into his Bosom, and did run away as fast as his Legs could carry him. The Danes laugh'd heartily at his simplicity; but what diverted them more than all the rest was, that they perceived some of these Savages to make their Courtship, after their way, to one of their Ship's Crew, who having long Black Hair, and being of a swarthy Complexion, with a flattish Nose, they took him for one of their Country-men, who perhaps had been carried away from Greenland some time before; which often furnished them afterwards with matter of Laughter, so that the poor Fellow was always jeer'd as long as the Voyage lasted.

On the 19th of the same Month Capt. Monck ordred the Sails to be hoisted up in order to leave this Island, but was forced to return into the same Harbour, by reason of the Ice, which obstructed his passage. In the mean while they left no stone unturn'd to find out some of the Inhabitants, but in vain; they found some Nets spread near the Sea-shore, on which they hung Knives, Looking-glasses, and other such like Toys, in hopes to allure them to the Sea-side; but no body appear'd, whether out of fear of the Danes, or because they were commanded to the contrary by their Superiors, is uncertain. Capt. Monck being disappointed in his hopes of meeting with the Inhabitants, ordered a wild Reindeer to be shot, of which there were great numbers there; wherefore he gave the Name of Reensund to the Island, and to the Harbour that of Monckepes, being situated under the 64 Degr. and 20 Min. and after he had planted the Danish Arms there, he once more left the said Island on the 22d of July, but met with such bad Weather, and so many vast Ice-shoals at Sea, that on the 28th of the same Month he was forced to seek for shelter betwixt two Islands, near one of which he came to an Anchor: but finding it unsafe to continue thus, he brought his Ships as near the Shore as possible he could, so that at low Water they lay upon the Sand; and the high Tide carried such a prodigious quantity of Ice to the Shore, that they were in no small danger, if by their industry they had not prevented it. There was a great Ice-shoal, near fifty foot thick, which being loosened by the violence of the Sea, carried

Christiern's

ried all before it, and among the rest their Chaloops which narrowly escaped sinking.

Ashore they saw several footsteps of Men, a sign that the place was not destitute of Inhabitants; but whatever care they took, they could not get sight of any. They also found there some Mineral stones, and very good Talck, of which they carried off several Tunweight. There were several other small Islands thereabouts, but the Sea did run so high near the Shore, that the Danes durst not venture to land. These Islands are situate under 62 Degrees, 20 Min. about fifty Leagues within Hudson's, or as Monck calls it, Christians Straits. The Bay where he came to an Anchor, he call'd Hareford, from the great number of Hares they met with there. He again set up the Arms of Denmark, and the initial Letter of his Royal Master, viz. C. IV. signifying Christian IV.

On the 9th of August he set Sail again from this place with a North-west Wind, steering his course West South-west, and on the 10th came to the South of the Straits of America, and cast his Anchor near a large Island, unto which he gave the name of Snow-Island, because it was all covered with Snow.

On the 20th of August he directed his course to the North-west, being then (as his own Diary testifies) exactly under the Elevation of 62 Degr. 20 Min. but there fell so much Snow, and the Wind did blow so violently that they could see no Land, tho the Straits were not above 16 Leagues over thereabouts, which shews, that they are broader in some other places. After having past these Straits, he got into Hudson's Sea, which he furnished with another Name, or rather gave it two Names instead of one. For that part of it which washes the American Shore he call'd Mare novum, or the New Sea. To the other part which extends to Greenland (if it be really Greenland) he gave the name of Mare Christianum, or Christians Sea: He continued his course West North-West till he came to 63 Degrees, 20 Min. when finding himself surrounded on all sides by the Ice, he resolved to pass the Winter there; the Harbour he call'd Monck's Winter Harbour, and the Country New Denmark. In his relation he makes only mention of two Islands in the Christian Sea, which he styles the two Sisters; and in the New Sea, but of one called Dickles Osland. He advises those who undertake the Voyage through these Straits, to keep as much as possibly they can in the middle, to avoid being carried away by the stormy Tides, and the great Ice-shoals which are of such a thickness there, that if a Ship happen to get betwixt them, it seldom escapes. He says that it flows exactly five hours in the Christians Sea, the Tide being regulated by the Moon.

On the 7th of September Capt. Monck cast Anchor there, and after his People had refreshed themselves for some days, he ordered them to bring the Ships into a little Creek, where they were sheltered against the violence of the Winds and Ice. The next thing they had to do was to provide themselves good Huts against the approaching Winter-season. This Harbour lay near the Entrance of a River, which was not frozen up in October, tho the Sea was full of Ice all round about.

On the 7th day of the same Month, Capt. Monck had a mind to go up the River in a Boat, but could not go further than about a League and a half, by reason of the Cataracts, or Rocky Waterfalls that opposed his Passage. He then march'd with some of his Men about four Leagues deep into the Country, to see whether he could find any of the Inhabitants; but nobody appearing, he resolved to return another way. Here he met with a certain Stone raised above the Ground, upon which was painted an Image resembling the Devil, with Claws and Horns; near this Stone was a place of about eight foot square, enclosed with lesser Stones. On one side of this Enclosure there lay a heap of small flat Stones, intermixt with Moss of Trees; on the opposite side was a large flat Stone laid upon two others in the shape of an Altar, upon which they found three Coals laid across. They saw several more of those Altars, as they were walking about, and some footsteps of Men near each of them; tho they did not come in sight at that time. It is very likely that the Inhabitants used to sacrifice upon those Altars, either with Fire, or perhaps offer their Sacrifices to the Fire it self; for round about them they saw abundance of Bones, which probably were the Bones of the sacrificed Beasts, whose Flesh the Savages had devoured raw, according to their custom. They met also with many Trees, cut down to the Roots with Iron Instruments; and with Dogs that were muzzled. But what most confirmed them in their opinion, that this Isle was not destitute of Inhabitants, was, that in many places they could discover the Holes where they had fix'd the Poles belonging to their Monck. Tents, and found many pieces of Skins of Bears, Wolves, Dogs and Sea-calves, wherewith they used to cover them; which seem'd to intimate, that the Inhabitants here did lead a Vagabond life like the Tartars and Lapponians.

After the Danes had planted their Huts, they cut good store of Wood to be laid up for the Winter, and kill'd abundance of Wild Fowl. Captain Monck kill'd a white Bear with his own hands, which they eat; and he says expressely, that it agreed very well with them. They catch'd likewise abundance of Hares, Partridges, and other Fowl, besides four Black Foxes, and some Sables.

The Danes provide against the Winter

On the 27th of November there appeared three Suns to them, and on the next following 24th of January two. On the 10th of December Old Stile, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, which they saw about Eight a Clock at Night; after which they saw the same Night the Moon surrounded with a very bright Circle, through the middle of which was a Cross, which divided the Moon in two. This seem'd to be the forerunner of those Evils which these poor Wretches were to suffer hereafter, as will appear out of the following Account.

The Cold began to encrease with the Winter-season, to such a degree, that they saw Ice of 300, nay 360 foot thick: no Beer, no Wine, or Brandy was strong enough to be proof against it, but froze to the bottom, and the Vessels split in pieces; so that they cut the frozen Liquor with Hatchets, and melted it before the fire, before they could drink it. If they happened to leave any quantity of Water in their Copper or Tin Vessels, they found them all in pieces the next morning: Neither were the poor Danes able to resist so excessive a Frost, which mastered the Metals, for they all fell sick, and their Sickneses encreased with the Cold; they were generally seized with a Griping Looseness, which did not leave them till it put an end to their days. Thus they dropt away one after another, so that about the beginning of March the Captain was fain to do Duty as a Sentry, for want of others. The worst was, that the Spring did augment their Distemper, for their Teeth were ready to fall out, and their Gums swell'd to that degree, that they could not take any other nourishment but what was in Water. The poor remnant of these unfortunate Wretches were in the next following May seized with another Looseness, with such violent pricking pains in their Limbs, as made them look like meer Shadows; their Arms and Legs being quite lame, and full of Blew spots, as if they had been beaten; being a Distemper not unknown to Seamen, by whom it is commonly call'd the Scurvy. So many of them died, that there were not enough left to bury them, the rest being likewise sick and very weak: and to compleat their misery they began to want Bread, instead of which they made use of Raspberries which they dig'd out from under the Snow, which supply'd the defect of Bread; but they were fain to eat them as soon as they were taken from under the Snow, where they kept fresh, but soon grew useless afterwards.

On the twelfth day of April it rain'd the first time after seven Months; and toward the end of May there appear'd again all sorts of Fowl, such as wild Geese and Ducks, Swans, Swallows, Partridges, Ravens, Snipes, Faulcons, and Eagles, but they were too weak to catch them.

On the 4th of June Captain Monck himself fell so dangerously ill, that he did take no food for four days together; and expecting nothing else but present death, he made his last Will, in which he desired those that might by chance come to this place to bury his Corps, and to send the Diary of his Voyage to the King of Denmark. After four days were past he began however to recover a little, and with much ado got out of his Hut, to see whether there were any of his Ship's Crew left alive, of whom he found no more than two of Sixty four Persons he brought along with him. These two being overjoyed to see their Captain in a condition to stir abroad, took him in their Arms, and carried him to a Fire, to refresh his Spirits. They now began to encourage one another, promising to stand by one another to the last gasp. They dig'd every where among the Snow, till at last they met with a certain Root, which being both Restorative and Food to them, they were restored in few days. The Ice began now to melt apace, so that on the 18th of June they catch'd some Salmon, and other Fish, which with what exercise they used in Hunting, so strengthened them in a little time, that they resolved to return to Denmark.

The Summer Season approaching, they were extremely pestered with Gnats, which made them hasten their departure; so that on the 16th of July they went aboard their lesser Ship (leaving the biggest behind) and steer'd their Course towards Monck's Harbour; they were much incommoded by the Ice, and lost their Boat and Rudder. Whilst they were busy in making a new one, they fastened their Ship to an Ice-rock; which being loosened by the Tide, their Ship was carried away with it; but the Ice being melted soon after, they got clear again, and met with their Boat which they had lost ten days before. It was not long before they got fast within the Ice once more; but the Weather changing almost every day, they were soon released again. Having at last repast the Straits, they sail'd by Cape Farewel into the Ocean; but were on the 8th of September overtaken by a most terrible Tempest, which threatned no less than their total destruction, they being quite tired out, and not able to manage the Ship: so that leaving themselves to the mercy of the Winds, they lost their Mast, and the Sails blew over-board, which however they made shift to save.

In this condition they were forced upon the Coast of Norway, where they cast a piece of an Anchor (the only one they had left) in a small Creek, where they hoped to shelter themselves against the Storm; but found themselves deceived in their Hopes, for they were in most imminent danger of being dash'd to pieces against the Rocks, if by good fortune they had not got betwixt them and the Shore; where after they had refresh'd themselves for some days, they pursued their Voyage, and arrived at last in Denmark.

Capt. Monck had no sooner set foot ashore, but he went to Copenhagen to give the King an account of his unfortunate Voyage; who not imagining him to be still among the Living, received him with all imaginable marks of his Favour. Thus we have seen the brave Capt. Monck return to the Danish Shore, which, as might reasonably be supposed, would put an end to all his Sufferings; but it seems his ill Destiny had preserved him for Monck more, which was to put an unhappy period to the Life of this brave Man.

For whilst he was in Denmark, he used often to ruminate upon his past Adventures; and being by degrees convinced of what had been the chief cause of his miscarriage in his Voyage through the Straits, he took a resolution to try his Fortune once more, in which he hoped to supply the Defects of the former, arisen from the want of knowledg of those Seas, and some other circumstances. Accordingly he propos'd his Design to some Persons of Quality; who approving of it, equip'd two Ships, which he was to command in chief.

Having provided himself with all Necessaries for such a Voyage, he was ready to set sail, when (as his ill Fortune would have it) the King sent for him, and happening, among other things, to speak of his former unfortunate Voyage, told him, that he had lost two Ships by his want of Conduct. Which the Captain answering somewhat briskly, the King took his Cane and push'd it in anger against his Breast. The Captain took this Affront so heinously, that he immediately went home to bed, and would not be perswaded to take the least nourishment; so that in ten days after he died for Melancholy and want of Food.

The preceding Account seems to intimate, that there is a Passage of a considerable length and breadth betwixt Greenland and America, and beyond that a large Sea, the extent of which is not known hitherto, nor whether it be an open or only an inclosed Sea; tho it seems Capt. Monck was of opinion that Greenland was separated from America by this Sea, which was questionless the reason which induced him to try his Fortune a second time; in which, as we told you before, he met with such Encouragement from several Persons of Note in Denmark, that in all likelihood he would have ventured his utmost for the discovery of the Truth; if he had not been prevented by this sinister Accident.

Monck.

An Account of that Country commonly call'd Spitsbergen, being reckoned a part of Greenland.

With the manner of its first discovery, and what method is used in catching the Whales on that Coast.

AFTER the Portugueses had found out the way to the Cape of Good-Hope, and from thence to China and Japan, several other Nations being invited by the Treasures of those Countrys, did endeavour to discover a shorter Passage thither by the North, of which we have several Accounts abroad, some having attempted to find out the said Passage on the North-west side of America: which Course was taken by the English, viz. by Forbisher, Davis and Hudson, and likewise by Capt. Monck, whose unfortunate Voyage we have spoken of in the preceding Treatise.

Others have attempted to pass to the North-East by Nova Zembla (as the Russians call it) and the Great Tartary; of which number are the Hollanders, who in 1594, and the following Years, have (tho with ill success) endeavoured to open their way on that side to China.

The English first attempted the North-East Passage.

The English were however the first who attempted to find out this Passage: For in the Year 1553, under the Reign of King Edward VI. several Persons of Note entered into a Society, which they call'd, The Company for the discovery of Unknown Countries. The chief Director of this Company was the famous Sebastian Cabot, who under the Reign of King Henry VII. first discovered the Northern part of America; from whence in some ancient Maps that part is called Sebastian Cabot's Country.

This Company equip'd three Ships, under the command of Sir Hugh Willoughby an English Knight, and Richard Chancellor Vice-Commodore, with Orders to endeavour to find out a Passage to the North-East through the Tartarian-Sea to China.

Those three Ships pursued their Voyage together, without any sinister Accident, till they came to the height of Wardbuis and Lapland, where Richard Chancellor being separated from the rest by foggy, and stormy Weather, he cruised up and down on those Seas, in hopes to meet with them again; till at last he arrived accidentally in the Bay of St. Nicholas, under the Muscovite Jurisdiction, but unfrequented by any Europeans before. Being got into the acquaintance of some Muscovites, he resolved to wait in Person on the then Great Duke John Basilovitz; who being then engaged in the Livonian War, which had much interrupted the Eastland Trade, was very willing to encourage the English, by granting them considerable Privileges for the promoting of Trade; which has been since carried on by the English to their no small Advantage.

Sir Hugh Willoughby, after he had been tofs'd up and down for a long time, did at last (according to the Diary writ by his own hand) viz. on the 14th of August, come to an anchor near a Country situate under the 72d Degree; which Country since has been stiled in many Maps, Sir Hugh Willoughby's Country. From thence he pursued his Voyage along those Coasts, till the sudden approaching Winter obliged him to enter a certain Harbour, where to pass the Winter. He sent abroad three of his Men to the South-West to view the Country, and to endeavour to discover some of the Inhabitants: But these returning without success, within three days after he ordered three others to the West side; but these also failing in their hopes, three more were dispatch'd towards the South-East, who likewise returned without having been able to find out any Inhabitants. Thus far Sir Hugh Willoughby's Diary. He himself was found frozen to death, with the Ships Crew of his two Ships, consisting of seventy Persons, in an obscure Harbour of Lapland, call'd Areina Kecca, being discovered by some Russian Fishermen who accidentally came that way; way; for it is the custom of the Laplanders to dwell all the Summer season near the Sea-side, for the conveniency of fishing; but with the approaching Winter they retire to the Inland parts of the Country, which makes the Coast to be quite desolate as long as the Frost lasts. The said Sir Hugh Willoughby's Corps was afterwards, by some English Ships trading to Muscovy, carried to England, where he, with some of his Company, was honourably interr'd at London.

The English Ships trading to Muscovy, becoming thereby acquainted with those Northern Coasts, had observed a great number of Sea-Horses in those Seas; so that several Ships were sent out from England to catch them, chiefly for their Teeth-sake, which were sold at a very dear Rate in Muscovy.

The Sea-Horses are very strong Creatures, approaching to the bigness of a moderate Ox, having four Legs (the two hindmost being very unshapable) and a very thick Hide; there have been some seen at Amsterdam that weigh'd above 400 weight. Their Heads are vastly large, having two Teeth each of above a foot long, as white as the best Ivory, which is what they are pursued for with so much eagerness. They bring forth sometimes one, sometimes two young ones at a time, of whom they are very fond. They live both in the Sea, and upon Ice; they are not easy to come at whilst they keep in the Sea, by reason of their prodigious strength; but when they are catch'd upon the Ice, they are not able to make any considerable resistance, by reason of the shortness of their Legs and unweildiness; but they must be hit in the Head, their Skin being impenetrable. If they happen to see one of their own Kind dead upon the Ice, as many of them lay themselves upon it, till it is covered all over and corrupted. The English call them Sea-Horses; the Dutch, Wallnissets; and the Muscovites, Morsefs.

It was in the Year 1593, that the English sent the first time their Ships to catch those Sea-Horses. They landed in an Island, called by the Hollanders the Island of Bears; by the English, Cherry-Isle, from one of the chief Directors of their Com-began to be so shy, that as soon as they perceived any Men they got into the Sea; which rendering the catching of those Beasts the more difficult, and subject to great danger, the Whales began to be pursued by the industrious Mariners.

In the Year 1610, the beforementioned English Company sent one John Pool into the frozen Sea, who discovered that Country, which indeed was found out by the Hollanders before, in their third Voyage to Nova-Zembla, made in the Years 1596; and being by them taken for a part of Greenland, was, by reason of the highland piqued Mountains which are seen a good way off at Sea, call'd Spitsbergen.

Mr. Pool having made his particular Observations upon the great number of Whales found thereabouts, gave an account of it after his return to the Company, who the next following Year sent him thither with two Ships; and they had the good fortune to catch good store both of Whales and Sea-Horses; but by an unfortunate mishap lost both their Ships, the Ships Crew being carried back to England by another English Ship which came that way accidentally: these were the first Ships that came on that Coast on the account of catching of Whales.

In the Year 1612, the English sent two Ships more thither, who meeting with a Dutch Vessel which was sent thither upon the same errand, they obliged them to return home without any Booty.

The next following Year 1613, they pursued the same Design with more vigour than before: for having obtained a Patent from King James, forbidding all others, as well Foreigners as Natives (except the Muscovia Companys) to sail to Spitsbergen; they equipp'd seven Men of War, wherewith they chased the Dutch, French, those of Biscay, nay the English themselves that were Interlopers, from thence.

In the Year 1614 the Hollanders and Zelanders appear'd near Spitsbergen with eighteen stout Vessels, under convoy of four Frigats of thirty Guns each; so that the English who were but fifteen strong, durst not enter into a Dispute with them at that time. The same happened in the

on, and disputing ie English, plunrced them to re-

Monck. This Contest betwixt these two Nations continued for some Years after, till both sides being weary of it, the Passage thither was left free and open to all Nations.

The English alledged in their behalf, that they having been the first Discoverers of that Country, it was but reason they should reap the Benefit of what Expences they had been at. But the Dutch pleading a precedency, as having been there in 1596, the English answered, That the Country found out by Sir Hugh Willoughby, could be no other but Spitsbergen, there being no other Country situate under those Degrees; and that perhaps he had mistaken the Numbers, in putting 72 for 77. But these Disputes are of little weight where the Sword decides the Quarrel.

The King of Denmark did likewise lay a Claim to Spitsbergen, founded upon this Supposition, that it was a part of the Old Greenland, which depended on the Crown of Norway, and consequently on him. This Claim was back'd by some Men of War, but they were not strong enough to oblige the other Nations (as their intention was) to pay them a certain Custom.

Situation of Spitsbergen, and its Name. This part of Greenland, or Spitsbergen, is the most Northern part of the World, which hitherto is come to our knowledge, being situated betwixt Nova-Zembla and Greenland, and extends from the 76 to the 80 Degree. It is call'd Spitsbergen from its high and piqued Mountains which are seen at Sea. These Mountains are of a coarse Sand, intermix'd with small flat Stones like our Slates, and consequently have no firm bottom.

Three sorts of four-legged Beasts. The Country it self is uninhabited, but affords three several kinds of four-leg'd Beasts, viz. white Bears, not inferior in bulk and strength to our Oxen, they live for the most part upon the Ice. Besides these there are likewise Foxes here, gray, white, and black; and Rain-deer, somewhat smaller than a Stag, but very like them in shape, and every thing else, only their Horns are not so smooth. Their Food is a certain green Moss, inclining to a yellowish colour, which sprouts out among the Sand and Stones, being for the rest not unlike that which grows upon Trees. Some are of opinion that deeper in the Country there grows some Grass; and probably there may be some hot Springs there, as has been observed before in Greenland, and perhaps also some Grounds not so much exposed to the Snow, which afford some sustenance in Winter to those Beasts.

In the beginning of June, when the Foreign Ships commonly first appear on these Coasts, the Country is all over (as far as you can see) covered with Snow; and the Rain-deer are so lean, that they can scarce hang together: But in six Weeks after, when the Snow is melted away, they thrive to that degree, that they have two inches of Fat on their Ribs. They don't fly from Men, but rather meet them, and that so near, that sometimes you may lay hold of them, or at least can't fail to hit them with a Gun; at the noise of which the rest disperse, but return soon after to the same place.

The Country is exceeding cold; and tho the whole Summer is but one continued Day, the Sun not going below the Horizon for six Weeks together, yet is this but a slender allay to the Cold, which is there the more fierce, the more clear the Sky appears, as may be likewise observ'd with us in Winter-time; the Mountains especially send forth such cold Damps as are intolerable. The Air is frequently foggy here, to such a degree, that you cannot see the length of a Ship from you; so that nothing but a thirst after Lucre could induce Mankind to expose themselves to so many Inconveniences.

It is further to be observed, that tho this Country affords neither Trees nor Shrubs, yet those who are employed in boiling the Oil ashore, are never in want of Fuel; this defect being supplied by a great quantity of Trees, with their Roots and Branches, which are cast ashore there by the Sea: And not only here, but likewise in all the other Northern Countries, viz. in Nova-Zembla, Greenland, and the Isle of Bears. From whence those Trees come is variously conjectured, some will have them come from the Tartarian Rivers, which exonerating themselves into those Seas, are frozen up in the Winter; and in the Spring a sudden Thaw ensuing, the thick Ice-sholes, forced along by the swiftness of the Current, tear up many Trees, nay sometimes whole Forests by the Roots; which being carried into the Sea, are cast on those Northern shores. But to this it is objected, that since it is evident that the Winter-season has been the same many Years ago in those parts, it must necessarily follow that the Ice would have forced away all the Trees at any reasonable distance from those Rivers long before this time; and that consequently those Rivers could not furnish so vast a quantity city every Year, it being impossible these Trees should grow so fast, being especially kept back by the continual overflowings of those Rivers. Thus much however is certain, that the two great Rivers Oby and Petzora, carry a considerable number of Trees every Year into the Sea; but those cannot come in any comparison with that prodigious quantity which is cast on the Northern shores.

Spitsbergen has some Water-fowl, such as wild Ducks of two several kinds. The Northern Parrots, they resemble the other Parrots both in their Bills, and Colour of their Feathers, but their Feet resemble the Ducks Feet and wild Geese. The Sea is also barren of Fish, such as are fit for nourishment, unless it be now and then a Haddock.

The many Ships which are every Year sent thither from England, France, Spain, Denmark, and the Netherlands, coming only on the account of the Whales, from whence they draw an Oil by boiling; each Nation having its own Station, Bay or Harbour for that purpose.

It is further to be observed, that there are several different kinds of Whales in the frozen Sea, not to speak here of some Sea-monsters, which are mentioned by some upon the very credit of the Mariners who pretend to have seen them. The Whales may conveniently be divided into White and Black ones. The Black are again of two different Kinds, for some have only one Hole or Pipe, and those are all of one sort; out of the Head of those is taken that Matter which is call'd by the Apothecaries Sperma Ceti: others have two, and these are again distinguish'd by their different degrees of bigness. The biggest kind is called Grand-bay, the rest are subdivided into five several sorts; all which agree in this, that they have no Fins on their Backs. There is one kind which is never found without them, and for that reason has got the name of Fin-fish; but being a fierce Beast, and commonly very lean, is not much sought for. The white Whales are so call'd, because their Backs are covered with many white Cockle-shells.

Every Nation, as I told you before, has its own Station or Harbour, where they have fix'd their Coppers, Huts, and other Instruments fitted for the boiling of the Whale Oil, which are always left behind.

The States General of Holland have granted a Patent to a certain Company to catch Whales at Spitsbergen, with exclusion to all others of their Subjects: But such as did not belong to the said Company, and yet were willing to carry on a Trade with Whale-Oil, being inform'd that not only near Greenland, but also in many other parts of those Seas, there were a great many Whales; have since sent abroad their Vessels, which never came ashore, but pursue them in the open Sea till they catch them; when they cut them into small pieces, and putting them up in Barrels, carry them thus into Holland, where they boil the Oil in the same manner as they do in Spitsbergen. But it is to be observed, that this Oil has a certain rankness and ill smell contracted by the keeping of the Flesh so long in the Barrels. We will now come to a conclusion, after we have given you a short account of the manner of catching the Whales.

An Account of the Manner of the catching of the Whales.

AMong the before-mentioned several sorts of Whales, that kind which is called Grand-bay, is commonly esteem'd the best, by reason of his bigness, and the great quantity of Fat which affords the most Oil; as also because he is the most unweildy, and the easiest to be catch'd; this Beast being as lumpish as it is bulky: the Head makes up one third part of the whole Body, with very small Eyes in the midst of it, no bigger than Oxens Eyes; the Eye-balls being no bigger than a good Pea. Instead of the Ears, appear on the out-side only two Holes, so small, that they are scarce to be found out, and will scarce admit of a single Straw; but within the Head they have a larger Orifice, and are formed like Ears, which afford them a sharp hearing. On the top of the Head he has two Pipes, for the drawing in and out of the Air, and the discharging the Water which he swallows in his Mouth, which is forced out through these Holes in a vast quantity, and to a great height. His Tongue is about 18 Foot long, and ten broad, weighing commonly near 600 weight; of such a bulk, that when it lies upon the ground, the tallest Man cannot look over it. This Tongue is inclosed within a good quantity of Hair, not unlike to Horse-hair, which are fast-

Monck. ned to and cover that we commonly call Whalebone; of those there are about 800 within the compass of the Mouth great and small; the broad ends are join'd together on both sides of the Palate, as the lesser are below: those would questionless wound the Tongue by their sharp Edges if they were not covered with Hair, which are like a Bed for the Whales Tongue to rest in. He is destitute of Teeth, and after he is opened you scarce find any thing within but a few Sea-Spiders, and some Sea-moss which is cast up from the bottom of the Sea; from whence it seems probable that neither of those are the ordinary Food of this monstrous Creature, but the Sea-Water, which conveys those Spiders and Moss into his Belly; tho at the same time the Mariners look upon it as an infallible sign that Whales are near at hand when they meet with many of those Spiders, which sometimes cover the surface of the Sea. His Mouth is about four or five fathom wide, with thick and broad Lips weighing sometimes 6000 weight. He is very thick from the Head to the middle, but thinner and sharper towards the Tail; the Fins of which don't stand upright in swimming like other Fish, but are on both sides like our Crawfish; those he makes use of in swimming with incredible swiftness. The Tail it self is about 27 foot long, and at the end one and a half or two foot thick; the Fins are very strong, wherewith he performs Miracles, his whole Strength consisting in them. The privy Members of the Whale are on the outside like the four-leg'd Creatures, the Yard being about 14 foot long, and in the thickest part about a foot in circumference. The Female commonly exceeds the others in bigness, its privy Members are within the Body, not unlike those of Women, and open and shut as occasion requires. They are to be seen next by their Breasts, (where you also find those of the Males) as you may see in the Cut; she never brings forth more than one young one, which follows the old one every where, and sucks her two Breasts.

The whole length of a Whale. The whole length of a Whale is about 70 or 80 foot, having on each side a Fin of a fathom in length, and half a one broad.

The Sword fish his Enemy. There is a certain Fish in those Seas call'd the Swordfish, or Finsfish, who is the declar'd Enemy of the Whale; it is not above seven or eight foot long, but not easily catch'd by reason of its Strength and Vigor; there being Instances, that such a Fish after it has been wounded by the Harpun, has swam so long and with such swiftness afterwards, that the Chalops being tired in the pursuit, have been glad to cut the Line. These Fish, as we said before, are dangerous Enemies to the Whale, who flies before them with all his might; but they surround him in vast numbers, pinch and pull out his Fins by degrees, whilst he makes the best of his way from them, and endeavours to keep them off with his Tail. But after they have bereaved him of his chiefest strength, I mean his Fins, they get into his Mouth, where they devour his Tongue, nothing being more common than to find dead Whales floating upon the Water without Tongues.

The manner of catching and killing of the Whale is perform'd thus: As soon as they espy a Whale either from the Shore or Ship, they put out three Chalops, man'd with six Men each, among whom is one who being call'd the Harpuneer, is the Person who is first to wound the Whale with his Harpun. Those three Chalops row as fast as possibly they can after the Whale, but must be very cautious they don't come too near his Tail; when they come pretty near him, they are as silent and make as little noise with their Oars as possibly they can, for fear the Whale should take to the bottom of the Sea. When they are near enough, the Harpuneer of one of these Chalops, who believes himself to be within reach, throws his Harpun at him with all his force; this Harpun is about three foot long, having on both sides Hooks or Notches to prevent its being torn out again, after it once is fixed in the Body of the Whale: it has a wooden Handle, the better to ballance it for the conveniency of throwing, and a Line fastned at the end, which being about 200 fathom long, is laid in a Vessel in the Chalop; for no sooner finds the Whale himself to be wounded, but with incredible swiftness he goes towards the bottom of the Sea; so that the Line smoaks, being rub'd against the sides of the Chalop, and would certainly take fire if the Men did not continually pour Water upon it. There is also one whose business it is to take care that the Line be not entangled; for if that should happen, they have nothing to do but to cut the Line, for else it would overset the Chalop. If they find one of the Lines fall short, those of the next Chalop furnish them with theirs, which they fasten to it: But all this would stand them in little

the Whales are brought on shore*

little stead, if the nature of this Fish were such as to be able to abide long under Water; whereas after he has run some hundred fathoms deep, he is forc'd to come up again to take breath, at what time he sends forth such a terrible sound through his Pipes, that it may be heard at half a League distance, tho some make a much greater noise than others. As soon as the Fish appears upon the surface of the Water, the Chalops pursue him, being directed by the Line which shows them the way. The Harpuneer who comes first nearest to him, throws another Harpun into his Body, which makes him once more take towards the bottom; but after he comes up again the second time, they don't make any further use of the Harpuns, but of certain small Pikes, not unlike a Lance, of which there are two sorts, throwing-Lances and pushing-Lances. The throwing-Lances resemble an Arrow, and are used much in the same manner, but have no Hooks at the end; for they are thrown into the Body of the Whale, and drawn out again, the intention of which is to tire the Fish by so many Wounds till they dare venture at him with the pushing-Lances; for whilst he is in his full strength no body dares to come near him, for whatever he hits with his Tail and Fins he batters in pieces, as has been seen sometimes in some Chalops, which have been torn in flitters, and the Men thrown up to a great height into the Air. When they find him almost tir'd, and his Strength considerably abated, they draw nearer to him, and make use of the other Lances, which resemble our Pikes; with those they wound him, but especially near the Fins, where this Creature is most sensible; and this they hold so long till they have hit his Lungs or Liver, at which time the Fish spouts out a vast quantity of Blood through the Pipes, which rises into the Air as high as the Mast: then they desist, and the Fish finding himself wounded in so sensible a part, begins to rage most furiously, battering the Sea and his Body with his Fins and Tail, till the Sea is all in a foam; and when he strikes the Fins against his Body, and his Tail at the Waves, you may hear it half a League distance, the sound being no less than if a great Cannon was discharged. This struggling affords so agreeable a Spectacle to the Beholders, that those who have seen it assure us, that they could never be tired with the sight of it. Whilst the Whale is making his last Efforts, the Chalops are obliged to follow him sometimes for two Leagues together, till having lost all his Strength he turns upon one side, and as soon as he is dead upon his back: then they draw him with Ropes either ashore (if it be near Spitsbergen) or else to the Ship, where he is kept so long till he rises above the Water; for the first day he lies almost even with the Surface of the Water, the second he rises about six or seven foot above it, and the third sometimes as high as the sides of the Ship. On board each Ship there is one whose business it is to open the Fish, who after he has put on his Garment fitted for that purpose, cuts open his Belly with a very large Knife, which is not done without a roaring noise, and an intolerable smell sent forth from the Entrails of this Beast: But notwithstanding the Man proceeds in his business, separating the Flesh from the Bones by pieces of two or three hundred weight, which are convey'd thus either ashore or on board the Vessel, where they are cut again in smaller pieces. The Tail of this Creature serves for a hacking Block, being so very nervous and strong, that it exceeds any Wood whatsoever for this use. Being thus cut into small pieces, those who have their Settlements at Spitsbergen extract the Oil immediately by boiling it ashore, which being put into Barrels, is thus transported to the respective places to which the Ships belong. But those who want this conveniency, and go only abroad to catch the Whales in the open Sea, are fain to put up those pieces in Barrels, which they carry home, and boil them after the same manner as they do at Spitsbergen; but this is of less value than the other, as having a very disagreeable scent. Each Fish is computed to afford from 60 to 100 Barrels of Oil, at three or four Pounds Sterling the Barrel, according as the Market goes. There are three Harpuneers to each Ship, every one of whom has 10 l. for every Whale that is kill'd; and sometimes one Ship catches ten Whales in a Voyage.

OF

OF THE Kingdom of Poland,

Lying between the Confines of Muscovy, and the Borders of Transylvania.

Together with their Customs, Manner of Life, and how they manage their Wars.

Written in French by the Sieur de BEAUPLAN.

THE Sieur de Beauplan, Author of this small Account, had a long time to make himself perfect in it, having serv'd, as he tells us, 17 years in the Ukraine, as Engineer to the King of Poland. He gives a particular account of the Manners of the Poles and Cossacks, with whom in so many years he could not but be extraordinary well acquainted: he describes their Persons, particularizes much upon their manner of making War, which was his Profession, sets down to a tittle the manner of the Cossacks making their Irruptions into Turkey and Tartary by way of the Black Sea, describes the Country, and particularly the River Boristhenes, with that exactness, as may be expected from a Mathematician who had view'd all those parts, and made special Observations, not only for his own curiosity, but to fulfil the duty of his Employment, which was to erect Forts, and even build Towns in convenient places. Tho he calls this only a Description of Ukraine, yet he stops not there, but sets down the manner of electing the Kings of Poland, the Greatness of their Nobility, and way of Treating in solemn Feasts. Nor is this all, but he runs into Tartary, and besides describing the Country of Crim and Budziak, takes his course quite round the Black Sea, observing all Places of note upon it, and not only acquaints us with the Manners and Customs of both those People, but very particularly informs us, how they make their Irruptions into Poland and the Ukraine, both in Summer and Winter, and how they do to avoid coming to Battel when pursu'd. Nothing is wanting, but the Map which in some places he refers to; but in a short Advertisment he informs the Reader, that all his Papers and Draughts, which it seems he had left to be engrav'd in Poland, had been there seiz'd by the King, which has depriv'd us of the Satisfaction of so exact a Map as we might reasonably expect from him.

A Description of Ukraine, and the River Boristhenes, commonly call'd the Nie- per, or Dnieper, from Kiow down to the Sea into which it falls.

K IOW, otherwise call'd Kiowia, was, one of the ancientest Citys in Europe, as may be seen still by the Remains there of Antiquity: As for instance, the height and breadth of its Ramparts, the depth of its Ditches, the ruins of Churches, the old Tombs of several Kings found within them. Of the Churches only two remain as a Memorial, which are those of S. Sophia and S. Michael; for of all the rest there is nothing left but Ruins, as of that of S. Basil, whose Walls are yet standing five or six foot high, with Greek Inscriptions on them of above 1400 Years, standing upon Alabaster Stones, but now almost worn out with Age. Along the Ruins of those Churches are to be seen the Tombs of several Princes of Russia.

The Churches of S. Sophia and S. Michael have been rebuilt after the antient manner. That of S. Sophia makes a fine Front, and looks graceful on every side, for the Walls are adorn'd with several Histories and Mosaic Figures: Which Work is made of very small Bits of several colours, shining like Glass; and so well put together, that it is hard to discern whether it is Painting or Tapestry: The Arch is made only with earthen Pots fill'd and plaister'd all about. In this Church are the Tombs of several Kings; and the Archimandrita or Chief of all the Monks reside there. S. Michael's Church is call'd the Golden Roof, because it is cover'd with gilt Plates. The Body of S. Barbara is shown there, said to be brought thither during the Wars of Nicomedia.

This antient City is seated on a Plain that is at the top of a Hill, which commands all the Country on the one side, and the Boristhenes on the other, that River running along the foot of the Hill; between which and the Water stands New Kiow, a Town at present but little inhabited, there being not above five or six thousand People in it. It is about four miles in length along the Boristhenes, and 3 miles in breadth from the Boristhenes to the Hill, being inclos'd with a scurvy Ditch 25 foot wide. Its shape is triangular, encompassed with a wooden Wall, and Towers of the same material. The Castle stands on the ridge of a Hill commanding the lower Town, but commanded by Old Kiow.

The Roman Catholicks have four Churches in this Town, which are, the Cathedral, that of the Dominicans in the Market-place, the Bernardines under the Hill, and of late Years the Jesuits, who have taken up their Quarters between the Bernardines and the River. The Greek Russians may have about ten Churches, which they call Cerkuits; one of which is near the Town-Hall, where is an University or Academy, call'd by them Bracha Cerkuits, and another at the foot of the Castle, call'd S. Nicolay: if I mistake not, the rest are in several Parts of the Town, which I don't particularly remember.

This Town has but three good Streets, all the others being neither strait nor regularly bending, but running in and out like a Labyrinth. It is look'd upon as divided into two Towns, one of which is called the Bishop's Town, where the Cathedral is; the other the Common or Publick, in which the other three Catholick and Greek Churches are. There is a good Trade, considering the Country: The principal Commodities are, Corn, Furs, Wax, Honey, Tallow, Salt, Fish, &c. There belong to it, a Bishop, a Palatin, a Castelane, a Tarosta, and a Grod. And there are four several Jurisdictions, or Courts; that of the Bishop, that of the Palatin or Tarosta, which is the same; the third of the Wloyst, and the last of the Consuls or Sheriffs.

The Houses are built after the manner of Muscovy, all upon a Floor, low enough, and seldom above one story high. They use Candles made of Sticks of Wood, so cheap, that for a Double, which is less than

than a Farthing, there are more of them than will serve the longest Winter night. The Chimneys are sold in the Market; which is very comical, as is their manner of dressing Meat. Their Weddings, and other Ceremonies, we shall speak of hereafter. And yet from hence came that brave People, known at present by the name of Zaporousky Cossacks, spread of late Years into so many Places along Boristhenes, and the neighbouring Parts, whose number at present amounts to 120000 disciplin'd Men, and ready in less than eight days upon the least command they receive from the King. These are the People, who very often, and almost every Year, make excursions upon the Euxine Sea, to the great detriment of the Turks. They have several times plunder'd the Crim Tartary, ravag'd Anatolia, sack'd Trebisond, and run to the Mouth of the Black Sea, within three Leagues of Constantinople, where they have put all to Fire and Sword, and then return'd home with a rich Booty, and some Slaves, which are generally young Children whom they breed up to serve them, or present them to some Lord of their Country; for they keep none that are grown up, unless they think them rich enough to pay a good Ransom. They are never more than between six and ten thousand Men when they make their Ravages, and cross the Sea miraculously in pitiful Boats they make themselves, and of whose shape and structure I shall speak hereafter.

Having mention'd the Bravery of the Cossacks, it will not be amiss to give an account of their Manners and Employment. It is therefore to be understood, that among those People in general there are Men expert in all sorts of Trades necessary for human Life, as House and Ship-Carpenters, Cartwrights, Smiths, Armourers, Tanners, Curriers, Shoemakers, Coopers, Tailors, &c. They are very expert at preparing of Salt-peter, whereof there is great plenty in those Parts, and make excellent Cannon-Powder. The Women spin Flax and Wool, whereof they make Cloth and Stuffs for their own use. They all understand Tilling, Sowing, Reaping, making of Bread, dressing of Meal, brewing of Beer, making of Hydromel, Breha, Aqua Vita, &c. There is no body among them, of what Age, Sex, or Condition soever, that does not strive to outdo another in drinking, and carousing effectually; and no Christians trouble themselves less for to morrow than they do.

There is no doubt but all of them in general are capable of all Arts; yet some are more expert than others in certain Professions, and others there are more universally knowing than the common sort. In short, they are all ingenious enough, but they go no further than what is necessary and profitable, particularly in Country Affairs.

The Land is so fruitful, it often produces such plenty of Corn, they know not what to do with it, because they have no navigable Rivers that fall into the Sea, except the Boristhenes, which is not navigable 50 Leagues below Kiom, or Kiovia, by reason of 13 Falls on it, the last of which is seven Leagues distant from the first, which makes a good days Journey, as may be seen in the Map. This it is that hinders them carrying their Corn to Constantinople, and is the cause of their sloth, and that they will not work but just when Necessity obliges them, and that they have not wherewithal to buy what they stand in need of, chusing rather to borrow of the Turks, their good Neighbours, than to take pains to earn it. So they have Meat and Drink, they are satisfy'd.

They are of the Greek Church, which ^{Their} in their Language they call Rus; have ⁱⁿ great veneration for Festivals, and Fast-ing-days, which take up eight or nine Months of the Year, and consist in abstaining from Flesh. They are so positive in this Formality, that they believe their Salvation depends on this distinction of Meats: and I believe there is no Nation in the World like this for liberty in Drinking; for no sooner is one drunken Fit off, but they take a Hair of the same Dog. But this is to be understood when they are at leisure; for whilst they are in War, or projecting some Enterprize, they are extraordinary sober. Nothing belonging to them is so coarse as their Habit, for they are subtil and crafty, ingenious and free-hearted, without any design or thought of growing Rich; but are great lovers of their Liberty, without which they do not desire to live: and for this reason it is, they are so subject to revolt, and rebel against the Lords of the Country, when they see themselves crush'd, so that they are scarce seven or eight Years without mutinying against them. In other respects they are a faithless People, treacherous, perfidious, and not to be trusted but upon good Security.

They are of a strong Constitution, able to endure Heat and Cold, Hunger and Thirst Thirst; indefatigable in War, bold, resolute, or rather rash, not valuing their Lives.

They show most Valour and Conduct when they fight in their  Tabords*, and cover'd with their Carts (for they are very expert at their Fire-arms, their usual Weapons) and in defending strong Places. At Sea they are not bad, nor very good a Horseback. I remember I have seen two hundred Polish Horse, rout two thousand of their best Men: True it is, a hundred of these Cossacks, under the shelter of their Tabords, do not fear a thousand Polanders, nor as many Tartars; and were they as brave a Horseback as they are afoot, I should think them invincible. They are well made, strong and sinewy; love to be well clad, and make it appear when they have been plundering among their Neighbours, for otherwise their Garments are indifferent enough. Naturally they are very healthy, and free enough even from that Distemper peculiar to Poland, which the Physicians call Blica, because all the Hair of the Head is sensible of it, tangles and clots together in a most unaccountable manner; the People of the Country call it Gsches. Few there die of Sickness, as they be of a very great Age, most of them dying in the Bed of Honour, being kill'd in War.

The Nobility among them, whereof there is but a very small number, hold of that of Poland, and seems to be assum'd to be of any other Religion but the Catholick, to which they daily go over; tho' all the great Men, and those that are call'd Princes, are come out of the Greek Church.

The Peasants there are very miserable, being oblig'd to work three days a Week, themselves and their Horses, for their Lord; and to pay, proportionably to the Land they hold, such a quantity of Wheat, abundance of Capons, Pullets, Hens, and Goslings; that is, at Easter, Whitson-tide, and Christmas: Besides all this, to carry Wood for the said Lord, and a thousand other Jobs they ought not to do; besides the ready Money they exact from them, as also the Tithe of their Sheep, Swine, Honey, and all sorts of Fruit, and every third Year the third Beef. In short, they are oblig'd to give their Masters what they please to demand; so that it is no wonder those Wretches never lay up any thing, being under such hard Circumstances. Yet this is not all, for their Lords have an absolute Power, not only over their Goods, but their Lives, so great is the Prerogative of the Polish Nobility (who live as if they were in Heaven, and the Peasants in Purgatory) so that if it happens that those wretched Peasants fall under the servitude of bad Lords, they are in a worse condition than Galley-slaves. This Slavery makes many of them run away, and the boldest of them fly to the Zaporouys; which is the Cossacks place of retreat in the Boristhenes; and after having pass'd some time there, and been once at Sea, they are reputed Zaporousky Cossacks; and this sort of desertion much increases the number of their Troops. This the present Revolt sufficiently testifies, these Cossacks after the defeat of the Polanders, rising in Rebellion to the number of 200000; who being Masters of the Field, have possess'd themselves of a Country above 120 Leagues in length, and 60 in breadth. I had forgot to observe, that in time of Peace, Hunting and Fishing are the usual Employments of the Cossacks; and this is what I had to say in general of the Manners and Customs of these People.

Now to return to the Matter in hand: The Country along the River Boristhenes. It is believ'd that at the time when the antient Kiow, or Kiovia, was in its splendor, the Channel in the Sea which runs to Constantinople was not open; and there are grounds to conjecture, or rather certain proofs, that the Plains on the other side the Boristhenes, which stretch out as far as Muscovy, were once all under Water, as appears by the Anchors, and other Tokens found of late Years about Lofficza, upon the River Sula. Moreover, all the Towns built on those Plains, seem to be new Structures erected within some few Centuries. I had the curiosity to inquire into the Historys of the Russians, thinking to learn something concerning the Antiquity of those Parts, but without success; for having ask'd some of the most knowing among them, I could only be inform'd that the great and bloody Wars which have always harass'd their Country from end to end, had not spar'd their Libraries, which even from the beginning had been burnt; but that they remembered it was deliver'd to them by antient Tradition, that formerly the Sea cover'd all those Plains, as has been said, which was about 2000 Years since; and that it was about 900 Years since Old Kiow had been totally ruin'd, excepting those two Churches before mention'd. Another powerful Reason is alledg'd to prove that the Sea extended as far as Muscovy, which is, that all

~~~~~ all the Ruins of old Castles and antient
Beau- Towns in those parts are upon high places, and Mountains, and not so much as plan. one on the Plain, which gives cause to believe it was under water. Besides all this, in some of those Ruins there have been found Cellars full of a sort of Copper Coin with this Impression.

However it was, I shall only add, that all the Plain reaching from the Boristhenes to Muscovy, and further, is very low and Sandy, except only the Northern Bank of Sula, and those of Worsko, and Psczol, as may be seen much better in the Map. It is further to be observ'd, that the motion of these Rivers is almost undiscernable, and much like a standing water: and if you add all these reasons to the violent and rapid motion of the Channel in the Black Sea, which running before Constantinople falls into the White-Sea, you will find it no difficult matter to grant that these places have been formerly under water.

Let us go on with the description of our Boristhenes. A League above Kiow, and on the other side of it, the River Desna falls into the Boristhenes, which comes from near the City Moscko, and is above 100 Leagues in length.

Half a League below Kiow is a Burrough, and in it a great Monastery, the usual Residence of the Metropolitan, or Patriarch. Under the Mountain, that is, near the Monastery, there are abundance of Caves in the nature of Mines, full of great number of Bodies, preserv'd there these 1500 Years, in the nature of the Egyptian Mummies. It is believ'd the Primitive Christian Hermits dig'd those Subterraneous places to serve God there in private, and liv'd peaceably in those Caverns during the Heathen Persecutions. There they show a certain S. John, who is intire down to the Waste, being so far bury'd in the Ground. The Religious Men of that Place told me, that the said S. John finding the hour of his Death draw near, dig'd his own Grave, not at length after the usual manner, but in depth. His time being come, for which he had long before prepar'd, and having taken leave of his Brethren, he put himself into the Earth; but Divine Providence so ordain'd it, that he could go but half way in, tho the Hole was deep enough. There is also to be seen one Helen, whom they hold in great veneration, and an Iron Chain, wherewith they say the Devil beat S. Antony; and that it has the virtue of expelling those wicked Spirits out of such Bodies as are bound with it. There are also three Mens Heads on Dishes, from which there daily distills an Oil of Sovereign use for curing of certain Distempers. In those places are kept also the Bodies of several Persons of Note, and among the rest those of twelve Masters, who built the Church; and these are preserv'd like so many precious Relicks to be shown to curious Persons, as they did to me several times; I having once my Winter Quarters at Kiow, where I had leisure to learn all these particulars. For my part, as I said before, I find no great difference between these Bodies and the Egyptian Mummies, but that their Flesh is neither so black, nor so hard; and I believe it is the Nature of those Caves or Mines that preserves them from corruption, they being of a sort of petrify'd Sand, hot and dry in Winter, and cold and dry in Summer, without any dampness. There are abundance of Monks in that Monastery, where, as has been said, the Patriarch of all Russia resides, and owns no Superiour but him of Constantinople. Before this Monastery there is another where a great many Nuns live, to the number of a hundred, who work at their Needle, and make abundance of fine Works on curious Handkerchiefs, to sell to those that come to visit them. They have the liberty to go abroad when they will, and their usual Walk is to Kiow, about half a League distant from their Monastery. Their Habit is all Black, and they go two and two together, as most Catholick Religious Men do. I remember I have seen as fine Faces among those Nuns as any in all Poland.

On the Mountain that looks towards the River between Kiow and Piecharre, there is a Monastery of Russian Monks, which has a very fine Prospect, and is call'd S. Nicoly. Those Monks eat nothing but Fish, but they have the liberty to go abroad when they please, to divert themselves, and make Visits.

In a Bottom under Piecharre, is a Burrough which they call Tripoly.

Below that is Stayky on the top of a Mountain; the Town is antient, and there is a Ferry-boat to pass over the River. Then

Then follows Richow seated in the same manner on a Mountain. This is a place of consequence, and deserves to be fortify'd, because the River there is easy to pass.

Lower yet is Trctemirof a Monastery of Russians, seated amidst Precipices, encompass'd with inaccessible Rocks. Thither it is the Cossacks convey their best Goods; there is another Ferry over the River.

A League from thence, on the other side, you come to Pereaslav, a Town that seems not to be very antient, because standing low, yet very considerable for its situation, naturally strong, and there might easily be built a considerable Citadel, to serve as a place of Arms against the Muscovites and Cossacks. The place has about 6000 Houses, and the Cossacks keep a Regiment there.

Lower towards Russia is Kaniow, a very antient Town and Castle, in which a Regiment of Cossacks always keeps Garrison, and there is a Ferry.

Below still on the other side are Bobunska, and Domonton, places of small note.

Lower yet, and still on the side of Russia, stands Cirkacre a very antient City, well seated, and easy to be fortify'd. I have seen it in its splendor, when it was in a manner the Center of the Cossacks places of refuge, the General residing there; but we burnt it in the Year 1637, on the 18th of December, two days after we had gain'd a Victory over the said Cossacks. During that War they kept a Regiment of theirs in this place, and here is a Ferry upon the River.

Further yet are Borowiche, Bougia, Voronowka; and on the other side Czerwin, about a quarter of a League from Ambrowa; as also Krilow, on the Russian side upon the River Itazemien, a League from the Borisshenes.

Lower still on the side of Muscovy is Kremierkzow; there are some antient Ruins, on which I design'd a Castle in the Year 1635. This place is very pleasant and convenient to live in, and is the last Town, for beyond it is all a Desert Country.

A League below it is the mouth of Pseckol, a River abounding in Fish; and beyond it on the side of Russia is a little River they call Omelnick, which falls into the Borisshenes, and is very full of Crayfish. Lower on the same side is another little River, call'd Drug Omielnik, like the other very full of Crayfish. Opposite to it is Worsko, a good large River, abounding in Fish, and runs into the Nieper; and on the same side is Orel, still richer in Fish than the others. At the mouth of this River it was I saw above 2000 Fishes taken at one draught of a Net, the least of which was a foot long.

On the other side, which is next Russia, there are several Lakes, so very full of Fish, that the great quantity which dies for want of room in that standing water, causes an extraordinary corruption, which infects the very Water. They call those places Zamokam, about which I have seen Dwarf Cherry-trees two foot and a half high, or thereabout, which bear very sweet Cherries, as big as Plums, but are not ripe till the beginning of August. There are whole Thickets of these little Cherry-trees, very thick, and sometimes half a League in length, but not above two or three hundred paces over. It is pleasant at that time of the Year to see those little Groves of Cherry-trees, whereof there are many in the Plains, and for the most part in the bottom of Valleys. There are also abundance of Dwarf Almond-trees, but wild, and the Fruit very bitter; nor are there such numbers as to make one of those little Woods, as there is of the Cherries, which are as good as if they were cultivated. I must confess that my curiosity prevailing with me to transplant some of those Cherry and Almond-trees to Bar, my usual place of Residence, the Fruit grew bigger, and better relish'd, and the Tree outgrew its natural smallness. Above those places is a small River, call'd Demokant, full of Crayfish, above nine Inches long. There they gather Water-nuts, which are like Water-Colthropes, very good to eat boil'd.

Lower still is Romanow, which is a sort of a Mount where the Cossacks sometimes meet to consult together, and bring their Troops into a Body. It would be a convenient and pleasant place to build a Town.

Below this is an Island half a League long, and 150 Paces over, which in Spring is overflow'd, they call it Romanow; several Fishermen from Kiow and other places put in there. At the end of this Island, the River has its full breadth, without being any more divided or stop'd by Islands. For which reason the Tartars are not afraid to pass over there, being in no danger of Ambushes, especially above the Island.

Lower still on the Russian side, is a place call'd Tarenski Rog, one of the pleasantest I ever saw to live in, and of great consequence to build a Fort, which would command the River; for there it has its plan. full breadth, and is not above 200 paces over, and I remember I shot a Carabine which carried from one Bank to the other. The farther Bank is somewhat higher, and is call'd Socogura; to add to the conveniency of the place, it is all encompass'd with Channels abounding in Fish, which run among the Islands.

Below is the Island of the Monastery all hemm'd in with Rocks and very high, with Precipices all round 25 or 30 foot high, save only towards the upper end, where it is lower, and for that reason it is never overflow'd. There was formerly a Monastery in it, whence the Name was given it. Were not this Island commanded from the shore, it would be good living there; the length of it is about 1000 paces, the breadth 80 or 100: In it there are abundance of Snakes and other Serpents.

Next is Konesky Ostro, near three quarters of a League long, and a quarter over at the upper end, full of Woods and Bogs, and flooded in Spring. In this Island there are abundance of Fishermen, who for want of Salt preserve their Fish with Ashes, and dry a great deal. They fish in the River Samar, which on the other side falls into the Nieper, upon the right of the upper end of Konesky Ostro. This River of Samar and its Territory is very considerable, not only for its plenty of Fish, but for the Honey, Wax, Deer, and Wood for building, whereof it has greater store than any other. Thence was brought all the Wood used to build Kudak, of which place we shall soon speak. This River runs very slow because of its windings; the Cossacks call it the Holy River, perhaps on account of its Fruitfulness. I have seen Herrings and Sturgeon caught there in the Spring, for there are none at any other time.

Below the end of Konesky Ostro, is Knarow Ostro, a little Island all of solid Rock about 5 or 600 paces long, and 100 broad, free from being flooded, as is Koracky Ostro still lower, all Rock too, without Wood, but full of Snakes.

Within Cannon-shot lower is Kudak, which is the first Porouy, that is, a ridge of Rocks running quite cross the River, and hindering Navigation. There is a Fort which I caus'd to be erected in July 1635. but in August following, after I was gone, one Solyman General of certain rebellious Cossacks, in his return from the Sea, perceiving that Castle obstructed his return into the Country, surpriz'd it, and cut the Garrison in pieces, which then consisted of about 200 Men under the Command of Col. Marcon: and Solyman, after taking and plundering the Fort, return'd with the Cossacks to Zaporouy; yet they continued not long Masters of it, being besieg'd and taken by the other Loyal Cossacks, under the Command of the Great Koniespolsky Castellan of Cracosky; and lastly, that General of the Rebels was taken with all his Followers, and carried to Warsaw, where he was quarter'd. The Polanders afterwards neglected that Fort, which made the Cossacks insolent, and gave them the means to revolt in the year 1637. when we met them, being 18000 strong, in their Tabort at Komaiky, on the 16th of December the same year, about noon; and tho our Army consisted but of 4000 fighting Men, we fell on and routed them. The Fight lasted till Midnight, of them about 6000 were kill'd upon the spot, and five pieces of Cannon taken; the rest escap'd by the assistance of the Night then very dark, leaving us masters of the Field. We lost about 100 Men, and had 1000 wounded, and among them several Commanders. Monsieur de Morueil a French Gentleman, who as Lieutenant Colonel lost his Life, together with his Ensign. Captain Juskesby was kill'd, and the Lieutenant, Monsieur la Crofade, besides several other Strangers. After this Defeat the War with the Cossacks lasted till October following, and then Peace was concluded. That Great and Noble Koniespolsky went in Person to Kudak with 4000 Men, and continued there till the Fort was made tenable, which was done in a month, or thereabouts: Then the General went away, carrying along with him 2000 Men, and commanded me with some Forces and pieces of Cannon to take a view of the Country as far as the last Porouys, and at my return order'd me to come up the River in their Boats with my Lord Ostrorok Great Chamberlain, which gave me the opportunity of seeing thirteen Falls of the Water, and of making the Map as you see it. In those parts 100 Men nor 1000 do not travel in safety; nor ought Armies to march but in good order, for those Plains are the usual abode of the Tartars, who having no settled place to be in, are continually ranging up and down those vast Plains, and never go fewer than 5 or 6000, and sometimes 10000 in a body. We leave it to another place to give an account of their Manners, and way of making War. In this place I will only say, that I have seen and observ'd all the 13 Falls, and pass'd over them all in one single Boat, going going up the River, which at first sight seems impossible; some of those Falls we have made way through, being 7 or 8 foot high; judg whether those were not places to ply the Oars. Among them none can be admitted as a Cossack, that has not gone up all the Porouys; so that by their rule I may be a Cossack, and that is the Honour I acquir'd by that Voyage.

To give you the true definition of the word Porouy, I must inform you that it is a Russian word signifying a Stone or Rock; and this Porouy is a ridg of such Stones reaching quite cross the River, whereof some are under Water, others level with the surface, and others 8 or 10 foot above it. They are as big as a House, and very close to one another, so that it resembles a Dam or Bank to stop the course of the River, which then falls down five or six foot in some places, and six or seven in others, according as the Boristhenes is swoln. For in Spring when the Snow melts, all the Porouys are cover'd with Water, except the seventh, call'd Nienastites, which alone obstructs Navigation at that time of the year. In Summer and Autumn when the Waters are very low, the Falls are sometimes 10 or 15 foot; and between these 13 Falls there is but one place, which is betwixt Budilou the 10th and Tawolzan the 11th, where the Tartars can swim over, the Banks there being very easy to get up. In all the distance from the first to the last Porouy, I observ'd but two Islands that are not flooded: The first is athwart the fourth Fall call'd Strelczi, which is all Rock 30 foot high, all Precipices quite round; it is about 580 paces long, and 70 or 80 over: I know not whether there is any Water in it, for no Creature goes into it but the Birds, yet all about it is cover'd with wild Vines. The second is much bigger, all Rock too, but not so full of Precipices as the other. The place is naturally strong and pleasant to dwell in. In this Island there grows abundance of Tavala, which is a red Wood as hard as box, whose quality is to make Horses hale. The Island is call'd Tawolzany, the name of the 11th Fall, as has been said before. The 13th Porouy is call'd Wolny, and is a very convenient place to build either a Town or Fort.

A Cannon-shot above it is a little Rocky Island call'd by the Cossacks Kaczawanicz, which signifies boiling of Millet, to express their satisfaction for being come down all the Falls in safety; therefore they feast in this little Island, and it is with Millet that they treat themselves on their Voyages.

Below Kaczawanicz, and as far as Kuockosow, there are pleasant places to inhabit. Kuockosow is a little River which falls into the Nieper or Boristhenes on the side of Tartary, and which gives Name to a Neck of Land enclosed by the said Boristhenes, and hemm'd in by two inaccessible Precipices, as appears in the Map, so that there is no coming at it but on the Land-side through a place about 2000 paces in breadth and low enough. It were need only to close up this place to make a fine strong Town. It is true that the ground not being plain, it makes a sort of hollow, so that the Tartar Banks command these places, and they again command the Tartar Banks. These places are very high, the River is there free and undivided, and very narrow, especially towards the South, which you will find mark'd down in the Map by pricks. Those are the narrowest parts I have so mark'd, and I have seen Polanders with a Bow shoot across the River, and the Arrow has fallen above 100 paces beyond the Bank. There is the best and safest Ford the Tartars have, for there the Channel cannot be above 150 paces over; the Banks are easy, and the Country open, so that they have no Ambushes to fear: This Pass is also call'd Kuiskosow. Half a League lower is the head of Chortizca, but I having gone no further on that side, shall only tell you what I learn'd by information from others, and therefore I do not deliver it as undeniable. They say that Island is considerable because of its great height, and being almost hemm'd in with Precipices, therefore not very accessible. It is two Leagues in length, and half a League in breadth, especially towards the upper end, for it grows narrower and lower towards the West: it is not subject to Floods, has abundance of Oaks, and would be a very good place to build a Town, which would be as it were a Watch-tower over the Tartars. Below this Island the River grows very wide.

Below it is Wielshy Ostro, an Island two Leagues long, and all plain; it is of no great consequence, because in Spring it is flooded, only about the middle, where there remains a place dry of about 1500 or 2000 Paces Diameter. Opposite to this Island on the Tartar side there rises a River which falls into the Nieper, and is call'd Konsekawoda, very rapid, makes a Channel apart, and holds its own till two Leagues below the Island of Tawolzan.

along the Tartar Banks; sometimes it breaks out of the River, then returns to it again, leaving great Banks of Sand between its course and the Nieper.

Tomahowka is an Island about the third part of a League diameter, or thereabouts, almost round, very high and lofty, like a half Globe, all cover'd with Wood: From the top of it may be seen all the Nieper from Chortika to Tawan. This Island is very pleasant, I could not learn after what manner the Banks of it are, but that it is nearer Russia than Tartary. Ckemistky had made choice of this place for his Retreat when he was threatned with a Siege, and it was there they began to rendezvous when they rebell'd and took the field in May 1648. and won the Battle on the 26th of May near Korsum.

A little below the River of Czertomelik about the middle of the Nieper is a pretty big Island, with some Ruins. It is encompass'd by above 10000 other Islands, lying every way in very confuse and irregular manner, some of them dry, others fenny; besides they are all covered with great Reeds like Pikes, which obstructs seeing the Channels that part them: and into those confuse places the Cossacks make their retreat, which they call Skarbniza Woyskowa, that is, the Treasure of the Army. All these Islands are drowned in Spring, and only the place on which the Ruins are remains dry. The River is full a League between the two Banks. In these places it is that all the Power of the Turks can do no good; many Turkish Gallies have been lost there as they pursu'd the Cossacks returning from the Black Sea: for being got into this Labyrinth, they could not find their way back. and the Cossacks with their Boats play'd upon them, drawing them in athwart the Reeds. Ever since then the Gallies do not go up the River above four or five Leagues. It is believ'd that there are many pieces of Cannon in Scobnicza Woyskowa, hid there by the Cossacks in the Channels, and none of the Poles could find them out: for besides that they do not go unto those parts, the Cossacks who are very close will not reveal the Secret to them, and there are but few Cossacks that know it. All the Cannon they take from the Turks they sink; nay their Money is hid there too, and they only take it out as they have occasion, every Cossack having his particular hiding-place. For after pillaging among the Turks they divide the Spoil, when they return to these parts; then every one hides his little Concern, as has been said, that is, such things as will not decay under Water.

In these places they make their Cholms, Cholms that is, Boats to cross the Sea, which are about sixty foot long, ten or twelve in breadth, and eight in depth, with two Rudders, as we shall show in their Draught.

Kair is an Island five or six Leagues long, all plain, and cover'd partly with Reeds, and partly with Willows: when the Channel runs on the Russian side, the Island is larger towards Tartary. The West side is never drowned.

Wieleky Woda, that is, the great Water opposite to Skorouke, where there are but few Islands, and in the midst of the River an empty space without any.

Nofokouka is an Island above two Leagues long, without any Wood, and drowned in Spring. The Tartars pass over across this Island, as they do across Kair Kosmaka, which is but half a League. Betwixt this Island and Russia is a Channel call'd Kosmaka, down which the Cossacks slip when they go to Sea, for fear of being discover'd by the Guard kept at the antient Ruins of the Castle of Aslan Korodick upon the Strait of Tawan, for there the Turks always keep Guard.

Tawan is a streight and great Passage of the Tartars, because there the River runs all clear without interruption, and is not above 500 paces over. The Russian side is very high and steep, but the other Bank is low, which is the Island of Tawan, yet not subject to be drowned, and is a proper place to erect a Fort, to curb the Cossacks, and prevent their going to Sea. The River runs altogether, that is, it makes but one Channel till two Leagues below, where it begins to spread and make Islands and Channels again.

The Island of Tawan is about two Leagues and a half long, and a third part of a League over. The Channel between the said Island and Tartary is Konskawoda, whereof we have spoken. When the River is not swollen, it is fordable; about half the Island floods on the West-side.

The Island Kosaky is about half a League long, but drowned.

The Island Burbanka about the same length, and flooded, but is a place where the Tartars pass over, tho there are three Channels there, viz. the Konskawoda, and the Dnieper twice, and none of these Channels are fordable.

Between Kuockasow and Orzakow there are five places where the Tartars may pass over.

A Description of Crim Tartary.

Now let us relate how the Tartars enter Poland in Summer, being generally but 10 or 12000 strong, because if they came in a greater number, they would be too soon discover'd. Thus it is.

When they are within 20 or 30 Leagues of the Frontiers, they divide their Army into 10 or 12 Squadrons, each of them containing about 1000 Horse: Five or six of these Troops they send to the right, about a League or a League and a half distant from one another; the other five or six Squadrons doing the same on the left, that their Front may extend 10 or 12 Leagues, sending out careful Scouts above a League before them to get intelligence, that they may know how to proceed. In this manner they travel athwart, keeping close together, appointing to meet again upon a day prefix'd at a certain place of rendezvous, two or three Leagues from the Frontiers, like several Beams joining in one common Center. The reason why they march in several distinct Bodies, is, that if the Cossacks, who lie two or three Leagues out in the Plains as Sentinels to observe their motions, should spy them, they may not judg them to be so great a number, being able to give an account but of the Squadron they see. For these Cossacks having discover'd the Tartars at a distance, immediately retire to alarm the Country, and seeing but 1000 or thereabouts, are not much frighted at that number, but are surpriz'd some days after they have receiv'd the News. The Tartars enter upon the Frontier after this manner, they run along between two great Rivers, and always keep the upper Country, seeking the heads of little Rivers that fall into the great ones, some into one and some into another: by this means they meet with no Obstruction in their Inroads, plunder and ravage as the others do in Winter, but never go above 10 or 12 Leagues up the Country, and immediately return. At most they stay but two days in the Country, and then retire as we said before, divide the Spoil, and every one returns home.

These Tartars are Libertines, who obey neither the Cham nor Turk, and live in Budziak, which is a Plain lying between the mouths of the Niester and the Danube, as was said before, where in my time there were at least 20000 of them that had fled, or were banish'd thither. They are braver than the Tartars that dwell in Crim-Tartary, being better exercis'd, and daily upon Action: They are also better mounted than the others. The Plains lying between Budziak and the Ukrain are generally stor'd with 8 or 10000 Tartars, who live divided in Troops of about 1000 each, 10 or 12 Leagues asunder, to seek their fortune: and because of the danger there is in crossing those Plains, the Cossacks go in Tabort, that is, they travel in the middle of their Carts, which march in two Files on their Flanks, eight to see such multitudes together. Thus these mighty Armies march, halting every hour, about half a quarter of an hour, to give their Horses time to Stall; and they are so well manag'd, that they do it as soon as they stop; then the Tartars alight and piss too. They remount immediately, and go on, all which is done only by the Signal of a Whistle; and when they are come within three or four Leagues of the Borders, they lie still two or three days in some place chosen on purpose, where they think they are conceal'd; there they give out Orders, and refresh their Army, which they dispose in this manner. They divide it into three parts, two thirds are to compose one Body, the other third is subdivided into two parts, each of these two making a Wing, one on the right, the other on the left. In this order they enter the Country. The main Body moves slowly (which in their Language they call Choche) with the Wings, but continually without halting day or night, allowing but an hour to refresh, till they are got sixty or eighty Leagues into the Country without doing any harm. But as soon as they begin to march back, the Body holds the same pace: then the General dismisses the two Wings, which have liberty each on its own side to stray ten or twelve Leagues from the main Body, but that is to be understood half of the way forward, and the other half Sideways. I had almost forgot to say, that each Wing, which may consist of eight or ten thousand Men, is again subdivided into ten or twelve Squadrons, of five or six hundred Men each, who run up and down to the Villages, encompass them, making four Corps de Garde about each Village, and great Fires all the night, for fear any Peasant should escape them: then they fall to Pillaging and Burning, kill all that make any resistance, and take and carry away all that submit, not only Men, Women, and Sucking Babes, but the Cattel, Horses, Cows, Oxen, Sheep, Goats, &c. As for the Swine, they drive and shut them up in a Barn or such like place, and fire the four corners, so great is the loathing they have for those Creatures. The Wings being allow'd to stray but ten or twelve Leagues (as has been said) return with their Booty to their main Body, which is easily done; for they leave a great track, marching above fifty in front, so that they have nothing to do but to follow; and in four or five hours they join their Body again, where as soon as they are come, two other Wings consisting of the like number as the former go out on the right and left to make much the same havock: then they come in, and two others go out, and so continue their Excursions without ever diminishing their Body, which, as has been mention'd, makes two thirds of the Army, and move gently, to be always in breath, and ready to fight the Polish Army, if they should meet it, tho their design is not to meet but avoid it, as near as possible. They never return the same way they broke in, but take a compass the better to escape the Polish Army: for they always fight in their own defence, nay and they must be forced to it, without they knew themselves to be ten to one; and yet would they consider of before they fell on, for these Robbers (so we may call the Tartars) do not enter Poland to fight, but to pillage and rob by way of Surprise. When the Polanders meet them, they make work, forcing them to get home faster than their usual pace. At other times after they have sufficiently stray'd, plunder'd and rob'd they enter upon the Desert Plains in the Frontiers, thirty or forty Leagues in length; and being in that place of safety make a great halt, recovering breath and putting themselves into order, they were in any confusion on account of meeting the Polanders.

That day seve'night they bring together all their Booty, which consists Slaves and Cattel, and divide it among themselves. It is a sight would grieve the most stony heart to see a Husband parted from his Wife, and the Mother from her Daughter, without hopes ever seeing one another, being fallen into miserable Slavery under Mahomet Infidels, who use them inhumanly. The brutish Nature causing them to commit thousand Enormities, as ravishing Maids, forcing of Women in the sight of their Parents and Husbands, and circumcising their Children in their presence to devote them to Mahomet. In short, it would move the most insensible to compassion, to hear the cries and lamentations of those wretched Russians; those People sing and roar when they are sold. These poor Creatures are dispers'd several ways, some for Constantinople, some for Crim Tartary, and some for Anatolia, &c.

Thus the Tartars gather and carry away above 50000 Souls in less than a few night: thus they use their Slaves while they have shar'd them, and then sell them if they think fit, when they return to their Country.

Wine and Brandy. The Horse's Fat they mix with Millet or Barley, or Buckwheat Meal, for they lose nothing; and of the Hide they make Thongs, Bridles, Saddles, Whips (being skilful at all these Trades) to put on their Horses, for they wear no Spurs. Those that do not go to War, eat as it happens, or according to the season, Ewe, Ram, Kid, Hens, and other Fowl, (as for Swines-flesh, they eat none of it no more than the Jews) if they can get Meal, they bake Cakes in the Embers; and their most common food is Millet, Barley, and Buckwheat Meal. These sorts of Grain are sow'd among them, and they eat Rice brought from abroad. As for Fruit they have very little, but Honey is common among them, and they are great lovers of it, and make a sort of Drink, but not boil'd, so that it causes terrible Gripes. Those that dwell in Towns are more civiliz'd, they make Bread somewhat like ours; their common Drink is Breba, made of boil'd Millet. This Liquor is as thick as Milk, and will make a Man drunk. They also drink Brandy brought them from Constantinople. There is another sort of Liquor which the Poor who cannot buy Breba, make thus: They put Cows, Sheeps, and Goats Milk into a Churn, and churn it very well, make a little Butter, and keep the Butter-milk to drink; but this soon growing sour, they make it fresh every day. They are a sober People, eat little Salt with their Meat, but a great deal of Spice, and among the rest Guinea Pepper. They make another sort of Liquor, like that us'd by the People of Madagascar, which is when they boil their Meat with a little Salt without Skimming, as has been said, they keep the Broth, and call it Chourbe, warming it when they drink. When they roast, they spit a whole Ewe or Ram; when roasted, they cut it out into pieces a Foot long, and four Inches broad. Thus those People feed.

Since we have said how they live in the Field, we will now give an account how they enter an Enemy's Country to pillage, and burn and carry away Slaves.

When the Cham, their Lord, receives Orders from the Grand Signior to break into Poland, he with all Expedition gathers his Troops, that is, 80000 Men, when he goes in Person, for at other times their Armies consist but of 40 or 50000 Men, when a Morza commands them. Their Irruptions are generally about the beginning of January, but always in Winter, that they may meet with no obstacles in their way, and that the Rivers and Marshes may not hinder them from ranging wheresoever they are directed. Being assembled and muster'd, they advance; but the Reader must observe, that the Crim Tartary lies between 46 and 47 Degrees of North Latitude, yet the Desert Plains that lie North of them, are cover'd all the Winter with Snow till March, and this encourages them to undertake such a long course, because their Horses are not shod, and the Snow saves their Feet, which could not be were the Ground bare, for the hardness of the Frost would batter their hoofs. The greatest and richest Men among them shoo their Horses with Horn, and fasten it to the Hoof with Leather, but that is not lasting; for which reason they dread a Winter when the Snow does not lie, and the Frost, where their Horses that are best shod will slip. Their Marches are but short, generally about six French Leagues, and so move on day after day, laying their business so that they may be back before the Frost breaks, and make their Retreat in safety. Thus they come to the Frontiers of Poland, still travelling along the Valleys they are acquainted with, and which seem to succeed one another: and this they do to secure themselves in the open Country, and prevent being repuls'd by the Cossacks who lie in wait in several places to discover when they come, and what way they take, to alarm the Country. But the Tartars are so cunning, as I observ'd, that they travel through the deep Valleys only, and at Night when they encamp, they make no fire; for the same reason they send out parties to discover, and endeavour to take some Cossacks that may give them intelligence of their Enemies: so the watchfullest and cunningst surprizes his Enemy. Thus the Tartars march 100 in front, that is 300 Horses, for every one of them leads two, which serve for relays, as has been said before: their Front may extend 800 or 1000 Paces, and they are 800 or 1000 in File, which reaches three long Leagues, or four when they keep close, for at other times they extend above ten Leagues. This is wonderful to those that have not seen it, for 80000 Tartars make up above 200000 Horses: Trees are not thicker in the Woods than Horses are at that time in the Field; and to see them at a distance, they look like a Cloud rising in the Horizon, which increases as it rises, and strikes a terror into the boldest, I mean those who are not us'd to

Crim Tar- We shall take notice of two sorts of Tartars, the one call'd Haysky, and the other Crimsky; these last are of that Peninsula we have mention'd, in the Black-Sea, commonly call'd Scythia Taurica. But those of Nabaysky are divided into two sorts, that is the great Nabaysky, and the little Nabaysky, both of them inhabiting between the River Don, and that of Kuban, but moving, and as it were Savage; part of them are subject to the Cham, or King of Crim Tartary, and others to the Muscovites. There are some of them subject to no body. These Tartars are not of so generous a Temper as those of Crim Tartary, nor these so brave as those of Budziak. They are cloth'd after this manner, they wear a short Shirt of Cotton, which reaches but half a foot below their Waste, Drawers and close Cloth Breeches, and the common sort of Cotton Cloth pink'd; the finest among them have a Cassetan of pink'd Cotton Cloth, and over it a Cloth Gown, lin'd with Fox-skins, or Sables, their Cap of the same, and their Boots of Red Turky Leather without Spurs.

Their Ha- The common sort wear only a Cassock of Sheep-skins, with the Wool outwards in hot or rainy Weather; and to meet them unexpectedly in the Field in this Garb is frightful, for a Man would take them for White Bears a Horseback. But in Winter and cold Weather, they turn their Cassock, wearing the Wool on the inside, and make a Cap of the same Skin, and in the same manner.

Their Weapons are a Scimiter, a Bow and Quiver, with eighteen or twenty Arrows, a Knife stuck in at their Girdle, a Flint to strike fire, a Nawl, with five or six fathom of small Leather-thongs, to bind the Prisoners they catch. Every one of them carries a Sun-dial in his Pocket. Only the richest wear Coats of Mail, the others for want of better Provision go to the War without any Armour. They are all good Horsemen, and resolute, but sit ill, their Legs being bent, because they ride short, so they sit a Horseback as a Monkey would upon a Hare; yet for all that they are very active a Horseback, and so expert, that as they ride a large Trot, they will leap off one Horse when he is tir'd upon another they lead, that they may fly the better when pursu'd, and the Horse as soon as eas'd of his Master's weight comes about to his right hand, and keeps along even with him, to be ready to receive him again when he has occasion to mount him, according to their usual manner of activity. Thus are the Horses taught to attend their Masters. In other regards the Horses are ugly and ill shap'd, but good to endure Fatigue; for those Baquemates (so they call that sort of Horses) that have a very thick Main, and hanging down to the Ground, and their Tail in the same manner, are the only Beasts for running twenty or thirty Leagues without drawing bit.

Most of the common sort of those that remove from place to place do not eat Bread, unless they be among us. They had rather eat Horse-flesh than Beef, Yew-mutton, or Goats, for they know nothing of Weather-mutton; and they kill no Horse till he is very sick, and no hopes left of his being ever serviceable; and tho the Horse should die naturally of any Distemper whatsoever, they will not forbear eating of him, for it is to be conceiv'd that they are not at all dainty. They that go to War live after the same manner, and join Ten in a Mess; and when any Horse among them is not able to travel, they cut his Throat; and if they can get any Meal they mix it with the Blood, as if it were Hogs-blood to make Puddings; then they boil it in a Pot, and eat that as a curious Dish. The Flesh they dress thus, they quarter the Horse, and lend their Comrades that want three Quarters, keeping for themselves only a Hind-quarter, which they cut out in as large slices as they can in the fleshiest part, and only an Inch or two thick; this they lay upon their Horse's back, and the Saddle over it, girding him as tight as they can: then they mount, ride three or four Hours a Gallop, for all the Army goes the same pace. Then they alight, unsaddle, turn their slice of Meat, and stroking up the Horses sweat with their hand, baste the Flesh with it, that it may not grow dry; then they saddle again, and girt hard as before, riding on three or four Hours longer, and by that time the Flesh is dress'd to their mind, as if it were stew'd, and this is their Dainty and Cookery. As for the rest which cannot be cut into Slices, they boil it with a little Salt, but never skim it, for they are of opinion that in skimming the Pot they throw away all the juice and relish of the Meat. Thus that miserable People lives, drinking fair Water when they can meet with it, which is but very seldom, for all the Winter they drink nothing but melted Snow. Such as are able, as for instance, the Morzas, that is Gentlemen, and others who have Mares, or she-Asses, drink their Milk, which serves them instead of Wine

Of the Crim Tartars.

Since we are upon the Tartar Country, I think it will not be amiss to say somewhat of their Manners, way of living, how they make War in the Field, what order they observe in marching through an Enemy's Country, and how they make their Retreats into the Desert Plains.

The Tartars for several days after they are born, do not open their Eyes, like the Dogs and other Creatures; their Stature is low, for the tallest of them are scarce above our midling Men; they are rather slender than gross, but lusty and bony, their Stomach high and large, their Shoulders thick, their Neck short, their Head big, their Face almost round, their Forehead high, their Eyes narrow, black and long, their Nose short, their Teeth as white as Ivory, their Complexion fallow, their Hair very black and harsh, like a Horse's Mane. In short, they have quite another Physiognomy than Christians, and a Man may know them at first sight. Their Shape and Countenance is somewhat like that of the American Indians about Maragnon, and of those they call Caraibes. They are all of them lusty and bold Soldiers, hardy to endure Fatigue, and all the sorts of Weather. For from seven years of age when they come out of their Cantares, that is, their Houses or Huts upon two Wheels, they never lie under any other Roof but the Canopy of Heaven, and after that age they never give them any thing to eat but what they fetch down with their Arrows. Thus they teach their Children to hit a Mark, and when they come to twelve years of age they send them to the Wars. It is their Mothers care when their Children are very young, to bath them every day in Water that has Salt dissolv'd in it, to harden their Skin, and make them less sensible of the Cold, when they are forced to swim Rivers in Winter.

ther Castle, which encompasses it round. And from this Town to the Western shore there is about half a League, and a Ditch that reaches to the Sea. In the Town there are not above four hundred Inhabitants: The Tartars call it Or, and the Polanders, Perecop, that is in English, a Land trench'd about; for which reason Geographers call that part of Tartary, Tartaria Precopensis.

Kosofow is an antient Town Eastward, belonging to the Cham; it may contain about two thousand Inhabitants, and has a Harbour.

Gopetorkan, or Chersonne, is an antient ruin'd Place.

Baciefary is the Cham of Tartary's Place of abode, and has about two thousand Inhabitants.

Alma, or Foczola, is a Village where there is a Catholick Church dedicated to St. John, it contains about fifty Houses.

Balucclawa, a Port and Town, where they build the Grand Seignior's Ships, Gallies, and Galleons. The Mouth of the Harbour is about forty Paces over, the Port it self about 800 Paces in length, and 450 in breadth: What Water it has I could not learn, or what Bottom, whether Sand, Owze, or Rock; but it is likely to be above fifteen Foot, since Vessels of above 500 Tun go in loaded. This Borough has not above 120 Houses. It is one of the pleasantest Places, and best Harbours in the World, for a Ship is always afloat in it; and whatever Storm blows, it is not toss'd, for it is shelter'd from all Winds by high Mountains that enclose the Harbour.

Mancupo is a pitiful Castle, upon a Mountain call'd Baba: All the Inhabitants are Jews, and there cannot be above sixty Houses.

Cassa is the Capital City of Crim Tartary, where there is a Turkish Governour for the Grand Seignior. The Tartars do not much live in this City; but most of the Inhabitants are Christians, serv'd by Slaves they buy of the Tartars, who take them in Poland and Muscovy. In this Town there are twelve Greek Churches, two and thirty of Armenians, and one of Catholicks, call'd S. Peter: It may contain five or six thousand Houses, but there are in it thirty thousand Slaves, for in that Country they make use of no Servants. This is a City of great Trade, and deals to Constantinople, Trebisond, Sinope, and other Places; and in short to all Parts, as well within the Black Sea, as throughout all the Archipelago and Mediterranean.

Crimenda is very antient, belongs to the Cham, and has about an hundred Houses.

Karasu also belongs to the Cham, and has about two thousand Houses.

Tusla, where the Saltpitrs are, has about eighty Houses.

Combas about two thousand Houses.

Kercy about 100 Houses.

Ackmecery about 150 Houses.

Arabat, or Orbosac, is a Stone Castle which has a Tower seated on the Neck of a Peninsula, enclosed by the Sea of Limen and Tineka Woda; and this Neck is not above half a quarter of a League over, and is palisado'd from Sea to Sea. The Peninsula is call'd by our Cossacks, Casa, because it is shap'd like a Sithe; there it is the Cham keeps his Breed, which is accounted to amount to above 70000 Horses.

Tinkawoda is a Strait between the Continent and Casa, is but 200 Paces over, and fordable in calm Weather. The Cossacks pass over in the Tabort, when they go to steal the Chams Horses, as we shall mention hereafter.

From Balucclawa to Cassa, the Sea-Coast is very high, and perpendicular, all the rest of the Peninsula is low and plain. On the South side towards Or, there are abundance of moving Villages of Tartars, living upon Carts with two Wheels like those of Budziak.

The Mountains of Balucclawa and Carofu, are call'd Mountains of Baba, whence spring seven Rivers that water all the Peninsula, and are all shaded with Trees.

The River Kabats produces Vines.

On the River Sagre are abundance of Gardens, and much Fruit.

The Strait between Kercy and Taman, is not above three or four French Leagues over.

Taman is a Town belonging to the Turk, in the Country of Circassia. This Borough has a poor Castle, where about thirty Hanichaves keep guard; as is the like at Temruk, that secures the Pass at Azak, or at Zouf, which is a Town of note. At the Mouth of the River Donnais, East of Taman, is the Country of the Circassians, who are Christian Tartars, and look'd upon as the faithfullest.

the Water stinks for want of an Outlet.

Jezero Kuidlik is 2000 Paces from the Sea, and is as full of Fish as the other. There go Caravans to these two Lakes from above 50 Leagues off for Fish. There are Carps and Pikes of a wonderful bigness.

Bielegrad is seated a League from the Sea upon the River Niefter, which the Turks call Kierman. This Town is also subject to the Turk.

Killa is another Turkish Town, wall'd round, and with a Counterscarp. The Castle is seated above the Town upon the River Danube, a League from its Mouth. On the other Bank opposite to it is Old Kilia, of which some Ruins are still to be seen.

Budziak is between Bielegrad and Kilia, where is a Plain about twelve Leagues in length, and five or six in breadth, whither the mutinous Tartars, who own neither the Cham nor Turk, retire. There are about eighty or ninety Villages of those Libertine Tartars, who daily run into the Desert Plains to steal Christians and sell them to the Galleys, for they live upon Rapine like Birds of Prey. They sometimes break into the Ukraine and Podolia, but make no long stay there, and are forc'd to retire hastily, because they are not above four or five thousand Tartars; but they are continually upon the Borders, and in the Desert places. Their Villages are moveable, and their Houses built upon two Wheels, like the Shepherds Huts in France; for when they have eaten up the Grass in one Valley, they raise the Camp and remove, as I shall at last relate.

Tendra is an Island three or four Leagues from the Mouths of the Dnieper, but plain, with some Bushes: In it there is very good fresh Water, and all about it good anchoring.

Two Leagues from the Mouth of the Danube is a low Island about two Leagues in Compass, in which there is also fresh Water; the Turks call it Illanada, that is, Island of Serpents.

Smil is a Turkish Town, not wall'd: A League above Smil is the Place where Osman the Great Turk laid a Bridge over, in 1620, when he came into Podolia with 600000 fighting Men; it is a Cannon-shot below Oblizieza, and yet he did nothing but take a poor Castle call'd Kofin, which is upon the River Niefter in Walachia; and the Polanders deliver'd it up on condition the Turk should return to Constantinople; which he did, after losing above 80000 Men, either by the Sword or Distempers that rag'd in his Army. The River in that place is very narrow, not above five or six hundred Paces over, for the Turks with their Bows shoot over it. Below that Bridg the Danube divides into several Branches, and the chief Channel runs down to Kilia.

Between Rene and Obliszica are two Islands, as may be seen; Palleco is a small Island between the Danube and the Sea, about 2000 Paces in circumference, being round and encompass'd with Precipices, and all wooded; but every Year the Danube carries away some Port, its Current being very rapid, and the Island of a sandy Soil.

Galas is in Walachia, the Inhabitants Greek Christians; it is seated on the Danube betwixt the Mouths of the Rivers Seretz and Prut.

South of it is Warna, a Port on the Black Sea in Bulgaria: There is no other place in the Black Sea till you come to Constantinople, but only the Towers of the Black Sea, which are upon the Mouth of the Strait three Leagues from Constantinople.

Of the Crim Tartary.

C CRIM is a great Peninsula in the Black Sea, South of Muscovy: It is full of Tartars come out of the Great Tartary, who have a King whom they call Cam, who holds of the Great Turk; and these are the Tartars who so often make Inroads into Poland and Muscovy, to the number of 80000, who burn and ravage all they find in their way; and then return home with fifty or sixty thousand Russian Slaves, and sell them to serve aboard the Galleys, for these People live only upon Rapine.

This Peninsula's Isthmus is not above half a League over, which if cut it would be an Island: Upon it there is a pitiful Town without any Wall, with only a Ditch about it, twenty foot wide, and six or seven Foot deep, half fill'd up, encompass'd with a poor Rampart six or seven Foot high, and about fifteen Foot thick. This Town is seated about three hundred Paces from the Eastern shore; has a Stone Castle, enclōs'd within another

Description of Crim Tartary.

The first is Kuczkasow.

The second Nosowka: This Pass is very troublesome, being at least three quarters of a League over; being full of Islands and Reeds troublesome to pass, and several Channels: Besides, the Tartars are afraid of the Cossacks, who are not generally far from those Parts, and lay ambushes for them.

The third and best is Tawan, being the most convenient, as well in regard it is but a days Journey from Crim Tartary, as because the Passage is easier, there being but two Channels; the first Konskawoda, commonly fordable in that place; then the Dnieper, that must be swam, but it is not very wide, yet may be about five or six hundred Paces.

The fourth is Burbanka, not so good as the last; there are three very large Channels to cross, viz. Konskawoda, and the Dnieper twice, all three not fordable.

The fifth and last is Oczakow, which is the Mouth of the Dnieper, a large French League over. The Tartars pass it thus, they have flat Boats, across which they lay Poles, to which they tie their Horses one before another, and as many on the one side, as on the other to ballance equally; they put their Baggage into the Boats, make the Beasts swim: the Horses so ty'd, follow, and easily cross the Mouth of the River; it puts them out of Breath, but being tied short to the Pole which bears them up, and the Boats going gently along, they get over with ease; this is to be understood in fair calm Weather. In my time the Turks pass'd all their Cavalry over in this manner, and it consisted of 40000 Horse, when the Grand Seignior sent to besiege Ozow, or Azak, a Town upon the Don, which the Muscovite Cossacks had taken the Year before, which was 1642, from the Turks, and he carry'd it.

Three Leagues above Douczakow is the Mouth of Bog, where there is a triangular Island half a League long opposite to Semenwiruk.

Above Semenwiruk on the Bog, is Winaradnakricza, which is a Fountain of Water on a Precipice; a pleasant place, and fit to be inhabited, as well for the conveniency of Wood, as for the Mills that might be made there. Andre Ostro is an Island about a League long, and a quarter over, full of Wood. Piczane Brod is very fordable, the River does not carry there above three foot of Water; is narrow, and the Banks of easy ascent, so that heavy Cannon might pass over there. Below that place the River is navigable, and above fordable in many places, as may be observ'd in the Map.

Krzeminczow is an Island about 1500 or 2000 Paces in length, 1000 in breadth, and between 20 and 25 Foot high; upright on the North side, and low on the South. Wood for building is but half a League off towards Oczakow. North of the said Island on the Shore, there is a convenient Place enough to erect a Castle or Fort, encompass'd with deep Valleys like Precipices. Oucze Sauram, or Konespol Nowe, is the last dwelling-place the Polanders have towards Oczakow, which I founded in the Year 1634, and in 1635 I caus'd a Fort Royal to be built there; a good place of Arms might be there made against the Turk.

Let us return to Oczakow, to inform the Reader, that it is a Town belonging to the Turk upon the Mouth of the Dnieper, call'd in the Turkish Language Dzian-crimenda. This Town secures the Gallies that guard the Mouth of the Borisphenes, to hinder the Cossacks from running down into the Black Sea. There is no Harbour, but only good Anchoring. Under the Castle there are two Towns seated on a Hill inclining on one side, and an absolute Precipice on the other, well secured from the South-west to the North-west. The Walls of the Castle are about 25 Foot high, but those about the Town are much lower. In the Town there are about 2000 Inhabitants. South of those Towns there is another little Castle in the nature of a Platform, on which some pieces of Cannon are planted to shoot cross the River to the other side of the Borisphenes (which is at least a League wide of the Mouth) where there is a Tower in which the Turks keep guard to discover the Cossacks at a distance on the Sea, and give the Signal to the Gallies. But the Cossacks laugh at that, for they can pass and repass, as I shall show hereafter.

About a League from Oczakow towards the South-west there is a good Harbour, call'd Berezan, the Mouth of it is at least 2000 Paces over; there is no passing it without a Boat; it is deep enough for Gallies, which can run two Leagues up the River that makes the Harbour, its name is Anczakrick.

Jezero, that is, Lake Teligoh, is eight Leagues long, and between the 7th and 8th part of a League over; there is a natural Dike or Bank along the Sea-shore to hinder the Lake and Sea from mixing. It breeds such abundance of Fish, that the or ten of them in the Front, and as many in the Rear: they themselves are in the middle with Firelocks, and half-Pikes and Scythes upon long Poles; the best mounted among them about their Taborts, with a Sentinel a quarter of a League before them, another at the same distance behind, and one upon each Flank. If these discover Tartars, they make a sign, and the Tabort halts. If the Tartars are discover'd first, the Cossacks beat them; and if the Tartars, discover the Cossacks first, they give them a fierce Assault by way of surprize in their Tabort. In short, they who travel over those Plains must have, as the Italians term it, good Feet and good Eyes. I have often met them in the field at least 500 together, who assaulted us in our Tabort; and tho I had but 50 or 60 Cossacks with me, they could do us no harm, nor could we gain any advantage over them, for they would not come within the reach of our Arms, but after making several Essays as if they would fall upon us, and let fall showers of Arrows on our heads, for they shoot flights twice as far as our Arms will carry, they go off and cunningly hide themselves in the Plains to surprize some Caravan before they are discover'd. You must understand that those Plains are cover'd with Grass two foot high, so that they cannot go without treading it down, which leaves such a track as it is easy to guess what number they were, and which way they went; and therefore for fear of being pursued by a greater Power, they have found out this contrivance, that if there are 400 in a Troop, they will make four Ranks of about an hundred Men each, some march North, others South, others East, and others West: Every one of them goes about a League and a half strait on its way, and then each little Parcel divides into three of about 33 in a Company, who move, as is mention'd before, excepting towards the River; then at about half a League distance they divide into three again, and so travel till they come to be but ten or twelve together, as may be better conceiv'd by the Draught than can be explain'd by words.

All this is done in less than an hour and a half, and riding a large trot ; for when they are discover'd they can never make haste enough ; they have all of them these tricks at their fingers ends, and know all the Plains as well as Pilots know their Harbours. Every little Squadron of ten or eleven crosses the Country at discretion, without ever meeting in their Range, but at a day appointed they rendezvous 10 or 12 Leagues from the place where they broke up, in some Bottom where there is Water and good Grass, for there they lie. Every little Troop travels by it self, some have but a little way to the Rendezvous, but others by reason of their windings and the compass they take, have a long Journey ; and the Grass trod but by eleven Horses, rises again the next day, so that no sign remains. When together, they lie hid some days, then move in a body, and fall upon some open Town on the Frontiers, which they surprize and carry ; which done, they fly, as has been said before. This crafty method have the Tartars found out to conceal themselves in the Plains, and the better to delude the Cossacks, who pursue them hotly, knowing they are not above 5 or 600 : the Cossacks mount to the number of 1000 or 1200, pursue them, seek the tracks, and having found them, follow them to the Maze abovemention'd, where their Measures are broken, and they know not where to look for them, because the track goes every way, which obliges them to return home, and say they could see nothing. You see how difficult a matter it is to find those Tartars, unless they light upon them by chance, eating or drinking, or resting at night, but always upon their guard. Their Eyes are sharper and clearer than ours, because they are not so open, and therefore the Rays are stronger, and they see better than we do : They discover us before we do them, and Policy, not Strength, carries it. If they meet in the Morning or Evening an hour before Sun-rising, or after his setting, they both contrive to have the Sun in their back, as two Ships at Sea strive for the Wind. If the Polanders fall in with the Tartars, and they find they are not strong enough to stand them with Sword in hand, they will scatter like Flies, and run every one a several way, shooting with their Bow as they gallop full speed, so dexterously that they never miss their Man at 60 or 100 paces distance. The Polanders cannot pursue them, their Horses being shorter <sup>How they</sup> winded than the Tartars. These rally <sup>fight.</sup> again a quarter of a League off, and give a fresh charge upon the Polanders, and when drove disperse again, shooting over their left Shoulder, for they cannot over the right, and so tire the Polanders that they are forced to go off : and this is when the Tartars, as I said before, perceive they are ten to one, otherwise they go clear off without looking back. Thus those People made War in that Country.

Now let us give an account how the Tartars swim Rivers, and those the biggest in Europe. All their Horses swim well, especially in that Country which is cold, and the Water heavier than ours in France, as not being so well purg'd by the Sun : but I am satisfied that were their Horses brought into France, they would not cross the Seine as they do the Boristhenes ; for, as I said, the Water is heavier, and consequently bears other Bodies better, as I have found by Experience. When their Army would cross the Boristhenes, which is the greatest River in that Country, they seek out where the Banks are easiest on both sides, and every one provides Rushes, or Reeds, as they find, and makes two little Trusses three foot long, and ten or twelve Inches thick, about a foot distant from one another, and join'd together with three Sticks well bound at top, and one under from corner to corner, well fastned and tied to the Horses Tail. Then the Tartar puts his Saddle upon his Float, strips himself, lays his Clothes on the Saddle, and on that his Bow, Arrows and Scimeter, all well bound and fastened together ; then enters the River stark naked with a Whip in his hand, and drives on his Horse with his Bridle on his Neck, which yet he holds sometimes with one hand and sometimes with the other, together with the Mane ; and so putting on his Horse, makes him swim, and he swims with one hand, holding the Mane with the other, and the Bridle which he never quits ; and thus leads his Horse, putting him on with the Whip till he has pass'd the River. Then when his Horse finds his feet upon the other side, and the Water reaches but to his Belly, he stops him, takes the Float from his Tail, and carries it ashore. All of them pass together in this manner, for they make a Front half a League in length upon the River. All the Cattel passes in the same manner. This is what I could learn of the Tartars.

Manners and frequent Infidelity. If the Cossack elected accepts of the Generalship, he thanks the Assembly for the Honour done him, tho unworthy and incapable of that Post, yet protests he will use his utmost Endeavours to become worthy to serve them either in general or in particular, and that his Life shall be always expos'd for the Service of his Brethren (so they call one another): Having spoke these words, they all shout, Vivat, vivat, &c. then they go in order to pay their Respects to him, and the General gives them his Hand, which is the manner of saluting one another among them. This is the manner of choosing their General, which is often done in the Desert Plains. They are very obedient to him, and in their Language he is call'd Hettman. His Power is absolute, and he can behead and impale those that are faulty. They are very severe, but do nothing without the Council of War, which they call Ruds. The General may fall into Disgrace if he have not such Conduct when he leads them out to War that no Disaster befall them, and if he does not appear brave and politick upon any unexpected or unlucky Accidents; for if he commits any act of Cowardice, they kill him as a Traitor. Immediately they choose another among themselves in the usual manner, as was said before. It is a troublesome Employment to lead and command them, and unfortunate to him it falls upon; for during seventeen years I serv'd in the Country, all that had this Post dy'd miserably.

When they intend to go to Sea, it is without the King's leave, but they take it of their General, and then they hold a Ruds, that is, a Council, and choose a General to command them during that Expedition, observing the same Ceremonies we have mention'd in the Election of their great General, but this now chosen is but for a time. Then they march to their Sczabeuifza Worskowa, that is, their place of rendezvous, and there build Boats about 60 foot long, 10 or 12 foot wide, and 12 foot deep; these Boats have no Keel, but are built upon Bottoms made of the Wood of the Willow about 45 foot in length, and rais'd with Planks 10 or 12 foot long, and about a foot broad, which they pin or nail one over another, like the common Boats upon Rivers, till they come to 12 foot in height, and 60 in length, stretching out in length and breadth the higher they go. This will be better understood by the rough Draught I have inserted here.

You

How the Cossacks
choose their General.

It remains that we perform what we promis'd before, which is, how the Cossacks choose their General, as also how they make their Excursions, crossing all the Black Sea even to Anatolia, to make War upon the Turks. Thus it is they choose their General: when all the old Colonels and antient Cossacks, who are in esteem among them, are assembled together, every one gives his Vote for the Man he thinks fittest for the Employment, and he that has most Voices carries it. If he that is chosen will not accept of the place, excusing himself as being incapable of it, or for want of Experience, or his great Age, that does him no good, for they make no other answer, but that he is not worthy of that Honour, and immediately kill him upon the spot as a Traitor; and it is they themselves that are treacherous in so doing, which you may remember I said they were when I spoke of their

on the Black Sea

You may observe they have great Bundles of large Reeds put together as thick as a Barrel end to end, and reaching the whole length of the Vessel, well bound with Bands made of Lime or Cherry-tree; they build them as our Carpenters do with Ribs and cross-pieces, and then pitch them, and have two Rudders one at each end, as appears in the Draught, because the Boats being so very long, they should lose much time in coming about when they are forced to fly back. They have commonly ten or fifteen Oars of a side, and row faster than the Turkish Gallies: They have also one Mast, which carries an ill-shap'd Sail made use of only in very fair Weather, for they had rather row when it blows hard. These Vessels have no Deck, and when they are full of Water, the Reeds above-mention'd ty'd quite round the Boat, keep it from sinking. Their Bisket is in a Tun ten foot long, and four foot diameter fast bound, and they take out the Bisket at the Bung. They have also a Puncheon or half Tun of boil'd Millet, and another of Dough dissolv'd in Water, which they eat mix'd with the Millet, and make great account of it: This serves for Meat and Drink, and tastes sowerish; they call it Salamake, that is, a dainty Food. For my part I found no delicacy in it, and when I made use of it upon my Voyages it was for want of better. These People are very sober, and if there be a Drunkard found among them, the General causes him to be turn'd out; therefore they are not permitted to carry any Brandy, being very observant of Sobriety in their Expeditions and Enterprizes.

When they resolve to make War upon the Tartars in revenge for the Mischiefs receiv'd from them, they take their opportunity in Autumn. To this purpose they send all Necessaries for their Voyage and Enterprize, and for the building of Ships and other uses to the Zaporouys: then 5 or 6000 Cossacks all good able Men well arm'd take the field, and repair to Zaporouy to build their Boats: Sixty of them go about a Boat, and finish it in a fortnight; for, as has been said, they are of all Trades. Thus in three weeks time they make ready 80 or 100 Boats, such as I describ'd above; between 50 and 70 Men go aboard each Vessel, with each of them two Firelocks and a Scimiter, carry four or five Falconets upon the sides of the Vessel, and Provisions proper for them. They wear a Shirt and Drawers, have a Shift, a pitiful Gown, a Cap, six Pounds of Cannon Powder, and Ball enough for their small Arms and Falconets, and every one carries a Quadrant. This is the flying Army of the Cossacks on the Black Sea, able to terrify the best Towns in Anatolia.

Thus provided, they run down the Boristhenes; the Admiral carries his Distinction upon the Mast, and generally has the Van, their Boats keeping so close that the Oars almost clash. The Turk has commonly notice of their coming, and keeps several Gallies ready at the mouth of the Boristhenes to hinder their coming out, but the Cossacks who are cunninger slip out in a dark night about the New Moon,

They see not out till after Midsummer, to be back the latest at the beginning of Autumn.

Moon, lying hid among the Reeds that are three or four Leagues up the Boristhenes, where the Gallies dare not go, having far'd ill there formerly, and think it enough to wait their coming out, in which they are always surpriz'd: Yet the Cossacks cannot slip by so swiftly but they are discover'd, then all the Country takes the alarm, and it runs as far as Constantinople. The Grand Signior sends Expresses all along the Coasts of Anatolia, Bulgaria, and Romania, that all People may be upon their Guard, giving them notice that the Cossacks are at Sea. But all this is to no purpose, for they make such use of their time, that in thirty six or forty hours time they are in Anatolia, where they land with every Man his Firelock, leaving but two Men and two Boys to keep each Boat: There they surprize Towns, take, pillage and burn them, and sometimes go a League up the Country, but return immediately, and go aboard with their Booty, hasting away to try their fortune in another place. If by chance they meet with any, they fall on; if not, they return home with their Booty. If they find any Turkish Gallies or other Ships, they pursue, attack and make themselves masters of them, which they do in this manner: Their Boats are not above two foot and a half above Water, and they discover a Ship or Gally before they themselves can be perceiv'd by them: Then they strike their Masts, observe how the Enemy winds, and endeavour to have the Sun upon their backs at night; then an hour before Sun-setting they row with all their might towards the Ship or Gally till they come within a League of it, for fear of losing sight of it, and so continue: Then about midnight (the Signal being given) they pull up again amain towards the Vessel, half the Crew ready to fight, only expecting when they come together to board. Those in the Ship or Gally are astonish'd to be attack'd by 80 or 100 Vessels, which fill them full of Men, and in a moment bear all down: This done, they pillage what they find in Silver, or Goods of no great bulk, that cannot be spoil'd by the Water, as also the brass Guns, and what they think can serve them, then sink the Vessel and Men in it. This is the practice of the Cossacks: had they Skill to manage a Ship or Gally, they might carry it away, but they have not that knack. When they are to return home, the Guards are doubled upon the mouth of the Boristhenes; but tho weak they laugh at that, for when they have been forced to fight, they have often lost many Men, and the Sea has swallow'd some of their Vessels, for they cannot be all so good, but some must fail. Therefore they land in a Creek three or four Leagues East of Oczakow, where there is a Valley very low, about a quarter of a League in length, the Spring Tides sometimes overflowing it half a foot deep, and is about three Leagues over to the Boristhenes: there two or three hundred Cossacks draw their Boats across one after another, and in two or three days they are in the Boristhenes with their Booty. Thus they avoid fighting the Gallies that keep the mouth of the River of Oczakow. To conclude, they return to their Karbenicza, where they share the Spoil, as was said before. Besides this they have another Refuge, they return by the mouth of Don through a Strait that lies between Taman and Kercy, and run up the mouth to the River Mius, and as far as this River is navigable, from whence to Taczawoda is but a League, and Taczawoda falls into the Samar, which runs into the Dnieper a League above Kudac, as may be seen in the Map. But they rarely return this way, because it is too long for them to return to Zaporowy. Sometimes they go this way out to Sea, when there is a great Force at the mouth of the Boristhenes to obstruct their coming out, or that they have but twenty or twenty five Boats.

When the Gallies meet them at Sea in the day time, they set them hard with their Guns, scattering them like so many Rooks, sink several, and put them in such a Consternation, that those who escape make haste to put in wheresoever they can. But when they fight with the Gallies, they do not ply their Oars, which are lash'd to the side by Withs; and when they have fir'd a Musquet, their Comrades give them another ready loaden to fire again, and thus they ply it without ceasing, and effectually. The Gallies are not able to board one of them, but their Cannon does them much harm. Upon these occasions they commonly lose two thirds of their Men, and seldom come off with half; but they bring rich Booty, as Spanish Pieces of Eight, Arabian Sequines, Carpets, Cloth of Gold, Cotton, Silks, and other Commodities of great value. Thus the Cossacks live, and these are their Revenues; for as for Trades they use none, but drinking and debauching among their Friends when they return home.

plan.* To proceed in the performance of what I promis'd, something must be said of the Customs they observe in some of their Marriages, and how they make Love, which will seem odd and incredible to some Persons. There, contrary to the practice of all other Nations, the Maids make Love to those young Men they take a liking to; and a certain Superstition they have among them, and observe punctually, is the cause they seldom miss of their aim, and they are more sure to succeed than the Men would be, if Application were made by them. This is the manner of it.

How the Maids court the young Men.

The Maid that is in Love goes to the young Man's Father's House, at such a time as she judges she may find the Father, Mother, and Gallant together. Coming into the Room, she says, Pomagaboa, that is, God bless you, the common Salutation us'd at entering their Houses. Having taken her place, she compliments him that has won her Heart, and speaks to him in these words, Juan, Fediur, Demitre, Woitek Mitika, &c. (in short, she calls him by one of these Names, which are most usual among them) perceiving a certain Goodness in your Countenance, which shows you will know how to rule and love your Wife; and hoping from your Virtue that you will be a good Dospodorge: These good Qualities make me humbly beseech you to accept of me for your Wife. Then she says as much to the Father and Mother, praying them to consent to the Match. If they refuse her, or make some excuse, saying, he is too young, and not fit to marry; she answers, She will never depart till she has marry'd him, as long as he and she live. These words being spoken, and the Maid persisting, and positively asserting she will not depart the room till she has obtain'd her Desire; after some Weeks the Father and Mother are forced, not only to consent, but also to persuade their Son to look favourably upon her, that is, as one that is to be his Wife. The Youth perceiving the Maid fully bent upon loving him, begins to look upon her as one that is in time to be Mistress of his Inclinations, and therefore intreats his Father and Mother to give him leave to place his Affections upon that Maid. And thus amorous Maids in that Country cannot miss of being soon provided, for by persisting they force the Father, Mother, and Son, to comply with them; and this, as I said above, for fear of incurring God's Wrath, and that some Disaster may not befall them; for to thrust the Maid out would be an affront to all her Kindred, who would resent it; and in this case they cannot use violence, without incurring, as I was saying, the Indignation and Punishment of the Church, which is very severe in these Affairs, imposing, when such a thing happens, Penances, and great Fines, and declaring the Family infamous. Being kept in awe by these Superstitions, they, as near as may be, avoid the Misfortunes they believe, as firmly as they do their Articles of Faith, will befall them, by refusing to give their Sons to those Maids that demand them. And this Custom holds only among People of equal Rank, for in that Country the Peasants are all rich alike, and there is but little difference as to their Worth.

Now I will speak of other unequal Amours between a Peasant and a Gentlewoman, allow'd by antient Custom and Privilege kept up among them.

It is the Custom in all the Villages of that Country, for all the Peasants, with their Wives and Children, to meet at the usual place of Rendezvous, every Sunday and Holy-day after Dinner. The place of Rendezvous is the Tavern, where they spend the rest of the Day a merry-making together; but only the Men and Women drink, while the Youth spend their time in dancing to a Douda, that is, a Horn-pipe. The Lord of the Place is usually there with all his Family to see them dance. Sometimes the Lord makes them dance before his Castle, which is the most usual Place; and there he dances himself, with his Wife and Children. At that time the Gentry and Peasants mix together; and it is to be observ'd, that all the Villages of Podolia and Ukraine are for the most part encompass'd with Underwoods, where there are lurking-places for the Peasants to retire in Summer, when they are alarm'd with the coming of the Tartars. These Underwoods may be half a League over; and tho the Peasants are kept under like Slaves, nevertheless they have this antient Right and Privilege of conveying away if they can, out of this dancing Assembly, a young Maiden Gentlewoman, tho she were their own Lord's Daughter, provided he does it so dexterously as to come off well, otherwise he is a lost Man, and that he can fly into the Neighbouring Copses, where if he can lie hid four and twenty Hours, without being discover'd, he is clear'd of the Rape committed; and if the Maid he has stoln will marry him, he cannot refuse her without losing losing his Head; if not, he is acquitted of the Crime, and cannot be punish'd: but if it happen that he is taken within the 24 Hours, his Head is immediately chopt off, without any Form of Law. Tho I liv'd there seventeen Years, I never heard that this was once done. I have seen the Maids make love to the young Men, and often succeed, as I said above; but this last practice is too dangerous, for a Man must have good Heels to carry away a Maid by force, and run away with her in sight of a considerable Company, without being overtaken; and it would be yet harder, unless the Maid was consenting to it; besides that at present the Peasants are more kept under than they were formerly, and the Nobility is grown more haughty and imperious. It is likely this Privilege was granted the Peasants when the Polanders at the Election of their Kings, prefer'd him that ran swiftest barefoot, looking upon him as the bravest and best Men, as if Valour and Worth consisted in swiftness and activity of Body. Hence I suppose it came too, that the Nobility make the King swear, the day after his Election, before the Altar, that he will imprison no Nobleman for any Crime whatsoever, except Treason against the State, or himself, four and twenty Hours after the Fact committed, to show they had as great value for those that ran well and were nimble. And this may be further observ'd by the great Value they put upon Fleet-Horses, for that is all they look for, and give any thing for them, so they run well: And this, I guess, is that they may overtake a flying Enemy, and fly themselves swiftly when pursued.

Since we have spoken of the Amours of the Ukrainians, let us say somewhat of the Wedding-Feasts and Ceremonies observ'd at it.

The Nuptial Ceremonies are these. The Youth on both sides are invited, and have Orders from the Bride and Bridegroom to bring all their Kindred, to be present at the Wesellé, that is, the Wedding, to authorize them for performing this Duty; each of them has a Garland of Flowers given him, which he puts upon his Arm, carrying a List of all the Guests invited, to whose Houses they go the day before the Wedding, by two and two. The first of them who delivers the Message, and makes the Speech, has a Rod in his hand. I shall not spend time to give an account of the Dishes, and what Varieties are serv'd up to Table; I shall only inform you, that the Bride being well dress'd after their manner, that is, in a long Gown of sad Beau- colour Cloth hanging on the Ground, stiff-plaw. ned with Whalebone all round, which makes her spread, and lac'd with broad Laces, half Silk and half Woollen, her Head bare, her Hair spread on her Back, showing nothing naked but her Face, and a Garland of such Flowers as the Season will afford on her Head; her Father, Brother, and nearest Kinsman, leads her to Church, a Violin, Hornpipe, or Cimbale going before. After she is marry'd, one of her near Relations takes her by the Hand, and leads her home again with the same Musick. I omit the Rejoicings at the Wedding-entertainment, tho they are extraordinary, and wherein they are nothing inferior to other Nations; and shall only observe, that what encourages them the more to Debauchery, to which they are naturally inclin'd, is, that upon Weddings, and Christning of their Children, the Lord of the Place gives them leave to brew Beer, which liberty makes them drink it the cheaper, and much more extravagantly; for it is to be observ'd, that at other times the Lords have common Brew-houses, where all his Vassals are oblig'd to buy their Store.

When it is time to put the Bride to bed, the Bridegroom's female Kindred carry her into a Room, where they strip her stark naked, and search her all round, even her Ears, Hair, between her Toes, and other parts of her Body, to see whether there is no Blood, Pin, or Cotton dip'd in some red Liquor hid about her; and should they find any such thing, it would discompose the Wedding, and cause much disorder: but if they find nothing, they put her on a fine Smock of Cotton Cloth, very white and new; and then lay her between two Sheets, making the Bridegroom steal to Bed to her. When they are together, they draw the Curtains, and yet most of the People at the Wedding come into the Room, with the Horn-pipe, dancing, and every one with a Glass in his hand. The Women dance and skip, and clap their hands, till the Matrimony be absolutely consummated; and if she makes any demonstration of Joy at that happy Moment, all the Company leaps, and clapping their hands, give great acclamations of Joy. The Bridegroom's Kindred are still watching about the Bed to hear what is doing, waiting to draw the Curtain as soon as the Sport is over. Then they give the Bride a clean Smock, and if on that they take from her they find the Tokens of a plan.* Maiden-head, they make the House ring with joyful Acclamations, in which all the Kindred joins. After that, when she is dress'd, it is after the fashion of Women, into which number she is admitted, that is, her Head is cover'd, which is only allow'd to them, for Maids never wear any thing but their Hair, and would look upon it as a disgrace.

Maiden-

Next day another no less comical part is acted, which to those who have not seen it must seem very strange, which is, that they run a Staff through both the Smock Sleeves, turning it the wrong side outwards, and so in great state walk with it all about the Town, like a Banner bearing the honourable Tokens of the Combat, that all the People may be witnesses, both of the Bride's Virginity, and the Bridegroom's Manhood. All the Guests follow with the Musick, singing and dancing more eagerly than before. And in this Procession, the young Men leading the young Maids that were at the Wedding, walk all about the Town; all the Multitude runs out, hearing the noise, and follow them till they return to the House of the new-marry'd Couple.

But if on the other side they should not find the Marks of Honour, every Man throws down his Glass, and the Women forbear singing, for then the Feast is spoil'd, and the Bride's Kindred disgraced, and out of countenance. There ends the Wedding: then they commit a thousand Extravagancies in the House, make Holes in the Pots the Meat was dress'd in, break off the Mouths of the earthen Cups they drank out of, put a Horse Collar about the Bride's Mother's Neck; then set her upon a Table, and sing a thousand filthy beastly Songs to her, giving her to drink in one of those broken-mouth'd Cups, and upbraid her unmercifully for not having been watchful in preserving her Daughter's Honour. In short, after having us'd all the vile Language they can think of to her, every one goes home vex'd to have been at so disagreeable an Entertainment. Especially the Kindred of the Bride keep in their Houses as if they absconded, and continue there some time without stirring abroad, because of the shame of that Misfortune. As for the Husband, it is left to his choice to keep or leave her; but if he will keep her, he must resolve to put up all Affronts that shall be offer'd him upon that account.

I must add this one word more upon this Subject, concerning the Manners of their Women, and allow them the Honour of being chaste when fasting; but the liberty allow'd them of drinking Aqua Vita, and their Liquor made of Honey, would render them more easy of access, were it not for fear of publick Shame, and the dishonour done to Maids if they will marry, as has been shown above, without having the Tokens of their Virginity.

Before I conclude this Discourse, I will Ceremonies at Easter say something of the Ceremonies they observe at Easter. Upon Holy Saturday they go to Church (which they call Cerkil) to be present at the Ceremonies perform'd there, which are putting an Image of our Saviour into a Sepulcher, whence they draw it out with great solemnity: Which Representation being ended, all the Men, Women, and Children go in their turns, and kneel down before the Bishop (whom they call Wladik) and present him an Egg painted red, or yellow, speaking these words, Christos vos Christ; and the Bishop lifting up each Person says, Oystinus vos Christos, and at the same time kisses the Women and Maids. Thus the Bishop, in less than two hours, gathers above five or six thousand Eggs, and has the satisfaction of kissing the handsomest Women and Maids in his Church: true it is, it would be some trouble to him, and displeasing, to kiss the old Women; but he has ways to make a distinction between them, for when he does not like the Faces, he only gives them his hand to kiss. The Metropolitan call'd Moquilla, who is Head of all the Bishops, exercis'd this Function at Kiow, as do all the meanest Curats, whom they call Despodé.

For eight days there is no going about the Streets, without a quantity of those painted Eggs, to give such of your Acquaintance as you meet, saying the same words they do to the Wladik, or Despodé. Then the Friend, whether Man or Woman, answering as above, they embrace one another and kiss; and he or she thus saluted, is oblig'd to return another Egg, performing the same Ceremony over again.

On Easter Monday, very early in the Morning, they have another pleasant Custom, which is, that several young Fellows go about the Streets together, and take up all the young Maids they meet, whom they carry to the brink of a Well to bathe them, throwing five or six Pails of Water over their Heads, that they may be wet all over. This Sport is only allow'd till Noon.

On Tuesday following the Maids have their Revenge, but more cunningly: several of them hide themselves in a House, with each of them a Pitcher full of Water ready, and have a little Girl that stands Sentinel, and gives notice by some sign, when a young Man goes by; then all the Maids run out into the Streets, and seize the Man with great Shouts; which the Neighbours hearing, all the Maids flock to their assistance, and two or three of the strongest holding him, the rest pour all their Pitchers of Water down his Neck, and let him not go till he is well wash'd. This is the Sport between young Men and Maids at Easter.

The Men play another Game on Easter Monday, which is, that they go in the Morning in a body to the Castle to meet the Lord, who devoutly expects them; and after making their Obeysance, every one draws near, and presents him with Pullets, or some other sort of Fowl. The Lord in return for these Offerings, treats his Vassals with Aqua Vita, causing the Head to be beat out of a Cask, which is set upon the other Head in the middle of the Court: Then all the Peasants make a Ring about it, and the Lord comes with a great Ladle, which he fills, and drinks to the eldest in the Company, then gives the Ladle to him he drank to; so they all drink round, and begin again till the Cask is out; and if it be out before Night (which often happens) the Lord must cause another full Cask to be brought instead of the empty one, for he is bound to treat them after this manner till Sun-set, if the Peasants can hold out; but after Sun-set they sound a Retreat. Those that are able go home, those that cannot lie down in the Street and sleep it out, unless their Wives and Children have so much charity as to lay them on a Handbarrow and carry them home; but they who have over-charg'd themselves, remain in the Court of the Castle to sleep their fill. It is an odious thing to see those Wretches so drunk, without having eaten a morsel of Bread, rolling in their filth like Swine: And I have seen one of those brutal Fellows carry'd away dead upon a Cart, and it was not then above two a Clock in the Afternoon. Those are strange Customs which make Men die miserably; and how brutish is the Proverb they have always in their Mouths, That a Man bad as good drink fair Water, if he does not feel the Effects of drinking? Those People can hardly sleep after their common Meals, but when they are drunk they sleep sound; so that the next Morning they remember nothing that happen'd the day before, Drunkenness so Beating drowning their Reason that they have nothing left but the shape of Men. Upon these Occasions, such as design to get any thing from them by way of Gift, do pretend to be drunk with them; and when they see them hot-headed (for then they are very free-hearted) they beg something they have a mind to of them, which is immediately granted and deliver'd, which he that receives takes and sends away; but in the Morning they are surpriz'd, for having forgot what they did, and not finding what they gave away, they grow sad, being concern'd at their Prodigality, but comfort themselves with the hopes of catching another the same way to make up their loss.

Since we are entred upon the Subject of our Russians, or Cossacks, it will not be amiss to relate what more we know of them, and speak of their manner of Behaviour upon several other occasions. I have seen Cossacks sick of a Fever, who take no other Medicine but half a Ban-daleer of Cannon-Powder, and dissolve it in half a pint of Aqua Vita; and having stir'd it well together, drink it off, and go to bed upon it, and rise in the Morning in perfect health. I had a Coachman whom I have seen do it several times, and who has often cur'd himself with this Drench, which the Physicians and Apothecaries would never think on. I have seen others take Ashes, and mix them with Aqua Vita, temper'd as above, which they have drank with success. I have often seen them wounded with Arrows, and being far from Surgeons, dress themselves with a little Earth, temper'd in their hand with their own Spittle, which heal'd them as well as the best Salve; which shews that Necessity exerts its ingenuity as well in this Country as any other.

This puts me in mind of a Cossack I once met upon the River Samar, who was boiling Fish in a wooden Bowl, which the Polanders and Cossacks carry behind them on the Saddle to give their Horses water: To do this he heated flat Stones in the Fire, and threw them into the Bowl; which he did till the Water boil'd, and the Fish was ready, an Invention which at first sight has but an indifferent aspect, and yet is ingenious enough.

I remember I once made mention of a Disease they call Goschist, to which they are subject, and whereof it will not be amiss to speak a few words.

plan.

Goffest
a Disease among the Cossacks.

The Persons afflicted with this Disease (which the French call Coltons) are lame of all their Limbs for a Year, as if they were struck with a Dead-Palsy; but endure great pains in all their Sinews, so that they are continually crying out. After a Year is expir'd, their Head falls some night into a great sweat, so that in the morning they find all their Hair clung together, and flat, like a Tail of salt Fish. Then the sick Person finds much ease, and some days after is perfectly well, nay better in health than ever he was before, only that his Hair looks scurvily, and cannot be comb'd; and if he should happen to cut it off within two days, the Humour that purges out at the Pores of the Hair would fall upon his Eyes, and he would be quite blind.

Among them they look upon this Disease as incurable; but I have cur'd several after the same manner as we do the Pox in France. Some perceiving this Disease come upon them, go away for a while into other Countrys for change of Air, which is another Remedy that cures them insensibly. This Disease is not got by drinking out of the same Glass with those that have it; but if one Person lies with another that has it, the Husband gives it his Wife, and the Wife the Husband. The Physicians make a distinction between Male and Female, and say, that old Babas, as they term them, poison the Men and give them this Distemper, making them eat of certain Cakes. Others giving it in the steam of hot Water; so that he who receives it, finds his Brain disturb'd, and falls ill within a few days after. There are Children born with their Hair clotted together; but that is a good sign, for as they grow it loosens, and those Children can never after have this Distemper.

I must further add, as a thing very remarkable in that Country, that there is an infinite number of Flys along the Banks of the Boristhenes. In the Morning there are those of the common sort which do no harm; at Noon others as thick as a Man's Thumb, which trouble Horses very much, and sting them through the Skin, so that they are all over bloody; but at Night it is still worse along that River because of the Knats, and other Insects, so that there is no sleeping without a Polené as the Cossacks call it, which is like a little Tent, under which they lie to secure themselves against those Vermin, and without which in the Morning their Faces would be all swollen. I once felt it, and can give an account of it; three days pass'd before my Face came to it self, and I could scarce see or open my Eyes, for my Eye-lids were swell'd, and I look'd monstrously. But, as I said, the Cossacks have a Polené made after this manner; They cut fifteen little Forks of Hazle, about an inch thick, and two foot and a half long, or thereabouts: These they fix in the ground about two foot one from the other, and breadth-way a foot distance. Then they lay five cross pieces of the same Hazle upon the Forks, and five more athwart them, and bind all together with a Withy. Over this they lay a Cotton-Cloth made on purpose, and sew'd, to fit this bigness; which covers not only the top, but all the sides, about a foot or more lying on the ground, which is tuck'd in under the Quilt or Bed for fear the Flies should get in: thus two Persons lie very well. Only principal Officers use this, for all People have not the little Tent or Pavilion. When they see it will rain, they cover themselves as in the following Draught, which will better demonstrate it than all I can say. In short, they are so persecuted in that Country, that they are fain to make a fire continually, that the smoke may drive away the Insects.

A B C D E F G is the Polene cover'd with Cloth, H I and L M are two Forks on which a cross Pole I L rests, which supports the Turky Carpet made of twisted thred, which the Rain cannot pierce, and serves as a Roof to the Polene.

After the Flies, let us talk of the Grasshoppers, or Locusts, which are there so numerous that they put me in mind of the Scourge God sent upon Egypt, when he would punish Pharaoh. I have seen this Plague for several years one after another, particularly in 1645, and 1646: those Creatures do not only come in Legions, but in whole Clouds, five or six Leagues in length, and two or three in breadth, and generally come from towards Tartary, which happens in a dry Spring; for Tartary and the Countrys East of it, as Circassia, Bazza, and Mingrelia, are seldom free from them. These Vermin being drove by an East, or South-East Wind, come into Ukraine, where they do much mischief, eating up all sorts of Grain and Grass: so that wheresoever they come, in less than two hours they crop all they find, which causes great scarcity of Provisions; and if the Locusts remain there in Autumn, and the Month of October, which is the time when they die after laying at least 300 Eggs apiece, which hatch next Spring if it be dry, then the Country is 300 times worse pe-ster'd. But if it rains when they begin to hatch, they all die, and the Country escapes that year, unless they come from other parts. It is not easie to express their numbers, for all the Air is full and darkned; and I cannot better represent their flight to you than by comparing it to the fleaks of Snow in cloudy weather drove about by the Wind: and when they alight upon the Ground to feed, the Plains are all cover'd, and they make a murmuring noise as they eat, where in less than two hours they devour all close to the Ground; then rising, they suffer themselves to be carry'd away by the Wind; and when they fly, tho the Sun shines never so bright, it is no lighter than when most clouded. In June 1646, having stay'd two Months in a new Town call'd Novogrod, where I was building a Citadel, I was astonish'd to see so vast a multitude, for it was prodigious to behold them, because they were hatch'd there that Spring; and being as yet scarce able to fly, the Ground was all cover'd, and the Air so full of them, that I could not eat in my Chamber without a Candle, all the Houses being full of them, even the Stables, Barns, Chambers, Garrets, and Cellars. I caus'd Cannon-powder and Sulphur to be burnt to expel them, but all to no purpose; for when the door was open'd, an infinite number came in, and the others went out fluttering about, and it was a troublesome thing when a Man went abroad to be hit on the Face by those Creatures, sometimes on the Nose, sometimes the Eyes, and sometimes the Cheeks; so that there was no opening ones Mouth, but some would get in. Yet all this was nothing, for when we were to eat, those Creatures gave us no respite; and when we went to cut a bit of Meat, we cut a Locust with it; and when a Man open'd his mouth to put in a morsel, he was sure to chew one of them. In short, the wisest Men were confounded to see such innumerable multitudes, which were such as cannot be express'd; and they that would conceive it, should have seen it, as I did. After they had destroy'd all that grew in the Country for a Fortnight together, and having gather'd strength to fly further, the Wind took them up and carry'd them away to do as much mischief in some other place. I have seen them at night when they sit to rest them, that the Roads were four inches thick of them one upon another; so that the Hor-

 fes would not trample over them, but as they were put on with much lashing, pricking up their ears, shorting and treading very fearfully. The Wheels of our Carts, and the Feet of our Horses bruising those Creatures, there came from them such a stink as not only offended the Nose but the Brain. I was not able to endure that stench, but was forced to wash my Nose in Vinegar, and hold a Handkerchief dip'd in it continually at my Nostrils. The Swine feast upon them as a Dainty, and grow fat, but no body will eat of them so fatned, only because they abhor that sort of Vermine that does them so much harm. These Vermine increase and multiply thus: They generate in October, and with their Tails make a Hole in the Ground, and having laid 300 Eggs in it, and cover'd them with their Feet, they die, for they never live above six Months and a half; and tho the Rains should come then, it would not destroy the Eggs, nor does the Frost, tho never so sharp, hurt them, but they continue till Spring, which is about mid-April, when the Sun warming the Earth, they hatch and leap all about, being six Weeks before they can fly, without going far from the place where they receiv'd life; but when stronger, and that they can fly, they go wherever the Wind carries them. If it should happen that the North-East prevails when they first take their flight, it carries them all into the Black Sea; but if the Wind blows from any other Quarter, they go into some other Country to do mischief. But if the Rains fall when they begin to hatch, and continue but eight or ten days, all the Eggs are lost, and so in Summer eight or ten days continual Rain kills all the Locusts upon the Ground, for they cannot fly, and so the People are deliver'd from them. But if the Summer prove dry (which is most usual) they are tormented with them till they die in October. This is what I have observ'd several years in those parts concerning the Locusts, which are as thick as a Man's finger, and three or four Inches long. I have been told there by Persons that understand Languages well, that these words are writ on their Wings in Chaldee Letters, Boze Gnion, in English, Scourge of God; for the truth of it I rely on those that told me so, and understand the Language.

Now let us proceed to what I found most remarkable beyond the Dnieper, where there are two Rivers, one call'd Sula, the other Sapoy, which both fall into the Nieper, between which Rivers there are little Creatures which they call Bobaques, in shape and bigness much resembling the Barbary Rabbits, which have but four Teeth, two above, and two below, their Hair and Colour like a Badger. They make Burroughs like Rabbits, and in October shut themselves up, and do not come out again till April, when they run about to feed, and spend all the Winter under Ground, eating what they have laid up in Summer. They are great sleepers, and good managers, Nature directing them to lay up their Provision, in so much that one would think there were Slaves among them, for they take those that are lazy and lay them on their Backs, then lay a great handful of dry Herbage upon their Bellies, which they hold fast with their Paws, or rather Hands, because they make use of them almost as the Monkeys do; then the others drag those Drones to the mouths of their Furrows, and so those Creatures serve instead of Barrows, whence they make them carry the Provision into their Holes. I have often seen them practise this, and have had the curiosity to observe them whole days together, making them run to their Burrows to see their Apartments, and have found several Holes parted like little Chambers, some serve for Store-houses, others for Burying-places, whither they carry the Dead; and others for other uses. They live eight or ten in a Family together, and every one has its Apartment by it self, where they live very orderly; and their Government is nothing inferior to that of the Bees or Ants, of whom so much has been writ. I must add that all these Creatures are Hermaphrodites, and being taken young in May are easily tam'd. In the Market they do not cost above a penny or three half-pence. I have bred several of them, and they are pleasant in the House, being as diverting as Monkeys or Squirrels, eating the same sort of food.

I had forgot to say that these Creatures are very cunning; for they never go abroad without posting a Sentinel upon some high ground, to give notice to the others whilst they are feeding. As soon as the Sentinel sees any body, it stands up on its hind-legs, and whistles. Upon which Signal they all fly into their Burrows, and the Sentinel after them, staying there till they think the People are gone by.

The distance between these two Rivers of Sula and Supoy is not above six Leagues; and from the Nieper to the Borders of Muscovy, is not above fifteen or twenty Leagues. These Creatures I have describ'd live there, and are not to be found elsewhere. There is no good Galloping in those parts, because the Ground is full of little Burrows (like a Warren) and if a Horse treads into a Hole, he falls and is in danger of breaking his Legs; I have been catch'd so several times. In May and June the Peasants catch them after this manner, they pour five or six Pails of Water into their Burrows, which makes them come out, and clapping a Sack or Net at the mouth of it, take them in it. The young ones tho never so tame, cannot forget their own Nature; and in October, if they are not secur'd, they will earth in the House, and hide themselves to sleep a long time; and perhaps if they were let alone, would sleep out six whole Months, as the Dor-mice and Mountain-mice do. Mice have been hid a Fort-night, and after much seeking we found a Hole; I caus'd them to be dig'd out, and found them quite wild.

There is a sort of Quails in those parts with blew Feet, which are present death to any that eat of them.

In the Desert Plains toward the Porouys along the River Nieper, I have met a Beast about as tall as a Goose, but its Hair very fine and smooth, and soft as Sattin, when it has cast its Coat, for afterwards it grows harsher, and is of a Chestnut-colour. This Creature has two white shining Horns, in the Russian Language they call it Sounaky. Its Legs and Feet are very slender, has no bone in its Nose; and when it will goes backward, not being able to graze otherwise. I have eaten of it, and the flesh is as good as Kid; the Horns which I keep as a rarity, being white, shining, and smooth.

In those same parts there are also Stags, Hinds, troops of wild Goats, wild Boars of a vast bigness, and wild Horses, who keep in flocks of fifty or sixty, and have often alarm'd us, for at a distance we took them for Tartars. These Horses are not serviceable, and the Colts tho taken up and broke, are good for nothing but to eat: their Flesh is very dainty to look to, and tenderer than Veal; yet in my opinion not so well relish'd, but unsavory. Those People who eat Pepper, as we do Pease, took away all its sweetness with their Spice; the old ones being no way to be broke, or only fit for the Shambles, where their Flesh is sold as common as Beef and Mutton. Besides, their Feet are spoil'd, for the Be Hoof does so bind their Feet that they cannot be shod nor par'd down, and consequently cannot run, which shows the Providence of God, and that this Beast is wholly design'd for the use of Man, because when out of his hands, it becomes unfit for use, and unable to run.

There are also along this River Birds, that have such a large Neck, that within it there is as it were a Pond, where they keep live Fish, to eat when they have occasion. I have seen some of the same sort in the Indies. The other most remarkable Birds there, and most numerous, are the Cranes, of which there are vast multitudes. As for Buffaloes, and other large Creatures, they are on the Frontiers of Muscovy; as are the white Hares and wild Cats. There are also in that Country, but towards Walachia, Sheep with long Wool, their Tails shorter than usual, but much broader and triangular. The Tails of some of them have weigh'd above ten Pounds, generally it is above ten Inches broad, and more in length ending in a point, all of it excellent fat. The Great Men of the Country have fine Horses spotted like Leopards, beautiful to behold, which draw their Coaches when they go to Court.

The greatest inconveniency in that Country of Ukraine is the want of Salt, and to supply that want they have it brought from Pocouche, a Country belonging to Poland, on the Frontiers of Transylvania, above eighty or a hundred Leagues in length, as will appear in the Map. In that Country all the Wells are of Salt-water, which they boil, as we do white Salt, and make little Cakes an Inch thick, and two Inches long, giving 300 of them for a Penny. This Salt is very pleasant to eat, but does not salt so much as ours. They make another sort of Elder and Oak, which is good to eat with Bread; they call this Salt Kolomey. About Cracow they have Mines of Salt, as clear as Chrystal; that Place is call'd Wieliczka. That Country is also ill furnish'd with good water; I believe it is that which in some measure breeds the Distemper they call Goschets, whereof we have spoken before.

Notwithstanding those Countrys are near in the same Latitude with Normandy, yet the Cold is much more severe and sharp than in France, as we will make appear. Among other things to be observ'd there, there, is the Cold, which some years is so violent, and excessive, that it is insupportable, not only for Men, especially to those that belong to the Army, but to the brute Beasts themselves, as Horses and other serviceable Creatures. Such as are expos'd to the rigor of it, if they lose not their lives, come off well with the loss of any part, as Fingers or Toes, the Nose, Cheeks, Ears, and even that part modestly forbids to be nam'd, the natural heat of which Parts is sometimes put out in a moment, and it produces a mortification. Sometimes those Parts escape a sudden mortification, but if not speedily reliev'd are subject to cancerous Tumours, as painful as those proceeding from a malignant burning Humour, which made me sensible whilst I was there that Cold has as much power and force to destroy any thing as Fire has to consume. The beginning of those Tumours is so small, that the place where the pain is at first is not so big as a Pea; but in a few days, nay sometimes a few hours, it grows so big, and spreads so that it destroys all the part: and thus two Persons I am acquainted with, in a trice lost the pleasantest part of them.

Sometimes, and that very frequently, it seizes Men so violently, that there is no possibility of escaping it, especially when both inward and outward precautions have not been us'd, and it kills two ways. The one is quick, being violent, and may be said to be easy, because a Man is not long in pain, and dies in his sleep. For they that are abroad, whether a Horseback, in Coach, or Waggon, if they have not us'd the necessary Precautions, and are not well clad and lin'd, and naturally of a disposition fit to endure such terrible Cold, it seizes the extreme parts of their Hands and Feet, and by degrees all the rest of those parts, in such manner that being become insensible of the Cold, they are taken with a sort of Lethargick heaviness, which causes an extraordinary inclination to sleep; which if they are suffer'd to give way to, they sleep, but never wake again; but if they use all possible means to shake off that drowsiness, they escape death. And thus have I escap'd it several times, being very near it; for my Servants who were stronger, and more us'd to the like inclemencys of the Air, awak'd me. The other sort of death, tho not so sudden, is so cruelly painful and insupportable, that it almost distracts the mind of those that endure it. This it is that even to the strongest Constitution. The Cold seizes the Body on the right side of the Reins, and all about the Waste, the Troopers under their Armour; so pinching and straitning those parts, that it freezes up all their Belly, especially the Stomach and Entrails; so that tho they are always hungry, if they eat such things as are of easiest digestion, such as Broths or Gravy, when they are to be had, they are forced to cast them up as soon as they have swallow'd them, with such violent pains, and intolerable Gripes, as are not to be express'd. Those Persons who are thus seiz'd and tormented, are continually complaining, loudly and frequently crying out that all their Bowels and other parts of their Belly are torn to pieces. I leave it to the ablest Physicians to examine into the cause of such horrible Pains; and this being none of my Province, I shall think it enough to relate what I have seen, assisted by the Curiosity of some of that Country, who being desirous to see what was the effect of so violent and irresistible a Distemper, caus'd some that dy'd of it to be open'd, the greatest part of whose Bowels they found black, burnt up, and as it were glew'd together; which made them sensible that such Diseases are generally incurable, and that as their Intrails consum'd and mortify'd, they were forced to complain and cry out day and night without respite, which rendred their Death terrible, tedious, and without intermission.

This terrible Cold assaulted us in the Year 1646, when the Polish Army, entered Muscovy, to expect the return of the Tartars, who had made an irruption, to fight and take from them all the Prisoners they had seized. The Cold was so violent and cutting, that we were forced to remove our Camp, with the loss of above 2000 Men, most of whom dy'd in the cruel manner above mention'd, and the rest were maim'd. This Cold did not only kill the Men, but the Horses too, tho much more hardy and strong; for that Campaign above 1000 were spoil'd, that being seized with that cold fit, were never able to go, and among them six Horses belonging to Lieutenant General Potoski's Kitchen, he who is now Generalissimo and Castellán of Cracow. This Cold came upon us when we were near the River Merlo, which falls into the Boristhenes. All Remedies generally us'd are only by way of Precaution, as being well clad and provided with all things that warm and repel such violent Cold. For my part being in a Coach or Waggon, I kept a Dog upon my Feet to warm them, covering them with a thick Woollen Blanket, or a Wolf's Skin, and wash'd my Face with good Spirit of Wine, as also my Hands and Feet, and wrapp'd them in Cloths dipp'd in the same Liquor, which I never suffer'd to dry up: and by these means, with the assistance of God, I prevented all the ill Consequences before-mention'd, to which a Man is more subject if he does not take some hot Meat or Drink, such as for example what they usually take three times a day; which is made of hot Bear, a little Butter, Pepper, and Bread, and serves them instead of Pottage, fortifying their Bowels against the Cold.

The King being dead, the Archbishop of Gnesna takes upon him the administration of Affairs; and two or three Weeks after the King's Death, holds a great Assembly at Warsaw, where he presides: All the Senators meet there to debate and conclude upon the Time and Place for electing a new King. This Point being settled, every Senator returns to his Palatinate, there to hold a little Diet of that Territory; that is, he assembles all the Nobility under his direction, at a certain Time and Place appointed, where none of them fail to come; and being all together, they confer about naming a new King. Every one shows Reasons, according to his Inclinations; and after all their Contests and Debates, they fix upon several Princes; one of whom the Deputies appointed for the Election make choice of, and no other, after every one has shown his Commission for being at the Election, and consenting to one of those five or six nam'd; so that every one of the Senators has done the same thing in his Palatinate at the same time. Thus all the Deputies of the Palatinates, or Provinces, are the first Voters, and have the plurality of Voices in the Diets above the Palatines; yet they always deliver themselves in the Name of all, for before they come there they have all conferr'd Notes, and are agreed upon what is to be done without contradicting one another; so that all depends on them, for nothing can be concluded on there, which all the Deputies have not consented to; and if there be but one that opposes, and cries out aloud Niewolena (which is, you are not allow'd it) all would come to nothing: for they have this Power, not only at the Election of Kings, but may in any Diet whatsoever break and disappoint all that the Senators have concluded upon; for they hold these as Fundamental Maxims in their Dominions.

1. That no Nobleman can pretend to the Crown, or name or give his Vote for another to be so.

2. That whosoever is chosen King, must be of the Roman Catholick and Apostolick Religion.

3. That he who is elected be a Foreign Prince, that he may have no Lands in their Dominions: and tho the Sons of the Kings of Poland are Princes, and born within their Territories, yet that does not hinder them from being look'd upon as stranger Princes among them; and they may not purchase Lands of Inheritance as the Native Nobility may: And for this reason they may be chosen Kings, as happened to Vladislaus the 4th, who was then eldest Prince, after the death of Sigismund the 3d his Father, who was succeeded by John Casimir his Brother now reigning; and yet this is to be no Precedent to render the Crown Hereditary.

The manner of their Elections is thus: It is generally made in open Field half a League from Warsaw, the Capital of Masovia, where the King usually resides; and in the Castle of which Place the Diets are commonly held, that Town being as it were the Center of all the Provinces belonging to the Crown of Poland. The Place of Election is half a League from Warsaw towards Dantzick; where there was a small Inclosure made about 1000 or 1200 Paces in compass, inclos'd by a pitiful Ditch about five or six foot wide, which serves only to hinder Horses from going into the said Inclosure; in which there are two great Tents, one for the Election where all the Senators sit, and the other where all the Deputies of Provinces meet, who confer together before they go into the Great Audience of the Senate. Every one shows his Commission, and what he may consent to; and in this Conference they all agree upon what they may oppose or grant. They meet thus every day before the Audience, which every time lasts six or seven hours, during which time they propose all they can think on towards preserving their Liberties. At least a fortnight was spent at the Election of the late King Vladislaus; during which time there were no less than 80000 Horse about that little Inclosure, all Soldiers following the Senators; for every one of them had a little Army, some greater, some less, as the Palatine of Cracow who then had seven thousand Men; and so others according to their Power; for every one is attended by his Friends and Subjects in the best condition they can, being well disciplin'd, and with a Resolution to fight in case they cannot agree. Observe, that during the time of the Election, all the Nobility of the Country was upon its Guard, every one with his foot in the Stirrup ready to mount upon the least disagreement or falling out, to fall upon those that should attempt to infringe their Liberties. At length, after several Sittings and Audiences, they agreed upon a Prince for their King; every one, or at least the chief of the Senators and Deputies, put his Hand to it, but did not publish it till next day. Then every one returning to his Quarters, gives Orders to his Troops to be ready to draw up, according to the Great General's command (for then they all put themselves under the great Standard of the Crown) and were ready to cry, Long live the King, calling him by his Name. After three shouts they fir'd Volleys of all the Cannon and small Arms, expressing their satisfaction, and repeating it three times. Then all the Senate rose, and the principal Senators went to the Elder Prince who had been chosen King, and was then at a Village half a League off. After saluting him in the Name of all the Republick, they made a Speech, declaring how they had chosen him for their King, desiring him to accept of it, and to receive them under the Government of his Wisdom, assuring him they would be his most faithful and most obedient Subjects. The King accepting, the Senators shew'd him their Laws and Statutes (tho he was not ignorant of them) which he promis'd to observe inviolably. Next day they conducted him to St. John's Church at Warsaw, where before the Altar the King took his Oath; these that follow were the Articles read to him in the presence of all the Assembly.

Articles
the King swears to observe.

1. That he shall never enjoy any Demesne of the Crown but what is assign'd him; so they term their State.

2. That it shall not be in his Power to purchase or possess one foot of Land in it.

3. That he shall not give out Commissions for raising of Men, unless they have been appointed in the Diet.

4. That it shall not be in his Power, after the expiration of 24 hours, to cause any Polish Gentleman to be imprisoned, unless it be for High Treason against his Person, or the State.

5. That he shall not declare War, nor so much as send an Ambassador upon Affairs of State, without the Consent of the Republick.

6. That he shall always allow three Senators to be near his Person to assist him in Council; and that they shall have an eye upon his Actions, for fear he should contrive any thing to their Prejudice. These three Senators serve quarterly, so that the King can bring about nothing but what must be presently known.

7. The King shall not marry, make any Alliances, nor go out of the Kingdom, without Consent of the Senate.

8. It shall not be in his Power to make any Commoner Noble for any Service done, unless it be to the State, and then the Senate must consent to it.

The King, tho thus ty'd to Conditions, yet has the Power, not only of bestowing all Ecclesiastical Benefices, but all Lands belonging to the Crown, as they fall, but it must be to Gentlemen that are Subjects of the Crown; and particularly to such as have merited by their Service, either in War or Embassies, or other publick Service, that this may be a Reward, and make others vie to be useful and vertuous.

He has also the Sovereign Power to grant leave to burn Wood in those Lands and Governments he bestows, for making of Pot and other Ashes, which yield a great Revenue, tho it destroys much Wood.

He has also the Right of bestowing all Offices, from the highest to the lowest, and that for Life; for no Man can be removed from his Employment without his own Consent, or being proceeded against according to Law.

He appoints the meeting of Diets, which are usually held every two Years. When he goes to War, he may oblige all the Gentry of any Province to attend him by way of Arrier-Ban; and whosoever fails, forfeits his Head, his Race loses its Nobility, and his Goods are confiscated to the Crown. This is the Extent of his Power; and tho he be a King, his Hands are tied up in many Cases, not doing as he thinks fit, but being forced to consent to many things against his Inclination. Nevertheless he is Head of the Republick, and all things are done in his Name, tho he can do nothing of himself.

The Polish Nobility are all equal, there being no Superiority among them, as is usual in France, Germany, Italy, Spain, &c. where there are Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, Barons ; for they have no other Title but that of Tarosta, which are Governments and Demesns the King bestows on the Nobility ; for all the Lands of Noblemen are held without any mention of Feoffe, or Under-feoffe, so that the poorest Gentleman thinks himself no way inferior to one much richer than himself ; but they pay a Respect to those that are Officers of the Crown. The meanest of them pretend they are capable of being Senators, when it shall so please the King ; and to this purpose they all from their Infancy learn Latin, because all their Laws are writ in that Language. They all aspire to hold some Lands belonging to the Demesns of the Crown, and this makes them strive to outdo one another in Virtue, and to appear in the Army, and there to perform some notable Exploits upon occasion, that they may be taken notice of by their General, and be recommended to the King, who rewards them with some of those Estates.

The Nobility, as has been said, has the Power of chusing their King, who cannot after 24 hours imprison any of them for any Crime whatsoever, except Treason. Nor can any of them be imprisoned till his Cause be try'd, Judgment given, and he thrice summon'd to appear. So that the Nobility have liberty to come and go, to make Interest with their Judges, and be present at the examination of Witnesses who depose against them, without fearing to be apprehended before Sentence is past ; after which they have time to withdraw into a Monastery, which very often is the Sanctuary of wicked Men, who are not able to support themselves by main force ; for the great Lords laugh at Justice, and travel with Company enough to oppose them that have caus'd them to be convicted. The Sentence is usually to be beheaded, and their Goods forfeited. Then they are three times summon'd by a Crier to appear, and come before the Court of Justice in an Hour : But they are no such Fools to put themselves into the hands of the Hangman, knowing they are condemn'd to die. They not appearing, Infamy is added to the Sentence ; that is, any one that meets, is authoriz'd and allow'd to kill them ; and they that eat or drink with them are accounted guilty of the same Crime. Then the Plaintiff being too weak for the Party condemn'd, comes to some Composition, and for a Sum of Money discharges the other : After which the Criminal may sue out the King's Pardon, which costs two or three thousand Livers ; by which he is clear'd of his Crime, and of Beau the Infamy, and restor'd to his Goods. plan. But when the Criminal is not so powerful as the Party grieved, he must fly the Country to save his Life, and his Goods are forfeited to the Crown. These are the Benefits the King cannot enjoy, and which he gives the Nobility for Life. But, as they say, Guilt wears out in time ; for after some Years past, Friends endeavour to make up the Business, either because the Party concern'd is dead, or that he relents and forgives, or through some other means, after which the Criminal may easily recover his Goods, if he has any Interest.

It is not so among Soldiers, for upon the least Offence they are secur'd, without being look'd upon as Gentlemen, but as Soldiers, and are accordingly try'd by a Council of War, and Judgment no sooner given than executed.

The Nobility may farm Land without any disparagement, and sell the Product of the Earth ; but they are not allow'd to trade, any more than in France.

In private Quarrels they are not oblig'd to seek Satisfaction of the Wrong done them, Man to Man. When they think themselves injur'd, they gather all their Friends, and the most resolute of their Vassals, and march out with the greatest strength they can make, to attack and worst their Enemies wheresoever they can meet them, and do not lay down their Arms till they have fought, or else some Friends have interpos'd and reconcil'd them, and instead of a Scimiter put into their hands a great Glass full of the Liquor they call Toquaye, to drink one anothers health. No single Duels.

They have also the liberty of wearing little Crowns over their Arms, as being Petty Sovereigns, to cast as much Cannon as they please, and to build as considerable Forts as they are able, without being obstructed by the King or Republick ; and they only want the privilege of Coining, to be absolute Sovereigns. Formerly Money was coin'd in the Name of the Republick, at present in the King's Name only. In short, it appears at the beginning of this Relation, that they have Sovereign and Absolute Authority over the Peasants that hold of them ; that is, who are their Vassals in their Hereditary Possessions : for they have not such full Power over the Peasants that live upon Crown-Lands, which they hold only for Life ; for of these they can put none to death with legal Process, nor seize lan.* seize their Goods without showing a reason for it; the Peasants of the Crown, when molested, having their Complaints heard before the King, who protects them, and keeps their Privileges.

A Gentleman cannot be condemn'd to death for killing a Peasant belonging to another Gentleman, but is by Law to pay 40 Grivnes to the Heirs of the Party kill'd to have their Discharge; a Grivene is worth 32 Sols. In these Cases the Testimony of two Gentlemen is sufficient to condemn a Peasant, but there must be fourteen Peasants to convict a Gentleman.

*Strangers, Peasants, and Bur-
gers.* Strangers may not purchase Land there, nor the native Peasants, who never can possess any of their own; but they and their Children hold their Farms for Life, pay great Rents to their Lords, and cannot sell or mortgage, but the Lord can enter upon them when he pleases. In Towns the Burgers may buy Houses and Gardens, about the same Towns within their Liberties. By this it appears that all the Lands in that Republick are possess'd by the Nobility, who are very rich, excepting only the Lands remitted to the Crown (which are not Hereditary, like those we have spoken of) where there are certain Villages depending of the Crown, which the Kings have given to Boyars, who are a sort of People inferior to the Gentry, and above the trading sort, to whom the King has given Estates for them and their Heirs, who enjoy them upon condition they shall serve in the Wars at their own Expence, as often as the Great General requires, and do all they are commanded for the Service of the State. Tho most of these are very rich, yet there are some among them poor enough; but the Nobility is rich, as has been said. In Mosovia, where there is a great number of them, being at least the sixth part of the Inhabitants, they are not so well to pass; for which reason a great many of them go to Plow, and serve great Men as Gentlemen-Followers, which is more honourable than to be Coachmen, as the most stupid of them are forc'd to be. Of this sort were two that serv'd me as Coachmen several Years, whilst I was in that Country employ'd as first Captain of the Artillery, and the King's Engineer, tho they were Gentlemen of good Birth.

The Patrimony of the Nobility is free from Winter-Quarters, and Garisons; and the Army is only permitted to march through, being never allow'd to be in Garison, but upon the Demeans of the Crown.

When several Brothers are Coheirs, the eldest divides, and the youngest chuses.

A Widow marrying again, may, if she pleases, give all she has to him that marries her, and so disappoint her Children: This Law makes Children obedient to their Parents.

The Polish Nobility are humble, and complaisant enough towards Superiors, such as the Palatines and other Officers of the Crown; courteous and well-bred to their Equals and Countrymen, but haughty and insolent to their Inferiors; affable to Strangers, whom yet they do not much affect, or willingly converse with: as for instance, the Turks and Tartars, whom they seldom see but in War, and with Sword in hand. As for the Muscovites, by reason of their Brutality, they do not associate, or deal with them; nor with the Swedes and Germans, for whom they have so great an aversion that they cannot bear with them, but hate them mortally; and whensoever they make use of Germans, it is for very great need. On the contrary, they call the French Brothers, sympathizing with, and being ally'd to them in Behaviour, as well in their free way of delivering themselves without Dissimulation, as in their easy jovial Temper, which inclines them to laugh and sing without any melancholy. So the French who converse with those People, have a great esteem for them, because generally they are good-natur'd, generous, void of Malice, not given to Revenge, witty; and those that apply themselves, improve mightily. They have excellent Memories; are magnificent, honourable, expensive in their Habit, wearing rich Linings; and I have seen some of Sables worth above two thousand Crowns, adorn'd with large Gold Buttons set with Rubies, Emeralds, Diamonds, and other precious Stones. They carry abundance of Servants after them; are very courageous, resolute and skilful at their Weapons, wherein they outdo all their Neighbours, as making it their common Exercise, for they are seldom or never without War against some of the powerful Princes of Europe, as the Turks, Tartars, Muscovites, Swedes, Germans; and sometimes two or three of them together, as happen'd in the Years 1632, and 1633, when they were at War with the Turks, Tartars, and Muscovites, and came off very well, after several Victories obtain'd over them, follow'd by that over the Swedes in 1635.

After which Peace was concluded between the two Crowns of Sweden and Poland, by the Mediation of Monsieur Davvy, his most Christian Majesty's Ambassador, to the satisfaction of both Kings. Besides their Generosity in other respects, they entertain their Friends in their Houses very civilly, being honour'd and visited by them; nay, they are most obliging to Strangers they never saw before in their lives, and treat them with the same civility as if they had been long acquainted.

There are in that Country some very rich Lords, for there are those whose Personal Estates amount to 800000 Livres per Annum, without reckoning those that hold by Gift of the Crown, which are the 6th part of the Kingdom; and the cause of this great Wealth is, because the Peasants can have no Inheritance, so that all belongs to the Nobility, being fallen in to them, either by Conquest, or by Confiscations from Rebels and turbulent Persons, whose Estates have been confiscated, and annexed to the Demefn. The Nobility fearing lest the King, if possess'd of such vast Estates, might make himself absolute, they obstruct his being master of them, and are themselves gainers by it.

These People, when they go to War, serve after a strange manner; and should we see such as them in our Armys, we should rather gaze at than fear them, tho they are loaded with all sorts of Offensive Arms. I will give a description of them by what I saw my self in the Person of Monsieur Deczeinsky, <sup>1</sup> Rostmaster of a Troop of <sup>2</sup> Cossacks, who was thus arm'd. In the first place he had his Scimiter over his Coat of Mail, his Headpiece, which is a Steel Cap, with Labels of the same sort as his Coat of Mail, hanging down on both sides, and behind over his back, his Carabine, or else his Bow and Quiver; there hung about his Waste a <sup>3</sup> Czidela, a <sup>4</sup> Steel, a Knife, six silver Spoons made to lie one within another in a Purse of red Turkey-Leather; a Pistol in his Girdle, a fine Handkerchief, a Purse of dress'd Leather that folds, holding about a pint and half, which they use to take up Water to drink in the Field; a <sup>5</sup> Sabletas, a <sup>6</sup> Naiyque, two or three fathom of Silk Rope about the thickness of <sup>7</sup> Beas half a Man's little Finger to bind the Prisoners they take. All these things hang on the side opposite to the Scimeter, and besides all this a Horn to drench their Horses. There also hung by the Saddle on the off-side, a wooden Bowl that would hold half a Pail to water his Horse; also three <sup>8</sup> Nogans of Leather to hold his Horse whilst he feeds. Besides, when he had not his Bow, instead of it he carried his Carbine at his Belt: he had, moreover, a <sup>9</sup> Ladonnequis, a Worm for the Carbine, and a Flask. Judg whether a Man thus loaded be in a condition to fight.

The Housarts are Lancers, and all of them Gentlemen of considerable Estates, as far as 50000 Livres a Year; are excellently mounted, the worst of their Horses worth 200 Ducats, being all Turkish Horses brought from Caramania, a Province in Anatolia. Every one of them serves with five Horses, for in a Company of a hundred Lancers, there are but twenty Masters, who all march in the Front, being File-leaders; and the four other Ranks are their Servants each in his File. Their Lances are nineteen foot long, the Spear hollow, the rest of solid Wood. At the point of their Lances they wear a Streamer or Flag red and white, or blue and green, or black and white, but always of two Colours, four or five Ells long, which, I suppose, is to fright the Enemies Horses; for when they have couch'd their Lances, running with all the swiftness their Horses heels can carry them, these Streamers twirle about, and discompose the Enemies Horses they are to charge. They are arm'd Back and Breast, Arms, Head, &c. By their side they have only their Scimiter, a Palache under the left Thigh; and on the right side of the pomel of the Saddle is fastned a long Sword, broad at hand, and tapering downwards with a square Point, which is to run a Man thro as he lies on the Ground if he is not yet dead; and therefore this Sword is five foot long, and has a round Pomel that they may the better thrust against the Ground

They also carry Battel-axes weighing at least six Pounds made like our square Pick-axes, well temper'd, with a long Handle to strike upon the Helmet, and Enemys Armour, which they pierce with these Instruments.

As their Armour and manner of waging War seems to us very different from ours, we will let you see by what follows, that their Banquets and their Behaviour at them, is different from what is us'd by most Nations in the World. For the Lords who value themselves most upon this particular, the People that are very rich, and those that are in a medium, treat very splendidly accordingly to their ability ; and I can with truth affirm, that their common Meals do much exceed our Feasts in all points, by which sensible Men judg what they do when they debauch and make extraordinary Treats. The Great Lords of the Kingdom, and other Officers of the Crown, upon leisure days, when they are excus'd from going to the Senate, and hold the Diet at Warsaw, have made Entertainments that have cost 50, and even 60000 Livres, a very great Expence, considering what is serv'd in, and how it is serv'd. For it is not there as in those Countrys, where Amber, Musk, Pearls, and costly dressing arise to prodigious Sums. All that is serv'd here is very ordinary and coarsely drest, but in prodigious quantities, tho it be but for a small occasion. But the wast their Servants and Family make, as shall be shown hereafter, is what enhances the Charge. Now that you may guess at the value of the whole by a small Sample, I must inform you upon my own knowledg, that very often (according to the Bills of the Expence which I have seen) there has been one only Article which mention'd 100 Crowns in Glasses only, and they were not curious ones, but only a Penny a piece. When they begin, they are generally only four or five Lords Senators, and sometimes the Embassadors that are at Court join with them, which is but a small number for so great an Expence, as we have spoke of, but increas'd by the number of their Gentlemen Followers, to the number of twelve or 15, who are all bid welcome, and in all make seventy or eighty Persons, who all sit down to a Table, made of three Tables put end to end, and near 100 Foot in length, generally cover'd with three fine large Table-

Clothes, and all the Service gilt ; upon every Plate a Loaf under a very little Napkin, no bigger than a Handkerchief, with a Spoon but no Knife. These Tables so placed are commonly in a spacious Hall, at the end of which is a Sideboard full of Plate, with a Rail about it, within which no body is to go but the Butler and his Assistants ; upon that Sideboard there are often eight or ten Heaps of Silver Dishes, and as many Plates as will reach the height of a Man, and they are no short ones in that Country. Opposite to this Sideboard, and generally over the Door, is a Gallery for the Musicians, as well Vocal as Instrumental, which are not to be heard confusedly all together, but begin with the Violins, which are follow'd by Cornets in a proportionable number, after them come the Voices with Children that make an Harmonious Comfort enough. All these several sorts begin again alternatively, and last as long as the Feast. The Musicians have always eaten and drank before the Feast begins, during which, being bound to attend their business, they could have no leisure to eat or drink. All things being thus in order, the Tables are cover'd with all sorts of Varieties ; then the Lords are led into the Hall, in the midst whereof there are four Gentlemen, two of whom hold a Gilt Bason, at least three foot Diameter, to wash in, and the Ewer proportionable to it. The Gentlemen drawing near the Lords, give them Water for their Hands, and withdrawing give way to the other two, who hold a Towel about three Ells long, each holding an End, and offering it to the Lords, who dry their Hands. After this, the Master of the House having perform'd the Honours due, gives to every one his proper place, according to his Rank and Dignity. Being thus seated, they are serv'd by Gentlemen Carvers, three at each Table, and treated with the Varieties which are dress'd and season'd after their manner, that is, some with Saffron, whose Sauce is Yellow ; others with Juice of Cherrys, which makes the Sauce Red ; others with the Juice of Prunes, and that Sauce is Black ; others with Juice of boil'd Onions strain'd, and this makes a Greyish, and is by them call'd Gonche. All these sorts of Meat in their several Sauces are cut into bits as big as a Ball, that every one may take what he pleases. No Soupe is serv'd up to Table, because the Meat has its Broth with it in the Dishes, among which there are some Pasties. Every one of the Guests

Guests eats according as the Sauce pleases him, which are never any more than those four we have mention'd, besides the several sorts of Meat. They serve up Beef, Mutton, Veal and Pullets without Sauce, well season'd according to the Custom of that Country, with Salt and Spice, and so well that they have no need of Salts, which are therefore never us'd. As soon as one Dish is empty'd, they set on another, as Salt-Cabbidge, with a piece of Salt-Pork, or Millet, or boil'd Dough (I suppose Dumplings) which they eat as a great Dainty. They make another sort of Sauce of a Root they call Cresen, which they bruise and steep in Vinegar, and has the relish of delicious excellent Mustard, fit to eat either with fresh or salt Beef, and with all sorts of Fish. The first Course being thus over, and the Dishes empty'd, most of the Meat not eaten by the Guests but their Servants, as we shall mention more fully hereafter, they take off, and not only the Dishes, but the first Table-cloth with them, and then comes the second Course of Roast-meat, as Beef, Mutton and Veal, cut into large pieces; Capons, Chickens, Pullets, Goslings, Ducks, Hares, Venison, Kid, Wild-Boar, and all other sorts, as Partridges, Quails, Larks, and other small Birds, whereof they have great plenty. As for Pigeons they never use them, because they are rare in that Country, as are Rabbits, and Woodcocks. All these sorts are serv'd up without any order, but confusely, intermixing them with several Salads of divers sorts. This second Course is attended by an Entremets of several sorts of strain'd Pease with a good piece of Bacon, whereof every one takes part, and cuts it into Bits, which they eat with a Spoon dipping in the Soupe, and look upon this as a Dainty Dish, swallowing it without chewing; and the value they put upon it is so great, that they think they have not been well treated if it be wanting; as also if they have not Millet butter'd, and husk'd Barley dress'd in the same manner, which they call Cacha, and the Dutch, Gru. They have also bits of Paste like Macaroons fry'd in Butter full of Cheese; and another sort made of Buck-wheat, like very thin Cakes, which they dip in the Juice of white Poppy-seed, which I suppose they eat to fill them up quite, and dispose them to sleep. This second Course being taken away, as the first was, the Desert is brought in, such as the season and opportunity will allow of, as Cream, Cheese, and many other things

I cannot at present call to mind. All which Dishes and Dainties are so far inferior Beau- to the meanest of ours, that I should va- plan. lue one French Dish above ten of theirs. But for Fish they understand it wonderful well, for they not only have that which is very good, but dress it to perfection, and give it so fine a relish that it will raise a decay'd Appetite, wherein they exceed all other Nations, not only in my opinion, but by the general consent of all French and other strangers, who have been entertain'd by them. Nor is it any wonder, for they spare neither Wine, nor Oil, Spice, Currants, Pine Apple-kernels, nor any other thing which with their Ingenuity can contribute to season it well. During Dinner they drink but little, to lay a good foundation, and what they drink is Beer out of long round Glasses as big as a French Pot, into which they put tosted Bread sprinkled with Oil. It was above mention'd, that tho the Dishes of first and second Course were taken from Table almost empty, yet the Guests had eaten the least part; which is very true, for it is to be observ'd that every one of those that is at Table has one or two Servants, and when they would have clean Plates, they fill their foul ones with what is next them, and give them heap'd to the said Servants, who being well provided, get together to devour it in some corner of the Room, as it were by stealth, making an undecent noise, which yet their Masters do not hinder, but cause it by supporting such a Custom. After the Masters have eaten heartily at Table without much drinking, and the Servants gormandiz'd what their Masters have given them in the corners of the Hall, then they begin in earnest to drink one anothers Healths, not in Beer as before, but in their Wine, which is the best and noblest in the World; and tho it be white, yet it makes their Faces red, and enhances the expence of their Treats, for they consume abundance, and it costs four Livres a Pot, paying so much rather for its goodness than scarcity. When one has drank his Friends health, he gives him the same Glass of that Wine that he may pledg him, which they do easily without the help of Servants, the Tables being cover'd with great Pots of Wine and Glasses, which are as soon fill'd as empty'd: so that an hour or two after this pleasant work begins, it is no less pleasant to see the vast number of Glasses every one has before him, to such a prodigious quantity that it is impossible he should

 drink them off, than to observe the Forms and Figures they stand in, for sometimes they are Squares, sometimes Triangles, sometimes Oblongs, and sometimes Circles; and these Glasses are so variously mov'd, and in so many several Forms, that I cannot believe the motion of the Planets can be more irregular and disagreeing than that which is caus'd by that excellent pleasing white Wine. When they have spent four or five Hours at this notable but not laborious exercise, some of them overcome, fall asleep; others go out to make water, and return more able to carry on the work; others discourse of their brave Actions on the like occasions, and of what Advantages they gain'd over their Companions. But all the Masters do, is nothing compar'd with the behaviour of the Servants, for if they were expensive in eating, they are so much more in drinking, and destroy ten times as much Wine as their Masters, and consequently they commit unparallel'd Insolencies, rubbing the dirty Greasy Plates against the Hangings, tho never so rich, or else against their Masters Hanging-sleeves, without any respect to them or their rich Garments; and to crown the work, they all drink to such a pitch that none of them goes off without feeling the effects of Wine, for Masters, Servants and Musicians are all drunk. Yet they that have the charge of the Plate, are not generally so gorg'd, but that they take care, as near as they can, that no Man shall get out of the House till all the Plate be secur'd by those to whom it is committed: but these Officers generally making use of their time, cannot perform their duty so well as they should, so that there is generally something lost.

To conclude; this is what at present I can call to mind of what I have seen and heard in that Northern Country, as to its Situation, the People inhabiting it, their Religion, Manners, and way of making War; if my memory which has furnish'd me with what hitherto I have found to divert you, shall bring to light any thing else, I shall think worthy to present you with. I shall not forget my duty, but will most willingly acquaint you with it, hoping that if this I have presented you with does not answer your expectation, you will easily excuse my inability to write more politely, which I thought improper for a Souldier, who has spent all his days in throwing up Works, casting of Cannon, and burning of Salt-petre.

To the Reader.

THE Authors of this small Work being two Persons who travel'd not out of any vain Curiosity, or out of any design of gathering Wealth, but only out of a pure zeal to propagate the Christian Religion; it would appear somewhat unchristian to call in question the Truth of their Relation. No worldly Interest could bias them, who propos'd to themselves no Gain, nor indeed were they capable of any, their Profession not permitting them to possess any thing. It is needless to say much in vindication of them; for in truth whosoever reads, will scarce find any thing but what is credible enough, unless they be such Persons as being altogether strangers to the World, will credit nothing but what they see is frequent in their own Country. I do not pretend to apologize for the Book, every Man will give his judgment whatever I can say for it. Therefore all I shall add is, that to some the Account of Congo will not appear so diverting as they perhaps might have conceited it, because they always expect things very surprizing from Countrys very remote. This is not a History of a Country, or of its Conquest, and therefore there are no warlike Expeditions to please the Reader. The People are rude and ignorant, and therefore there are no fine Descriptions of Citys and noble Structures. The Authors were Religious Men, and therefore added no Romantick Invention of their own to make their Writings taking. The Account is very particular, it speaks not only of Congo, but of Brazil and some parts of Europe, the first part being made out of the Letters of F. Michael Angelo who died in Congo, and the rest compos'd by F. Denis who return'd home, and sets down particularly all that befel him there in his way back to Italy. The Translation is faithful, without adding or diminishing in the least; and even the Style of the Authors, which is plain and easy, is follow'd: which is all that I think requisite the Reader should know before he enters upon the Voyage.

A Voyage to Congo, in the Years 1666, and 1667. By the R. R. F. F. Michael Angelo of Gattina, and Denis de Carli of Piacenza, Capuchins, and Apostolick Missioners to the said Kingdom of Congo.

TO satisfy the Curiosity of several Persons, who press me in such an obliging manner as I cannot easily withstand, to give them an exact Account of what I have seen and learn'd during the long Voyage, from which I am lately return'd, I will write a Relation of the Kingdom of Congo and of Africk, where the Duty of my Mission made me acquainted with several strange Customs, and go through abundance of Hardships, omitting at present to speak of Brasil, and some other parts of America, whither we were first carried, and of which I shall say but very little.

The Author appointed for the Mission.

In the year 1666, Alexander the 7th being Pope, fifteen Capuchin Missioners, of which I was one, were dispatch'd by the Cardinals de propaganda fide, and receiv'd the Commissions or Patents at Bononia, where I then resided, at the hands of F. Stephen de Cesa, of the Noble Family of Clermont, whose Virtue has been since rewarded with the Post of General of the said Order. Our Patents contain'd the following Privileges: To dispense with any Irregularity except incur'd by Bigamy, or wilful Murder: To dispense and commute simple Vows even to that of Chastity, but not that of Religion: To dispense with Marriages within the second and third degrees, and for Pagans converted to keep one of their Wives: To absolve in Cases reserv'd to the Pope: To bless Church-stuff, Churches, and Chalice: To give leave to eat Flesh and Whitemeats, and to say two Masses a day in case of necessity: To grant plenary Indulgences: To deliver a Soul out of Purgatory, according to the intention of the Priest, in a Mass for the dead said on Monday and Tuesday: To wear Secular Clothes in case of necessity: To say the Rosary for want of a Breviary, or any other Impediment: To read forbidden Books, except Macchiavel.

As soon as these Letters Patents were deliver'd to me, I set out for Piacenza my Native Country, arriv'd there at the beginning of Advent, and receiv'd Orders to expect F. Michael Angelo of Reggio, who was to be my Companion in this Voyage. He being come, we went together to Genoa, where all the Missioners were to embark: Thence we sail'd for Lisbon, and having resided there some Months, took the opportunity of a Portuguese Vessel bound for Brasil to load there, and sail over to Africk to the Coast of Congo.

We spent three Months in our Passage from Lisbon to Brasil, the fair Winds usually on these Seas befriending us. By the way we had often the satisfaction to see the flying Fishes about our Ship: This is a very white Fish about a foot long, with two Wings or Fins proportionable to the Body; it is not unlike a Herring, save that its back is of an Azure Colour, and its Fins larger, and fitter to serve instead of Wings. This Fish flying from another call'd the Dorado or Dory, which pursues to devour it, springs out of the Water, and flies as long as any moisture is in the Fins, which once dried by the Air it falls back into the Sea, and is devour'd by its Enemy, who never loses sight of it, or else is taken and eaten by the Seamen if it happens to fall into the Ship, or is sometimes catch'd in the Air by some Bird of Prey. So that this wretched Creature, as it were banish'd by Nature, can scarce find any place of safety in the Air, in the Sea, or on the Earth, the delicacy of its flesh being the cause of its unhappiness. There is another sort of Fish in those Seas call'd a Shark,

Shark, very greedy of Man's Flesh: they Angelo. catch it with a Rope and a Chain at the end of it, to which is fastned a strong Hook baited with a piece of Flesh: The Shark perceiving it swallows the Flesh, Hook, and most of the Chain; then the Sailors draw the Head above Water, and batter it with Clubs; after which they bind the Tail where its greatest strength lies, and bringing it aboard cut it in pieces.

Drawing near the Coast of Guinea, we began to feel much heat from the Sun, which is there in the Zenith; and as we went farther it grew so violent, that in a few days we were so weak that we could neither eat nor sleep; and to add to our Sufferings, the Provisions and Drink were full of Maggots. This lasted for fifteen days we sail'd under the Line, so that 'tis a sort of Miracle we should live amidst so many Hardships, tho it was then the Month of August, the most temperate time of the year in those parts.

Spots at Sea. The Portugueses use generally to make some rejoicing, and keep holy-day, to beg of God a good Issue of that dangerous Voyage. They also observe this antient Custom: Those who have never been under the Line are oblig'd to give the Sailors either a piece of Mony, or something to eat or drink, or at least Mony's worth, from which no Man is excused, not even the Capuchins, of whom they take Beads, Agnus Dei's, or such like things; which being expos'd to sale, what they yield is given to say Masses for the Souls in Purgatory. If any Man happen to be such a Miser as to deny paying this Duty, the Sailors cloth'd like Officers carry him bound to a Tribunal, on which a Seaman is seated in a long Robe, who acting the part of a Judge, examines him, hears what he has to say, and gives Judgment against him to be thrice duck'd in the Sea after this manner: The Person condemn'd is ty'd fast with a Rope, and the other end of it run through a Pully at the Yard-Arm, by which he is hoisted up, and then let run amain three times under Water; and there seldom fails to be one or other that gives the rest this Diversion. The same is practis'd in passing the Straits of Gibraltar, and Cape of Good-Hope.

Having pass'd the Line, the Wind still continued right astern, but so very violent, that if it had not pleas'd God we had met with so rapid a Current of Water as stemm'd our furious course, I know not how we could have escap'd. Some time after when we had made considerable way, the Wind calm'd, and consequently we lost that Refreshment we had so much need of in the great Heat, which had not yet ceas'd; this Calm falling out no less unluckily for our Provisions, which we were afraid would soon fall short. What increas'd our Fear was, the Impression remaining in us of the Disaster lately had happen'd to the Ship call'd Catarinetta, which the Reader will not be displeas'd to be acquainted with.

That Vessel being laden with Commo- Strang dities of great value set sail from Goa, count, and meeting with a prosperous Wind, Ship. arriv'd safe in Brazil; whence putting to Sea with as fair a Wind as could be wish'd, it took its Course for Lisbon, but in passing the Line the Master dy'd, overcome with the violent Heat of the Climate, and soon after him all the best Sailors: so that the Ship being left, like a Horse that has shook off the Bridle, to the mercy of the Waves, drove about in a piteous manner upon the Sea for seven Months, which forced such as were left alive, after consuming all their Provisions, to eat the Cats, Dogs, and Rats that were in the Ship, and to dress their Shoos and any other Leather, which they endeavour'd the best they could to make eatable. At last nothing being left, only five remain'd of four hundred Men they were at first. One of these five was the Captain, who being distracted with the dismal thoughts which a miserable Death near at hand is wont to inspire, fancy'd that Death would not be the greatest of his Misfortunes, but that together with his Life he should lose his Reputation; and that Fame which commonly spreads abroad false News, would report, that he was fled into some far Country to make his advantage of the great Treasure he was entrusted with, and enjoy the Fruits of his Dishonesty out of danger. So that being ardently desirous that at least some one of them might survive to carry home the News of their Misfortune, he propos'd to his Companions to cast Lots which of them should be kill'd to serve for Food to the other four. Not one of them contradicted that inhumane Proposal, but only they would exempt their Captain from being subject to the rigour of it. They us'd their utmost endeavours to make him consent; but after much contending, he solemnly swore he would not be exempt from falling a Sacrifice to the rest, if it fell to his lot, since absolute Necessity made that Course just and reasonable. In short, having cast Dice, the Lot fell upon the unhappy Captain, who was already offering up his Soul to God; but the others bewailing their Misfortune, began to conclude it was better they should all die like good Catholicks, than like Barbarians to imbrue their hands in the Blood of their Companion. God inspiring them in return for this good Resolution, one of them went up to the Top-mast Head, from whence looking about on all sides, he spy'd at a great distance something dark, which he told the Captain; who going up with a Prospective Glass, discern'd that it was the Coast of the Continent. They steer'd that way the best they could, and being come up with the Shore, found it was a Port then in peace with Portugal. Being landed, with God's assistance, they went immediately to the Governor, whom they acquainted with their Misfortune. The Governour gave them good entertainment, and furnish'd them with all they stood in need of. During their stay there they were advis'd by Physicians to make use of some Medicines, and proper Restoratives to recover their Health, and return to Sea; yet two of them, more spent than the rest, gave up their Ghosts; the other three, with the help of the good Medicines apply'd, were perfectly recover'd. They gave Thanks to God for his Mercy, and to the Governor for his Civility, refitted their Vessel, and set sail again for Lisbon. As soon as they came thither, one of the three who relaps'd by the way, dy'd. To conclude, the Captain and Sailer that remain'd, landed, and were immediately introduc'd to the King of Portugal, to whom they gave a dismal account of their Adventures, which turn'd to their Advantage; for the King mov'd at their Sufferings, comforted, and gave them Gifts of Value, making the Captain Admiral of the Fleet, and the Sailer Captain of the best Ship.

Now I return to our Voyage.

Being in ten Degrees of South Latitude, we discover'd about Evening Cape S. Augustin at a great distance; and in the Morning it pleas'd God, we saw abundance of Land-Fowls flying near about us, and Whales, which spouting up great streams of Water, at that distance look'd to us like fine Fountains gushing in the midst of the Sea. There are such numbers of them in that Sea, that I shall scarce be believ'd, if I say a Merchant pays the King of Portugal 50000 Crowns in Gold for the Patent to make Oil, tho' it is more true.

Passing by our Lady of Nazareth, we all saluted her with three Ave Maries, and a triple discharge of our Cannon. This Church is but five Miles from the Town of Fernambuco; near to which place Francois de Brito a Portuguese Nobleman, travelling before the Church was built, the good Lord who had a special devotion for the Blessed Virgin, met a poor Woman clad in White, with a Child in her Arms, who humbly begg'd an Alms of him. He putting his hand into his Pocket, gave her a Ducat; and whilst he was giving, and she receiving, the Woman's Face seem'd to him to be altogether chang'd. Brito following on his way at a small distance from the place, as if he were quite surpriz'd at what he had seen, turn'd about several times to see the Person that had won his Heart; but tho' it was a plain Field, where there was no place to be conceal'd, nor any thing to obstruct the sight, he could never see the beautiful Beggar again. This breeding a dissatisfaction in his Mind, he return'd to the very place where he left his Alms, and his Thoughts, and only found the print of two Feet upon the Earth, which made him conclude that the poor Woman was the Blessed Virgin, that had inflam'd his Heart with her Heavenly Eyes, and ravish'd his Soul with her Divine Beauty; and therefore in that very place he erected a stately Church in honour of the most Holy Virgin, endowing it with a Revenue, and Chaplains proportionable to the Worth and Generosity of that noble Gentleman.

When we were under the Tower, which serves as a Fort to the Harbour of Fernambuco, we cast Anchor there, saluting the Town after the usual manner, the Port being too little for Ships to lie in.

The Captain went away in the Pinace, to get leave for us to land. Whilst he was gone, we observ'd that a Wall runs from the Tower, which the People there call Arrecife, which creditable People say is natural, running three hundred Miles, one part of it inclosing the Harbor, and securing it against any Weather. This same Wall in like manner parts the Sea from a River that runs through the middle of the City; and when the Sea grows boisterous, it sometimes raises its Waves above the Wall, mixing its Salt with the fresh Waters of the River, which is the cause that the People catch fresh and salt-Water Fish indifferently in the River, and in the Sea, as if by a sort of Metamorphosis the Sea were become a River, and the River Sea.

Story of Church Brazil.

As

As soon as we landed in the Port of Fernambuco, we saw a great croud of People, as well Blacks as Whites, about us, and among them a Black Woman, who kneel'd, beat her Breast, and clapt her Hands upon the Ground. I enquir'd what the good Woman meant by all those motions with her Hands; and a Portuguese answer'd me: Father, the meaning of it is, that she is of the Kingdom of Congo, and was baptiz'd by a Capuchin; and being inform'd you are going thither to baptize, she rejoices, and expresse her joy by those outward tokens.

In going to the House appointed for our Entertainment, we pass'd through the middle of the Town, which we found to be indifferent for bigness, but very full of People, especially of Black Slaves they bring from Angola, Congo, Dongo, and Mattamba every Year, to the number of 10000, whom they employ about their Tobacco, Sugar-works, and to gather Cotton, abundance of which grows there upon Shrubs, about the height of a Man; as also to cut Wood for Dying of Silk, and other Stuffs of value, and to work in Coco and Ivory.

Indians of America. As for the Original Natives of Brasil, or South America, the Portugueses have not been able to subdue them to this day, they being a People too fierce and barbarous. They call them Tapuges, or Caboclos, and the colour of their Skin is a dark Tawny. They go quite naked, and carry a Bow an Ell and half long, with Arrows made part of Cane, and part of a hard Wood sharpned towards the Point like a Saw, that where it hits it may make the Wound bigger, more troublesome, and be the harder to be drawn out; and it is most certain that when they shoot with a design, and their best, they strike a Board or Plank through and through at a Musket-shot distance. These Tapuges, when they can, eat Man's flesh; and when they have none of their Enemies about them, they feast upon such Strangers as they can catch in their Country.

They wear little bits of Wood and Stone of several Colours set in their Faces; I know not whether for Ornament, or to appear more terrible. At their Ears they have Pendants, not of Lead as our Lap-dogs have, but great pieces of the same sort of Wood. They live upon such Beasts as they hunt, and upon Men; for when any one among them takes his Bed, they assign him a certain time to recover, which if he does not within the time limited, they kill him without mercy and eat him, to put an end charitably to his Sufferings. The same favour or inhumanity they use towards their Parents, and old People, become unfit for Hunting, whom the Children kill and eat with their near Relations, invited by them to that cruel Feast; thus killing those to whom they owe their Life, and burying those in their Bowels, from whose Bowels they came. In short, they are miserable Pagans plung'd in Idolatry. The rest of the Inhabitants of that New World, whether good or bad, are Christians, or at least bear the name.

At the place of our Reception we found two of our Companions sick of a Fever, and we our selves felt some indisposition, which oblig'd us to go into the Doctor's hands, it being usual and almost inevitable for all who come into that Country to fall sick, whether it proceed from the change of Air or Food.

One Morning we heard an admirable Consort of Trumpets all aboard the Fleet, as well within as without the Port, founding, to the number of Eighty Ships, including ours, which was loading with Sugar, of which she carry'd no less than 1000 Chests. Nothing could be pleasanter than that Prospect, which seem'd to represent a Town where the Houses were tost at the pleasure of the Waves, or like a Forest floating about as drove by the Wind. There we receiv'd the news of the death of John Mary Mandelli of Pavia, Prefect to the two Millions of Angola and Congo, who dy'd among those People with the reputation of Sanctity, after enduring a thousand hardships for their Spiritual advantage during 25 Years he liv'd there.

We took a time to go see the Town of Olinda, but three Miles distant from Fernambuco. It was formerly a great Town, but at this time almost ruin'd, since the Dutch made a descent there. In a Marshy Field we were shown certain Trees, which like others have their Roots in the Ground, but have others above, the Leaves being all cover'd with them. There we saw abundance of great Parrots, several sorts of Macacos, that is Monkeys or Apes, of which the least call'd Sagorini are most valu'd. We went this way in a Canoo, which is a large Trunk of a Tree hollow'd; and our Watermen were two Blacks, naked like the People of Brasil, having only a little Rag before them for decency.

The temper of that Climate tho very hot is not bad, nor the great dampness of the Moon dangerous, so that there is good travelling enough by night as well as by day. Silver and Gold Money in this Town goes as it does in other parts of Brazil, they give two Testons for a Mass, and thirty or forty for a Sermon. The Country produces neither Wheat nor Wine, but there is enough carry'd out of Europe, and sold dear enough. The Ground being sandy, the Natives and Travellers are troubled with a kind of Insects, which some call Pharaoh's Lice, alledging that was one of the ten Plagues wherewith God formerly punish'd Egypt. They are less than Lice, and work themselves insensibly in between the flesh and the skin, and in a days time grow as big as a Kidney-bean, or other small Bean. Some experienced Black undertakes the cure, for were they left unregarded, they would corrupt all the Foot in a very short time. Observing two days after I came, that something hinder'd my walking, I caus'd a Black to search me, who took out four of those Insects pretty big grown, and there was not a day but they came and took out ten or twelve apiece from us. It is no small misfortune, if any one escapes undiscover'd by the Blacks, for they gnaw and torment the Feet.

During our stay at Ternambuco there was a great Feast of the Rosary kept in the Great Church call'd Corpo Santo, or the Holy Body. The Order of it was very magnificent. The Church was hung with 10000 Ells of Silk of a Fire-colour, and other rich Stuffs: The Tabernacle which was lofty, cover'd with Silk embroider'd full of Flames of Gold, and a Silver Galloon over it, which dazled the Eyes: The Musick of Harps, Violins, and Cornets, making a Consort to the Holy Hymns. The Religious are not at this great Expence, but chuse the richest Merchant in the City, who looks upon it as a point of Honour to open his Purse freely upon such an occasion. He that bore the charge that Year, protested to us the next day, that he had spent 4000 Ducats in Bonfires, the night before; but he meant thus: We being impatient to go over into Africk as soon as possible to perform the duty of our Mission, went to see that Merchant, who had a great kindness for us, to beg of him that when a Ship of his bound for Africk, was laden and ready to sail, he would be so charitable as to assign us the great Cabin to go in, which he readily granted. The Vessel being found unfit for the Voyage, was unloaded, all the Iron-work and Rigging taken out, and the Timber burnt, which he said cost him four thousand Ducats, that being the cost of the Ship. Ang

To divert us we went one day to see Sugar-works, which is a great curiosiry. The Engine they use is a great Wheel turn'd violently about by a number of Blacks; it turns a Press of massy Iron, in which the Sugar-canes cut in pieces are bruise'd, the moisture that runs from them falling into a great Cauldron over the Fire. It is wonderful to see the Blacks, who are naturally lazy, labour so hard, and clap the Canes so dexterously under that mass of Iron, without leaving their Hands or Arms behind them.

The Fruit in that Country, which generally lasts all the Year upon the Trees, is very delicious, and among the rest the Niceffes, which are like our Lemmons. They grow on a stalk like an Indian Cane, and two of its Leaves would clothe the biggest Man. This Stalk sometimes produces but one Bunch, in which there are about fifty Niceffes. To ripen them, they must be cut off Green and hung in the Air, where they grow Yellow in a little time. When they are cut through the middle, there appears on both sides the exact Figure of a Crucifix. When the Bunch is cut off, the Stalk withers, and another soon grows out of the same Root. The Bananas is much of the same nature, only the Niceffe is three Foot high, and the Banana twice as much.

The Ananas are like a Pine-apple, about a span long, and the Plant produces but one. The Rind being taken off, they look Yellow, and the Juice of them is like that of a Muscadine Grape, but it must be eaten with moderation, being hot in the third degree. There are other sorts of Fruit, as that call'd Fruta do Conde, or the Count's Fruit, which grows on a Plant as high as an Orange-tree, of a very pleasant flavour. Manaquas, like our small Melons, and growing on very large Trees. Marracoupas, like a great round Apple, and Yellow without, of which I sent the Draughts, as I did of several other curious sorts of Fruits, to the Sieur Jaques Zanoni Apothecary of Bononia, who will make them publick in his Book of Plants now in the Press.

As for European Fruits, such as Grapes, Pomgranates, Melons, Figs, Gourds, Cucumbers, Oranges, Lemmons and Citrons, they grow there to a wonder; and these last are like our Gourds in Italy, by reason of the goodness of the radical moisture of the Earth. So the Portuguese Orange-trees do not only multiply there,

Angelo. but improve very much ; and the young Plants grow up to vast high Trees. Little other Meat is eaten there but Beef and some Pullets. Wine is dearer than Saffron, for it is brought from the Maderas, that is above 650 Leagues, and pays above eight Pistols a Pipe Custom. All the Whites in that Country are either Portugueses, or descended from them, and drink little Wine. The Commonalty drink all Water, which is none of the best. Instead of Bread they eat Cakes made of the Meal of a Root call'd Manioca. In that Country there are properly but two Seasons, Spring which is temperate enough but rainy, during which the Trees don't lose their Leaves ; and Summer, which is very hot and dry, inasmuch that did not the Dew make some amends, the Country would be quite dry'd and parch'd up. The Town of S. Paul, and Country about it, which lies furthest up in Brasil, may be call'd the true Lubberland, or Country of Pleasure. Any Stranger that comes thither, tho never so poor, is welcome, and presently meets with a Wife to his liking, provided he submit to the Conditions, which are to think of nothing but Eating, Drinking, and Walking, but particularly of being kind to no Woman but his own. If he gives the least cause to suspect he will make his escape, she certainly poisons him ; but if he agrees well with her, he is cherish'd and made much of, every one striving to out-do another in kindness.

Their Wealth comes out of a River that waters the Country, and which is so rich, that it can relieve the miserablest Wretch who implores its assistance ; for they need only take the Sand of the River, and separate the Gold from it, which abundantly requites their trouble, there being only the fifth part due to the King by way of acknowledgment. Much more curious and extraordinary is reported of that Country ; but not having been there my self, because it lies in the furthest part of Brasil, and near to the River of Plate, I dare not avouch all for truth, tho in reality nothing ought to appear incredible to those who are well acquainted with the extravagant Customs, and absurd Manners of those Barbarous Nations.

At length on the second of November 1667, we set Sail for the Kingdom of Congo, and were forced to avoid contrary Winds to run into 29 Degrees of South Latitude, even with the Cape of Good Hope, which might better be call'd

the Cape of Death, because of the continual fear of death they are in who come near it. For the space of eight days we were toss'd in a terrible manner ; sometimes lifted up to the Clouds, and sometimes cast down to the deep, either way dreading to perish. At last the Wind fell, the Waves settled, and we saw some Bones of Cuttle-fish, which the Goldsmiths make use of for Casting, float upon the Water, esteem'd a token of fair Weather, and of being within sixty Leagues of the Continent, that Fish never going far from shore.

In short, next day we saw Land, and began to hope well of the success of our Voyage, because there are never any Storms on that Coast, and Ships may run along within Musket-shot of it, without any danger of Sands. Our Boat being out for several days, founding to discover some Rocks that lie under Water along the Shore ; we fish'd as we went, and always brought aboard a great deal of Fish. Among the rest we caught one that weigh'd about 15 or 16 Pound, which the Captain said he would treat us with. The colour of it was Red, the Head large and round, the Eyes sparkling like fire, the Nostrils flat upon the Forehead, the Fins beating, the Scales rustling together, the whole Body tossing and puffing in a hideous manner. The Captain knowing it to be one of the most delicious Fishes in those Seas, would dress it for us himself, making a sort of white Sauce with Sugar, Spice, and Juice of Oranges and Lemmons ; so that it being all like a Dish of Curds, we eat it with Spoons, and could not distinguish whether the Sauce made the Fish good, or the Fish mended the Sauce.

I had a great mind to go ashore, but the Master would not suffer it, assuring me there were Blacks along that Coast that eat Man's flesh. We discover'd two of them, who as soon as they saw us, ran away far enough, which made the Master put off from Shore, for fear those Blacks were gone to call some Magician to sink our Boat, and seize us. Some days after the Master went out of the Boat ashore to comply with some Corporal necessity ; but as soon as he got behind a little Rock, he ran back to the Water, out of breath, calling to us to come to his assistance, as we did with all possible speed. The cause of his fright was that behind the Rock he saw a Fire lighted, near to which there was a string of Fishes a drying, a certain token that some Blacks liv'd near, which so terrify'd him, that for-forgetting the need he was in, he had no occasion for three days after.

When we had pass'd that Coast, which is hideous to look to by reason of a long Ridg of barren Mountains, about the Latitude of 14 Degrees we discover'd some green Trees, and a pleasanter Shore, in which there were good Ports made by Nature, capable of containing two or three thousand Ships. Upon Christmas Eve we touch'd at Benguela, Capital of the Kingdom of the same name, where there is a Portuguese Governour and Garison; and we found about two hundred white Inhabitants, and abundance of Blacks. The Houses are built with Mud and Straw, the Church and Fort being made of no better Materials.

Abundance of small Boats came aboard us, each carrying two Black Fishermen, who came to exchange Fish with the Seamen for Brazil Roll-Tobacco.

The Father Superior and I went ashore, where I preach'd the first time in Portuguese. The temper of that Climate is so bad, that it gives the Food the Country produces so pernicious a quality, that those who eat of it at their first coming certainly die, or at least contract some dangerous Distemper; which is the reason that Passengers take care not to go ashore, nor to drink the Water, which looks like Lye. This made us unwilling to accept of the Dinner the Governour invited us to, tho he assur'd us there should be none of the Country Provisions, and we should drink Wine brought by Sea; which he perform'd, giving us a Treat altogether after the fashion of Europe. After which he further express'd his Kindness, sending very good European Fruit aboard after us, with a whole Beef head, but little, and without Horns, very well tasted, as is all the Meat of the Country, whereof there is great plenty and very cheap.

Any body that sees the Whites who live in that Country, may easily discern how little that Air agrees with them; they look as if they were dug out of their Graves, their Voices are broken, and they hold their Breath in a manner between their Teeth; which made me, in the most obliging manner I could, refuse the Governor's Request, who wanting Priests would have kept me there some time to administer the Holy Mysteries. The Courts at Lisbon, as a Punishment for some hainous Crime, often banish Criminals to Angola and Benguela, looking upon those Countrys as the most wretched and infectious of any the Portugueses possess: Therefore the Whites there are the most deceitful and wickedest of Men. Angelo.

Having taken leave of the Governor, we went aboard again, and proceeded on our Voyage, which we ended happily before the Wind, arriving on Twelfth-day at the Port of Loanda, which is the finest and largest I ever yet saw. My Companion and I landed, and were receiv'd by an infinite number of Whites and Blacks, who strove to outdo one another in expressing their Joy for our arrival, kissing our Habits, and embracing us. Attended by this Croud, we proceeded to our Hospitium or House for our reception, in the Church whereof we found above three hundred Persons, with the chief Men of the Town, who came out to meet us. Having ador'd the Blessed Sacrament, and return'd Thanks to God for our prosperous Voyage, we went into the Convent, where we found three Fathers, an old Layman threescore and ten years of Age, an under-Guardian of Congo recovering after a fit of Sickness, and one of Angola in a Fever. We were inform'd, to our great regret, that two Religious Men of our Company, who came away a little before us from Genoa, dy'd both of them as soon as they arriv'd, one at Loanda, and the other at Messangrana not far off. Those Fathers, who were of a vigorous Constitution, now enjoy the Reward of their pious Intention, which they had not the power to put in execution, being prevented by Death. Soon after the Sub-Guardian of Congo intended to set out and conduct me and my Companion to the County of Songo, and thence to the County of Bamba, there to be expos'd to all those Fatigues for which we had prepar'd our selves. The County of Bamba is no less in extent than the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily together.

Loanda is an Island and Town of the same name, being the Capital of all those Countries the Portugueses possess in those vast Regions of the Blacks. The Dutch once made themselves masters of it, but the Portugueses with much bravery beat them out. There is a good number of Jesuits, who are allow'd by the King of Portugal a Pension of 2000 Cruzadoes a Year, that is, 266 l. 13 s. 4 d. They keep Schools, preach, and perform other Functions for the Salvation of Souls. To requite their Labours, the People of that Country have given them the Property of several Houses, and of 12000 Slaves of sundry Trades, as Smiths, Joiners, Turners, and Stone-cutters, who when they have

Angelo. no Employment at home, serve the Publick, and bring their Masters in a Cruza do a day. We also found Carmelites there, and some of the third Order of S. Francis, all of them religious Men, of a very explanatory Life.

The City Loanda is large and beautiful enough. The Houses of the Whites are of Lime and Stone, and cover'd with Tiles; those of the Blacks are of Mud and Straw. One part of the City stretches to the brink of the Sea, the other rises up to the top of the Hill. There are about 3000 Whites, and a prodigious multitude of Blacks, whose number is not known: They serve as Slaves to the Whites, some of whom have fifty, some an hundred, two or three hundred, and even to three thousand. He who has most is richest, for they being all of some Calling, when their Masters have no use for them, they go work with any that wants them; and besides, saving their Masters their Diet, they bring home their Earnings.

The Whites when they go about the Town, are follow'd by two Blacks, with an Hammock of Network, which is the conveniency us'd for carrying of People even when they travel. Another Black walks by his Master's side, holding a large Umbrello over him to keep off the Sun, which is violent hot. When any two that have business meet, they join their Umbrelloes, and walk side by side in the shade. When the White Women go abroad, which is very seldom, they are carry'd in a cover'd Net, as is us'd in Brazil, with attendance of Slaves. The Slaves, both Men and Women, kneel when they speak to their Master.

At Loanda they eat abundance of Fish, Cow-beef, which is the best sort of Flesh, Goat and Mutton. Each of the last may be said to have five Quarters, the Tail being the biggest of them; but it is not wholesom because of its great fatness, nor indeed is any Flesh in that Country. Instead of Bread they use the Root of Manjoza, as they do at Brazil, and Indian Wheat, of which they make little Cakes, and other things of Paste, which yet are not so good as Bread. The Water they drink is very bad: It is brought from a neighbouring Island, where they dig a Trench even with the Sea, and the Water freshens as it strains through the Sand, but not thoroughly. Else they go for it to a River twelve or fourteen miles from Loanda, and load their Canoos, which are Boats made of one piece of Timber. These Canoos have a hole at the bottom, which they open when they are in the River, and stop it up when the Canoo is full enough. When they come home, they strain it from the dirt, and let it stand some days to settle. Wine brought from Europe is sold for 60 Mil Reys the Pipe, that is 20 pounds Sterling; when there is a Scarcity, it rises to 100 Mil Reys a Pipe, and sometimes there is none at all to be had.

There is but little Money passes in that Country; but instead of it they buy and sell with Maccutes, Birames, and Indian Pieces, or Muleches. The Maccutes are pieces of Cloth made of Straw a yard long, ten of which are worth 100 Reys. The Birames are pieces of coarse Cotton Cloth made in the Indies five Ells long, and cost 200 Reys the Piece. The Indian Pieces, or Muleches, are young Blacks about 20 years of Age, worth 20 Mil Reys each. If they are younger, they are valu'd by People who have judgment in them. Young Women are of the same Value as Men. Besides these there are Shells they call Zimbi which come from Congo, for which all things are to be bought as if they were Money; two thousand of them are worth a Maccute. The People of Congo value these Shells, tho they are of no use to them, but only to trade with other Africans who adore the Sea, and call these Shells which their Country does not afford, God's Children: For which reason they look upon them as a Treasure, and take them in exchange for any sort of Goods they have. Among them he is richest and happiest who has most of them.

The Inhabitants of Loanda courted us to stay with them for a Year at least, to use our selves to the Air and Provisions, before we ventur'd further into those Deserts and unhealthy Countrys of Bamba, where our Lives would be in danger. We answer'd, it would be a happy exchange to meet with Death that would purchase us true Life, and to lose our Bodys to find so many Souls, for whose Salvation Providence had brought us thither.

All that follows to the End is writ by F. Denis Carli.

Carli.

<sup>dom of</sup> WE set out both of us for our Mission of Bamba, where a great Duke subject to the King of Congo resided; for in that Kingdom there are five <sup>ince of</sup> <sup>va-</sup> Provinces. The first is that of S. Salvador, or S. Saviour, where the King of Congo, whose name is D. Alvaro, resides. It takes name of the capital City call'd S. Salvador, which is best seated, and in the wholesomest Air in the Kingdom, built upon a Hill. In it there are scarce any Flies or Gnats, Fleas or Bugs, as there are in the rest of the Kingdom; but it is not free from Ants, which are very troublesome. The King's Palace is almost a League in compass. Formerly it was the only House that was boarded, but the Portugueses who have settled there have put the Great Men in the way of adorning and furnishing their Houses. The Cathedral is built with Stone like those of our Lady, S. Peter and S. Anthony of Padua, in which are the Tombs of the Kings of Congo. That of the Jesuits dedicated to S. Ignatius is not the meanest. Our Lady of Victory is made of Mud, but whitened both within and without; it was given to the Capuchins by King Alphonso the Third. The second Province is that of Bamba, where the Great Duke call'd D. Theodosio rules. The Third that of Sondi, where there is another Duke. The Fourth that of Pemba, where a Marquess resides; and the Fifth that of Songo, in which there is a Count who has not own'd the King of Congo for some Years: He resides in the Town of Songo, a League from the River Zaire.

Having provided all things necessary, F. Michael Angelo and I went aboard, and coasting along the Continent, in two days came to Dante, on the Frontiers of the Kingdom of Angola, where the Portugueses have a Fort. We went to wait upon the Governour, and shew'd him the Letters we brought from the Lords of the Council of Loanda, who then govern'd the Kingdom, the Viceroy that was expected not being yet come; they were Letters of Recommendation for him to help us to Blacks to carry us and our Goods. During two days we stay'd there, the Governor sent out a fishing; and salted the Fish for us; and among other sorts there were Soles and Pilchards above a Span long. Our Provision being ready, and thirty Blacks appointed to carry us and our Equipage, Hammocks were provided for us; the Gentlemen of that City giving us to understand, that it was impossible for us to go afoot, being clad and equipp'd as we were: so that there being no other Remedy, we comply'd with the Custom of the Country.

We set out, and there being no great <sup>Way of</sup> <sup>Travelling.</sup> Roads in those wild Countrys, but only Paths, were forced to go in File. Some Blacks went before us with their Burdens, next F. Michael in his Hammock follow'd by some Blacks; then came I carry'd in my Net, which to me seem'd an easy sort of Carriage; and after me follow'd the rest of the Blacks, to relieve those that carry when they are weary. It is wonderful to see how soft they go tho' loaded. They were arm'd with Bows and Arrows, and were to carry us to one of their Towns, which in their Language they call Libartes, as we shall always call them in this Relation. There we were to provide other Carriers.

The Lord or Governour of the Libarte, whom in their Language they call the Macolonte, came immediately to visit us, and assign'd us two of the best Cottages in the place; for throughout all the Kingdom there is never a stone House, <sup>How the</sup> <sup>People</sup> <sup>live.</sup> but only of Straw and Stubble; and the finest are of mud Walls, and thatch'd, most of them without Windows, the Door serving for a Window. We must except the City of S. Salvador, as was said above.

The Macolonte was clad after this manner: He only wore a Clout of the bigness of a Handkerchief made of Palm-tree Leaves, for decency-sake, to cover that which modesty requires should be cover'd, and a Cloke of European Cloth reaching down to the ground; it was Blue, a Colour much esteem'd among them; the rest of his Body was naked. The Blacks that attended the Macolonte, and who were his Officers, had only one of those Handkerchiefs, which they send to be dy'd Blue at Loanda: The rest of the People had only Leaves of Trees, and Monkeys Skins; and those who live in the open Country, and lie under the Trees, whether Men or Women, wear nothing at all, but go quite naked without any sense of Shame.

This first Libarte was pretty large, consisting of about a hundred Cottages, separate from one another, and without any

Carli. any order : It may be said they don't live in them in the day-time, for the Men go abroad a walking, to take their Diversion, to converse together, and play upon certain Instruments, which are wretched and ridiculous enough, till night, being altogether strangers to Melancholy. The Women on the other side, go out in the morning to till the Ground, carry a Basket at their backs, into which they put a black earthen Pot, which they call Quiousou, and one of their Children, carrying the youngest in their Arms, who takes the Breast without the Mother's help. They lead one by the hand, and very often carry another in their Belly, for these People are fruitful and incontinent. The rest of the Children, if there be more, follow the Mother ; but when they are grown somewhat big, they let them go where they will, without taking any more care of them than if they were not their Children.

We presented the Macolonte with a string of Beads of Venice Glass, which they call Missanga, and hang about their Neck, having no Pocket or other place to keep it. The Macolonte having received and returned his Compliments, sends a Black all about the Libatte, to order the Inhabitants to bring their Children to be baptized ; the Youth being almost all baptized before, we having had that Mission thirty Years. They acquaint them that a Capuchin is come, whom in their Language they call Gramga, adding, by way of respect, the word Fomet, which is as much as Father, or Master. As soon as they hear of our coming, they all flock in, bringing their Children, and by way of Alms two of their Handkerchiefs of Palm-tree Leaves, or else 3500 little Shells, which, as has been said, is the Money of the Country, called by them Zimbi ; or else a Pullet, for a quantity of them was once carried thither, but the Wars have almost destroyed them. They also bring a little Salt upon a Leaf to bless the Water, and give one of the Presents above-mentioned for baptizing their Children ; and if they have nothing to give, they are christened for God's sake. In this first place we baptized thirty, each of us fifteen, to our great satisfaction, they being the first we had made Christians. I spoke to the Macolonte to prepare things to say Mass next day ; and immediately he sent out several Blacks to cut Wood, and Palm-tree Leaves, wherewith they erected a little green Chappel, as was the Altar, I having given them the height, and breadth ; and then we furnished it, all the Missioners carrying a Chest along with them, containing all things necessary for the Holy Sacrifice. Whilst my Companion said Mass, the Macolonte sent notice to other Blacks that were at a small distance from thence, who came time enough to hear the second Mass : after which we baptized ten Children of that neighbouring Libatte. There was a great number of People present, the Chappel having been erected on a rising ground, to the end they might at least see, if they could not hear the Mass. Next we catechized, dividing the People into two parts, and explaining what we said to them by the help of an Interpreter.

That done, they fell a playing upon several Instruments, a dancing, and shouting so loud, that they might be heard half a League off. I will describe but A Musical Instrument, one of their Instruments, which is the most ingenious and agreeable of them all, and the chief of those in use among them. They take a piece of a Stake, which they tie and bend like a Bow, and bind to it fifteen long, dry, and empty Gourds, or Calabashes of several sizes, to sound several Notes, with a hole at top, and a lesser hole four fingers lower, and stop it up half way, covering also that at the top with a little thin bit of Board, somewhat lifted above the hole. Then they take a Cord made of the Bark of a Tree, and fastning it to both ends of the Instrument, hang it about their Neck. To play upon it they use two Sticks, the ends whereof are covered with a bit of Rag, with which they strike upon those little Boards, and so make the Gourds gather Wind, which in some manner resembles the sound of an Organ, and makes a pretty agreeable Harmony, especially when three or four of them play together.

They beat their Drums with open Drums. hand, and they are made after this manner : They cut the Trunk of a Tree three quarters of an Ell long, or more ; for when they hang them about their Necks, they reach down almost to the ground. They hollow it within, and cover it top and bottom with the Skin of a Tiger, or some other Beast, which makes a hideous noise when they beat it after their manner.

The Gentlemen or Gentlemen's Sons, carry in their hand two Iron Bells, such as the Cattel among us wear, and strike sometimes the one, sometimes the other, with a Stick, which is seldom seen among them, this Instrument being only carried ry'd by the Sons of Great Men, who are not very numerous among them.

We preparing to be gone, our Macosiste made a sign for his Blacks to stand still, and be silent, which was done in a moment, and they had need enough of it, being all in a sweat. Having given them our Blessing we set out, and they began afresh to play, dance and hollow, so that we could hear them two miles off, not without surprize and satisfaction, it being a Comfort of so many curious, and to us strange Instruments.

By the way we saw several sorts of Creatures, particularly little Monkeys, and abundance of Apes of divers Colours, who all fled to the tops of the highest Trees. We discover'd two Pacasses, Beasts somewhat like Buffaloes, that roar like Lions: The Male and Female go always together, they are white, with black and red Spots; have Ears half an Ell long, and their Horns streight: When they see any body, they neither run away, nor do any harm, but look upon such as pass by. We saw another Beast with black and yellow Hair upon a Mountain; the Interpreter told us it was a Leopard, but it was far enough from us. There is also in those Parts a Beast shap'd like, and as strong as a Mule; but its Hair is distinguish'd by white, black, and yellow Streaks, which go round the Body from the Back-bone under the Belly, which is very beautiful, and looks as if it were done by Art, it is call'd Zebra.

Going on our Journey we came, before we were aware of it, upon a Beast that lay asleep, and was wak'd by the shouting of the Blacks as they travel; it rose, took a great leap, and fled; the Body was like that of a Wolf, whereof there are abundance, but its Head was like a Bullock, which is disproportionable and frightful to behold: I ask'd what Beast it was, and they assur'd me it must be some Monster. There were abundance of Beasts like our Goats, which ran away, and then staid for one another; and a multitude of wild Hens, bigger than the tame, which taste like a Hare.

Nothing extraordinary hapned to us at the second Libatte, and we did there as we had done at the first. One Night when we were got into one of those Libattes, they shut the Door which was made of dry'd Thorns, all the Inclosure, like the Walls of our Towns, being Hedges of Thorn as high as a Pike. Cottages were assign'd us to pass the Night; but the Heat being excessive, I chose rather to lie in the open Air in my Hammock, fastning one end of it to the top of the Cottage, and the other to two Poles set up across one another; F. Michael Angelo did so too. About Midnight came three Lions roaring that they made the Earth shake, which wak'd me thoroughly; and had it not been for the thorny Hedges, F. Denis had never seen Italy again. I lifted up my Head to try whether by the Moon-light I could discern one of them; but the Hedges was so close and full of Leaves, that I could perceive nothing, tho I was sensible they were not far from it. I was almost resolv'd to go back into the Cottage, but thinking it impossible they should leap such high Hedges, I lay quiet till day, not without panting for fear now and then. Day being come, I went to ask F. Michael Angelo, who was in a Cottage hard by, whether he had heard the Lions in the Night; to which he answer'd, he never slept better, because the Night was fresh, and had heard nothing. You are happy, said I, for if they had broke in, you had gone to Heaven without knowing which way. He reply'd, That God's Providence always watches over his Elect, and that it was not his Will that they should be expos'd to the cruelty of those merciless Beasts.

After baptizing several Children we set out, and having travell'd till Noon, the Blacks told us we must stay and rest, there being a little River of good Water hard by. Being set down, we got into the shade under some Trees, there to make ready our Dinner. Some of our Men went to gather Buck-wheat, others to bring Wood to make Fire. F. Michael Angelo would have made use of his Steel to light it; but a Black who was Cook, said, Father, we have no need of that; and taking a piece of Wood about two fingers thick, with many holes in it which did not go quite through, then taking another little Stick about the thickness of ones Finger, and putting it into one of those holes, turn'd, rub'd the two Sticks hastily one against another with both hands, and the little one took fire, which is their way of lighting it. The others who came loaded with Buck-wheat, shook it out of the Ear, and put it into four Pots to make Broth, and boil'd Batataes, which are tolerable good Roots.

Whilst every one was busy about the Cookery, on a sudden we discover'd an Elephant, not much less than a Cart loaden with Hay in Lombardy, his Head hanging a little, one of his Teeth being already already dropt: All the Blacks got up hastily, and laying hold of their Bows, began to let fly Arrows at him with their usual Cries; but one of them more cunning than the rest, took a Firebrand and ran to set fire to a neighbouring thatch'd Cottage: The Elephant seeing that great Flame presently fled with three Arrows in his Body. The Fire of the Cottage being spread by the Wind laid hold of the next Herbage, which being dry'd up with the excessive heat of the Sun, and very high, burnt so that the Conflagration spread for above a League, consuming the Grass, Trees, and all it met with; so that all the Beasts thereabouts being frightened, we could continue our Journey to the next Libatte in all manner of safety, tho now and then my Fancy represented to me that terrible Beast which frightened us.

Another day being upon our Journey, we saw a great Serpent draw near to us; it was without any Hyperbole 25 foot long, which I should not be so ready to assert, had I not seen and measur'd the Skin of such another, nothing inferior to it, which was presented to F. Michael Angelo, and which he sent with some other Curiosities to his Father. This Creature had a Head as big as a Calf, and what frightened us more was, that it came along the same Path we were upon. The Blacks according to custom gave a great shout, and striking out of the way, made us go up a rising ground to give it time either to go back or move forwards. I observ'd that in going on it made as much Herbage shake, as if there had been twenty People. We waited above an hour for it to pass, after which we came down and went on our way. F. Michael told me in Italian, that he might not be understood; I thought being so many of us we were safe, but I perceive these Blacks are more fearful than we. To which I answer'd, We were to expect no further Assistance from them but what their Heels could afford us, carrying us the best they could, and rather flying from Enemies than attacking them. And to say the truth, we often wish'd we had brought a Gun along with us, which would have been very useful, being often at such a non-plus and in so great danger, that without God's special Assistance we could never have come off, being forced throughout the Journey either to fly, or to fire the Herbage to secure our selves from wild Beasts.

One day as we drew near a River, where we were told there was never a Libatte, but only two thatch'd Houses, to entertain and lodge the Blacks that go from Loanda to S. Salvador the Capital of the Kingdom, being come within sight of the River, we discover'd a number of Cottages, and heard a great noise of People sounding Trumpets, and playing on Drums, Fifes, and other Instruments. The Blacks halting a little, said, Perhaps that might be the great Duke Lord of the Province; but coming up, we perceiv'd they were all new Cottages encompass'd with a thick Hedge of Thorns to secure them against the wild Beasts that come to drink at the Rivers. We ask'd a Black what there was in that place, and he told us there was the Brother of the Captain-Major of Dante, of whom mention has been made before. That Gentleman hearing of our approach, sent four Mulattoes with Muskets to meet us. Mulattoes are the Children of a White and a Black: With them came many Blacks with Fifes and Trumpets. We went to wait upon that Gentleman, who receiv'd us with much Courtesy, and told us that every Evening wheresoever Night came upon him, he caus'd such a Village to be built enclos'd with Thorns.

That worthy Gentleman show'd us a-bundance of respect, and treated us with Pullets and Fruit of the Country. We would have staid there till he was gone, especially because there was no Libatte on the other side of the River; but he said it was better we should cross whilst he was present, because there were several Blacks well acquainted with those parts, who would take care we should receive no harm. He bore us company to the River with all the Instruments, and there was such a multitude of People with him, that a Man would have thought it had been the King of Ethiopia, there being above 1800 Men, besides Women and Children, which was the reason we had been forced to stay two days at Dante, where we found not Men enow to bear us company. He had so much patience as to see us carried over and out of danger; and having saluted him, he turn'd to his Cottage, where he caus'd his People to make ready to march, which we had the pleasure to see. Among the rest he had 24 Mulattoes, who are bold, daring, and undaunted Fellows in all dangers; they were arm'd with Muskets and Scimeters, the Blacks had Bows and Arrows, and Half-pikes: The Instruments sounded, and the Cries were redoubled at their departure, which made us admire to see see with what State and Attendance great Men travel in those parts.

• We went from the River, and the Sun being very low, had scarce travell'd half a Mile when we stopp'd at the two Cottages, but perceiv'd we should not be very safe there from wild Beasts, because there were no Thorny Hedges, only four Trees where Watch might be kept, and where we might rest that night, there being little Huts on the tops of them. The Blacks told us we might go into one of the Cottages, and that some of them would stand Sentinel all night upon the Trees, and the rest would go into the other Hut. F. Michael Angelo said we should be safer if we got up the Trees; but the Blacks assur'd us we could not sleep there, telling us we need not take care, for they would watch all night in their turns. We went into the best Cottage, and caus'd some Straw to be brought to lie on, as we did, after eating of what that Black Gentleman had charitably bestow'd on us, and giving thanks to God for having brought us safe so far. After making the sign of the Cross we gave our selves up to sleep.

About midnight we were disturb'd by a Lion and the Tiger that came sporting together towards our Huts; and perceiving their roaring drew nearer and nearer, I ask'd my Companion, whether he had heard the Lion? Too much of it, said he, and it would not be amiss whatsoever may happen that we should hear one another's Confessions. Having done so, we look'd through the Crevices of the Cottage whether we could perceive them by the light of the Moon: It was easy to see them, they not being a stones throw off; and any body may believe it was not without some heart-aking that we silently expected how God would be pleas'd to dispose of us. We heard the Blacks on the Trees, and those in the other Cottage talk together; and soon after they lighted fire, which made those Beasts fly towards the River. Thus were we again deliver'd from that danger, through the Mercy of God, to whom we had heartily recommended our selves.

The next day, having travell'd half our Journey to the next Libatte, we heard a great noise of People, and drawing near them, found they were Blacks carrying a Portuguese to be Canon of S. Saviour, where the Cathedral of all the Country is. Having view'd him, and remembring we had seen one another at Loanda, where he came every day to say Mass in our Church, we express the great satisfaction we receiv'd in meeting so fortunately, and travell'd together the remaining part of the day. We ask'd him how he could leave so fine a City as Lisbon his Native Country, to come into those wretched and desert Countries. To which he answer'd he had a good Pension allow'd him of 50 Mil. Reys a year, which is about 17 l. Sterling. I would not undertake such a Task, said I to him, for a thousand Millions of Gold. What do you come to do here then, quoth he? It is for the Love of God and of our Neighbour, reply'd we, that we left Italy; and we shall think all our Care and Fatigues sufficiently rewarded, if but one Soul purchases Heaven through our means. Discouraging in this manner we came to the Libatte, where we found but few People, which troubled us, because there were not Blacks enough to convey us all; which made us desire the Canon to go before, and we would stay till his Carriers came back, but we could never prevail with him, tho it had prov'd better for him, for he dy'd a few days after at Bombi, whence we were gone before he came, and where we might have comforted and done the last Duties towards him, if he were past the others.

Bombi is a very great Libatte, where there resides a Marquess subject to the great Duke of Bamba, as he is to the King of Congo. There we found a Son of the Marquess who spoke Portuguese, and offer'd to go along and be our Interpreter, not only on our Journey, but during our stay at Bamba, which we accepted of with the consent of his Father the Marquess. When the Sun was up, we set out better pleas'd than before, because we had that Youth of 25 years of Age with us, who express'd himself well in Portuguese; yet we suffer'd never the less for that, for when we least thought of it, we perceiv'd at a distance a great Fire the Blacks had lighted among the Herbage, which running on before the Wind, drove all the wild Beasts towards us: Our Men said, Fathers, we must shun the Fury of these Beasts, for perhaps there are Lions and Tigers among them. the best way is to climb the Trees. Hearing this, and being sensible there was no other Remedy, we open'd one of our Trunks, and took out a Ladder of Ropes made in Brazil; then we made a Black get up a Tree to fasten it, after which my Companion and I, and the Marquess's Son went up, drawing up the Ladder after us, all the rest getting up other Trees. And in truth we were in the right not to lose

Carli. time, for that troop of wild Beasts was with us immediately, and their number was so great, that as many as we were we should all of us have scarce made one good Meal for them. There were Tigers, Lions, Wolves, Pocasses and Rhinocerosies, which have a Horn over their Nose, and several other sorts of Creatures, who as they passed by lifted up their Heads, and look'd at us. Our Blacks who had Arrows for the most poison'd with Juice of Herbs, wounded some of them, but that did not make them run so much as the Fire they felt drawing near. This danger being pass'd we came down, and went on our way, giving thanks to God for having deliver'd us from such danger of Death.

The next day we came to a Libatte, where we found but very few People; they told us they were gone to the War with the Duke of Bamba against the Count of Songo, who had been long revolted against the King of Congo: That after some were destroy'd on both sides, the rest concluded a Truce, and some time after took up Arms again.

There being but few Men in that place, we resolv'd to part, that so one might expect the return of those that carried him who went first. F. Michael Angelo offer'd to go before, our Residence at Bamba not being far off, and send me twenty Men from thence to carry me and our Burden which was to remain behind. I staid six days with the Marquess's Son, both of us living upon Kidney-beans, which in their Language they call Cazacaza, and the young Man gather'd them every day: But perceiving that Food of Kidney-beans did not nourish me, and that I could scarce stand upon my Legs through weakness, I began to string Beads, sitting upon a little Straw at the door of my Cottage; which the Blacks observing, who were most of them good old Men, they flock'd about me, admiring those Beads with Silk Tossels, to which the Medal was fastned, and earnestly intreated me to give them a pair of Beads for the Macolonte. I told them I would, provided they gave me a Pullet, having seen a great many about the Libatte, which they did. Necessity oblig'd me to do so, there being never a Child to baptize there, and they being little acquainted with giving Alms for God's sake. In short, with the help of the Beads I liv'd the best I could.

At last the Blacks my Companion sent me ~~me~~; and being on our way not far from Libatte, where we were to lie that we were surpriz'd to meet a Lion so wounded that he could scarce go, and left a track of Blood wheresoever he went. The Blacks in a fright set down their Burdens and me so hastily, that I had much ado to get loose out of my Net: They laid hold of their Bows, and one of them taking the two Sticks, as I describ'd them before, lighted fire, and put it to the Herbage which immediately flamed, it being then almost dry, very tall and thick, because it was the Month of March, contrary to what is usual in our European Countries: The Flames rising, and the Blacks continuing their Cries, the Lion who was coming towards us in a fury turn'd about and took another way. We came to the Libatte an hour before night, but it had no inclosure of Thorns like the rest, and went to the great place in it, where we found all the People gather'd about a wounded Man: I came down from my Hammock, and ask'd what the matter was; they told me it was the Macolonte who had fought a Lion. They made way for me, and drawing near I saluted him, telling him he was in the wrong in not making a Thorn Hedg about the Libatte as was about others. Father, said he, as long as I live there will be no need of a Hedg; when I am dead, they may do as they think fit. His Wound was but slight, and I desir'd him to tell me how he had fenced with the Lion. Father, said he, as I was standing here talking with my People, a hungry Lion led by the scent of Mans Flesh came upon us so unexpectedly, without roaring as is usual, that my People who were all disarm'd had scarce time to make their escape; I who am not us'd to run away, clapt one Knee and one Hand on the ground, and holding up my Knife with the other struck him with all my force in the Belly; he finding himself wounded roar'd, and came upon me so furiously, that he wounded himself again in the Throat, but at the same time with his Talon he tore a piece of Skin off my side: However my People returning with their Weapons, the Lion wounded in two places ran away swiftly, losing much Blood. That was the Lion which we met, certainly in a bad condition, being wounded with a Knife made after the manner of a Genoese Bayonet, guided by the Hand of so brave a Man as the Macolonte.

I was further inform'd by him, that the great Duke of Bamba, who had fought with the Count of Songo, was made the King's Generalissimo. At this time time they brought me a handfom young Black Woman stark naked to be baptiz'd. Being oblig'd to catechife her, I caus'd her to be cover'd with some Leaves, and reproach'd her for deferring to be baptiz'd so long, it being a long time since the Kingdom had receiv'd the Faith of Jesus Christ. She answer'd, That she liv'd in the open Country, as many others do, who lie under Trees; and that she had but then heard of the coming of the Capuchins. Having instructed her in the Principles of Christianity, and it being St. Joachim's day, I call'd her Anne. The Ceremonies of Baptism being perform'd, all the Blacks of the Libatte, Men, Women, and young Lads, whom they call Muleches, made a Ring, and took her in the midst of them, dancing, playing on their Instruments, and crying, Long live Anne, Long live Anne, with such a noise and hubbub, that I was quite stunn'd and besides my self. F. Michael Angelo having gone before me, there were no Children to baptize. I only baptiz'd some of the Country, who will not draw into the Libattes, that they may be more at liberty, tho it be not without danger.

Next Morning I continu'd my Journey towards Bamba, and being forced to alight in a great Valley, because the way was bad, I got out of the Net, and walk'd about half a League in a stony way, a very rare thing in that Country, where till then I had not seen one stone. The Blacks who were barefooted suffer'd much, and I was not without fatigue, the Heat being excessive, and the Path narrow; besides, the Grass which was high and thick beat against my Legs, which flead them, and they were sore for two Months after. My Companion had far'd no better, for I found his Legs swath'd.

Through the midst of the Valley there ran a River, narrow, but very deep. The Blacks founded the Ford to carry us over where there was least water, which was four Foot deep. We lay in our Hammocks, and two of the lustiest Carriers held the Staff over their Heads, not without danger of falling together into the Water; but they only laugh'd at it, and stopp'd to bath themselves. We took notice of abundance of very beautiful Birds of several Colours, Green, Red, Yellow, and some which I thought the finest with White Feathers, and Black Fillets, looking like the Scales of Fish; their Tail, Eyes, Beak, and Feet, of the colour of Fire. These are Ethiopian Parrots, which talk like those of America, and are rarely brought into Europe, but scarce ever into Italy.

Being very near Bamba, I heard a Bell, which they told me belong'd to our Convent, seated on a Hill. F. Michael Angelo had made it ring to Mass, and having said it, came to meet us with several Blacks playing on Instruments after their manner. After performing my Devotions in the Church for my good Journey, I went into the Convent, where I found four little Cells of Mud-walls cover'd with Straw, an Entry and Porch, and Sacristy or Vestry, and Church all built with the same Materials. Whilst we were giving one another an account of what had happen'd to us, there came a Black from the Great Dutchefs to bid me welcome, and let me know she was desirous to see me. Finding my self very much weaken'd and spent with continual sweating, I desir'd him to excuse me to her, and assure her that as soon as I was a little recover'd I would not fail of going to pay my respects to her. I had great need of rest, but being in a strange Country where every thing was new to me, curiosity made me go out to see our Garden; where I could not sufficiently admire such variety of Fruits of the Earth not only of Africk, but of America and Europe, observing all those sorts there which I had before seen in Brasil. Those of Europe were Grapes, Fennel, Cardoons, or Thistles, all sorts of Sallating, Gourds, Cucumbers, and many other sorts, but no Pears, Apples, Nuts, or such like Fruits as require a cold Climate. At night the Dutchefs sent me a Bottle of Wine made of the Palm-tree, as white as Milk. I tast'd a little, but neither I nor F. Michael Angelo liking it, we gave it to our Blacks, who look'd upon it as a great Dainty, often repeating the word Malaf, which among them signifies Wine.

It is to be observ'd that in the Kingdom of Congo there are two Harvests every Year; they begin to sow in January, and reap in April. After that they have their Winter when our Summer is; but that Winter is like a sweet Spring or Autumn in Italy. The Heat begins again in September, when they sow again, and have a Harvest in December.

F. Michael Angelo had already taken several Blacks into our Service, and settled the affairs of the House. The House and Church being old, and threatening ruin, he had thoughts of building new ones. He had appointed two of our Blacks to be Gardiners, one to be Cook, one Sacristan, two to go fetch Water to drink and dress our Meat, one to look after the little Shells which serve instead of Money in that Country, and to buy Honey, Wax, Fruit, Meal, Buck-wheat ; and our Interpreter, who continu'd with us. We found a great many Blacks, who understood Portuguese, Bamba being in the Road to go to S. Salvador ; these Blacks having often occasion to speak that Language with those who carry'd such Merchandize as the Portuguese Merchants at Loanda transport to S. Salvador. Bamba is a great Town, 70 Leagues from the Sea, the Capital of the Province of that Name, and well peopled because of the Great Duke's residing there.

Pemba.

I went to visit the Great Dutcheſs, and we agreed together to ſend a Black to the Great Duke to adviſe him to make a Truce with the Enemy, and return to his own Eſtate. But being inform'd that the King of Congo was come to Pemba, diſtant ten days Journey from Bamba, F. Michael Angelo told me we ought to lay hold of that opportunity to go both of us to pay our reſpects to him, and the more becauſe our labour would not be loſt ; for whatſoever place we went through, we ſhould find Children and Youth to baptize and inſtruct, and might preach our Holy Faith. We ſet out the next day with ſeveral Blacks allow'd us by the Great Dutcheſs, rather for our Guard than any thing elſe, we carrying nothing with us but what was neceſſary for ſaying Maſs, and for our ſubſiſtence, leaving the reſt in our Houſe. We being to paſs over ſome very Deſert Mountains, were told that abundance of Lions were abroad, and that it was requiſite to give them time to get further off and loſe themſelves in the Wood ; which mov'd us, that we might force them away the ſooner, and not loſe our time to no purpoſe, to ſet fire to the Fields, as we had done in the way to Bamba, and it ſucceeded with us ; for the Wind ſpreading the flame every way, made the Lions go off very ſoon.

We found abundance of Children to baptize by the way as we had foreſeen ; and being come to Pemba, went to our *Hofpitiu*m, or little Houſe of Reception, where F. Antony de Saraverre a Capuchin of the Province of Tuſcany reſided, who receiv'd us very courteouſly, and was aſtoniſh'd to ſee us ſo young, for we could not make up ſixty years between us. Having told him our deſign, which was to pay our reſpects to his Maſteſty, and return immediately to our Miſſion of Bamba ; we preſently heard a great noiſe of Trumpets, Fifes, Drums and Cornets ; which drew near us ; and F. Antony told us, it was certainly his Maſteſty, and we might go out and ſalute him. No ſooner were we out of the Convent, but we met the King, who was a young Black about twenty years of age, all clad with a Scarlet Cloak and Gold Buttons. He commonly wears white Buſkins upon Carnation Silk Stockings, or of any other colour ; but they ſay he has New Clothes every day, which I could hardly believe in a Country where fine Stuſſs and good Tailors are ſcarce. Before him went 24 young Blacks, all Sons of Dukes or Marquilles, who wore about their middle a Handkerchief of Palm-tree dy'd Black, and a Cloak of Blew European Cloth hanging down to the Ground, but all of them bare-headed and footed. All his Officers being about an hundred, were much in the ſame dreſs. After them came a Croud of other Blacks, with only thoſe black Handkerchiefs.

Near to his Maſteſty was a Black, who carry'd his Umbrello of Silk, of a Fire-colour, laced with Gold ; and another who carry'd a Chair of Carnation Velvet, with Gold Nails, and the Wood all gilt. Two others clad in Red Coats, carry'd his red Hammock, but I know not whether it was Silk, or dy'd Cotton ; the Staff was cover'd with red Velvet. We bow'd and ſaluted his Maſteſty, whoſe Name was D. Alvaro, the ſecond King of Congo. He told us we had oblig'd him in coming into his Kingdom, for the good of his Subjects, but that it would be more pleaſing to him, if we would go along with him to S. Salvador. We humbly thank'd him, and answer'd, that there was more need of us at Bamba, there being never a Prieſt in all that Province, whereas there were many at S. Salvador. After this we talk'd with him of ſeveral matters concerning Italy and Portugal ; after which he order'd his Secretary, who was a Mulatto, to give us Letters of Recommendation to the Great Duke, that upon all occaſions whatſoever he might not fail to aſſiſt us in all things relating to our Miſſion, or our private concern.

Being thus diſmiſs'd by his Maſteſty, he made us ſeveral Preſents, as we did of ſeveral Jewels of Devotion, which were very acceptable to him, he being a Perſon very Religious and affable. We took leave of F. Antony, and thank'd him, returning very well ſatisfy'd that we had ſaluted the King, and ſeen in what State he goes, carrying ſuch a number of People about with him. King Alphonſo the

of Congo.

3d in 1646, when he gave Audience to some Missioners of our Order, was more richly clad. He had on a Vest of Cloth of Gold set with Precious Stones, and on his Hat a Crown of Diamonds, besides other Stones of great value. He sat on a Chair under a Canopy of rich Crimson Velvet with gilt Nails, after the manner of Europe; and under his Feet was a great Carpet, with two Stools of the same colour and Silk, laced with Gold.

Child. We went through our Journey easily enough, meeting with no particular obstacle, and every day saw all sorts of Beasts, so that one would have thought they had rendezvoused there from all parts of the Earth. One day as we were upon the Road I heard the crying as it were of a little Child; and making the Blacks, who went very fast, stop, bid them take notice of that Voice, to go see what it was. We hear it, said they laughing, but it is a great Bird that cries so. Which was true, for within a moment after we saw it rise off the Ground and fly away. It was a Bird bigger than an Eagle, of a dark yellow. During this Expedition both going and coming home, we had certainly starved had we not been paid for our Ecclesiastical Functions. It is true, the People of the Country are very charitable among themselves; for if we gave one of them any thing to eat, he would give a little of it to the next he met, and so all of them eat together, which ought to put many Europeans to the blush, who let the Poor starve rather than give them a bit of Bread. This I say without any reflection upon those who have more compassion for their Neighbours wants.

sc Being come again to Bamba, they began to bring us Children to baptize, from all the Country about. Others came to be marry'd, but these were few, and only some of the best sort and most civiliz'd; for the main difficulty lies in bringing the multitude to keep but one Wife, they being wholly averse to that Law. Others sent us their Children to School, which we were fain to keep in the Church, because of the great number of them, insomuch that upon Holy-days not only the Church, but all the Place before it was full. We often said two Masses a day: true it is, we usually went to say the second in another Libatte, where the Macolonte treated us with Kidney-beans, common Beans, and other things the Women sow in the Country, scarce eating any thing else, whilst they are there, and at work. When Harvest is over, which is twice a year, they put all the Kidney-beans into one heap, the Indian Carls Wheat into another, and so of other Grain: then giving the Macolonte enough for his maintenance, and laying aside what they design for Sowing, the rest is divided at so much to every Cottage, according to the number of People each contains. Then all the Women together, till and sow the Land for a new Harvest, the Earth being fruitful and black like the People.

So they have something to eat, they don't trouble themselves about laying in great store of Provisions, scarce minding in the Morning whether they shall have any thing at Night for Supper. It has often hapned, when I have been travelling with them, that having nothing to give them, because I had it not for my self, they without any concern would take a piece of Wood, which they cut, and shap'd so as to serve instead of a Mattock, and sitting down on the Ground would cut up the Grass, and near the Roots found certain little white Balls which they fed on: which did not a little surprize me, for having tasted of them, I could not for my life swallow one of them; and yet after such a wretched Meal, they would skip, dance, and laugh, as if they had been at a Feast. What greater happiness can there be, than not to be afflicted when a Man has nothing, nor so much as to desire what he has not? So when they have any thing good to eat, they express no more satisfaction than when they have the worst.

Our Employment continu'd as usual. There was never a day but we baptiz'd eight or ten Children, and sometimes fifteen or twenty, the poor People coming many Leagues to us, which we considering resolv'd to divide, one to stay in the Monastery, and the other to go into the Country. F. Michael Angelo offer'd to go abroad first, promising not to stay above a Fortnight, and to let me hear from him, I being to take my turn after the same manner, to the end that by this means both the Town and Country might receive some Spiritual comfort. During his absence I continu'd administering Baptism, and teaching School. The Great Dutchess had two Sons, D. Peter, and D. Sebastian, who never miss'd coming, especially to learn Portuguese. At the same time I instructed them in the Mysteries of Faith, and their Genius appear'd to be futable to their Birth, tho Blacks; being of a sharp and ready Wit, learning all I taught Carli. taught them, and behaving themselves as became such Princes. Now and then some Black would come to me to complain that a Wolf had devour'd one of his Children in the Night; to which I answer'd, What would you have me to do? if you who are the Father or Mother do not take care of them, must I look to them, who do not know where they go? For to say the truth, they take no more care of them when they are big, than if they were none of their own.

I began then to be sensible what it was to live without eating Bread, or drinking Wine: for tho I was well in health, I had very much to do to stand upon my Legs, I was so spent with living upon that Food which has so little nourishment, and with which I was forced to be satisfy'd in those parts. So I recommended my self to God, that it might please him to preserve my health, for the benefit of those poor Blacks; not so much, to say the truth, because I found my self incapable of undergoing very long the fatigue of our continual Employment, as because of the little likelihood there was of seeing any other Millions come into that Country to succed us, and to ease me of that Employment, which I found to be above my strength.

Blacks.

One Evening an hour after Sun-set, I heard abundance of People singing, but in such a doleful tone as caus'd horror. I enquir'd of my Domesticks what that meant? They answer'd, It was the People of some Lihatto, that came with their Macolotte to discipline themselves in the Church, because it was a Friday in March. This surpriz'd me, and I presently sent to open the Church-doors, light two Candles, and ring the Bell. Before they came in, they continu'd a quarter of an hour on their Knees before the Church, singing the Salve Regina in their Language, with a very doleful harmony; then being come into the Church, I gave them all Holy Water. They were about 200 Men carrying great Logs of Wood of a vast weight, for the greater Penance. I spoke a few words to them of the benefit of Penance, which if we will not undergo in this World, we shall be forced to endure in the next. They were all on their Knees, and beat their Breasts. I caus'd the Candles to be put out, and they disciplin'd themselves a whole Hour with Leather-thongs and Cords made of the Bark of Trees. After that we said the Litanies of our Lady of Loretto; and having dismiss'd them, they return'd home, leaving the Branches of Trees they brought without the Church, which serv'd us in the Garden. This action, so much to be admir'd in those poor People, comforted and encourag'd me, considering how it pleas'd God those miserable Ethiopians almost destitute of all Spiritual assistance, should one day upbraid the Europeans for their negligence, since they are so far from doing any thing, tho they have full liberty and conveniency, that they even despise those that do, and in contemptible manner call them, Hermits, Executioners of Christ, and wry Necks. Be this said without offence to those who do not approve of such injurious words, and whose thoughts are more agreeable to their Character of Catholics.

Another Night after the Ave Mary Bell, our Blacks that were in the Garden call'd me to see the Heaven burn. I went out, imagining it might be some Fire on a Mountain, but found it was one of the greatest Blazing Stars I ever saw in my life. I told them how it was call'd, and that it foreboded some ill to the World; that therefore they should do Penance for the Sins they had committed against the Majesty of so Great a God, who is merciful to bear with Sinners, but just with those that are impenitent. It was in March 1668 that this Comet appeared.

One day they brought me a quantity Colla, of round Roots like our Truffles (in sort of N. English Pignuts) but these grow on Trees and are as big as a Lemmon: opening them, there appear four or five such Nuts red within. To keep them fresh, they put Earth about them; when they will eat of them, they wash them, tast a little of each, and drink of their Water. In eating of them they have a little bitterness, but the Water drunk after makes them very sweet. In their Language they call them Colla; and I having observ'd that the Portugueses made great account of them at Loanda, had some sought out, and sent them to those Gentlemen my good Patrons, who in return sent me some Presents come from Europe.

F. Michael Angelo return'd, well-pleas'd with his Progress, having baptiz'd abundance of Infants and Youths, who had never seen Priests, for there are but six Capuchins in the whole Kingdom, except at S. Salvador; and these have the hardest task in the World to preserve their Health; and when any one of them dies, as it often happens, it is a matter of no small difficulty to get another into his place. My Companion being come home, he apply'd himself to cultivate the Garden, whence we had our chief Nourishment; and finding there some Vine-Plants, he transplanted them to a rising Ground. He sow'd several sorts of European Grain, which all came up in perfection. He had brought with him a great many Iron Tools; for having baptiz'd very many in a Libatte that was near an Iron Mine, he had caus'd Spades, Shovels, Hooks, Axes, and other Utensils to be made of it for the Garden, and cutting of Wood. He also caus'd to be made twelve sharp Spears two foot in length, to be fixt upon Staves, to serve the Blacks to defend themselves against the wild Beasts when they go through the Desarts; for being sometimes surpriz'd when they least think of it, they can make no use of their Bows.

The Father told me what had happen'd to him during his absence; and particularly, that flying once from the Paws of a Tiger, he was forced to run a great way into a thicket of Brambles, there being never a Tree to get up, without which Mist he must have lost his Life, as one of the Blacks did; who to avoid pricking his Skin among the Briars, trusted to the swiftness of his Heels, which could not deliver him from Death, that merciless Beast soon overtaking him. The Capuchin Habit did the Father a kindness to keep off the Prickles of the Thorns, which had made as many holes in his Legs as in a Cullender.

I set out in my turn, after saying Mass, with twenty of those who had accompany'd F. Michael Angelo, and came to several Places where no Capuchin had been of many Years; so that in some Libattes I baptiz'd above a hundred Children, taking something of those that would give, and bestowing my Charity for God's sake on those that had nothing. I accepted of the Presents of the Macolontes, which were Beans, and Kidney-Beans, to maintain those that went with me, who were satisfy'd to attend us, provided we maintain'd them. In some Places they fled as soon as they saw me, having in all probability never seen any Capuchins. After fifteen days travel, during which time I never return'd to the same place, I came back to our House, where I found my Companion busy in the Garden, which he had made up after the manner of Italy, and planted Vines, Orange and Lemmon-Trees, so that one would have thought it was not the same Garden we found there at our coming. Carl

Since that Nation has receiv'd the Faith of Jesus Christ, there still remain among them abundance of Sorcerers and Inchanters (as there are Hereticks in Europe) who are the ruin of those People, otherwise tractable enough. It is in a manner impossible for the King to root them out, insomuch as that Prince, who is a very good Christian and zealous Catholick, has given leave to several of his great Men, who know their lurking-places, to fire their Cottages; but they having Spies abroad, tho they meet at Night, make their escape, and are very seldom taken. Wizard

The Great Duke was now come home, and frequented our Convent every day. He was surpriz'd to see the Alteration of our Garden; and the more, because in those parts the Country is always green; and when the Ground is burnt any where, the Grass springs up again immediately. I enquir'd once of the Great Duke, where he had left his Army, which consisted of 150000 Blacks. He told me he had dropt them in the Libattes as he came along, to which they belong'd; and when he came to Bamba, he had but 10000 left. It is not to be admir'd there should be so many People, for there being no sort of Religious Person, and most of them keeping as many Wives as they please, the Country cannot chuse but be well peopled. One of the Kings of Congo led 900000 Blacks to the War against the Portugueses, an Army one would think should make all the World shake; and yet the Portugueses gave him battel with 400 Musketeers, and two Field-pieces. The terror of that Cannon loaded with Partridge shot, and the Death of the King, put them to flight. I spoke with the very Portuguese who cut off that King's Head, and he assur'd me they found all the Utensils belonging to him of beaten Gold. For that reason they don't at present work in the Gold Mines, which are near those of Iron we have spoken of, lest the Portugueses should make War upon them; for what Mischief will not Gold stir up Men to?

There was scarce a day but the Duke, Great Duke, who liv'd near us, came to our Church, of Bamba, in which there was a Chappel of Timber-work pretty big, where were the Tombs of the Dukes deceas'd, over which there were Figures made of Clay like our Mortars, colour'd with red. He once told us he had refus'd to be King, that he might be

Carli. be nearer the Portugueses, to have the opportunity sometimes of drinking Wine and Brandy. We understood him perfectly well, but would not seem to do so, to prevent using him to such Familiarity; for it is difficult to get Wine to say Mass, there being none but what is brought out of Europe. This Duke went habited like the King, but with fewer Attendance. He wore a Coat down to his Knees made of Palm tree Leaves dy'd black, and over it a Cloak of blue Cloth; a red Cap with a Gold Galloom about it; about his Neck he had a large pair of Beads with above fifty Medals, his Legs and Feet bare like the rest. The Son of some Lord carry'd his Hat, another his Scimiter, and a third his Arrows. Fifty Blacks went before him playing confusedly on several Instruments; 25 Men of note, and 100 Archers follow'd him. It is no difficult matter to find such abundance of Soldiers, the Men exercising no Trade, except some few who work in Iron, or make those Clothes of Palm-tree Leaves.

The Women of Quality wear the finest Cloth of Europe, whereof they make Petticoats down to their Heels. They cover their Back, Breast, and left Arm, with a short Mantle of the same sort, leaving their right Arm naked. The inferior sort wear Stuffs of less Value, and the Commonalty Stuffs made of Palm-tree Leaves, whereof they have only a Petticoat.

F. Michael Angelo one day told me he found himself much spent, and presently after he fell into a Fever; which troubled me very much, and the more, because in that Country there are neither Physicians nor Medicines, but all must be left to Nature. Bleeding is the only Remedy us'd, and to that purpose I sent to the Great Duke's Surgeon: He was a Black, who had learn'd that Profession at Loanda; for being us'd to bleed the Blacks, it was easier for him to practise upon the Whites, whose Veins are more visible. During his Sickness, F. Philip our Superior came to Bamba, which was a great relief to me, because he spoke the Language of the Country, and knew the manner of curing sick Persons in those Parts. I was sensible I should soon have need of his assistance, not being very well myself. Our sick Man let me understand that Disease would be his last, because he found it prevail'd upon him. I spoke some words of comfort to him, signifying that his Disease being but a Double Tertian, he might hope to recover, but however advis'd him to leave all to God, and resign himself up to his Holy Will. Soon after he complain'd of a pain in his left Ear, which spread over his Neck. I mistrusted it might be an Ulceration in the Almonds of his Ears, and acquainted the Superior with my Thoughts, who was of the same Opinion. We anointed him with Oil of Angelico made at Rome, which seem'd to work a wonderful Effect, taking away the Pain; but it remov'd to the other side, and the swelling in the Throat increas'd, which made us forbear using our Oil, for fear it might do more harm than good; and to say the truth, hearing him complain with so slight a Fever, I concluded he was worse inwardly than appear'd outwardly. In short, notwithstanding all the care we took of him, I had the mortification to see him die the 15th day, having receiv'd all the Sacraments, and express'd a Saint-like Resignation; hoping that the Lord, who does not forget to reward his Servants, lets him now enjoy the Recompence of all his Labours.

My Heart was more sensible of my trouble for this loss than my Pen can express; and without doubt, had not our Superior been there, sent by God's special direction in so sorrowful a Conjunction, and giving us all worldly and spiritual Assistance, I had dy'd too, having already lost half my Life, in that of the dear Companion of my Travels snatch'd away by Death. He had been blooded fifteen times; and being apprehensive it was too much, I gave an account at my return of his Distemper to the Physician at Angola. He told me it had been better to have bled him thirty times; but his Hour was come, and it was the Will of God.

The Superior finding me in a Fever, which increased, thought Providence had sent him to bury us both, and would not go away till he had seen the end of it: However he resolv'd to try Means to cure me, causing me to be blooded twice a day, which I suffer'd to be done without speaking one word: But in truth that usage in a few days brought me into a desperate condition, having been forty times blooded, and the Fever never decreasing. I confess'd, and receiv'd the Holy Viaticum, being nothing but Skin and Bones. The Father, but for whose Charity I believe I had dy'd like a Beast, perceiving the Disease was like to be tedious, the fury of the Fever abating, gave me to understand, that for the good of the Mission he must of necessity be gone. I had scarce strength, bowing my self, self to tell him, that since he could not stay longer, he should inform my Blacks how they ought to manage me; and that he would please to send F. Michael de Orviet to me, with whom I had travel'd, and who knew how to look to the Sick. He promis'd to do so, but his Orders miscarrying, he came not. I was left in my Bed, not able to turn my self; and the worst was, that so much bleeding had almost blinded me. In that condition, half alive and half dead, I was left to the mercy of those Blacks, who stole what they could, and brought me, when they thought of it, a Porringer of Broth; I being able to swallow nothing of substance, and loathing all Sustenance.

One day when I was more cast down with Melancholy and Sadness than the Distemper it self, I receiv'd a Visit from a Portuguese Jesuit, who came from S. Salvador, and was returning to the College at Loanda. When he saw me in that miserable condition, How now, Father, said he, are you so sick, and yet stay in this Desert? I came, said I, very well in health into this Country, but after losing my Companion, I fell sick, and have been now some Months struggling with Death; but I perceive it is not God's Will it should have the upper hand, tho it was one of my Wishes. Two days he staid comforting me, and presented me with some Pullets, which were more acceptable for coming from his hand, than for their own rarity. We confess'd to one another, he declaring it was a satisfaction to him to be thus provided, being to pass through many places, where the firing of the dry Herbage made the wild Beasts run about the Country. He assur'd me that as he came, he was forced to get up a Tree, tho there were sixty Blacks with him, to avoid Death threatned them by two Tigers. Therefore we are not to believe what some Authors have writ, that the Tigers do not assault Whites, but only Blacks.

After his departure I remain'd with my continual Distemper; but what comforted me was, that every day I baptiz'd ten or twelve Children; and not being able to sit up alone in my Bed, was held up by two Blacks, another holding the Book, and another the Bason, receiving what Alms they gave me; not for my own sake, for I could eat nothing, but for my Family, who would all of them have forsaken me had they wanted Meat. I marry'd several of the chief People; one of them gave me a She-Goat, whose Milk I drank every day, which indeed was little in quantity, but counted a great Dainty in that Country. This Car happiness I had in my Indisposition, that I slept all night, which is twelve hours long, never varying half an hour all the year round. I would willingly have eaten an Egg, but sick People there are forbid Eggs, they being look'd upon as unwholesom for those that are ill, being too hot in those parts. Whilst I lay thus in bed, several Cripples came to beg of me, and I gave them some of those Shells that serve instead of Money, of which 3500 make the value of a Pistol; so many are given for a Pullet, for at Lisbon a Pullet is worth a Crown, in Brasil a Piece of Eight, at Angola ten Shillings, and at Congo a Pistol, which seems to me cheaper than a Crown at Lisbon.

My Bed was against the Wall, which was of fat Clay ill put together, and might well be call'd a Nest of Rats; for there were so many of them and so large, that they troubled me very much, running over me every night, and biting my Toes, which broke my Rest very much. To prevent this I caus'd my Bed to be laid in the middle of the Room, but to no purpose, for those cursed Creatures knew where to find me. I caus'd Mats to be laid all about my Bed for my Blacks to lie on, and defend me not only against the Rats, but any other wild Creatures that might come. This Precaution stood me in no stead, for there was no Night but the Rats disturb'd me. Another Consideration mov'd me to keep those Blacks in my Chamber, which was, that they might see how I liv'd, and be Witnesses of my Behaviour, that Country being no more free from Detraction than others.

I took the freedom to acquaint the A Great Duke with the trouble I had from the Rats, and the Stink of my Blacks, who had always some wild and disagreeable Smell. He said he would give me an infallible Remedy against those two Inconveniences, and that had he known it sooner, he would not have fail'd of sending it: This was a little Monkey that would secure me against the Rats by blowing on them when he spy'd them, and would expel the ill scent by that of his Skin, which smelt of Musk. I gave him a thousand thanks for his Charity towards me, and said I should expect that favour from him. He sent me that tame Monkey, whom I laid at the feet of my Bed, and who perform'd his Duty exactly; for when the Rats came as they were wont, the Monkey blew hard at them two or three times, and made them run away; and the scent of Musk with which he perfum'd my Chamber, corrected the ill smell of the Blacks. These Monkeys are not the same Creatures as the Civet Cats, for I have seen several of those Cats at Loanda, where they keep them shut up in a wooden Cage, and fasten'd with an Iron or Silver Chain, and the Owner of them once a week with a Spoon takes off the Civet, which they call Angeglia, and which is found in a Purse between the hind Legs. In short, the little Monkey did me extraordinary service, not only for those uses already mention'd, but to keep my Head and Beard clean and comb'd, better than any of the Blacks would have done: and to say the truth, it is easier to teach those Monkeys than the Blacks; for these have enough to do to learn one thing well, but the others do every thing they are put to dexterously.

multitudes of Pif-
mires.

I just began to mend, tho the Fever had not left me, when one night as I lay asleep, I felt the Monkey had leap'd upon my head; I thought the Rats had frighted him, and made much of him to still him, but at the same time the Blacks arose, crying, Out, out Father. Being thoroughly awake, I ask'd them what was the matter? The Ants, said they, are broke out, and there is no time to be lost. There being no possibility for me to stir, I bid them carry me into the Garden, which they did, four of them lifting me upon my Straw Bed: Their Nimbleness stood me in good stead, for the Ants began already to run up my Legs, and get to my Body. After shaking them off, they took Straw, and fir'd it on the floor of four Rooms, where the Ants were already above half a foot thick; and there must needs be a wonderful quantity, for besides the Chambers, the Porch and walking place were full. They being destroy'd by fire, as I said, I was carried back to my Chamber, where the Stink was so great that I was forc'd to hold the Monkey close to my face. Having caus'd the Mats to be shaken, we had scarce slept half an hour before I was awaked by the light of a flame of Fire at the Chamber-door: I call'd my People to see what it was, they found the Fire had taken hold of the Thatch of the House, and fearing the Fire might increase with the Wind, I caus'd my self to be carried again into the Garden. The Fire being put out, we endeavour'd to go to sleep again, but all this hurry had compos'd me too much; and before the troublesome Night was quite over, I heard a great noise near us: I wak'd my Blacks that they might be in a readiness, in case there was some other Army of Beasts to engage. One of them laid hold of one of the Halbards F. Michael Angelo had caus'd to be made, and went out to see who made all that hurlyburly: He came back again to tell us, that the Pismires having again broke into a neighbouring Cottage, they had burnt them as we did; but the Hut being all of Straw, it was consum'd as well as the Ants, which made the Blacks get out of their Houses for fear the Wind should carry about the Flame, and burn all that quarter. I got off, causing my self to be once more carried into the Garden, giving God Thanks that he had deliver'd me from the Pismires; for had I been alone fast in my Bed, and unable to stir, as I then was, it is certain they had eaten me up alive. This often happens in the Kingdom of Angola, where in the Morning there are Cows found devour'd in the Night by Ants, and nothing left of them but the Bones. It is no small deliverance to escape them, for there are some that fly, and are hard to be remov'd from the place where they lay hold: but God be praised that my Body was not devour'd by them alive.

I had a young Tiger given me, which I did not care to keep, especially because the Monkey would not lie upon the Bed with him: I gave it Goat's Milk to preserve it, but it did not live long, and I was not sorry for it, it being no satisfaction to me to see that fine Beast, tho little, and as yet unfit to do like the old ones. The Great Duke's Visits were a great Comfort to me, and when he could not come himself, he sent some of his chief Men, who would stay three or four hours sitting about me upon Mats; but they always having their Pipes in their Mouths, and the Smoak offending my Head, I was forc'd to tell them they would oblige me in coming, but that I beg'd of them for God's sake not to take Tobacco in our House, and that the rather because their Pipes which are an Ell long have great bowls like a little Pot, which are never out. They were so obliging as to comply with me, and when they came left their Pipes in the Garden.

I found no other Remedy for my Distemper but to recommend my self to God, through the Intercession of the glorious S. Antony of Padua. In short, after long continuing irresolute, I resolv'd to cause my self to be carried to Loanda, notwithstanding I was sensible of the Fatigue

Fatigue of the Journey, and could find no Black that would go along to be my Interpreter. I spoke to the Great Duke, who promis'd me a great many Blacks, but he found not enough to carry all my Baggage, part whereof was therefore left behind to be stolen. I took another way different from that we came, and did not pass through Dante: All the poor Blacks flocking about me at my departure, came to express their concern for losing me, and I comforted them with the hopes of my return, if it should please God to restore my Health.

I went as far as the next Libatte without an Interpreter, but could speak enough to be understood. I endur'd all that can be imagin'd in such a Condition, for my Conscience check'd me for putting my self into such danger, as if I would have tempted God; but I had such Confidence in S. Antony, whom I had taken for my Advocate, that I fancied I saw him before my Hammock. During all this Journey, which lasted 25 days, I could not open my Mouth till night, so that the Blacks often came to see whether I was not dead. One day being to pass through a River, they discover'd about 2½ Elephants that were gone to drink, which troubl'd them very much, and made them stay till they were gone, another way from us. Having cross'd the River with some danger, the two Blacks who carried me going up a Hill, did not hold the Staff fast, and let me fall plumb on the ground, which put me quite beside my self, the Staff having hit me on the Head, and almost broke it: They took me up again, and I bound my Head with a Handkerchief without speaking one word, fearing if I complain'd of being hurt, they might leave me there, and fly unto the Woods; therefore I thought it better to hold my tongue, than talk to People that have no Compassion.

Being come to a Libatte, they left me alone in a Cottage upon a little Straw, and carry'd away my Staff. I had brought out of Italy, but I was resolv'd to be concern'd at nothing. I look'd whether any body would come in, being very weak for want of sustenance; but no body appear'd all day till Sun-setting, when the Women return'd with their Children from their Labour in the fields; I desir'd them to boil me a Pullet I had brought with me: They having dress'd it very well, I took the Broth, and gave them the Fowl, which made a great Feast among them. All my Sustenance during the Journey was a Porringer of Broth a day. They gave me two Nicestias, which are so refreshing and dainty, that I could not forbear eating of them, tho cautiously, for fear of causing my Distemper to increase upon me.

Next day they carry'd me to a Libatte, where I found all the People made Staffs of Palm-Tree Leaves, and therefore would not leave their business to carry me. Finding them positive, and not knowing what other way to take, I be-thought my self of a Bag of those Shells they call Zimbi, I had along with me, and began to call them, but they were deaf to me, tho sitting in the next Cottages on the ground about their Fire: That is their usual posture. After night-fall, that the Women are return'd out of the fields with their Children, they light a fire in the middle of their Cottage, sit round it on the ground, and eat of what they have brought; then they talk till sleep makes them fall backwards, and so they spend the Night without any further Ceremony. Finding it was to no purpose to call and spend my Breath, I drag'd out of the Bed where they had laid me, which was about a foot from the ground, and crawling upon all four to the Cottage Door, call'd a Muleche, or young Lad, who was playing with his Companions, and getting him to help me, open'd my Portmantua, whence I drew the Bag of Zimbis, and shaking the Bag that they might sound, drew those hard-hearted Blacks to me, and told them I would pay them in Zimbis if they would carry me to the next Libatte: they agreed to it, but being too few to carry all my Goods, part of them was left to their Discretion. There was no remedy but Patience, and at length by the help of Zimbis, Beads and Medals, I came to Bamba, the first place belonging to the Portugueses.

There I was met by a Portuguese who liv'd in the place, with a Priest of Portuguese Extraction, but born in Africk; they carried me to their House, and seeing my Countenance as yellow as Saffron, said to me, Father, How came you to travel through these Deserts in such a Condition? I could not answer them, nor open my Eyes. They understanding by my Carriers that I had eaten but one Porringer of Broth a day, and never spoke all the way, endeavour'd to bring me to my self with Malmsey and new-laid Eggs. Being a little recover'd, I found all their People weeping about me. I told them nothing had befallen me but what I had foreseen when I left Italy, and that I had concluded I should not return out of that

Carli. Country, as is the common fate of the Missioners sent thither. I continued there two days, and having thank'd them for the Civility and Charity they had us'd towards me, went away to Loanda. The Portuguese Gentleman would needs bear me company thither. I was kindly receiv'd by the chief Men of my Acquaintance, who wonder'd to see me alive still with that dead Countenance. They sent me some Refreshment, which I did not taste for want of Appetite: There I continued six Months without being able to stir out of my Bed, and never quit of the Fever: I loath'd Flesh, and could eat nothing but a little Fish. After that I bled at Nose, and lost three or four Pounds a day, as if I had not been blooded during my Sickness; the Heat I endur'd going on the Hammock contributed much towards it: It was surprizing to me that there should be so much Blood in a Mans Body. The Physician told me that all the Water I drank turn'd to Blood, and I drank five or six Bottles a day, for they allow the sick to drink as much as they will. The Physician had me blooded 24 times by way of revulsion; for I kept account how often I was blooded during my three years sickness, which was 97 times, without reckoning the Blood that ran in great quantities at my Nose, Mouth, and Ears, which to me seems prodigious.

During my stay at Loanda, the R. F. John Chrysofome, Superior of Loanda, came thither with two or three Capuchins of our Mission, who had much ado to know me, and were yet more surpriz'd to hear that most of our Fellows were dead in that Country. The Father Superior resolving to provide the Province of Messangrano, one of the chiefest in the Kingdom, with Missioners, sent thither F. Peter de Barchi, and F. Joseph Mary de Buffette; and within a few days news was brought that one of them was dead, and the other at the point of death, which much troubled the Superior, who had taken a great deal of pains to bring them from Italy, which shows how little that Climat agrees with our Bodies. I desir'd the Father Superior to send me to Colombo, two days journey from Loanda, to try to recover my Health. I went thither with F. John Baptist de Sallizan to a House of our Father's near the River Coanza, where there are abundance of Crocodiles. We have there a very fine Garden, in which are Orange and Lemmon Trees, and other sort of Fruit. There is a sort of Fruit in Africk like our

S. John Apple, at the end of which is a Chesnut little differing from ours: The Apple is not eaten because it is full of Fibers, but they suck the Juice which has a Muscadine taste. The Chesnut is boil'd, and tastes like our Almonds, is very hot, but the Apple cold, it is call'd Besou.

Near that place live several Portuguese Farmers, who keep a number of Swine, Cows and Sheep, but know not how to make Cheese, it being very difficult there to bring the Milk to Curd. We sometimes took the cool Air under a fine row of Trees ten paces distant, reaching from the Church to the River. These Trees bear a certain sort of Fruit like great Plums, but very harsh; they hold their Leaves all the year round. One day as we were walking under those Trees, we discover'd a great Serpent crossing the River to our side: We would have made it go back by shouting, and throwing clods of Earth for want of Stones, which are not to be found, but in spite of us it came over, and went to take up its post in a little Thicket of Reeds near the House. There are some of them there 25 foot long, and as thick as a good Colt, that make but a mouthful of a Sheep; when they have swallow'd one, they go into the Sun to digest it: the Blacks who know the manner of it watch and kill them, to make a good Meal of them, for they are as fat as Pork; and having flead them, they throw away nothing but the Head, the Tail and the Entrails.

F. John Baptist gave me an account of of his Travels in those parts of Africk, and Cubi among the rest of his being at Cassangi, where a Black Prince resides who rules a large Country, and is call'd Great Lord: That he came there at a time when that Prince's Birth-day was celebrated after an odd manner: He makes all the People of his Country that can travel come into a great Plain; they leave only one place empty, in which there are several Trees, on which there are Huts built for the great Lord and principal Men of his Kingdom, who go up thither with several musical Instruments sounding. One of the fiercest Lions in the Country is fastened to a Tree standing at some distance from the rest. The Signal being given, the String that holds him is cut, and then after some roaring he falls upon the first he meets: They instead of flying run together from all parts to kill him, being oblig'd to do it without any Weapon, and thinking themselves happy in dying before their Prince. The Lion before before he is tir'd kills several of them, and revenges his own death sufficiently, being at last born down by the multitude. After that the Survivors eat the Dead, and accompany their King with abundance of joyful Acclamations to his Palace, making all parts rebound, Long live the Great Lord of Cassangi. Thus they solemnize this Festival, which the Father assur'd me he had been an Eye-witness of. A Hellish Invention, and fit for those barbarous People!

He also told me he would go to the Kingdom of Malemba or Mattemba, where of late Years Queen Singa had reign'd, who dy'd a Catholick; but that after her death the People forsook the Christian Religion, and return'd to their antient Superstitions. I agreed with him to go thither, if he could gain admittance into the Country, provided he sent for me; but when he was gone, I heard no more from him, and was left alone with two Blacks at Colombo. I baptiz'd but very few there, the Country about being possess'd by the Portugueses, but sometimes there came Boats full of Slaves who were baptiz'd; they brought me Salt to use in the Baptismal Water, dug out of the Mountains, which when pounded is very white. Whilst I was there, the Fishermen took a great Fish as round as a Coach-wheel; in the middle it had two Tets, and upon it several holes through which it sees, hears, and eats, the Mouth being a span long: The Fish is delicious, and the Flesh of it like fine Veal. Of the Ribs of it they make Beeds to stop bleeding; but having try'd them upon my self, they did me no good, this Distemper growing upon me, insomuch that they once thought I was dead, which obliged the Father Superior to make me return to Loanda. The dread of going to Sea again, made me unwilling to go from Colombo, tho in other respects the place was scarce to be endur'd, being tormented day and night with infinite numbers of Gnats and Flies, which almost darken the Air; besides the continual fear of Serpents, Crocodiles, and Lions, who seldom fail'd a night of devouring some Cow, Calf, or Sheep.

At that time a Vessel was loading at Loanda for Brazil. Having obtain'd leave to return to Italy, I spoke with the Captain, who was very willing to receive me, thinking himself happy in having a Priest, and especially a Capuchin, with him; for not only the Portugueses but the Blacks themselves, cannot sufficiently admire to see us take Progresses into those barbarous Countrys, without proposing to our selves any other Interest but the spiritual Good of our Neighbour, and the Propagation of the Catholick Faith. I remember the Great Duke of Bamba one day sent me several Blacks to be my Slaves; which I would not accept of, but sent them back to him. I afterwards told him, I came not into his Country to make Slaves, but rather to deliver those from the slavery of the Devil whom he kept in miserable thralldom.

The Ship I went aboard of, when it was ready to sail, was loaded with Elephants Teeth and Slaves, to the number of 680 Men, Women, and Children. It was a pitiful sight to behold, how all those People were bestow'd. The Men were standing in the Hold, fastned one to another with Stakes, for fear they should rise and kill the Whites. The Women were between the Decks, and those that were with Child in the great Cabin, the Children in the Steeridge press'd together like Herrings in a Barrel, which caus'd an intolerable heat and stench. The Captain had made me a Bed upon the Quarter-deck, with Mats to keep me from the Rain and Dew.

This Voyage is generally perform'd in 30 or 35 days at farthest, because there is no occasion for going to the Cape of Good-Hope for a Wind; but they sail in a Line: However we were fifty days, being many of them becalm'd, during which time we endur'd great Heat under the Line. Being we made no way, the Captain desir'd me to baptize some Blacks that came last aboard, it being forbid, under pain of Excommunication, to carry any Blacks to Brazil that are not baptiz'd; which I did, instructing them in the Principles of Christianity.

The Portugueses, who knew there was Danger in that Calm we were in, either in regard of the great Heat of the Sun, or because among so many Mouths the Provisions grew short, one day took the Image of S. Antony, which they set against one of the Masts, saying these words on their Knees, S. Antony, our Countryman, you shall be pleas'd to stand there, till you have given us a fair Wind to continue our Voyage. This done, and some Prayers said, some little Wind came up, which set us forward, and made us rejoice. We pass'd very close by the Island call'd the Assumption of our Lady; where we did not touch, thinking we had no need of any thing. Nevertheless the Voyage holding longer than we had imagin'd, a few days after we began to want Provisions, Carli- fions, the Provéditor not having rightly consider'd how great a number of Mouths there was to feed.

A danger- The Captain came to be full of Af- fecti- fion, and said, Father, we are all dead Men, there is no remedy for it. My Fever being upon me, and a distill'd Blood before me, I told him that was no surprizing News to me, and that being lost so much Blood, I did not expect to live long. He made me sensible he spoke of all the Ship in general, and that they wanted Provisions, being still far out at Sea without discovering any Land. To comfort him in some measure, I bid him look into the Stern-lockers, for I remember'd my Friends had given me some Provisions, which might keep the Whites aboard alive some time; and as for the Blacks, he must have patience if they dy'd, since there was no possibility of relieving them; but that nevertheless since there were still forty Buts of Water, they should give them as much as was necessary; and the Climate being hot, they might live two days at least upon Water only: That yet God might relieve us, and we ought to confide in him, and not give way to despair.

I would have spoke some words of comfort to the Ships-Crew, and silenced them; but the dismal news I thought to acquaint them with being already come to their knowledg, the Children began to cry for Mercy; the Women hearing them, set up the same Cry, and the Men made up the dismal Harmony, which would have daunted the boldest Heart. In fine, when they were a little pacify'd, I began in Portuguese to exhort them to confide in the Mercy of God, who never forsakes those who sincerely rely on him; adding, that God sent us that Affliction to punish our Sins, and for the Blasphemies wherewith they dishonour'd his Holy Name, and perhaps because some of them were come aboard without confessing. Then turning to the Whites, I told them, that the ill Example they gave these new Christians, making themselves drunk every day with Brandy, had drawn that Punishment upon them: That the Blessed Virgin was also offended at them, because they had given her Name, to which all respect was due, to a Rope's-end with which they beat the Blacks, vvvhich vvvas not the vvway to perswade them that vve believ'd her to be the Mother of God. This Discourse made them again cry, Mercy, but with a more sincere Intention than at first. After the Hymns of the Holy Virgin, vvvhich I caus'd them to repeat, they made a Vow to cause eighty Masses to be said, forty for the Souls in Purgatory, and forty in honour of S. Antony.

Their Minds being a little settled, the Captain order'd every Black a Porringer of Water; but those poor Wretches, especially the Children, began to cry for hunger. The compassion their Crys mov'd in me, vvwithout any means of relieving them, made me retire to my Cabin of Mats. I continu'd so a day without eating, for fear of sharpening their Hunger if they saw me eat. It was likely that unless God wrought some Miracle, we were all lost.

As I lay full of these Thoughts, I heard some begin to talk of living upon Man's Flesh, so far had Despair disorder'd them; for vvvhich I reprov'd them severely, protesting that rather than suffer any one to be kill'd to maintain another, I would sacrifice my own Life if it might any way contribute to prolong theirs. Notwithstanding all this Affliction, there were those abroad who did not forbear doing some vile Actions. The Master being drunk, mortally wounded a Sailer; but he being the ablest and most experienc'd Seaman in the Ship, it was requisite to pardon him, and wink at it. At length God taking compassion on us, we discover'd Land; three days we continued without eating, and the Water was spent before we got to the Shore. Who can express the Joy which succeeded the former Sorrow! To hear all their discourse, one would have thought all the People in the Ship had been out of their right Senses. I observ'd the Ship lay much more to one side than the other, and oblig'd the Captain to redress it, the burden of Men being greater on that side which inclin'd. He did it, by filling four Cask with Sea-water, and fastning them to the other side.

We discover'd Cape S. Augustin, well known to the Portugueses, and on Sunday entred the Port of Baya de todos os Santos, or the Bay of all Saints, the Capital Town of all Brazil, where the Viceroy resides. There we found several Vessels of all Nations. Next Morning several Boats came to us with Merchants and others who had Slaves abroad. Understanding we had been fifty days at Sea, they concluded that most of the Blacks were dead, and were pleasingly surpriz'd when they were told there wanted but thirty three of the number, it often happening, that half of them die in that passage. They thank'd God for that Miracle wrought in their behalf, behalf, for it would have been a very considerable loss, if all the Slaves had been dead.

I went ashore as well as the rest, but my weakness was such, I had no use of my Legs. A good Woman into whose Shop I went, had compassion on me, and lent me her Hammock to carry me in to the Franciscans, who receiv'd me very courteously. A Genoese Captain of my acquaintance would have carry'd me to his House, but I excus'd my self on account of the obliging Reception I had met with in the Convent, declaring, that unless I found I was a burden to them, I would not leave it till my departure out of the Country. The Governor of the Island of S. Thomas, which is under the Line, sent his Steward to make me a Visit, and to desire me to come to his Palace to see a Capuchin that kept his Bed, and had been sixteen Years in Africk, either in the aforesaid Island, or the Kingdom of Benin and Oucrola. I could not go immediately, but went afterwards several times to see that Father, being carry'd in a Hammock. He wondered to hear I was so obedient to my Physician, who was the same that had him in hand; but the Physician told me, that according to his way he could not live long; and so it prov'd, for he dy'd soon after at Lisbon.

In this Convent there is a Chappel of the third Order of S. Francis. On Monday-Thursday the Fathers made a Procession, in which all the Images of Saints of the third Order were carry'd. Then follow'd three hundred Blacks, carrying whole Trees for mortification; others had their Arms bound to a great Beam in the nature of a Cross, and others after other manners. I was told their Fathers Confessors had enjoin'd them that Penance for robbing their Masters, and committing other Sins. It is not the custom there to make Sepulchers that Week, but they expose the Blessed Sacrament with an infinite number of white Wax-lights, whereof there is great plenty there as well as of Honey.

The Genoese Captain, who was to sail for Lisbon, had given me my Passage aboard his Ship. Being ready to sail, the Viceroy sent to desire the Captain, that since he had a good fighting Ship, he would, for the King's sake, convoy the Merchants Ships that were ready to sail, for fear they might fall into the hands of the Turks when they came near the Coast of Portugal; that kept us till Holy-Saturday. Leave to depart being obtain'd of the Viceroy, the Captain sent me word to come aboard; which I did, against my Will, not liking to begin so long and dangerous a Voyage upon a Holy Saturday; but he carrying me out of Charity, I must submit to his Will. We sail'd, firing all the Cannon, and all the Bells in the Town clattering.

The Ship was like Noah's Ark, for there were aboard it so many several sorts of Beasts, that what with the noise, and the talk of so many People as were aboard, we could not hear one another speak. The Loading was 1000 Chests of Sugar, 3000 Rolls of Tobacco, abundance of rich Wood for dying, and making of Cabinets, Elephants Teeth; besides the provision of Wood, Coals, Water, Wine, Brandy, Sheep, Hogs, and Turkeys: Besides all this, abundance of Monkeys of several sorts, Apes, Baboons, Parrots, and some of those Birds of Brazil, which they call Arracas. The Ship carry'd fifty Guns, four and twenty Pedreroes, and other Necessaries. The People aboard were of several Nations, as Italians, Portugueses, English, Dutch, Spaniards, and Indian Slaves who follow'd their Masters. The Great Cabin was hir'd by a rich Portuguese Merchant, whose name was Amaro, and who was returning to Lisbon with all his Family, that is, Wife and four Children; gave 1000 Crowns for his Passage, and had laid out 2000 upon Provisions and Necessaries for so long a Voyage. That honest Man seeing me so sick, freely offer'd me a place in his Cabin, which was large, painted and gilt. I accepted of his Offer, his Wife giving her consent, who being a vertuous Lady, was glad to have a religious Man's company. He would have allow'd me his Table, but I told him I was engag'd to the Captain, but that I might breakfast with him sometimes after Mass, which I said every day in the Great Cabin during the Voyage, which lasted three months, excepting only three days of stormy Weather; and not only he, but all the Portugueses aboard were at it. The Chaplain of the Ship said upon Deck to the Seamen and Officers of the Ship.

As we were under sail, having scarce run two Leagues, and being busy placing the Trunks and Goods aboard us, it pleas'd God to mortify us, who thought our selves the safest of the five Ships, that we might learn to honour Holy-days better; for we struck five times furiously upon a Bank, which threw both the Men and Goods not yet lash'd to, from side to side, and put all into a great

Con-

Carli. Consternation, the Vessel sticking fast upon the Flat. The Officers and Pilots in a fright thought to save themselves from imminent danger of death which threatned, and leap'd hastily into the Boat to get to Land, vvvhich vvvas not far off, for vve vvvere still in the Harbour, it being four Leagues in length. The Sailers and Passengers seeing themselves forsaken, began to cry aloud, We are all dead, we are all dead. And who can be able to describe vvhat a sad Spectacle that Ship was, which but just before look'd like a Castle on the Sea? This confusion made me rise from a Mat on which I lay struggling with the Fever; and being upon Deck, perceiv'd we made no way, tho the Sails were all loose, and a Plank floating upon the Sea, which made it appear the Ship was fast.

Nothing could be heard but Crys and Complaints. Some cast a Barrel into the Sea, others a Roll of Tobacco, others a Chest of Sugar to lighten the Ship, and every one did something to save his Life; only the Captain sat still like a Statue, without being able to speak or stir, tho he had fought six Turks in that same Ship. They would have fir'd a Cannon for the others to come to our assistance, but in that hurry they could neither find Gunner, Powder, nor Match. The several sorts of Animals hearing such a noise, began to play their part and increase the confusion. In this general consternation both Whites and Blacks came to cast themselves at my Feet, crying, Father, Father, Confession, Absolution. Having caus'd them to make an Act of Contrition, I gave them Absolution, wanting time to hear them singly. I met the Chaplain of the Ship in his Shirt, his Countenance alter'd, and looking gashtly, tho he was one of the bravest Men aboard, as he had often made it appear, fighting with the Turks upon several occasions. After hearing his Confession according to his desire, I ask'd him, What he intended to do in that case? O God, said he, I had no mind to come aboard, but I suffer'd my self to be deluded. I would have encourag'd, and made him conceive, that God had not altogether forsaken us, but we might yet escape that danger. Suppose it does so fall out, reply'd he, I am resolv'd to swim for it and get ashore. The others hearing his Resolution, renew'd their Complaints and Exclamations. I went into the Great Cabin, and found that Portuguese Lady sitting on a Carpet, and leaning upon two Cushions, with her four Children on their Knees, their hands clasp'd together in a fright, and crying, Mercy; the Husband sitting on a Chair, rather dead than alive. I comforted them both the best I could, and heard their Confessions.

In the mean while there came aboard us a Captain, who was a Friend to Senhor Amaro, to carry him and his Family away to his Ship. He seeing the horrid confusion we were in, began to encourage all the People, and sent two of his Men to the Pump, and into the Hold, to see what harm was done. They neither found Water, nor any thing broken, and perceiv'd that the Plank we had seen on the Water, was only some of the Sheathing which had given way. Our Captain taking heart, order'd to cast the Lead, and found but little Water for so great a Ship. Then he caus'd the Ship's Head to be brought about, which made the Vessel move; and it was well for us there happen'd to be but little Wind, for had it blown hard we must have been beaten to pieces. They that were ashore seeing us make way, came back with the Boat; and we continu'd our Voyage towards Fernambuco, a hundred Leagues distant from Baga de Todos os Santos. There we came to an Anchor five miles from the Town, the Harbour being unfit for great Ships.

The Governor kept us there five days before he dispatch'd us. As we were weighing Anchor, when it was already above Water, it broke off so suddenly, that all the Men who work'd at it, being forty of them, fell down hurt themselves, some on the Head, the Sides, and others in other places. They would have recover'd it, but there was no doing of it, because it dropt in a place that was very foul and full of small Rocks.

It was pleasant to see our Ship, when every Tradesman work'd at his Trade, as if he had been in his Shop; there were Gunsmiths, Armorers, Butchers, Shoemakers, Tailors, Coopers and Cooks. Others mended the Colours, there being an hundred of several sorts very fine upon great Days, and particularly the Pendant at the Main Top-mast head, eight Ells long, and all of Carnation Taffety. When the Weather would permit, the other Vessels bore up to us, and gave us a consort of Drums and Trumpets, saluting us with three Huzza's all the Sailers gave, taking the Signal from the Boatswain's Whistle. The Captain exercis'd his Men in firing Volleys. These Diversions were one day interrupted by this Acci-accident. Eleven Englishmen came together to complain to the Captain that they were not allow'd Water enough to drink, which put him into such a passion that he went to lay hold of a Sword, and had done them some mischief had not care been taken to appease him. He caus'd one to be put into the Bilboes with two Men to stand Sentinel over him, till we came to Lisbon, for fear he should raise some mutiny among his Comrades; for that Englishmen was wonderful strong, would manage a Cannon as another Man would a Musket, and had formerly blown up some Ships, setting fire to the Powder. He punish'd him after this manner to teach the rest, not to come in a Body like Mutineers to make their Complaints to him, whereas one alone should come when they wanted any thing. There was another Englishman whom they call'd Kill Turk, whom he also put into the Bilboes, because he had made himself drunk with two Bottles of Brahdy, and was not sober again in three days. He was so strong, that they said he had cleft a Man with his Cutlass, and therefore it was fear'd he might do some mischief in the Ship, being in that condition.

One Morning before Sun-rising, being near the Coast of Portugal, we heard a Cannon fire, and the Shot fell not far from us. I turn'd out to see what was the matter, and observ'd that Captain Joseph, Brother to our Captain, had put up the Red Antient, which was a Signal of Battle. Our Captain took a Prospective Glass to discover what it was that had occasion'd it, and a moment after told us his Brother was mistaken, and that those Sails we discover'd to the number of 500 were Fishing Boats that sail with any Wind. The Sun rising, it appear'd he was in the right, and we perceiv'd without the help of a Glass a prodigious number of Boats covering all the Coast. It is not to be admir'd that there is so much Fishing, for most of the People in Lisbon eat Fish at Night, even upon Flesh-days, which causes an infinite consumption, and it is not sold by weight, but by the Barrel.

We arriv'd at Cascais, a little Town without the Bar, and sail'd on to Fort S. Julian, where we fir'd so many Guns that the report reach'd the City. Being come to the mouth of the River Tagus, we saw abundance of Boats coming towards us, as well Italians as Portugueses, that seem'd to cover all the Harbour; they were Merchants and others who had some concern aboard us. I knew several who did not know me. They were surpriz'd to see me alive, after they had receiv'd an account that I was dead, and express'd much joy that the news had prov'd false. Having taken in Pilots belonging to the Port, as is the custom, we came to an Anchor just before his Highness Prince Peter then Regent of Portugal's Palace, the King being sent away to the Islands Terceras. All that came aboard the Ship had put on such fine Clothes, that I scarce knew them again. This they do at every Port, being but meanly apparel'd, as long as they are at Sea. After my Compliments to all those who had been kind to me during the Voyage, and particularly to our Captain, I went ashore to our Convent, to expect some Ship bound for Spain.

It was not long before an opportunity offer'd: Captain Dominick, a Native of Corfica, who was desirous to have a Priest aboard him, came to offer me my passage in his Ship, which was to sail in company of two other, the Loretto and the Princess. His Ship was call'd the Paradise, and it was too good an Omen to refuse to be Chaplain to the Paradise. Several Dominicans, Benedictines, and other Religious Men went aboard with me, inso-much that one said, We were afraid we should want a Chaplain, but here are enough to keep a Choir. However those good Religious Men, who were very much afraid of death, were no sooner under sail, but they kept themselves so close under Deck, that not one was to be seen. They admir'd that I being indispo'd, the Sea did me no more harm than if I had been ashore: but I said to them, Fathers, you need but go to the Indies, and then you will be no more afraid of the Sea than I am.

During this Voyage I fell into Discourse with an Irish Man, tho he was a Heretick, because I found some disposition towards gaining that Soul to Jesus Christ, and the more because he was of an inoffensive nature. He observ'd what I did, especially when I said Mass, and was pleas'd to hear the truth; so that in a few days, with God's assistance, without which the endeavours of the ablest Men are useless, I brought him to waver in his opinion. He told me he would have abjur'd in publick immediately, but that he would first go visit a Brother of his at Cadiz to receive Absolution. In fine, I was inform'd by him in that very Town, that he was become a Catholick, which nevertheless I would not publish, tho I

Carli. saw him more pleasant than he us'd to be, fearing he might do like many others, who sometimes appear very zealous, and yet afterwards forsake the good way they were in.

Tho our Ship was the biggest of the three our Convoy consisted of, yet our Captain had consented that the Captain of the Loretto, as being the Elder, should be Comandore. One day we discover'd a Ship, and it being our Captain's duty to know what she was, he made all the sail he could. We fetch'd her up in a quarter of an hour, and fir'd a Gun without Ball to make her strike, as the strongest usually do. They instead of answering our expectation, crouded up all the Sail they could, as if they would fly, their Vessel being much less than ours; that made our Captain suspect they might be Turks, since they had put out no Antient. He fir'd at them with Ball, and put up the Red Antient, which made them answer with one Gun but without Bullet. Being very near, the Captain made a Trumpeter, who spoke several Languages, Hail them. He spoke to them in French, because they had put up White Colours, but we suspecting it was a Cheat, bid them send some body aboard. They lanch'd their Pinnace, and the Master came aboard, by whom we were inform'd that the imagin'd Turk was a Vessel laden with Salt-fish from Nantes, and bound for the Islands Maderas. They drank the Healths of the Most Christian King, and the Republick of Genoa, and every one made the best of his way.

Arrives at Cadiz.

At last we came to an Anchor in that Great and Noble Port of Cadiz, one of the famousest in Europe, full of an infinite number of Ships, Galleys, Barks, Caravels, Tartans, and other Vessels, which I was assur'd at that time amounted to an hundred Sail. Just at the entrance of the Harbour we saw twenty five Ships of an extraordinary Bulk. There is a continual resort of Ships from all parts of the World, even from the Indies; and it is usual there to see thirty or forty Sail come in or go out in a day, as if they were but little Boats. I went ashore with an Italian Gentleman, and some Spanish Merchants, and we were all of us presently stopp'd by the Custom-house Officers: I gave an account of my self, and so did the Gentleman; but he added he was a Souldier in the King's Service, and they let him pass: the Spaniards said so too, and we caus'd our Goods to be loaded to go to our several homes. No sooner were we in the Town, but the chief Officer of the Custom-house with his Followers stopp'd the Porters, and bid them carry the Goods to the Custom-house. The Spaniards said they were all clear'd, and there was no need of further search. The Customer gave a surly answer; one word drew on another, so they came to ill language, and from ill language to blows. An hundred Swords were drawn in a moment, but they were throng'd so close together, that they fought with the Points of their Swords up, striking one another with the Pummels, and making such a noise, that one would have thought they were going to cut one another in pieces. The dust flew so thick there was no seeing one another, and the field of Battel being near the Harbour, the People ran thither in crowds, fearing there were many kill'd and wounded. There was much crouding to part the Combatants, hearing their crys, and the clattering of their Swords; but what abundance of rational sober People could not do, was done in a moment by four drunken Englishmen, who to make way to go to their Ships, began to throw Stones so furiously, that every Man thought himself happy enough that his Legs were found to run away. Those who were fighting, not thinking it safe to stand that shower of Stones, made their escape in an instant, some one way, and some another.

I repair'd to our Monastery, where my Fever which had granted me no respite increas'd, and kept me in Bed a Month, being forced in that time to be six times blooded again, and that while our Ships were gone. Before I could continue my Journey into Italy, I took the opportunity of going to the Shrine of S. James the Apostle in Galicia, and to that purpose associated my self with a Milanese Religious Man of the third Order of S. Francis, with whom I imbarc'd for Porto. A stormy sort of Gale carry'd us thither in a few hours, from thence we went by Sea to Birona, and from Birona with much difficulty afoot to Compostella, where we visited the famous Church of S. James the Apostle. The Canons of this Church are all clad in Scarlet, and call'd Cardinals. They told us that none must say Mass at the Saints Altar but Prelates and Grandees of Spain, for which reason the Sacristan would not permit us to say at that Altar. The Saint's Shrine is placed on the Altar with his Image upon it, so that the Pilgrims who go thither for their Devotion, ascend four or five steps, and put their Feet on the Head of that that Effigies, which is clad like a Pilgrim. There are abundance of Silver Lamps about it, but they are all black, as if they were of Wood. Having said a Pater and Ave, we went away; and the Father told me, that if he had thought it was as he found it, he would never have come into the Country. I lodg'd at a Goldsmith's, who treated us at Table with Florence Wine, Bolonia Sausages, and Parmesan Cheese; which made me admire that Italian Wines and Provisions should be found in so distant a Country, and we may well say, it is the Garden of the World.

Yes Ship
Corun-
le. We had receiv'd information that at Cape Finisterre, there was a Ship ready to sail for Cadiz, which made us hasten our departure. Just as the Captain was going into his Boat to imbarc we got thither; and tho I knew he was a Heretic, I begg'd of him to give me my Passage to Cadiz aboard his Ship for God's sake. He without answering made me a sign to go into the Boat, which when I had done, seeing he had not answer'd me, and perhaps because he did not understand Spanish, I spoke to him in Portuguese, then he answer'd I was welcome, and that he would not only carry me to Cadiz, but to Sevil if I would. I thank'd him for his charitable offer; but my Companion, who would have been glad to be in such a habit as mine, was forced to pay for his passage. It was a great English Man of War of 70 Guns, and 300 Men, loaden with Anchors, and other Naval Stores. It was bound by order of his Britannick Majesty to all the Ports of Spain, to find out twenty four Frigats belonging to that Crown, sent against the Turks, and was to furnish them with what they wanted.

When we were out at Sea, I saw the Captain with a Prospective Glass endeavour'd to discover some Sails that appear'd at a great distance; after which he went into his Cabin, and talk'd to his Officers in English, who went to give out Orders, and presently after the Drums began to beat, and the Souldiers to take their Posts. My Companion and I guest they were making ready to fight, tho we saw no Ships, but they had seen them. We directed our course towards them, sailing with a Side-wind, and adding two small Sails on the Sides of the Main Sheet; so that having fourteen Sails abroad, we flew like the Wind it self, and cut the Water in a most violent manner.

Within an hour we came up with the two Ships the Captain had descry'd, and Carli. they having put out no Colours, he gave them a Gun to bring them in; but they A Sea- fight. seeing they were two to one, and doubtless never imagining our Ship was so well mann'd, answer'd with a Bullet, and at the same time we heard from one of those Ships a confused noise of Voices as it were of People that complain'd. Our Captain said he did not question but one was a Turkish Vessel that had taken the other which was a Christian, and it prov'd so. At the same time he furl'd his Sails, and gave them a broad side of twenty Guns, which made such a thundering as would daunt the bravest heart. It was happy for us we had the Wind, which carry'd all our Smoke upon the Turks. Yet they fir'd like mad Men from both Ships, for the Prize was mann'd with Turkish Sailers and Souldiers, and the poor Christians were forced against their will to help at the Guns, the chief of them being put into Irons. The Cannonading continu'd an Hour and a half, and not knowing what the event might be, the Father of the third Order and I confess'd to one another. He was vex'd at heart to be in that business, but I arm'd my self with patience against whatever might happen, whilst no Ball reach'd me.

Our Captain perceiving the Fight was like to hold, caus'd one of the Enemies to be boarded, grappling with them to come to handy strokes. Then it was we began to hear the groans and crys of the poor wounded Men lying about the Deck one upon another, and serving to shelter those that fought. The Attack was furious, and the resistance vigorous; but the Enemy being inferiour in number, began to give way and yield. Our Men without losing time leap'd aboard, put the Turks in Irons, and set the Christians at liberty, who took up Arms to be reveng'd of the Infidels, and to secure the liberty they had newly obtain'd. The other Vessel being left alone fled for it, but our brave Captain soon had all things in order, and put Men aboard the Prize, which being less than his Ship, could better pursue the other that fled, which being loaded with Goods taken from Christians was soon fetch'd up by the other we had taken, that had nothing aboard but Provisions and Ammunition. They fir'd some Guns, but perceiving our Great Ship came up and was within Cannon-shot, yielded. The Lieutenant, who had the Command of the first given him, went to take possession of the other, putting the Turks in Irons, and releasing the Carli. Christians, who were in number four-score in all, Sailers, Merchants and Passengers, besides twelve that were kill'd: Of the Turks there were 130, the rest being either kill'd or dangerously wounded.

The three Ships drew close together, and our Captain order'd all the Christians to be brought before him, who all knelt down to thank him for their deliverance out of the hands of those Barbarians: He ask'd who was their Captain; and a lusty Man half strip'd told him in Spanish it was he; and afterwards in Portuguese, which our Captain understood better, gave an account how they had been taken: That sailing from Malaga laden with Wine, and being out of the Straits near Cape S. Vincent, that Turkish Ship which carried no Goods, but was well man'd with about 225 Souldiers and Sailors, had attack'd him, and being much the stronger made themselves Masters of his Vessel after some resistance. The Captain bid them go dress themselves, and take possession of his Ship again, making the English come out. They return'd him abundance of Thanks, and beg'd of him to convoy them to Cadiz, since he was bound thither as well as they, which our Captain granted them. The English divided themselves, some aboard our Ship, and some aboard the Turk, put all things in order, and held on their course rejoicing that they had kill'd two Birds with one stone, having taken the Turk, and deliver'd the Spaniard, among whom there were some Neapolitans, Milaneses and Flemings.

As we proceeded on our Voyage, making all the sail we could, the Sky began to grow dark on a sudden; and fearing some Storm was gathering, we lower'd our Sails, which indeed was done just in time, for but a moment after the Wind blew so outrageously that there was no keeping the Ship to her course, but she was left to the mercy of the Wind. Then were there heard throughout the Vessel such hollowing and calling as increas'd the terror of approaching Death; yet the Captain bid us fear nothing, for that the Ship being new would certainly bring us off: However we did not cease to offer up our fervent Prayers. The Father seeing we were every moment in danger of perishing, told me we had done ill in going aboard those Hereticks, who are always under Excommunication; but I answer'd, Those who travel about the World must make a Virtue of Necessity. In the mean while the Man at the Topmast-head cry'd, Land, Land.

The Captain ran up, and perceiv'd we were on the Coast of Barbary, the Storm having carry'd us a great way up the Mediterranean; for which reason before any Turks might discover us, he gave orders to steer towards Oran, a strong place belonging to the King of Spain. We got thither in less than an hour, the Wind blowing so hard, and gave God thanks for delivering us from the Turks, the Wind if we had not minded it carrying us directly to Algier.

Our Captain went ashore next morning with some of his Officers and the Spanish Captain; they went to the Governor, and gave him an account of our Fight, and he in the Name of his Catholick Majesty thank'd the English. This Fortress seems to be of great consequence, and in a manner impregnable: It is well provided with Cannon, and very serviceable to Christians when they are drove by Storms upon the Coast of Barbary, there being no other place where Christians can put in. Next morning the Wind being fair, we weigh'd Anchor, and soon arriv'd at Cadiz. I had thoughts of going ashore to our Monastery, but the Captain told me, that he having some business at Sevil had hir'd a Bark to go thither, and that if I pleas'd he would carry me in it for God's sake, which made me not neglect so good an opportunity. I staid about a day till he had dispatch'd some business he had at Cadiz, and then we set out, carrying 30 Men with us to row in case the Wind fail'd us. We touch'd at S. Lucar, staid there some hours, and having kept going all night, arriv'd at Sevil. I thank'd him for so many Favours I had receiv'd of him, declaring I was so much the more sensible of their Greatness, because I could not have receiv'd more from a Catholick. He made me such an Answer, as imply'd that Capuchins were in good esteem among them.

I went to our Monastery, which is great considering our Poverty, and has a considerable number of Religious Men. There I continued eight days, as well to rest my self, as to see the Town, which would not be unlike Milan were the Streets handsome and wide: The Dome in nothing inferior to that at Milan, only that it is not of Marble, but of a Stone somewhat like it, yet softer and easier to work. It is the custom throughout all Spain to make the Choir and high Altar in the middle of the Church, particularly in Cathedrals, which is very inconvenient where there is a great resort of People.

People, tho otherwise they are great and stately Structures. The Steeple is so large and well built, that a Man may go up to it a Horseback, or in a Litter: Going up to it, I was surpriz'd to see so many Bells, for there are no less than three and thirty. Whilst we were there they came to ring them, and all being to ring but two or three that belong to the Clock, we made haste down for fear of being stun'd with the terrible noise of their clattering: As soon as we were in the Street, they began to ring with such a noise, that it sounded as if all the Bells in the Town had been rung.

I went to see the King's Garden, which is fine enough, and has abundance of Waterworks, Orange and Lemmon Trees, yet there is nothing in it but what we have in Italy in greater plenty. I visited the Convent of the Recolets, which is very large, but of an antient Structure; there are in it above 150 Religious Men, besides those in the Infirmary. The Bell they ring to call to the Refectory is twice as big as that which serves our Church. The Canons of this City are very rich, and always go in Coaches drawn by four Mules: They then expected Monsigneur Spinola an Italian, who had the Archbishoprick of that City confer'd on him.

I set out from thence afoot for Cordova, passing through Carmona, and other small places, of which I will give no account for fear of tiring the Reader; yet I cannot forget the wretched Road, where there is neither House nor Tree, nor so much as Water to cool ones Mouth to be found. This made me provide a Bottle of Wine, which I had through the assistance of a Gentleman I met on the Road, who bought it for me, there being no hopes of having it given me for God's sake by the Inn-keeper. And were it not for People of Quality that relieve us, it would be impossible for Capuchins to live upon Charity according to their ways, the People being wholly strangers to giving of Alms. Being in a Town where we have no Convent, I beg'd some Bread for God's sake of a Baker, which was so surprising to him, that he stood in a maze like a Man besides himself: I left him and his Bread, for fear if I should beg any longer of him, he would be quite beside himself. I continued my Journy, begging of God that he would soon let me get out of a Country where there was so little Charity.

Being come to Cordova I went to our Monastery, where I was forced to be satisfied with the Spanish Dish they call

Olla Podrida, signifying a rotten Pot; which name is not improper, for it is an extravagant medley of several things, as Onions, Garlick, Pumkin, Cucumber, white Beets, a bit of Pork and two of Mutton, which being boil'd with the rest are almost lost. The Fathers as'd me whether I lik'd it: I told them it was very fit to kill me, Being as I was almost sick, and so weak that I had need of some better Restorative than that Podrida, to which I was not us'd. They put so much Saffron into it, that had I not been yellow enough already with my Distemper, that alone might have been enough to dye my Skin of that colour. It is a great Dainty for Spaniards, but a scurvy mess for those that are not us'd to it.

The Cathedral on the outside look'd to me bigger than all the Town, and I was not deceiv'd, for being in it, I was amaz'd to behold a Church so large, that from one side of it a Man can scarce see the Wall on the other; and were it proportionable in height, it would be one of the Wonders of the World: There are on the inside ten rows of Pillars, and fifteen Pillars in each row: The middle Isle is very spacious after the modern manner, and gilt about the high Altar and Choir. A Canon told me there were in it 366 Altars; on the chief of them is a very large Tabernacle all of precious Stones, which has a Revenue of 3000 Livers appropriated to it. In a large Chappel there is a great Silver Ciborium that weighs 96 Ounces. I observ'd upon a Pillar standing by it self, a Man painted kneeling: They told me it was the Picture of a Christian who had been many years a Slave in that Town when it was in the possession of the *Moor*s, and had with his Nails carv'd a Cross upon that Pillar: It was show'd me, and a Man would have thought it had been done with a Penknife. I believe he was very long about it, for the Pillar is very fine Marble. This City is seated in a great Vale, a River running by the Walls; formerly it ran through the midst of the City, which was then very large, but at present indifferent, and has in it nothing else remarkable that I know of.

I set out for Alcala la Real, and met Alcala with some Spaniards who told me, that Andalusia was the Garden of Spain: Whereupon I said to my self, God keep me from the rest of Spain if this be the Garden, I had better return to Sea. That Town stands upon a Hill, and I saw nothing remarkable in it. Granada, whither I went next, is a beautiful and very large

Carli. large City, but yet inferior to Sevil. Our Fathers have two Monasteries there, one for a Novitiate, the other to study: The Cathedral is not yet finish'd. The Palace of the Moorish Kings, call'd the Alhambra, stands upon a Hill, which tho very high has plenty of Water. There are such abundance of Rooms in this Palace, that a Man may lose himself, as if he were in a Labyrinth. There are two Baths where the Moors us'd to wash themselves, one of hot Water, the other of cold: The Cielings of the Rooms are very curious, being made of a colour'd Plaister that still looks new. There is another Hill on which the Infidels did put holy Martyrs to death, and where abundance of Relicks are kept.

Lercenna. From Granada I went to Lercenna, the Wine of which place is look'd upon to be the best in Spain, but the People speak such ill Spanish, that they are hardly to be understood: They call them Biscalins.
Antequera. I held on my Journey to Antequera, a Town as big as a City. I rested there eight days in one of our Monasteries, and the Guardian who did me a thousand good turns would have kept me there as long again. Thence I went to Malaga, which is an indifferent good Sea-port Town, very populous, and full of Trade. The Archbishop is a Dominican, Brother to Don John of Austria: I was told his Revenue was worth 80000 Ducats a year.

I lay there waiting some opportunity of Shipping, and finding my self still very ill, my bleeding at the Nose, Ears and Mouth, not being yet over, I put my self into the hands of an English Physician, who had so much success as to mend my Condition, for I bled only at the Nose: For eight days I was pretty well, and then relaps'd as bad as ever. After waiting some weeks, a very good opportunity offer'd: Six Spanish Gallies returning from the Straits of Gibraltar, came to an Anchor in the Port, to take in fresh Provisions, and go winter at Carthage: I apply'd my self to the Marquess of Bayona who commanded them, he was then call'd Marquess de Santa Cruz, having resign'd the Title of Bayona to his Son, who is now General of the Gallies of Sicily. That noble Lord understanding I was an Italian, did not only grant me my Passage, but would have me aboard his Gally; and tho I could speak Spanish, would have me converse with him in my Mother Tongue, because he spoke Italian to perfection, having been formerly General of the Gallies of Naples and Sicily. The Priest be-

Our Voyage lasted fifteen days, and in that short time I found what it was to be at Sea in Gallies: I envy'd their happiness who were aboard great Ships, which are more commodious and expeditious than Gallies. The bad Weather made us put back three times; a Calm ensuing, we made way with our Oars; discovering a Sail by the Moon-light, the Oars were hard ply'd to fetch it up: when we were near, she set up English Colours, yet we hemm'd her in, and gave her a Gun. She answer'd, and the Captain lanching his Boat, came aboard his Excellency. That Vessel appear'd like a Mountain to us that were aboard the Gallies, the Stern was all gilt; they were cruizing upon the Turks, whom they mortally hate: and did all Princes follow their Example, I believe those wicked Pirates would scarce show their heads at Sea.

We held on our course to Almeria, Almer where we continued two days laying in Water and other fresh Provisions: The Town is neither large nor populous, but seems to have been considerable in the time of the Moors, being encompass'd by Mountains, and defended by a good Fort: It is adorn'd with abundance of Fountains of very pure and wholesom Water. As I was there quenching my Thirst proceeding from the Fever and Effusion of Blood, I heard the warning-piece for sailing, and return'd aboard the Gallies. We set out about night-fall, being saluted by the Fort, and in our way took three Turkish Brigantines; the Men were distributed among the Gallies, and the Vessels man'd with Christians and Turkish Slaves. At last we arriv'd at Carthage, Carthage where is an excellent Port form'd by Nature, shut in with Mountains and very safe, especially for Gallies. The Town seems to have been formerly considerable, but is at present the most wretched place in Spain; for after the Inhabitants had ston'd their Bishop, they were seven years without Rain, but it seems God took Compassion on them after that, for now it rains twice or thrice a year: However the Country is barren, and they carry Bisket thither out of Italy to maintain the People belonging to the Gallies that winter there. Thence I went to Caravaca, where I saw the holy Cross Caravaca brought by an Angel from Heaven, and set on an Altar where a Priest was saying Mass without a Cross. I went on to Valencia,

Valencia, a very fine City, delightful for its Gardens, the pleasantest of which is the Archbishop's. Thence to Murcia and Alicant, a little Town, but of good Trade, the Houses high and well built: Having staid there five days, I continu'd my Journey through Tortosa and Tarragona, where there is a beautiful Dome, and then came to Monserrate: This place inspires Respect, and draws Tears from the Eyes of those who go thither with a true Spirit of Devotion. There are as many Chappels as Mysteries of the holy Rosary. One would think all the way to it was hew'd out, it being all through a Rock. There is a very great number of Silver and Gold Lamps, and some of Amber, the Ornaments of the Altars being answerable to that Grandure. There are continually Pilgrims on the Road going thither, or returning from thence.

From our Lady of Monserrate, I went to Barcelona, the Capital City of Catalonia, and a Bishoprick: I resided there six weeks, because of a Pain I felt, which made me unfit even to ride a Horseback. Three Monasteries we have there, are out of the Town: That of S. Matrona is upon the side of a Hill under the Fort, and in the Church is the Body of that Saint. The second is that of S. Eubalia, where that Saint's House stood, among the Mountains two miles from the City, and that is the Novitiate. The third is that of Mount Calvary, not that it is seated on a Mountain, but it is so call'd because of three Crosses there are in it: To this it was I betook my self, because it is the greatest, and has an Infirmary. Those Catalonian Fathers receiv'd me with extraordinary Civility, especially when they understood I came from so far a Country. The City is large and beautiful, abounding in all things necessary for Human Life, and would be the most considerable place in those parts, had it a safe Harbour for great Ships. I took notice of the Musick they use upon Rejoicings, for instead of Violins at Weddings they have fifes and Trumpets, which make the Church shake.

During my stay at Barcelona there came thither one of our Lay Brothers, whose Name was Peter de Saffari, from Argier, where he had been ransom'd among other Slaves by the Catholick King: He had been taken six Months before with F. Luis of Palermo in their way from Cagliari to Saffari. Those two Capuchins being carried to Argier, F. Luis found no difficulty to get his Living by Preaching, Masses, and hearing Confessions, and could besides pay his Master to whose share he fell, so much a Month as they agreed upon, for which reason he was not put to the Oar, but was allow'd to go about the Town freely: So when they were about ransoming of him, his Master set him at 3000 Ducats, whereas the Brother was sold for 300, being only fit for the Oar; and it being easier to raise that Sum, he was first ransom'd. I propos'd to him to go into Italy, and his Head was so possess'd with his late Misfortune, that he gave me to understand that his only design was to return home as soon as he could. We resolv'd therefore to lay hold of the opportunity of a Bark bound for Sardinia, the Captain whereof, D. Carlos de Piza, a very devout Catalonian, receiv'd us very courteously: We were 250 Souls aboard that Bark, which set sail with a fair Gale. The Wind being very brisk, we had made much way, and were entering the Gulph of Lions, when the Weather becoming boisterous, it grew to one of the most terrible Storms imaginable, the Waves tossing our Bark like a Nut-shell, and Mountains of Water covering of it every foot. The Disorder, Confusion, and especially the Cries of the Women terrify'd those that were most inur'd to such Tempests. The worst of it was, that the Seamen could not hear one another with the noise of the Sea and of the Passengers, which oblig'd the Captain to draw his Sword to drive all those under Deck who could not help, but only serv'd to hinder the Sailors: All upon the Deck and in the Cabin were wet; the Vessel seem'd to be ready to overset with the beating of the Sea, which drove all the People to that side which inclin'd, when a Wave struck against it with such violence that it broke the lashings of one of the Guns. The Cannon being loose ran down to the lower side with such fury, and gave such a shock, that it was a wonder the Bark was not flav'd: The noise it made increas'd the Terror, which the darkness of the Night spread. The Sailors wet and spent, resolv'd to let the Bark run before the Wind, provided she did not run aground. I thought with my self, how comes it about that I who have twice cross'd the Ocean, should come now to be drown'd in a puddle of Water; for to say the truth, I never thought my self so near being cast away as that time, seeing one of the Masts spent, the Sails half rent, the Bark batter'd, and the Seamen all cast down. This Storm lasted all night, so that we knew not whither we were going. About day

He sails for Sardinia.

Carli. day-break the Sea seem'd to grow somewhat stiller, and the Sky clearing by the rising of the Sun, we discover'd Mountains, which were not above a League from us, and found we were on the Coast of Spain near Cape Gata. So that perceiving I was drove back, and had in six hours space lost near as much ground as I made in six months, I resolv'd to go no more to Sea. However we soon took heart, for whilst we were making to shore, there started up such a fresh Gale from the North, that the Pilot thought it would not be amiss in some measure to regain the time and ground we had lost. We bent our Course for Catalonia, and in a few hours arriv'd at Mattalona, our Pilot's native Country.

Being come to an Anchor, I landed with my Companion whom I had not seen during the Storm, and went to rest us at our Convent, which stands on a Hill without the Town. I design'd to have staid there some time, but understanding the Pilot would sail up to Ablana, which is a better Harbor, I suffer'd my self to be tempted to make use of that Conveniency, being willing to put to Sea again, as soon as I was ashore, because of the distemper I still labor'd under. In a few hours we got to Ablana, and went to our Monastery seated on a Rock in a Peninsula join'd to the Town by a small Neck of Land; so that the Sea serves for an Inclosure to the Monastery and Garden, which I thought the finest situation of any Convent of our Order, the Air being very temperate. I acquainted my Companion that I intended to stay there some time, in order to return home through France, a more worthy Object for my Curiosity than Sardinia. The Crew of our Vessel, and particularly the Officers, who were all Italians, hearing of it, came to Confession to me, expressing how much they were concern'd that I should leave them. They sailing again for Sardinia, I rested eight days in that delicious place, and then set out with two Companions for Girona; so that I saw almost all Catalonia, which is a very fruitful Country, and the People extraordinary well temper'd. From Girona I went to *Higuera*s on the Borders of Spain; whence crossing some Mountains, I entered upon the Earldom of Roussillon, and the first Town of it call'd Cerat.

Roussillon. From Cerat I went to Touy in the Vale of Perpignan, and I remember I there pass'd over a River upon a Bridg, that has but one Arch, the Feet whereof rest upon two Hills, so that the middle of it is a prodigious height, and frightful to look down. They say there is not so high an Arch in all France, and for my part I must own I have not seen any like it in all those parts of the World where I have been. I saw all the Country about full of Soldiers; and asking what might be the reason, was told, That Country had once belong'd to the Crown of Spain; but being since under the Dominion of France, and the price of Salt being rais'd, the People had revolted; for which reason Troops had been sent thither from Languedoc to quell them.

Perpignan, which I saw next, is a Fort <sup>Perp</sup> Royal seated on a high Rock, encompass'd by three lofty Walls with good Ditches, and well stor'd with Cannon. To appearance it looks impregnable, yet the most Christian King took it after a Siege of eight months; which was the easier for him to do, because there is a very populous Town adjoining to the Fort; for had it been a Fort alone without a Town, eight months had not been enough to starve the place, where they might have laid up three years Provision. Our Monastery there is without the Town.

Having pass'd the Mountains, I came to Narbonne, through the midst of which <sup>Narb</sup> there runs a River that falls into the Sea a League off. The City is not large, but very populous, as are all the Cities and Towns in France. The Churches are not beautiful, but there is such a resort of People to them, especially upon Holy-days, that there is scarce room for the Priest to turn himself at the Altar. The Priests of the Church of S. Justus are habited like Monks. The two Steeples have a notable Echo, which is pleasant to hear.

Next I saw the Towns of Languedoc and Provence that lay in my Road, whereof I shall say but little. Beziers stands <sup>Bezie</sup> on a Hill in a delightful Country, and well water'd: I went to the Cathedral to see the Arch-bishop Monseigneur de Bonzy a Florentine, but he was then absent. He has been since made Arch-bishop of Toulouse, and his most Christian Majesty's Ambassador at Madrid. Yet the King allows him the Revenue of his Bishoprick, till it is bestow'd on another. In this Church I took notice of a very large Organ over the great Gate, where there are only those Pipes that appear outward in sight, the others being distributed by three and three among the Pillars, which makes the Church shake when they play, tho it is extraordinary great, which is a notable piece of curiosity.

Toulouse

Toulouse is a City worth seeing, for the great number of Relicks kept there, as also for its greatness, and the number of its Inhabitants; which made me take care not to go by the Churches when Mass or Vespers were ending, the Throng being so great that it would have forced me back.

Agde an antient Town, where was held the Council call'd Agatense. In our Monastery, which is on the Strand, there is a miraculous Image of our Lady; for the Sea having three times swell'd up to the Town, has never incroach'd since the Image was placed there, but rather gone back, for which reason it is call'd Nostre Dame du Gué.

Arles an Arch-bishoprick, and populous enough.

ics. Martegues a Place curious to behold, for it is divided into four Hamlets built upon the Sea, with Bridges from one to the other. We have two Monasteries, one at each end of the Town; in one of which there are fourteen Religious Men, and twelve in the other; and there being none of any other Order, they hear Confessions there, as they do in France, Spain, Germany, and some parts of Italy. The only support of this Town almost, is Fishing, there being eight hundred Tartsans for this purpose, besides a vast number of little Boats that cover a great part of the Sea.

At, Marseilles. Thence I went to Aix the Capital City of Provence, and to Marseilles, a considerable Town, and of great Trade, yet not so large as I had fancy'd it. The Harbour is very handsome and safe, more especially for Barks and Galleys, because great Ships cannot go in loaden. There I saw 25 Galleys laid up close by one another, and in the midst of them the Royal Galley, which all Vessels that come into that Port salute with a Gun. Her Stern is finely carv'd, and gilt. True it is, she is not so big as the Royal Galley of Spain I saw at Carthage, which carry'd the Empress: This Town has three Forts, of which the new one at the Mouth of the Harbour has three Walls, and four on one side. His most Christian Majesty has caus'd the Wall that enclos'd the side next to the Hill to be thrown down to enlarge its compass, which has brought our Monastery into the Town, and will make it much more considerable, being fill'd with a vast multitude of People of all Nations: Several Bodies of Saints, and abundance of Relicks are to be seen there, particularly S. Andrew's Cross. I went to see the Churches of S.

Maximin, and S. Beaume; they are places that inspire Devotion, and draw Carli. Tears from the hardest Hearts.

I took Ship for Ciotat and Toulon. This Toulon is an indifferent Town, but the Port very considerable, and capable of receiving any number of the biggest Vessels: I saw the Royal Luis, which must be finish'd by this time, and carries 120 Guns; it has three Galleries, and the Stern all Gilt, as are the Sides, Head, and Cabins. The Gilder that was about it told me they had already laid out 3000 Crowns in Leaf-Gold. I took the opportunity of a Vessel bound for Savona: The first day we sail'd right afore the Wind, and at night put into S. Trompes; but the next day the bad Weather forced us into a place where there were but two Houses, at a great distance from the City Grasse, which Grasse stands on a Hill encompassed by other Hills, so that we could scarce see it at Sea, and therefore we must either go thither, or starve. Finding my self somewhat hot of that which the Physicians at Marseilles call'd a Hellick Fever, and made me unfit to travel; I lay down to sleep under a Tree, but Hunger would not suffer me to close my Eyes. Being thus weary of my self, and not able to go to Grasse as the others did, I knew not A strange what course to take, when God, who has Story always reliev'd me in distress, as I have often found by experience in my Travels, ordain'd that I should meet a Person that to me seem'd of some note, and said to me, Father, what do you here all alone? My Distemper, said I, which you may discern by my Looks, has made me stay here; but at present Hunger torments me more than my Fever. He answer'd, I am come in that cover'd Felucca you see near that Rock, and it is mine; I have caught some Pilchers, if you please we will sup together. The Offer was very pleasing to me, as any Man may imagine; and so I follow'd him very readily. We went into the Felucca, where two Seamen had made all ready. How shall we do, said he, for we have no Bread but Bisket? Any thing is good in a time of need, said I, and I have been often without either Bread or Bisket. That good Man talk'd to me in Portuguese, which I admir'd, being so far from that Country; and therefore I ask'd him whether he was a Portuguese. He told me he was not, but that he had been there sometime.

We began to eat and drink, without regarding that the Sun shin'd violent hot in our Fates, Hunger making me lay about me, and giving an excellent relish

Carli. to any sort of Meat. Having eaten, and given Thanks to Almighty God, we walk'd along the Shore discoursing together: I step'd forwards alone to see a Dolphin that made a noise in the Water, as if he had been fighting with another Fish, and was busy throwing some Stones at him. When I had done, I look'd about and found that good Man did not follow me, which made me turn back for fear he should be gone before I could return him Thanks; but I sought him in vain, nor could I discover the Felucca. I went back to the place where it lay, and saw nothing, which put me almost beside my self. And indeed when I reflect upon it, I cannot tell what to think. One thing I know, which is, that having carefully examin'd those that were left aboard our Brigantine, whether they had seen that Felucca that came to the Shore with three Men in it; they answer'd, they had seen no Creature, tho they had been all the while ashore fishing in that little Creek. I held my peace, and in my heart thank'd God, the Source of all that is Good, for that he had been pleas'd, without any desert of mine, to relieve me in that distress, into which I was fallen for his sake. Whether it was by the hands of a Man, or of an Angel, I could not tell, but I felt an unspeakable comfort; and such it was, that had my Health permitted, I should have certainly return'd to Congo, since I could still make use of my Millioner's Patent which was not yet expir'd.

Next day we went aboard, and sailing before the Wind, arriv'd near to Nice; but the Port not being safe, went on to Villafranca, where I went to our Monastery, which looks like a Paradise amidst so many high Mountains, and so many uncouth Rocks. Three days after I set out aboard a Genoese Galley, which carry'd me safe to Monaco: This is a place of considerable strength, very pleasant and delightful. Thence I took the opportunity of a Brigantine bound for Savona; but we had like to have perish'd in a Storm, and were forced back. I would not trust the Sea again, after finding it so merciless and uncertain, for fear, lest after so many dangers as I had gone through, I should at last be shipwreck'd in the very Harbour. I thought the Land would be more favourable to me, and making short Journeys, took my way through Monten S. Remy, which is as it were the Paradise of Italy, Savona, Sestri di Ponente, and Genoa. In the Monastery call'd the Conception, which is without ders, having sent them an account of my Return. A violent Fever which held me forty days, had like to have done the Work, a Hectick Fever could not perform in three Years. It was a comfort for me to be among my Acquaintance, who did me abundance of Favours.

During that time Brother Michael de Orvietto came to Genoa from Congo, being sent to Rome by the Superior, to represent to the Holy Congregation de Propaganda Fide, to what a low condition that Million was reduced, most of the Millioners dying in a short time, and only three remaining in the whole Kingdom. He brought us news of the Death of D. Alvaro King of Congo, and the Election of another as devout as he. Besides, he told us that the Blacks had eaten F. Philip de Galefia, a Millioner of the Province of Rome, which happen'd in this manner: The Great Men having obtain'd leave of the King to burn such Sorcerers as they could find, went to a place where they knew they were got together, and set fire to their Cottages. As soon as the Flame began to rise, they fled, and meeting with F. Philip in their way, fell upon, kill'd, and eat him; which the Blacks who pursu'd them saw by the light of the Flames, and carry'd the news to S. Salvador. This happen'd in the Province of Sonde, where a Duke who is the King's Subject resides.

Contrary to all expectation I recover'd, and passing through Piacenza, came to Bononia, where, God be prais'd, I am at this time with some Relicks of my Distemper, left me by the great Fatigues of my Travels, thinking my time well enough spent, if but one of 2700 Children and Youths I baptiz'd, obtains Salvation through my Ministry. F. Michael Angelo, before he departed this Life, told me he had baptiz'd 316; and it is no wonder we should baptize so many in so short a time, the People being innumerable. A Black told me, that a Macolonte had got 52 Children upon several Women. God of his Mercy preserve those that for the future shall be appointed for this Mission, for fear if they fail, all those People should turn Pagans. Be it all to the Glory of God, whose Judgments are incomprehensible, and the means he uses for our Salvation various and wonderful in all respects. I desire the Readers to pray for those poor converted Ethiopians, that they may persevere in the Faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that we may altogether attain to our desired Port of the Kingdom of Heaven. Amen.

The Author's Preface.

THE Author of our Salvation Christ Jesus, the only begotten Son of God, descending from the Bosom of his Father to visit our tottering Mansions here on Earth, never had greater desires than to teach us by his Word and Works the secure and infallible way to Heaven, and thereby to deliver us from the horrid and deplorable Slavery design'd us by the Devil and his Ministers, and wherein we were all miserably involv'd by the Sin of our first Parents. Hence it is that after his most glorious Ascension he commanded his Disciples to go preaching his most holy Word through all the habitable parts of the Earth; and that in defence thereof, if necessity so require, they should be ready to shed their dearest Blood, which all the Apostles and Martyrs have accordingly done in Obedience to his most holy Commands, and for the Good and Propagation of the only true Catholick Church. Now because the preaching of this Word of God to a People that were wholly ignorant thereof before, was one of the greatest of spiritual Undertakings, Father Francis da Monteltone, a Capuchin Frier and Native of the Province of Sardinia, determin'd to go to Congo, and other neighbouring Kingdoms, to expose his Life for that purpose, and the rather by reason that those People, especially the Giaghi, were so far from paying any Adoration to the true God, that they sacrificed directly to the Devil; and what is yet worse, their Oblations were not Sheep and Oxen, but Men and Women. Being thus earnestly resolv'd, this Frier, inflam'd solely by fervent Charity, requested of the sacred College de propaganda fide, Permission for himself and his Companions to effect what he had thus propos'd; and to the end he might not be thought to have any regard to Self-interest, he proffer'd to go Gratis, thereby depriving himself of what had always been accusom'd to be given by that College to Missioners, and trusting entirely to Divine Providence for Support. Having obtain'd leave for himself, he further begg'd of the said College that I might go as his Companion, which being likewise granted, I accepted the Honour and great Favour done me, tho I was but little capable of so difficult an Undertaking, either in respect of my Health or Ability. What follows is the Product of some few years Observations in those Parts, which, tho short and imperfect, yet I assure my Readers is wholly true, and that especially which I have affirm'd my self to have been an Eye-witness of.

Voyage to CONGO, &c.

PART I.

ON the 5th of May, in the Year of our Lord 1682. and under the Pontificat of his Holiness Pope Innocent XI. we set sail from Naples in a Felucca for Corfica and Sardinia, and arriv'd at Bastia the Capital City of the former, on Whit-sunday; where meeting with a Genoese Ship ready to go for the Salt-Pits, the Wind being favourable, we immediately went on board her, and soon came up with a large Genoese Sloop with only three Men on board. We hal'd her, and beg'd of the Master to transport us Missioners to the Bay of Algeri in Sardinia, whither we were bound in quest of some of our Companions. Our Request being readily granted, we exchanged our Vessel, and coasted along the Island, often endeavouring to enter the Bay; but the Wind proving contrary, were as often forced back to Sea. We had recourse to our Prayers, because in great distress for want of Provisions: However the Divine Providence, that orders all things for the best, saw it not convenient that we should be so heard as to land where we desir'd; and therefore instead of suffering us to proceed on our Voyage, we were driven back to a small Port near the Point. Here my Companion being well acquainted with the Country, would needs go ashore and climb a small Mountain, intending to beg a Lamb for Charity of any Shepherd he could meet: As soon as he had reached the top, he began to call out to us below with great earnestness, requiring us speedily to come up to him; where when we came, we plainly perceiv'd that had we turn'd the Point, we had infallibly fallen into the Clutches of a Turkish Corsair that lay there upon the catch. To be the better convinc'd of this, we took our Glasses, and found what he shew'd us to be real;

besides that, some Coral Barks he had chas'd assur'd us of the truth of it. Then began our Master to lift up his Hands to Heaven, and to offer up Acknowledgments with a flood of Tears to St. Francis for having delivered both him and his Companions from so imminent a danger on our account.

The Night following the Pirat being wholly out of sight, and we probably out of danger, we went again on board our Sloop to prosecute our interrupted Voyage. In few hours after arriving at Algeri, we saw near an hundred Genoese Barks fishing for Coral, which it seems greatly abounds in those Seas; as also for Tunny-fish, and several other sorts, whereof there is great plenty. At our landing in the Bay, we immediately dispatch'd a Messenger to the Father Guardian of our Monastery, to acquaint him that we were come ashore, and to desire of him to send us a Horse to carry our Baggage to the Convent. Instead of a Horse he sent an Ox, that being the Beast of Burden commonly made use of in this Country. This seem'd very strange to me, especially when I understood that he was likewise a Pad upon occasion, and all this by reason of the extreme smallness of their Horses. Which I was the more easily induc'd to believe, when some Portuguese Gentlemen told me, that the same was done in the Island of Cabo Verde, subject to them, where there was a Breed between Oxen and She-Ases, which they compass'd by binding a fresh Cow's Hide upon the She-As, and this to the end that the Cattel bred of them might be expeditious. The consideration whereof I refer to Philosophers.

In this City I staid about a month waiting for my Companion, who was gone about the Island in search of the other Missioners who were to go with us to the

the Kingdom of Congo. During my stay the Bishop of the Diocese made a solemn entry into the City, and shew'd himself to be much devoted, and well-affected to our Order; for the next day after his arrival at his Palace, he came to our Convent to visit us. Moreover on the Feast of St. John Baptist, the Patron of our Church, he assisted with us at Mass. Likewise as a farther Instance of his Favour, having been inform'd by some of our Brothers, that I was going on a Mission to the Southern Africk, without any extraordinary provision of Necessaries: He gave me a Letter of Recommendation to several of his Friends in Spain to supply me with what I wanted. Which Kindness of his, as it happen'd, was of no use to us, because we touch'd at no Port in Spain.

My Companion returning, brought along with him only one Friar, nam'd Father Francis da Bitti a Preacher, the rest having been detain'd by some Business. All things being now dispatch'd here, and finding a Ship of Provence ready in the Harbour, we immediately embark'd and sail'd towards that Country. The Captain being Nephew and Brother to two of our Order, us'd us very courteously, not only while we were on board him, but after our landing, inviting us to his House, where we staid for some time. And to compleat his Civility towards us, understanding that the King of Portugal's Fleet waited at Villafranca to carry his Royal Highness the Duke of Savoy to Portugal (whither he was going to solemnize his Nuptials with the Infanta of that Kingdom) he would needs take a Felucca at his own charge to conduct us to that Port, where we soon after arriv'd, and were receiv'd with great Joy and Civilities by the Portuguese Commanders, telling us that if we could not find Conveniences elsewhere in their Ships, we might oblige them in accepting of their own Cabins.

franca.

Our Superior Father John da Romano coming from Genoa, with Father Amedeo da Vienna, and a Secular Priest of Piedmont, we all six went ashore to a Convent of our Order, where we remain'd three months, and had every week a charitable Substantance of two Weathers, a small Cask of Wine, and sufficient Bread sent us by those Gentlemen, besides other Presents made to the Monastery on our account.

The delay the Fleet made to set sail lasted in all six months, and which was occasion'd by the Duke of Savoy's falling sick, and growing worse every time he resolv'd upon his departure; which Politicians tell us happen'd through the Providence of God, and for the Benefit of Italy.

Not before the 4th of October, being the Feast of our glorious Patron St. Francis, did the Fleet put to Sea, the Wind North. For our better accommodation our Superior had order'd our Company to go but two in a Ship. Himself and his Piemontese Companion went on board the Admiral, the Count of St. Vincent Commander. I and Father Amedeo were in the Ship call'd the Fiscal, commanded by Signior Gonfalo de Casta; and the other two in Don Lewis Lobo's Ship, nam'd the St. Benedict. This last Person had been Vice-Roy of the Kingdom of Angola in Ethiopia. His singular Piety and Kindness to us was so remarkable, that I cannot omit giving one particular Instance of it. The first of November being come, when we were to bid a farewell to Flesh, and the Land of Portugal being in view, but which we could not reach that day, he sent a Boat ashore on purpose to fetch us Refreshment, to the end we might pass the last Day of our Carnival with the greater satisfaction.

On the second of November, being All-Souls day, we enter'd the Port of Lisbon about Sun-set. The Waters here are a proportionable mixture of Salt and Sweet, the latter being plentifully pour'd out by the River Tagus, so famous for its Golden Sands, and not unlike the Italian Pactolus, according to Juvenal and others.

Quod suo Tagus amne vebit, fluit Ignibus Aurum. Ovid.

Here we were oblig'd to make use of a Pilot (this Port being near as dangerous as the Fare of Messina) and that by the King's Orders, to prevent any more Wrecks, too many having happen'd here already. This Kindness is us'd towards Friends, but as for Enemys they are left to the mercy of many sharp Rocks, and of several well-fortify'd Castles and Forts.

Our Vessel coming to an Anchor, we enter'd our Boats and landed, not at the usual place Belem, or Bethleem, by reason of the too swift Eddy that ran there, but but at the Palace Royal between the hours of one and two at Night. Not knowing the way to our Monastery, we endeavour'd to get a Guide, but there was none to be had, tho a Religious Man that came with us, and was well provided, offer'd a considerable Reward to any that would shew us the way. At last a Negro Native of Congo, conducted us gratis, protesting the many Favours and Civilities his Country-men had receiv'd from the Religious Men of our Nation mov'd him to it. As soon as we came to the Monastery, after ringing the Bell our Guide was ready to be gone: We entreated him to accept of some Reward, or at least of a Glass or two of Wine for a Refreshment; but tho the People of that Nation are immoderate Lovers thereof, yet could he not be prevail'd upon to accept of a drop, which made me have a more than ordinary Affection for the People of Congo.

Whilst I was at Lisbon I visited the House where St. Anthony of Padua was born: It is now converted into a Church, and tho rich in respect of its Ornaments, is good in regard of its Structure, being both low, and built in the Angle of a Street. I visited likewise the Parochial Church and Font of Baptism of the same Saint: The Church is now called St. Engracia, which after it had been many years building with a vast Expence, fell down, and was at this time erecting again. I likewise paid my Devotion to the Convent of the Canons Regulars, amongst whom St. Anthony liv'd for some time, and whose Statue in the Habit of this Order, is placed over their high Altar. Their Church is also the Chappel Royal, and the burying place of the Kings, and of several Heroes of Portugal.

I shall not busy my self in any farther Description of this famous City of Lisbon, its Worth being already sufficiently known, and its Situation admir'd. I shall only add, that its Port is so large that it runs out 30 Miles in length, tho the Bay before the City is but six Miles over, and that its Custom-house is considerably employ'd with Entries of Pearl, Incense, and Ebony, from Arabia, of Rubies and Emeralds from Bengala, of Cassia and Ambergreace from Ethiopia, of Cloves, Cinnamon and Nutmegs from the Moluccoes, of Slaves, Ivory and Civet from Congo and Angola, of great varieties of Silk and Linen from India, of Sugars, Tobacco, and several sorts of Wood from Brazil, and of divers Commodities from other places, which I have neither room nor leisure to enumerate here.

Not having spent above a Month in this City, I look'd out every day for a Ship to proceed onward on my Voyage: For this purpose I address'd my self to a Captain of a Ship, and desir'd of him to let me go as his Chaplain to Brazil: He told me he could not accept of me as a Chaplain, having one aboard him already, but go with him I might if I pleas'd as a Passenger. I thank'd him kindly for his proffer, but withal acquainted him, that my Superior had commanded me to go in no other Capacity; and so I took my leave of him.

It happen'd a little after that another Ship bound for Brazil, having paid off her Chaplain and left him ashore, set sail with all imaginable Expedition; but she had not been many days at Sea before she was toss'd with so violent a Tempest, and threatned so many ways with Destruction, that she was glad of a turn of Wind to drive her back again to Lisbon: The Captain vowing never to sail again without his Spiritual Guide at whatever rate. Upon his landing therefore, being acquainted that some of us had a mind to go for Brazil, he courteously receiv'd and promis'd me all the Accommodation his Vessel could afford, my Companions being already provided. This coming to the first Captain's Ear whom I before had apply'd my self to, he began, with what reason I know not, to be in a great Passion, affirming that I ought not to have promis'd another, since he had first proffer'd to carry me. The cause of this stickling about us I guess'd to be by reason that we were to do our Office at easier rates, for Capuchins are to have only their Table free: When by the Laws of Portugal, a Priest or other Religious Person is to have not only his Diet, but likewise a Stipend of so much a Month, and when he comes to land must have moreover a House hir'd for him, and three Carlino's a day allow'd him. This put the Captain into such a Passion, that he threatned to challenge him that had taken me aboard, and would have done it had not all the rest blam'd and condemn'd his proceeding.

The first of December we went on board, but for want of a Wind could not sail till the 8th, being the Feast of the Immaculate Conception: We were in all five Ships, in two of which went our other two Companions, Father Amedeo da Vienna, and Father Francis da Bitti. Having left Lisbon, I wasted a farewell the Kingdom of Congo. During my st ay Afterrolla. the Bishop of the Diocess made a solemn entry into the City, and shew'd himself to be much devoted, and well-affected to our Order; for the next day after his arrival at his Palace, he came to our Convent to visit us. Moreover on the Feast

 Church, he assisted with us at Mass.
 Likewise as a farther Instance of his Favour, having been inform'd by some of our Brothers, that I was going on a Mission to the Southern Africk, without any extraordinary provilion of Necessaries:
 He gave me a Letter of Recommendation to several of his Friends in Spain to supply me with what I wanted. Which Kindness of his, as it happen'd, was of no use to us, because we touch'd at no
 Port in Spain.

Departure. My Companion returning, brought a-

Francis da Ritti a Preacher, the rest having been detain'd by some Business. All things being now dispatch'd here, and finding a Ship of Provence ready in the Harbour, we immediately imbarc'd and sail'd towards that Country. The Captain be-Having left Lisbon, I wasted a farewell

~~~~~ sigh towards the beautiful and happy Merolla. Europe, and immediately after we fell into the Gulph of Mares, so call'd from the furious Agitation of its Waves. We had now over against us the Island of Madera, which before its being inhabited was all over woody, and thence had its Name Madera, in Spanish signifying Wood, but after being discover'd it was by Fire render'd exceeding fertile. Its present Inhabitants have a more than ordinary desire to a Convent of our Order among them; but for want of Religious Men those pious Inclinations have been laid aside. I am very sure that a Gentleman of that Island came once to Lisbon on purpose to sollicite that Affair with the King of Portugal, at the request of the devout Inhabitants.

sailing.

From Madera to the Island of Palma are threescore and ten Leagues: This Palma is one of the Canaries, and whither we must go from Madera with a strong Convoy to prevent Pirats: From thence we may sail forward unguarded without any fear of danger. Those that are bound for Brazil steer towards the height of Cape Verd, situate in 14 degrees of North Latitude, and distant from Palma about two hundred and sixteen Leagues. Sailing near three hundred Leagues, more you come into the Torrid Zone, and have the Sun perpendicularly over your Head. Hence the Latitude of either Poll is reckon'd by Degrees, each of which is generally computed at sixty Leagues; but because the Degrees may differ in many respects, I shall leave their number of Leagues undetermined.

Great Heat.

Our Voyage now was so prosperous, that every short space of time we found our selves considerably advanc'd: But notwithstanding the many brisk Gales of Wind we had, the Heat, by reason of the propinquity of the Sun, was still prevalent; and tho we were in the midst of Winter, made us considerably sweat and languish. At length by the Grace of God we pass'd the Equinoctial, when it has often happen'd that others have been kept under it for some time with no small prejudice to their Health, and frequent danger of their Lives.

Ceremony
among Mariners.

I think I shall not much interrupt the

a ne.
of Court, consent of Commanders: Then two Judges drew accordingly sit at a Table, where they take full cognizance of all such as have not yet past the Line; those they find they upbraid with having liv'd so many years, and not having yet past the Line; and then, as if it were a great Crime, they mulct them according to their quality: Such as are not ready to pay their Fines, or at least willing to offer something, are seiz'd in a trice, and by a Rope about their middles haul'd to the Main-yard-Arm, whence they are let thrice successively into the Sea. From this Punishment or a Fine none are exempt, and 'tis said that with the latter they maintain a Church.

Whilst the Winds gently play'd the parts, we now began to devote ourselves to spiritual Exercises, continually celebrating Mass; Morning and Night we sung the Rosary, and in the Evening the Litany. On Holy-days we had always a Sermon preach'd by one or other of us. Our Ship was dedicated to our Saviour, the blessed Virgin, and St. Joseph, which made us to celebrate the Holy Nativity with more than ordinary Solemnity. Those Merchants that were on board us not only adorn'd the Altar with the richest things they had, but likewise hung the out-sides of our Ship with several Carpets and rich Cloths, the Air being at that time serene, and the Sea calm. Having just then finish'd my Lent and it happening to fall out on a Friday when we were oblig'd to fast by the Rule of our Order, Providence so order'd it that that very Night a flying Fish of considerable bigness darted against our Sails, and dropt down into our Ship. This Fish with a great deal of pleasure our Captain presented me, and which was received with no small thanks by me, for God knows how much I had suffered during that whole course of my Abstinence, Flesh being the only Provision of our Ship, and my constant Diet boil'd Lentiles, Bisket, and stinking Water. The difficulty of getting Fish I believe was partly contriv'd by the Seamen on purpose to make me break my Lent; they having often told me, that in such long Voyages as this, there was no Obligation to abstain from Flesh; but I thank God, notwithstanding their Opinion, I still persever'd in my Duty.

On Twelfth-day about two in the those Seas forty times. This, said others, may probably be that Guide which on this day conducted the Magi to Bethlem. But for my part, I am of opinion it was no other than the Planet Jupiter.

During all this time we had but only one calm half Day, and that the Captain propos'd to spend in fishing. Here it is most wonderful, that having cast the Lead in that vast Ocean, and ten degrees from the Line, we found but ninety foot Water. Among other Fish we took one call'd the Dorado or Gilt Fish, and truly not without reason, having perfect rays of Gold on his Back, and being moreover excellent Meat. This seems to me to be the Fish Martial speaks of in his thirteenth Book, where he says,

Non omnis pretium laudemq; Aurata meretur.

The Prey this Fish most delights in is the flying Fish, with which these Seas greatly abound, and which is like to our Sea-Swallows, and unlike them only in that it has a blue Back: The flying Fish has this particular unhappiness, that it is neither safe in the Air nor in the Sea, being persecuted by the Birds in the former, and by the Golden Fish in the latter.

On the 17th of January we arriv'd at Baia, or the City of San Salvador in Brazil, situate in 13 degrees of South Latitude. The Port of this City is not a little remarkable, whether it be for its Capacities, or its Security for Shipping, the latter being occasion'd by two Mountains on either side the Entrance of it, as likewise by its distance from the Sea.

At our landing we met a Widow carry'd in a Net with a Poll through it, on the Shoulders of two black Slaves, with mourning Clothes wrapp'd about them, and the Net cover'd with a Quilt, at the four Corners whereof marched four Women Slaves. This at first sight being a thing new to me, I took to be a Corps going to be buried, and upon enquiry found it to be a Portuguese Widow. I thereupon demanded, Why being a Christian she had not a Cross carried before her; and immediately out of pure Charity and Devotion fell to saying the de profundis for her Soul. This occasion'd an immoderate laughter in the Standers-by, who began to gather about me, whilst I hanging down my head, and perceiving my mistake of a living Woman for a dead, was glad to steal off as fast as I could.

The ordinary sort of these Nets I spoke of have only one Pillow or Cushion in them whereon either to lie or sit: Those for the Women have a Carpet under to sit on, and another over; and the Women Slaves, whom they call Moccomas, being the same that wait on them in their Chambers, walk by their sides. The richer sort of People have these Coverings like to the tops of Coaches, with Curtains on each side, but then the Nets change their Names to Palangas, and are much in use not only in Brazil, but likewise all over Ethiopia.

This City of Baia or San Salvador is the Metropolis of all Brazil, and has both a Governor equal in Power to a Vice-Roy, and an Arch-bishop. The Shores of this Kingdom are chiefly inhabited by Portugueses, beginning at the River della Plata, and extending to that of the Amazons, as likewise up as far as possible into the Country. Beyond the Natives have their residence. The principal Traffick here is for Tobacco and Sugars, of which every year great quantities are fetch'd away by the Portuguese Ships, and that not only from this City, but likewise down the Rivers of San Francisco and Janciro.

To uphold the Sugar-Works a vast number of Slaves is requir'd as well to plant and cultivate the Canes, as to provide sufficient Fuel for the prodigious Furnaces that are employ'd both night and day: Some there are who have no less than 500 Slaves for this purpose, and whose Labour is so hard, and their Sustenance so small, that they are reckon'd to live long if they hold out seven years.

So great is the Application of the Brazilians to this Traffick of Tobacco and Sugars, that few or none take care to till the Ground, or sow Corn. Hence it is that all manner of Provisions are excessive dear in these parts. Their Bread is generally made of the Root of the Herb Mandioca: The way they have to propagate it is by tearing off a Branch of it, and burying it in the Earth, when in a short time it will cast forth a Root, and shoot up a Stalk and Leaves like to our Lupins. At certain seasons of the year they press the Juice out of the Stalks and Leaves by a sort of Hand-mill, and that serves them either for Drink or Broth. The same Custom is us'd likewise in the Kingdom of Angola, and other places.

Fish is extreme dear in this Country, there being but very few that apply themselves to catch it. Flesh likewise is at a great rate, and that by reason of the great distance of Pastures, insomuch that Cattel often either die by the way in bringing, or else are harass'd to Skin and Bone by their Journey. Water also, that necessary Element, is scarce, and what they Merolla. they have is for the most part brackish; so that a Traveller in these parts must of necessity provide himself as well with this as with Victuals.

Fruit. Fruit they have here of many excellent kinds, and which, tho different from ours of Europe, yet is no less palatable and nourishing. Amongst others there is a sort of Palm call'd Cocco, whose Nuts shoot out with a Stalk in a Cluster to the number of twenty, more or less, at the bottom of a thick croud of long sharp and bending Leaves, not unlike Scythes: Each of these Nuts is of the bigness of a Flask with its straw clothing, with two Rinds, whereof the latter being saw'd asunder serves for Cups to drink out of. Its Fruit is of an excellent Savour, and white as Milk, but very substantial: In the midst of it there is about an ordinary Glass full of Liquor, which while the Fruit is green is in greater quantity, tho not so pleasant, but, as they say, cooling; yet when ripe, they say it becomes hot. This sort of Palm is to be found in Aethiopia and in the East-Indies, and in time of year by tapping, affords a great deal of Wine. Here is another kind of Fruit call'd Mamao, which grows on a Tree mostly without Branches, and whose Trunk is like to a Beam adorn'd with Leaves and Fruit; each Leaf produces its Fruit like to Melons or Pumpkins in shew as well as taste: The Seed is like Pepper, and has something of the taste of it: The Stalks on which the Leaves grow are long like the shoots of our Vines in Europe, bowing with the weight of the large Leaves, and four or five spans long.

Another sort of Fruit-Tree is the Banana, but which may rather be term'd an Assemblage of Leaves interwoven and twisted together so neatly, that they form a Plant about fifteen Spans high: At the top it throws out one Cluster of Fruit like to a bunch of those Grapes which we in Italian call Corniole, and which is of it self a sufficient Burden for one Man: Every Berry of this Cluster is about a span long, and as thick as ones Wrist, with a Rind like to an Orange. When the Fruit is once gather'd, you cut down the Tree to make it sprout anew, insomuch that being once planted, and thus order'd, it will often be ready to offer a grateful return to its Planter. This Fruit the Natives call'd Cacchio, and which even while green they gather and hang up in their Houses, where by degrees it ripens, and grows as yellow as Gold: When dry, they cut it across the middle, and it tastes much like to a dry'd

Fig of Calabria. The Leaves of this Plant are so neatly streak'd and sleek'd, that one would think they were rather the work of Art than Nature: They are generally about ten spans long, and about three in breadth. Many are of opinion, and argue that these were the Leaves our first Parents cover'd their Nakedness with after transgressing the Divine Precept in Paradise; which is not unlikely, because of their length and breadth before mention'd, and because in some Countries this sort of Fruit is call'd a Fig; and the Scripture tells us they made them Aprons of Fig-leaves; unless it were that Fig in India, which the Arabs and Persians call Mouze, and the Portugueses the Indian Fig, one Leaf whereof serves for a Table-Cloth at a Feast.

The Fruit Nicefi are much of the same kind with the former, being produc'd by a like Plant, and disagreeing only in that these are somewhat less. This Fruit being cut in the middle, or any ways except in length, shews a sort of a Sketch or rough Draught of a Crucifix, and which I take to be more wonderful than that of the Fruit of the Plant Baruth, vulgarly call'd the Paradise-Fig, wherein when cut is to be plainly seen the Impression of the Greek Letter Tau, when in this our Fruit is as easy to be discover'd the Figure of our Saviour upon the Cross.

For want of a conveniency to carry me farther up into the Country, I was fain sometimes to rely upon the Relations of others, but then I always took care to take them from Persons of Credit, and Natives of the Place. I was told that up higher there were vast Woods of large Citron-Trees, which seems not improbable if we consider the great quantity of candied Citron-Peel preserv'd and brought yearly from thence. To ripen them they bend down the tenderest Branches of the Tree, and cover the Citrons with Earth, whereby they soon become soft and yellow, and are pleasant to eat. I forbear to mention the many Fruits that are to be found in these Woods, and will confine my self to speak briefly of the Trees.

The Trees in the Forest are some of them so vastly great, that large Boats call'd Canoos, are made out of them all of a piece. One of these I saw in the Port of Baia, higher than one of our Felucca's, as broad, and of length sufficient for ten or eleven Men to row with long Oars, having only the Rudder added to it from another Tree. This I must tell you was something extraordinary, for common-commonly they row these Boats with Oars like Shovels, and that standing more or less on a side as occasion serves. The Indian Fishers have other sorts of Boats made of Reeds raddled together, and which serve their turn well enough, for they value not the Waters coming in, having no Clothes to spoil. In this Country there is great quantity of the Wood call'd Brazile Wood, some red of the colour of Porphiry, and another sort quite black like Ebony. Here are also some Trees that distil the true Balm, others that produce a kind of Oil call'd by the Natives Coppaiua, and which is in absolute Cure for Green Wounds, as likewise a Remedy against old Aches, and good to comfort the Stomach. A third sort call'd Almesega, which distils a Liquor like to Frankincense, and serves to heal Contusions and Bruises in any part of the Body, and moreover comforts the Stomach if taken inwardly. There are also some Plants to be met with here nam'd Bicoiua, or Nutmeg, whose Juice is a great Relief against, if not an absolute Cure for Fluxes and Gripes.

Not many years since Cinnamon was first order'd to be brought hither by the King of Portugal from the East-Indies, with express Command to the Captains of Ships, that they should deliver it to the Reverend Fathers of the Society of Jesus, who about four Miles from the City of Baia have a Marsh belonging to them, where it has thriv'd to a Miracle. The Birds likewise by picking the Seed and dropping it about the Country, have mightily contributed towards its increase; for when I was there I saw many little Trees of it in several places, and which could not have come thither by any other means. Also at my being there, the Trees that were first planted were begun to be flaw'd, and about 14 Pound of the Bark ready to be sent as first-fruits to the King.

I imagine I shall not much stray from my Subject, if I give some light here into the Origin of the Natives of this Country from a certain Franciscan Writer, who writ in the Portuguese Tongue, and had his Information from the Hollanders. He says that these People came from the Islands of Swedeland, either because of the great Colds that reign there, or being thrown on these Coasts by a Tempest. The Indian Natives of Brazil have the Name of Tabareos, and those born of a Portuguese and a Native are call'd Cabollos. The former sort are of a brownish Complexion, have long strait

Hair, with little round Eyes, and thick well-set Bodies of a middle size: Their Clothing is no more than they came into the World with: They maintain themselves with Hunting and Fruit, which is the reason that they seldom continue long in one place, but wander about according to the Seasons proper for their purpose. Sometimes they feed upon Man's Flesh, and that upon the following occasion: When any one of their Relations or Friends falls desperately sick, before he grows worse they knock him on the head, and cutting his Body to pieces distribute it amongst the rest to eat; alledging that it is much more honourable for him to be devour'd by them than to be prey'd upon by Worms and Insects. And thus as they have liv'd like Beasts, so like Beasts they die.

I was told by one Father Martin a Very Docile Capuchin, who had liv'd fourteen years in those parts, and was then Superior, that these sort of People are very apprehensive and docible, and that tho they could not read, yet they would sing and assist at Mass, and Vespers. This Father told me likewise, that he had brought over great numbers of them to the true Faith, and that they were in appearance so good Christians, that when they were at Church (I speak this to our Confusion and Shame) they might be seen kneeling on both Knees like Statues, without the least Motion; and tho they heard any Noise, not one of them would offer to look behind him, or speak the least word, thinking it a Sacrilege. He added further, that at first he found great difficulties in learning their Language, but that at length in the space of four years he made himself an absolute Master of it.

And because that these People liv'd without a Ruler and Government, when he came among them, the same Father chose out the best among them for their Governor, and whom the rest readily obey'd. He then reduc'd them to our way of living, and brought them to eat their Meat at due times of the day, whereas before the Pot was always ready, and they did little else but eat and drink. He taught them also to plant their Mandioca spoken of before, and instructed them in the Art of spinning and weaving their Cotton, to the end that they might conceal those parts which Decency requires should be hid. He told me likewise that before that time he had met with but one among a great number that had any thing to cover his Nakedness, nefs, and that was given him by a Missioner.

Conversion and Zeal. This Father in process of time becoming perfectly skill'd in their Language, and being moreover well-beloved by them, had a more than ordinary opportunity to inculcate Religion into them; and which undertaking of his was likewise facilitated by their having no Idols or Worship among them at the time of his attempting it. Their Notions of a Deity are, that there are two great Persons much in favour with God, and they pray for them continually; but who these Persons are they can't tell yet, which may be easily excus'd, in regard that some of them believe nothing at all. How zealous they are for their new Religion, may be seen by the following Instance: A certain Wizard, instructed perhaps in his hellish Science by some Blacks that had run from their Masters, was on a time seiz'd by them, and carry'd before Father Martin, by whom being sharply reprov'd for his wicked Practices, he was let go on condition that he should forsake his horrid Profession. But this readiness of his to promise, rather proceeded from want of Liberty, than from any Inclination to recant; in so much that in a very short time he relaps'd into his former Error, and was seiz'd a second time by such as did not think fit to release him any more without the loss of his Head. This done, they drag'd his Body before Father Martin, to whom they address'd themselves in these words; O dear Father, you are too forward in forgiving. These sort of People may prove a great Check to the growth of our New Religion, and therefore we have lop'd off the Head of this wicked Wizard, to prevent his doing any more mischief among us. Here are his Head and Body to dispose of as you shall best think fit. And to give 'em their due, they are more than ordinarily careful to protect the Sacred Truths establish'd among them.

Edibles.

The Flesh they eat is generally that of wild Creatures, kill'd by them in great abundance with their Bows; and especially of a sort of Serpent call'd Bomma, which they love inordinately. This Serpent after he has well fill'd his Belly, falls asleep; and being so found by the Hunters, they dart their Arrows into him and kill him. They say his Flesh is exceeding white, and well relish'd, and in fatness much like a Hog. After they have cut off his Head, and torn away his Bowels, they devour the rest of it greedily. At a certain Feast in Baja, I observ'd the Windows, instead of Tapestry and Arras, adorn'd with the Skins of these Serpents, as wide as that of a large Ox, and long in proportion.

Father Martin having taken care that the Indian Governor elect'd by him should pay obedience to the Portuguese, it soon happen'd that a mutual Commerce was establish'd between both Nations; and tho the Merchandize of the former was but of small Returns, yet it nevertheless serv'd them to clothe their Nakedness, and to furnish them with Iron for their Uses. The things they traded in were chiefly Brazil Wood, Skins of Beasts, divers sorts of Monkeys, Parrots of all kinds, and the like. Of these last the Hens are call'd in the Indian Language Coricas, and are observ'd to be far more loquacious than the Cocks. Araras are another sort, these are about the bigness of our Capons, and have long Tails of divers Colours. The Parokets are equal to our Thrushes in bigness, and generally Green, whereas the others for the most part are Grey and Crimson; They all imitate the human Voice when taught.

Apes and Monkeys likewise they have of all kinds, but none without Tails. One of these sorts is very much esteem'd, but no less difficult to transport into any part of Europe, because of the Cold: they are call'd Sagoris, or Sagorini, are no bigger than Dormice, and are kept in Cotton in Muffs. Those few Monkeys that are brought to Portugal, are bought by the Ladies there for about a Pistol a piece; and if they be of both Sexes, the Price is much greater, and they serve for a considerable Present. These, and many other things no less curious than gallant, are brought by these People to sell to the Portuguese all along the Coasts of Brazil. Such among them as have no Genius to trading, voluntarily list themselves in the Portuguese Service for so much a Month or a Year.

Because I have before begun to speak of Birds, I will here give some short Account of the Ostridge, if I may have leave to call that a Bird which is more beholden to its Legs than its Wings. In this Country the Ostridge is call'd Hiema, and is of that largeness as may be guess'd at by the Dimensions of its Egg; I have seen both young and old, little and great of them: Their Feathers are of a light Brown, and their Wings strengthned by a double Joint. They eat all sorts of Food, and will digest Wood and Iron, both which they greedily devour. Their Eggs

Eggs they lay in the Sand wherewith they cover them, I know whether out of design, that it should serve them for a Tomb or a Cradle; for it often happens that not remembring where they have laid them, they by a Mistake hatch those of another, and the Chicken is no sooner out of the Shell, but it shifts for it self. When they run from you, they only raise one Wing, and for the rest trust to their Feet, whereon they have but two Claws on each. They are so swift, that providing they have the Wind for them (which they always take a great deal of care to procure) they will out-run a Horse in his full career. When the Hunters have a mind to take them, they always follow them full speed, and with a long Hook stretch'd forth catch them, if they can, by the Neck; which if accomplish'd, they soon conquer, and have enough to boast of all the remainder of their Lives.

Before I leave Brazil to proceed on my Voyage, I may take notice of another sort of hunting there, and that not of Animals by Men, but on the contrary of Men by Animals, and those of the smallest size. You must know then that here is a sort of Worms almost invisible, which are call'd in the Country Language Nigua, which hopping upon Mens Toes for some time like Fleas, afterwards penetrate the Skin, and hide themselves between the Flesh and Nails of the Toes. This at first gives a pleasant tickling, but at length they grow to the bigness of a Vetch, and occasion a great deal of pain, reducing the Patient, if not timely prevented, to a manifest danger of either losing his Toe or Foot. When they are thus enter'd the Skin, the only way to get rid of them, and restore the Part, is by paring away the Flesh so far at least as is infected; for they are of a sort of venomous nature, and will rot and corrupt whatever they lie long upon. For my part I have experienc'd both the Pain and the Danger of them. But a certain French Frier of our Order was more particularly plagu'd with them, for had he not had speedy recourse to a skilful Surgeon, he had infallibly lost all his Toes.

Some will needs have these Worms to be one of the ten Plagues of Egypt sent by God to humble Pharaob; and Father Michael Angelo de Guattini, a Capuchin Missioner to the Kingdom of Congo, hints as much in a Letter to his Father from Fernambuco.

In the Islands of Cape Verde there are another sort of Worms that penetrate the Heel, and thence creep up under the Skin like a Horse-hair. The way to extirpate these, is either to scarify the Flesh as before, and so stop their progress; or else to seize them by one end, and by little and little to draw them out whole. Of this sort Della Valle speaks in his Travels; but his, it seems, were of a more contagious kind, and of a much longer size.

During my stay at Baia, however diverted, my mind still ran on pursuing my Voyage, and consequently my chiefest Business was to enquire after Ships bound for Africa. We were but three of us, and heard of one, but that was not to part in four Months; therefore so great delay could not at all suite with our desires to be gone. At last we lighted on a Smack or Brigantine, which was to set sail the first fair Wind, and whose Captain proffer'd to carry us to Angola. His Kindness we readily accepted: But whilst we thought our selves secure of a Passage, the Governour of Brazil commanded him to transport nine Prisoners in Chains to Angola, amongst whom was his own Secretary, disgrac'd for speaking disrespectfully of his Master; and for his greater punishment chain'd by the Leg and Arm with a Black Slave. The Captain having receiv'd these Orders, excus'd himself of his Promise to us, alledging that he had not room in his Ship for us all, and therefore desir'd we would provide our selves elsewhere. This however did not discourage us, for we immediately apply'd our selves to the Governor, and beg'd of him to let part at least of the Prisoners be left ashore, that we might proceed on our Mission. He was so far from yielding to our Request, that he commanded that we likewise should be gone on board, not caring whether there were any Accommodations for us in the Ship or no. He was obey'd, but scarce were we got out of Port, before the Captain (whether mov'd by Zeal, or Gold, I won't determine) call'd me to his Crew, and ask'd them, Where we poor Capuchins should lie, alledging that it was both his and their Duty to take care of us. And so hoisting out the Long-Boat, he put the Secretary and two other Prisoners into it, and sent them ashore, and I believe he had done as much for the rest had they presented him, by which means we got some Accommodation. We afterwards heard that this Secretary prov'd so great a Thorn in his Master's Side, and secretly rais'd Microlla. rais'd so powerful a Faction against him, that in a short time he occasion'd him to be seiz'd and sent to Lisbon. This it seems has been a common practice in the Portuguese Colonies at so great distance from Court; for whenever they do not like a Governour, they forthwith embark and send him home, and he ought to be thankful if he escapes so. The same has been sometimes done in the Kingdom of Angola, and elsewhere in the Portugal Dominions. If the succeeding Governor does not bring a general Pardon for all Delinquents, he is not admitted ashore; and this because of their once having been call'd to account, and severely punish'd for want of such Policy.

Sight of Land.

Seventy seven Days were we coop'd up in this Smack without discovering Land; but what most griev'd us was, that we could not say in all that time that we had seen either Sky or Sea, being kept down in the Hold continually to avoid the Rain or Waves. Towards the Cape of Good Hope, we met a furious Tempest, whose vehemence broke down part of our Prow, and we saw our selves at Death's Door; but at length, through God's Grace, and the Diligence of the Seamen, that Danger was removed. All the while the Pilot was extremely concern'd that we saw no Land, when by his computation it should have appear'd at least eight days before. Nevertheless at length we had sight of it, and found our selves much nearer to it than we thought we had been. Then began Joy to shine out in each Man's Countenance, and a Feast was order'd throughout the whole Ship; and the Pilot was so well pleas'd, that he gave the Seaman a pair of Silk-stockings who first brought him News of the Land.

A Providence.

After this we put our Boat to Sea, and some of the Ship's Company going in her a Fishing, had so good luck in a very short time, as almost to fill her with excellent Fish. This sight surpriz'd me, and put me in mind of the Sea of Genesarette, where the Apostles through our Saviour's Blessing had the like good Fortune. We left the Boat at Sea all that Night, fastned only with a Rope to our Smack, and with two Men in her. About five hours after Night a Whale hapning to pass between the Boat and the Smack, broke the Rope in two, and set the Boat adrift; which was not all, for she gave such a shock to the Vessel, as put out the Light at the Binnacle, and the Steersman being in the dark, we were in evident danger of being lost, and must have inevitably perish'd, had she taken us across the middle of our Keel. The Night was exceeding dark, insomuch that we could by no means discover which way the Men and Boat were driven; therefore we furl'd our Sails, and lay by, and at the same threw up some Fire-works in the Air to serve for a Guide to those miserable Wretches to find us; who at length appear'd when we had given them over to be lost.

Amongst other Fish observ'd by me in these dangerous Seas, is the Shark: His nature is to follow Ships in hopes of Prey. His Head is like that of a Dog, and his bigness more or less according to his Age; but generally at full growth as thick as an Ox. He has a very large Mouth, and a treble row of exceeding sharp Teeth. When he eats, his upper Jaw only moves; and Man's Flesh is one of the greatest of his Dainties. Our Mariners with a Bait of Salt-Beef took one of them, but in hoisting him up to the Ship he escaped; yet throwing in the Hook speedily he was taken again. Having open'd his Belly, we found therein a great many of the Bones of Meat which we had thrown for several days into the Sea, and whereby it appeared that he had follow'd us for some time. I observing that his Heart beat long after it was torn from his Intrails, took it up and kept it till the next day; when going to view it again, to my great wonder, it still palpated. This Fish always swims, attended by a great many little ones of divers colours, and which some will have to subsist upon the Steam that flies from his Mouth. These little Fish are call'd by the Portugueses, Romeiros, which signifies Pilgrims. There are another sort of about a Span long which stick to him, with their Bellies upwards, and Noses like Nutmeg-graters; these have the name of Pegadores, that is, stickers, from this Action. They are mention'd by F. di Genaro, in his Sacred Oriental, Lib. 1. c. 7.

That this Shark-fish is more than ordinarily greedy of Man's Flesh, may appear by the following Instance. Our Ship having a brisk Gale of Wind, most of the way between Lisbon and Brazil, a poor Mariner about break of day happen'd to drop off the Yard-arm into the Sea. At this Accident the Centry immediately gave notice, which occasion'd us all to come speedily running to the Man's Assistance: Some threw over-board to him whatever Planks they could find, whilst others endeavour'd to tack about the Ship; but all in vain, for being under under so full sail we made too much way. At last finding all means to save him fruitless, I caus'd one to call out to him from the Poop of the Ship to give a Sign of Confession; which the unhappy Wretch immediately did, by holding up his Arm; which I perceiving, gave him Absolution, and then he soon sunk. Not long after I spied a Shark-fish, half above and half under-water, rather flying than swimming towards the Body; which was a terrible sight to all, but more particularly touch'd me to the Heart.

Another sort of Fish we saw, whose name is Bonitto, as large as the Lantern-fish, and of a yellow and green Colour; but which the more pleasing it was to our sight, the more pernicious it would have prov'd to us had we eaten of it, for it causes sudden death, which makes the Fishermen as soon as taken to throw it away.

The Birds that fly most about in these Seas are Alcatraci, a sort of Sea-Gulls as big as Geese, of a brownish Colour, with long Beaks, wherewith they take Fish; and which they feed on, either upon the surface of the Water, or after they are up in the Air. At Night when they are dispos'd to sleep, they dart themselves aloft as high as possible, and putting their Head under one Wing, support themselves for some time with the other; but because the weight of their Bodys must needs force them down again at last, they no sooner come to the Water but they retake their flight, and both which being often repeated, they may in a manner be said to sleep waking. Oftentimes it happens that they fall into the Ships as they sail, and into ours there fell two one night, and one another: Those that know the nature of them, farther say, that in time of year they always go on shore to build their Nests, and that in the highest places, whereby they facilitate their flight, having but short Feet, and those large like unto a Goose. Of this we made an Experiment upon them that fell into our Ship, and found that being left at liberty upon the plain Deck, they could by no means raise themselves.

Before we had a sight of the Cape of Good Hope, we saw several other Birds called Velvet-Sleeves, as large as Geese; exceeding white, and with long black Bills. These, like the Pigeons out of the Ark, were as so many Messengers to inform us that the Land was at hand, their custom being adays to flutter about upon the Waves, and at night to return to the shore to rest: The sight of them makes the Seamen leap, and cry out for joy like Madmen.

There are also other Signs of Land being near, as those they call the Caravels of Britany, being Weeds, or rather Reeds like the Indian Canes; or rather like Grass, but as thick as ones Finger, thrown out by the Rivers, and which seem at a distance to be a small Island fix'd in the Ocean, being met sometimes an hundred miles at Sea. Whilst we sail'd along the Coasts, some of the Seamen would needs shew me a great Cross cut in a Mountain, and which they told me was made there long before those Countrys were discover'd by the Europeans. But notwithstanding all the diligence I could use, with the help of a Prospective-Glass, I could not perceive it by reason of the great motion of the Ship. I ask'd them who was suppos'd to have introduced this Sign of our Salvation amongst these ignorant Pagans? But they could give me no manner of satisfaction.

Now we are coasting along the Shore of the Cape of Good Hope, I imagine it will not seem any ways improper to discourse of something relating to the Inhabitants of this Country. By the Relations of many, these People are said not to have the Gift of Human Voice, but to understand each other only by a sort of hissing Tone, and motion of the Lips: Likewise that whatever pains has been taken with them, they could never hitherto be brought to speak articulately. Instead of clothing in Winter-time, they generally anoint their Bodys all over with a certain Liquor distill'd from a Tree; and which the better to settle upon their Skins, they bedawb themselves sufficiently with wild Oxes Dung, which when dry'd and hardned, cannot be easily got off. When they would take off that crufted Coat, they do it with hot Water, which leaves them naked as before, as they go in hot Weather, and eat much Flesh. Which makes me say with Ovid in his de Tristibus, lib. 5. El. 7.

Sive Homines, non sunt Homines hoc nomine digni.

The Portugueses call them Papagentes, that is, Men-eaters, on account of some accidents that have happen'd there, one of which that was told me I will insert.

In one of the Ports form'd by Nature, where there are many on these Coasts capable of receiving two or three thousand Ships each, a certain Vessel came to anchor;

Aferolla. chor; The Captain with some of his Crew going ashore, well arm'd, and happening to stray a little farther than ordinary from his Companions, saw two Women entirely black and naked carrying of Wood. These Women at the sight of a White Man, began to stand still; which he perceiving, and being willing to encourage them, threw them down several Trifles, such as fine Knives, Glafs, Coral, and the like. At this they immediately cast away their Burdens, and fell to gathering up the Toys, leaping and dancing about the Captain. This pleas'd him so well, that he was resolv'd to have as much of it as he could, and for that end squat himself down on the Grass. They perceiving his security, continued their Gambols for some time; but at length one of them seizing him behind across the Arms, and the other catching up his Feet at the same time, flew away with him with such dexterity and swiftness, that it was impossible for his Companions, who both saw and heard him cry out, either to rescue or come near him. Being depriv'd of all hopes of recovering him, they thought it advisable to return to their Ship, where they reflected on the barbarous Banquet those, rather Beasts than human Creatures, were to make that Night.

To confirm the probability of this Story, Father Michael Angelo de Guattini, relates in a Letter to his Father from Loanda, a City in this Country, that whilst he was sailing along these Coasts, not above a Musket-shot from shore, the Pilot of the Ship went ashore to ease himself; but scarce was he out of the Long-boat before he leap'd back again with great surprize and amazement, having it seems discover'd behind a Rock, abundance of Fish drying at a great Fire, by which he understood the Papagentes were not far off, and put him into such a fright, that he never thought of the business he went about in three days after.

Monsters. Another Story I have heard as follows. The Captain of a certain Ship having been in a great Storm, drove into one of these Ports to repair his Damage; his Passengers going ashore to look about them, discover'd at a distance a sort of Sea-Monsters like unto Men, and that not only in their Figures, but likewise in their Actions; for they saw them plainly gather a great quantity of a certain Herb, with which they immediately plung'd themselves into the Sea. Having observ'd what sort of Herb this was, the Passengers gather'd several Bundles of it likewise, and laid the same upon the Shore; the Sea-Monsters returning, and finding it ready gather'd to their hands, took it up and plung'd into the Sea as before. But O the great Example of Gratitude that reigns even in the Deeps! These Creatures knowing themselves to have been oblig'd, forthwith drew from the bottom of the Sea a great quantity of Coral, and other Sea-Herbs, and carrying them ashore, laid them in the same place where they had found the Herbs. This being repeated several times, the Passengers thought these Creatures endeavour'd to exceed them in Benefits; and therefore as a great Rarity, scarce to be parallel'd even in Rational Animals, they resolv'd if possible to take them. For this purpose they procur'd a Net from the Ship, and pitch'd it in a proper place; but tho their Design succeeded so far as to take them, yet could not they hold them, they shewing them another human Trick, which was, by lifting up the Net and making their escape, never appearing there after as long as the Ship staid.

Another Relation I have had made Excess me, which may not be improper to insert here: The Portugueses, for the Cold. convenience of sailing those stormy Seas, would needs some Years since make a certain Experiment on these Parts. For this end they brought from Lisbon six or eight condemned Persons, and left them in one of the three Points of the Cape of Good Hope, with Provisions of all things sufficient for a Year. These Men they commanded to take strict notice of all Mutations of Seasons, of the Climate, the Land and the Sea; and withal join'd them to let nothing pass of any moment each day they were there; promising them withal, that if they observ'd these their Commands, they would come the next Year and fetch them away, and give them their Liberty to boot. These Wretches being thus left, instead of escaping Destruction, met a more than common Fate by these means; for in a short time through the excessive Cold that reigns there, more than in any other of the Points of the said Cape, they were all frozen to death. At the return of the Ships, the last of them that surviv'd having observ'd many Particulars, and related the manner of his other Companions deaths, was found frozen to a Stone with his Pen in his hand. The last thing remark'd by him was, That the greatest Fire was scarce capable of overcoming the most intense Cold of this Country. But all this I must submit to the Reader, Reader, having it only by hearsay, and not having experienc'd it my self.

After three or four days sailing along these Coasts right afore the Wind, we enter'd a Port in the Kingdom of Banchella, or Binquella, a Conquest of the Portugueses. Here the People through a bad Temperature of the Air, which infects their Victuals, have 'all the Countenances of Death, speak with broken Voices, and as one may say, can scarce keep their Souls between their Teeth. Our arrival being but just known, the Vicar-General came to visit us at one a Clock in the Morning, bringing along with him several Refreshments of Flesh, Fruit, and Herbs. At this unexpected Charity and Civility, we were at first surpriz'd; but after we came to know that both he, and four of his Brethren, had been bred in our Monasteries, that Wonder ceas'd. This Vicar may be said to be General only over himself, there being no Catholick Priest in all this Country but he.

Some Years past there was another Million of our Order into these Parts; but because the chief Man gave no good Example himself, few of the Blacks were converted, and those that were gave but little attention to what was taught them, giving for reason, That if the Law of God was so negligently observ'd by Whites, how could they be expected to practise it more devoutly? The two last of the Friers employ'd at that time, did Martyrs to their Lenity; for they chusing rather to admonish than correct, to exhort than reprove a certain Great Man of a scandalous Life, in about eight days time died of Poison, thereby terminating both their Mission and their Lives: The Truth of this ought not to be doubted of, because it was the common Talk when I was there. The other Pagans that live up higher in the Country, lead the infamous Life of the Giaghi, a People that shall be spoken of more at large hereafter.

As soon as day-light appeared we went on shore to return Thanks to Almighty God for our safe arrival. Here the first thing I observ'd was, a great abundance of Date-Trees, which it seems of all Lower Aethiopia flourish most in these Parts, tho in goodness they are far inferior to those of the East. I likewise took notice of many Arbours and Walks of Vines, which by reason of the moistness of the Earth, Springs being every where near the Surface, produce Grapes twice a Year in great plenty. Nevertheless no

Wine is made, because the excessive Heat that reigns here, would rather putrefy Microlla than purge it. Every House hereabouts has Spring-water, it lying not above two foot deep; and which is the greater wonder, by reason that it is so near the Sea.

If this Country abounds with bad Men, it is no less productive of good Beasts. Of Elephants here are many, which with their Ivory Teeth bring great Profit to those that take them. The Elk likewise, that so-much desir'd and salubrious Beast, is frequently to be met with in these Parts; and which for the virtue of one of his Feet, has deservedly obtain'd, in the Congolan language, the name of Nococo, signifying The Excellent Beast. It is only call'd in Spain la Gran Bestia, or the Great Beast. The way to find out in which Foot the Virtue lies, is by knocking him down; when to recover himself of the Blow, he will immediately lift up that Leg which is most efficacious, and scratch his Ear. Then must you be ready with a sharp Scymeter to lop off the Medicinal Limb, and you shall find an infallible Remedy against the falling-Sickness treasur'd up in his Claws. Peter Cobero Sebastian says, in his Travels, that he has seen many of these Beasts in Poland. Those seen by me were of about the bigness of little Asses, of a brownish Colour, with long broad Ears hanging down like to those of English Spaniels.

In these Woods may be also found another Creature, call'd by the Natives Engalla, and much like unto a Wild-Boar: The two Tusks of which Beast being reduced to Poudre, expel Fevers, evacuating by way of Sweat the Malignity of the Distemper. This Poudre being likewise made up with the Juice of a Palm-Tree, call'd Mateba, composes an admirable Antidote. Here is also the Unicorn, call'd by the Congolans, Abada, whose Medicinal Virtue being sufficiently known, needs not to be taken notice of. These Unicorns are very different from those commonly mention'd by Authors; and if you will believe what I have heard say, there are none of that sort now to be found. A Theatine Missioner to the East-Indies told me, at his return from Goa, that he had endeavour'd to get one of these last, but whatever diligence he used, he could by no means obtain it. He added moreover, that he had heard several of the Eastern People, especially the Chinese Astrologers, say, that according to their Computations those Unicorns all dy'd the same day that our Saviour dy'd. What Merolla. allusion these can have to our Saviour may probably be from their Chastity, but I must leave all to my Reader, who will condemn and approve as he thinks fit. The Unicorn or Abada of this Country commonly arrives to the bigness of an Ox, and the Male only has a Horn in his Forehead: These have the same virtue as the other sort, if taken young, and before they have coupled; for the old ones lose much of their virtue by coupling.

These Forests likewise breed another four-footed Animal call'd Zerba, not unlike a wild Mule: The Skin of this Creature is so beautiful, that one would rather take it for a fine woven Silk than a Hide: Its Beauty consists in several Equidistant Streaks four fingers broad of white and black, border'd on both sides with Russet. This Animal is no less swift than beautiful, insomuch that if the Natives can but tame one of them, no Price is thought too great to offer for it. Our Superior, Father da Romano, amongst other things sent several Skins of this Beast as a Present to the Great Duke of Tuscany.

A ridiculous Superstition. Here are also abundance of another kind of Beasts call'd by the Negroes Impallanche, of about the bigness of the foregoing, and in colour much like to what we call in Horses a Sorrel: These have strait twisted Horns, by the several degrees of which wreathing, their Age comes to be known. They have in like manner some resemblance of a Mule, their Flesh is white, and would be more in esteem were it not spungy and insipid; but in rutting time, say the Natives, it ought by no means to be eaten, for fear of doing harm. The same is reported of the wild Goat, that if it be eaten when it is lustful, it causes such a rot in the Feet that the Toe-nails drop off. This is held to be so infallible, that it can never miss. An Instance whereof happened in my time in the following manner. Some Hunters having taken one of these Goats, suspected of being in the aforesaid condition, brought it to our Monastery at Sogno to sell: Our Fathers not knowing the nature of it, eat part of it, reserving the rest for another time. This coming to the Count's Ears, he came in mighty haste to our Convent with a numerous Attendance, and going directly into the Kitchen, he commanded all the Flesh to be thrown away, the Vessels that it had touch'd to be broken, and would moreover have set fire to the House as infectious, had not our Fathers remonstrated to him in an humble manner, that they were sensible of no harm it had done them, and that they verily believ'd there was none to be fear'd upon that occasion: As also that whatever Mischiefs had formerly hapned, it was rather to be attributed to some other Accident, than to any Pestilential Quality in the Goat. With these and the like reasons they at length prevail'd upon the Count to depart, without doing them any further damage. When these wild Goats are old, there are certain Stones to be found in their Bellies not unlike to Bezoar Stones, and whereof those produc'd by the Male are of the nobler kind, being experienc'd Remedies in several cases, especially in that of Poison. At the first taking them out they are soft and tender, but having been a while in the Air they begin to harden, and in a short time become perfect Stone. They must be taken as soon as ever the Beast is kill'd, otherwise they will soon dissolve.

Another sort of Beasts in this Country are the Impanguazze, so call'd by the Natives: These are a kind of wild Cows, whereof some are red, others Ash-colour, and some quite black: They are all very swift-footed, and have a pair of exceeding long Horns in their Foreheads: When they are wounded in the Chase, like wild Bulls or Buffalo's, they immediately face the Assaulter, and if he does not instantly take care to save himself in some Tree or other, instead of killing he will be in no common danger of being miserably kill'd. The Flesh of this Beast is very well relish'd and substantial; its Marrow is an infallible Remedy against cold Humours and Aches: Of its Skin the Negroes make Targets, which will resist the swiftest force of Arrow, so that if a Man stands bowing behind it he is altogether safe.

'Tis now high time to leave the wild Beasts to range in the Woods, and to come to speak of a certain brutish Custom these People have amongst them in making of Slaves, which I take not to be lawful for any Person of a good Conscience to buy here. Every one of these Negroes takes to Wife as many Women, be they Slaves or Free 'tis no matter, as he can possibly get: These Women by his consent make it their business to charm Men to their Embraces, which when they have done so as to make them commit the Act, they presently accuse them to their Barracan, so they call their supposed Husband, who feigning himself to be in a great rage, immediately runs and imprisons the Lovers, afterwards in a short time sells them to Strangers, gers, without being subject to any account for so doing: With the Money he has thus unjustly got he buys other She-Slaves, which are permitted to do the same thing; so that from time to time he is suffer'd to go on in this wicked round without any manner of Controul. Of these Women I fancy Tibullus speaks when he cries out, Ab credule Genus! Nec fidum femina Nomen.

Ab pereat! didicit fallere siqua Virum.

There are others who, not by means of Women but of themselves, going up into the Country thro pretence of Jurisdiction, seize Men upon any trifling Offence, and sell them for Slaves.

The current Coin of this Kingdom is little bits of Glass Coral brought hither by the Portugueses, and which the Natives call Misangas: This they make use of not only for Money, but likewise for Ornament, making of them both Bracelets and Necklaces. The Forts and Houses of the Whites here are compos'd of Wood and Clay after this manner. Two rows of strong Posts are fixt in the Earth about two spans asunder, and join'd together at top by several transverse pieces of a smaller size. The space between these rows is fill'd up with Clay well beaten, and smooth'd within side and without, and which being chequer'd with Creases seems at first sight to be a Stone-Wall. The Roofs are made with Reeds laid over Rafters, as with us. This is all I could observe of this Country, having been but one day in it, and that in a continual hurry in preparing for our farther Voyage.

After our departure hence, in four days sail we reach'd the Port of Angola, the utmost end of our desires, on the 6th of May, in about a year from our leaving of Naples.

I reserve the Description of this City of Angola for another place, intending at present to speak only of its Port: This is as secure as famous, being form'd neither by Art nor Nature, but only by Chance, having a long slip of Sand thrown up by the Sea, and forming a plain Island about ten Leagues in length, about a Mile from the City, behind which the Ships ride: The Entrance into it is by two narrow Passages at the extremities of the slip. Here all the Drinking Water us'd in the City is taken up, and the greatest wonder is, that it is freshest at the Flood, and saltest at the Ebb.

Here, and no where else on these Coasts, are caught Crabs and Lobsters, as likewise Cuttle Fish, and those little Shell-fish call'd Zimbi, which pass for Money. Heretofore the King of Congo reserv'd the right of fishing for these only to himself, but now the Portugueses usurp that liberty upon him. In the aforesaid pleasant Island the Citizens of Angola delight themselves as much as the Neapolitans do in their Retirement to Posilippo: For this purpose they have several little Houses there, which being intermix'd with verdant Trees afford a very delightful Prospect. They likewise cultivate the Earth in that Island, which being well water'd proves not a little fertile.

Being got into Port, and our Arrival known, the Governor immediately gave notice thereof to our Father Superior, who forthwith sent Father Joseph da Sestri, and Father Francis da Pavia to bring us ashore. At our landing in the City I could perceive joy in every Countenance on the occasion, and which was seconded by the great Civilities shewn us by the Citizens; for as we pass'd by their Houses, they not only sent us Umbrella's to defend us from the scorching Heat, but likewise to honour us. Being come to the Church, our Fathers sang Te Deum for our safe arrival. For eight days together we receiv'd Visits and Treats from the principal Persons of the City, in return whereof we presented them with some small Relicks brought from Italy, which were nevertheless accepted with a great deal of Devotion and Thanks. The accusom'd Ceremony us'd at the arrival of Missioners or a Prefect, was not shewn for us, by reason that we were only three. The Ceremony is this. No sooner is the News spread abroad that there are several Capuchin Missioners come into Port, but our Brethren accompanied by the Nobility and Gentry of the City go out to meet them: Having receiv'd them into a Barge, they conduct them ashore, where are posted a great number of white Singing-Boys dress'd like Capuchins, who going before in Procession sing all the way to the Church, and afterwards perform Te Deum there: Then the Governor, and all the Clergy, and Laity of the place come to pay them their Respects.

In about a fortnight's time I was oblig'd to depart from hence with some of our Fathers, who altho they had been here above nine Months, were not yet gone out on their Mission, and that by reason of their expecting the Heat should abate, which which it seems it is wont to about this Month of May, just contrary to our Country, where the cool Weather begins with September Rains. Father Joseph Maria da Bassetto, a Man of great Learning and Experience, chose me for his Companion in his Mission to Sogno, and ask'd me of our Prefect, Father Paul Francis da Portomauritio. Tho I found my self not altogether recover'd of my last Fatigue, yet considering the easiest way of travelling was by Sea, as also that this Mission of Sogno was not only the antientest, but likewise the best we had, thro the commodiousness of its River, and the disposition of its Inhabitants, I readily consented to accompany this Father thither. Hereupon the day appointed for our departure being come, we went on board a Skiff, and in four days arriv'd at the mouth of the River Zaire, the Port of Sogno. At our entring this River the Wind blew so hard, and the Waves rose so high, that we were not a little afraid of being lost. At length having weathered the first Point, we spy'd some Fishermen ready as we thought to assist us, but expected to be call'd; yet we taking them for Heathens, and fearing that instead of helping they might rather hinder us by their Sorceries, gave them no sign.

Enter the Zaire.

My Companion conjur'd the Winds and Seas, but I having said my Prayers betook my self to an Oar, at which I tugg'd heartily for some time, till at length by the sole Mercy of God we were courteously receiv'd into the Embraces of the River. After having pass'd the first reach, our Souls began to revive, and we took pleasure in casting our Eyes about towards both Shores, which seem'd to be strew'd with vegetable Emeralds; or might be taken at first sight rather for the industrious Workmanship of Pallas, than the capricious Product of Nature. The Water also appear'd more like a Cristal Causway, than any part of the inconstant Element. As we row'd along the winding Banks of this River, we were continually shrowded with Trees call'd Mangas, not unlike the Royal Laurels: These Trees at the joining of each Branch sprout forth a long hanging Root, which at length reaching the Mud, and taking root shoots up anew, and in a short time of one Tree forms a kind of little Wood, in a manner that you can hardly distinguish the Suckers from the Plant. I was shewn one of these Trees quite wither'd and decay'd, and was inform'd that a certain Bishop of Congo having been ill treated by some of these People, made the sign of the Cross upon it, whereupon it immediately dy'd like the Fig-tree curs'd by our Saviour.

Altho my business should be to write only what I observ'd in my Voyage, and not to take notice of other matters, yet cannot I forbear speaking of some Particulars relating to this large and famous River: Its Mouth then is about ten Leagues wide, tho some Writers will needs have it to be thirty; but their mistake I presume arises from including the Mouth of another Branch of it, not far distant from the former. The Waters of this River are something yellowish, by which they are known above 30 Leagues at Sea, and which was likewise the cause of this Country's being first discover'd; for the King of Portugal Don John II. having sent a Fleet under the Command of Don Diego Cano to make Discoveries on this Southern Coast of Africa, that Admiral guess'd at the nearness of the Land by nothing so much as by the Complexion of the Waters of Zaire; and putting into it, he ask'd of the Negroes what River and Country that was; who not understanding him answer'd, Zaioco, which in the Congolan Tongue is as much as to say, I can't tell: From whence tho the word be corrupted, it has been since call'd Zairo. After this on one of the Points of this River the Portugueses first planted a Cross of fine Marble, which some time after being found out by the Hollanders, they out of Envy broke it to pieces; nevertheless so much remain'd of it when I was there, as to discover plainly the Portuguese Arms on the Ruins of the Basis, with an Inscription under them in Gothick Characters, tho not easy to be read.

The first discovery of this part of the World by the Portugueses happen'd in the Year, so fortunate for them, 1485. and because they had been so courteously receiv'd by the Negroes, and admitted among them with so many tokens of Love and Affection, this Kingdom of Congo has never yet been subjected by the Whites, when it far'd quite contrary with the Queen of Singa and others. The first Religious Persons that set footing here, were three Dominican Friars, as testified by Father Masseus a Jesuit, in the first Book of his History of the Indies. One of these was kill'd by the Giaghi at the time when they over-ran the Kingdom of Congo, and routed the Congolan Army under the Conduct of their General Zimbo. This Barbarian of a Conqueror amongst other Spoils seiz'd upon the fa cred Vestments and Utensils of this unhappy Frier, and not contented with the bare possession of them, would needs ridicule and profane them by putting them on, as likewise by appearing at the head of his Followers with the Chalice in his hand. As for the other two Missioners, they dy'd in a short time after their arrival, through the excessive Heat of the Climat, which is often fatal to us Europeans.

To these succeeded twelve Franciscans of the Order of Observants, who were carry'd hither by the same Don Diego Cano in his third Voyage into these parts. Some attribute the whole Conversion of this Country to these Fathers, not allowing that the three that were there before through the shortness of their continuance, could have time to do any thing towards it. But for my part I am of opinion that it is next to impossible, those who had been so courteously receiv'd, and who found the People so easy to be wrought upon, should not convert many of them before they dy'd. Likewise it is certain that the Frier that was kill'd by the Giaghi had been Chaplain to the Congolan Army, and consequently was in a Post to do with them even what he pleas'd. Nevertheless not to carry the Argument farther, let me be allow'd to say, that it is probable the first Friars might sow the Seed, and that the last were those that cultivated and caus'd it to flourish.

Several other Evangelical Labourers had been sent out from time to time into this Vineyard, and at length at the request of Don Alvaro VI. King of Congo made to Pope Urban VIII. that his Holiness would be pleas'd to send some more Capuchin Missioners into his Kingdom, there were others sent with Letters Patents from the said Pope in the year 1640. altho through the many rubs and difficulties they met with, partly occasion'd by Philip III. King of Spain's death, and the seizing of the Crown of Portugal by the Duke of Braganza, they did not arrive till the year 1645. which was under the Pontificat of Pope Innocent X. and in the Reign of Don Garcia II. Successor to the before-named Don Alvaro. These Fathers entering the River Zaire, the first place they landed at was the Country of Sogno, where they were receiv'd with extraordinary demonstrations of Love and Joy by the People, and especially by the Count, who went out to meet them many Miles from the place of his Residence, and assisted with them at Mass with great Devotion in the Church of Pinda, a Town near the Mouth of Merolla. Zaire, adorning their Altars moreover with the richest Furniture in his Wardrobe. Hither flock'd an infinite number of People upon this occasion, as well out of Curiosity to see these new Apostles (whose awful Deportment fill'd them with Wonder and Amazement) as to vie with each other which should shew most Obedience to the Gospel. But this is no wonder, since the first Converts made by the aforesaid Franciscan Friars were the Sogneses, and who still seem'd to have lively Impressions left upon them of their former Instructions. The first that were baptiz'd among these Negroes were the Count and one of his Sons, whereof the former had the Name given him of Don Emanuel, and the other of Don Antonio. This Emanuel dying, besides the Funeral commonly made for other Counts, he had a particular Ceremony paid to his Memory every year after, and which I my self have more than once perform'd on his account. After the Count of Sogno, the King and Queen of Congo, together with their eldest Son, were prevail'd upon to be baptiz'd, the two former taking the Names of Don John and Donna Eleonora, the King and Queen of Portugal, and the latter that of the King's Son the Infante. Thus began the Christian Faith to be first establish'd in these parts, and which has been all along since maintain'd thro the Grace of God, and by the Labours of several poor Missioners successively sent in the Service of the Gospel.

But let us return to speak farther of the River Zaire. This River is commonly said to take its rise in the Kingdom of Matamba, subject to the Queen of Singa, which Kingdom being altogether govern'd by the Female Sex, I may number it among those Nations describ'd by Claudian in Eutrop. l. i. v. 323.

———— Medis, Levibusq; Sabæis
Imperat hic Sexus, Reginarumq; sub Armis
Barbariæ pars magna jacet.

In this Matamba there is a vast Collection of Water, which dividing it self into two principal Streams, one runs through Ethiopia, and is this River Zaire, and the other flows towards Egypt, being the Nile: This last was formerly ador'd by the Egyptians as a God, and that because of their being not able to find out its Source, imagining that therefore it had none. I believe the cause why they could not discover its Head, was by reason they could Merolla. could not go far up it, being hinder'd by the Cataracts which fall in such a dreadful manner, that they at the same time offend both the Eye and the Ear. In this vast Lake before-mentioned, before it divides it self into the aforesaid Rivers, are to be found several Water-Monsters, amongst which there is one sort which differs from Human kind only in want of Reason and Speech. Father Francis da Pavia, one of our Missioners living in this Country, would by no means believe that there were any such Monsters in this Lake, affirming they were only Illusions devis'd by the Negroes; whereupon the Queen of Singa being inform'd of his Infidelity, invited him one day to go a fishing for them: Scarce had the Fishermen thrown in their Nets, but they discover'd thirteen upon the surface of the Water, whereof they could nevertheless take but one Female, which was big with young. The colour of this Fish was black, it had long Hair and large Nails upon very long Fingers, which perhaps were given it by Nature to help its swimming: It liv'd not above 24 hours out of the Water, and during all that time would not taste any the least Food that was offer'd it.

The Mermaid, and its Virtues. Throughout all the River Zaire there is to be found the Mermaid, which from the middle upwards has some resemblance of a Woman, as in its Breast, Nipples, Hands, and Arms, but downwards it is altogether a Fish, ending in a long Tail forked: Its Head is round, and Face like to that of a Calf: It hath a large ugly Mouth, little Ears, and round full Eyes: Upon its Back it has a large Hide tack'd, perforated in several places. This Hide or Skin seems to have been design'd by Nature for a sort of Mantle to cover it, being contriv'd either to open or shut. The Ribs of this Fish are proper to stanch Blood, but the greatest of its Physical Virtues lies in two little bones in its Ears. I have eat of this Fish divers times, and it seems to be well-relish'd, and not unlike Swines-Flesh, which its Entrails likewise resemble. For this reason the Negroes name it Ngullu à Mafa (the Water-Sow) but the Portugueses call'd it Peixe Molker (the Woman-fish) Altho it feeds on the Herbs that grow on the sides of the River, yet does it not nevertheless ever go out of the Water, but only hold its Head out. For the most part it is to be taken only when it rains, for then the Waters being disturb'd it cannot so well discern the approach of the Fishermen. Those that go to take them have a little Boat for that purpose, in which they paddle up softly till they come to the place where the Fish lies, and which they know by the motion it causes in the Water; then having a Lance ready, they immediately dart it with all their force into her, and if through the smallness of their Boat, or for want of strength, they cannot hold her, they let go the Lance and leave the Fish at liberty, well knowing that being exceeding long the Lance must necessarily discover where she lies with it. But if on the other hand they can maintain their stroke with another Lance, they dart a second time, by which means at last they easily tire and take the Fish. After the same manner, but with less trouble they take Pilchards, which are fat, and as large as Herrings, and they have no other way to take them but this. I should have told you what sort of fashion'd Lances these were, because they differ something from ours of Europe; they have a very long round Staff made of Wood, but as hard as Iron, round, and so thick, that as many Darts are made fast to it a small distance from one another, that they take up six or seven spans in compass.

There is also in this River the Water or Sea-Horse, as large as two Land ones: He has short thick Legs, round Feet, a large wide Mouth, with a double row of hook Teeth, and long Tusks besides in the lower Jaw like to those of a large wild Boar, with which when he is in fury he tears whatever comes near him. As I was once sailing along this River, I saw one of these Horses floating near our Boat, and neighing like a Horse, of which he has great resemblance: Anights he goes ashore to feed, but in the day-time he keeps for the most part close in the Water; but wheresoever they are, the Female is always at hand, in whose defence the Male fights desperately; and when the Female is with young, or has lately dropt her Colt (which she generally does in the Fens where there is but little Water) the Male is most furious, and being exceeding jealous will assault the Barks as they pass along the River, and sometimes if they be small overturn them with his Heels: This makes those that know his nature to avoid the Marshes at that time, not caring how far they go about, so they can but have their Passage safe. The time to hunt them is anights, when they go to feed upon the Land: Then the Hunters block up their way back to the River with with Boats, and afterwards wait for heir return. Being return'd, they let fly their Arrows at them like Hail; but 'twill be to him that happens to be in any one of their ways after being wounded, for he will then assuredly tear him to pieces, if they have not Trees to save themselves on, which they generally take care to procure. Sometimes these Creatures will fly away after they are wounded, and not finding a Passage open to the River, will run to the next Precipice, and leap off from thence into the Water, whereby they break their Legs, and then are easily taken. The Flesh of these Animals is little valued, being generally esteemed Food for the meaner sort of People, allow'd by Divines to be Fish because they live and breed in the Water, tho they feed on Land. The Yard of the Male, and the two Stones found in his Ears, as large as Hen-Eggs, are good to dissolve the Stone, as well in the Kidneys as the Bladder. This last is likewise a Remedy against a stoppage of Urin, being pulveriz'd and dissolv'd in fair Water, and given about a Spoonful at a time. As I was once going up this River, I observ'd in a low Island hard by, several small Houses set upon Stakes, about ten foot from the Ground, with a Ladder at the Door to draw up and let down. Having inquired what these meant, I was told that they were built in that manner to prevent the Inhabitants from being injur'd by the Sea-Horses, that always feed thereabouts anights. The like sort of Houses I have seen near the Forests, to prevent the ravage of Lions and Tigers: But what makes me wonder most of all is, at the Name of these Sea-Horses, it being their nature to keep always out of the Salt-Water, which they hate and cannot subsist in.

Here are no Crocodiles as in other Rivers, but there are nevertheless several kinds of excellent Fish which are taken various ways, tho never in any great number, by reason of the slothfulness of the Inhabitants, who are naturally Enemies to hard Labour. The Night of fishing with Nets is wholly reserv'd to the Prince, who nevertheless is accusom'd to give leave to do it to any that will ask it of him; and when he wants Fish, he sends his Servants with his own Nets for it.

Having sail'd up this River, about midnight we arriv'd at the Town of Pinda, twelve miles from the Sea. Landing immediately, we retir'd to a Church, the first built here by the Portugueses, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, whose Statue of Bassorelievo, is constantly worship'd every Sunday by a vast number of Negroes who flock hither for that purpose. Here likewise was formerly a Convent of our Order, but by reason of the badness of the Air, being too near the River, it was thought advisable to remove it to the City of Sogno where the Count resides, about two miles off. Hither we went next morning with a great deal of willingness, tho I could not say I had wanted for Satisfaction all the way I came up this River. Being got to our Convent, the Count came immediately thither to congratulate and welcome our arrival, and that more especially on account of my Companion who had been there three Years before. After his Visit he order'd us a Present of several things of the Product of the Country. In this our Convent we found only one Priest named Father Paul da Varesa, and he return'd to Loanda in a few days in the same Skiff that brought us; there remaining then with us only a Lay-Brother, one Leonard da Nardo, an old Man of a good Life, and extraordinarily well vers'd in the Customs of the Country, through the long stay he had made there.

We now began forthwith to apply ourselves to the Business of our Mission, and it fell to my share to celebrate the first Mass; but not knowing much of the Language, I could not pretend to preach in publick. I therefore hastily compos'd a short Sermon, and preach'd it in the Congregation adjoining to our Church, which consists of the better Sort of Persons, and who generally understand something of Portuguese. Out of some of this Congregation 'tis that the Counts are mostly chosen, provided they are of the Sangre de Cadera, as they call it, which is an Expression borrow'd from Portuguese, and signifies The Blood of the Throne. My Companion always preach'd publickly every Holy-day; but we were fain to say Mass late, because of the Count and his Followers, who never came till then. He always came in great pomp, being better attended than any Prince of the lower Ethiopia is wont to be. The fifth Sunday after Whitsontide it hap'n'd, that when I was just ready to come out to say Mass, the Count came in. My Companion, and Superior, presently spy'd him, and turning to me, bid me preach that Sermon in publick, which I had prepar'd for the private Congregation, that the Count might not go with-

Merolla. out a Sermon on that Day. I began to shrug up my Shoulders, and to excuse it, not thinking my self yet qualify'd to speak in Publick; till at length he bid me obey; and God would assist me. I began Mass; and after the Gospel, the usual time of Preaching, took for my Text the words of the Commandments, Thou shalt not kill. From this Text I took occasion to inveigh against Wizards, who bear a mighty sway in this Country, proving, That it was much worse to kill the Soul, by inclining it to Diabolical Illusions, than to murder the Body. Now because I often repeated the word Kill in my Sermon, the People began to give a great Hum. I nevertheless went on, and was rather encourag'd thereby to exaggerate the heinousness of the Offence, than affrighted from speaking against it. But the more I rais'd my Voice, the greater was the Murmur, I might have said Clamour; the Count only all this while continued silent. At length the Sermon being ended, and the Substance of it explain'd by the Interpreter according to custom, I and my Superior were in a thousand Doubts about this Humming. We enquir'd of every one we met concerning it, yet none durst satisfy us therein; but all went away smiling. When all the rest were gone, we took one into the House, and treating him with Aqua Vita and Roll Tobacco, intreated him to tell us the cause of the Disturbance in the Church, believing it could not be caus'd by the Sermon, in which nothing was to be condemn'd, either as to the Subject or Language.

The Discourse, said he, was most excellent, tho not design'd by the Father; for the People, tho not well skill'd in the Portuguese Language, imagin that the Fathers Missioners know all that has hapned, and that Hum was a Token of their Approbation, they having taken his Words in another sense. Pray tell me what has hapned, said F. Joseph: I will so, reply'd he; but take notice, there is no less Penalty than Death for him that discovers it to the Missioners, and therefore your Reverence must take care that you do not make me lose my Life. Being assur'd we would keep his Secret, he proceeded thus; Your Reverence must then know, that in the time of Holy Week, Father Paul da Varese officiating in the Church, great multitudes of this Principality flock'd hither from all parts to join with him in Devotion. At the same time the Devil, who is never wanting to promote his Interest as often as he sees occasion, took the opportunity to put it in the Count's and his Relations head, that several of this Congregation, under pretence of Religion, were met together with a treacherous Design. Hereupon a great number of the Count's Vassals and Friends being assembled to wish him a Merry Easter, that Prince order'd them to see the Oath taken (what this Oath is shall be explain'd hereafter) by such and such as he then pointed out in three several places of his Dominions, and whereby (continued he) there are many already dead, and more and more die thereof every day. Is it so? (quoth Father Joseph) for the future you shall have no reason to fear any more dying by these means. Neither shall you (said he to the Negro) be in any danger for your discovery of these devilish Practices. The second Mass after the same Father preach'd, and resuming the Subject which I had been upon before, took occasion from thence to hint something against this scandal.

Towards Night we both went to Court, and desir'd private Audience of the Count; which was readily granted us. The first that began with him was my Companion Father Joseph, who warmly represented to him, That being a Christian, he had behav'd himself like a Pagan, commanding those poor People to make such a devilish Oath on a groundless Suspicion. To this smart Charge the Count at first gave no Answer, being no doubt surpriz'd with so unexpected a Reproof; but instead thereof, tho a Black, became almost Pale, and thereby convinc'd us at the same time both of his Guilt and Remorse. This strange and sudden Alteration put me in mind of what the Poet said of Queen Dido.

Interfusa genas, & pallida Morte futura. Æneid.

I cannot believe, added the Father, that Don Antonio Bareto da Silva (so was this Prince's Name) could do this of his own head, but rather imagine it to have been contriv'd by his Counsellors or Relations. The poor Count immediately fell on his Knees, weeping and lamenting like another David before Nathan the Prophet, and confessing his Crime in the following words; Truly (said he) I have been exceedingly to blame, in ordering so barbarous a Test of my Subjects Loyalty: But since I have sinned like David, like him I also beg Pardon. To which Father Joseph reply'd, in the words of St. Ambrose spoken to Theodosius the Emperor, Since you have imitated a King in his Sin, follow him in his Repentance. The Effect of this was, that the Count the same Night countermanded his his Orders, and thereby all further Mischief was prevented.

Manner of giving an Oath.

The aforesaid Oath Bolungo is administer'd to the suppos'd Traitor, by a sort of Wizard call'd Cangazumbo, who making a certain Composition out of the Juice of Herbs, Serpents Flesh, Pulp of Fruit, and divers other things, gives it to the suppos'd Delinquent to drink, who if guilty (as they tell you) will immediately fall down in a swoon, or trembling, to the ground, insomuch that if they did not presently give him an Antidote, he would infallibly die away;
but if not guilty, no harm would happen to him. A manifest and open Cheat this, tho not discover'd through the blindness of this People; for the Wizard in case he has a mind to acquit the Accus'd, omits those Ingredients in the Composition which he puts in where he deligns to condemn him. This Order from the Count was an absolutely new thing, and never practis'd before; for he had commanded every one of his Subjects, not excepting any, to go to one of those three places where these Ministers of the Devil reside, and there to undergo a Test of their Loyalty, after the following manner: The suppos'd Traitor was made to look into a great Vat of Water, wherein if he fell he had immediately his Head struck off; but if he was innocent, he came away safe and sound. Whence it proceeded that they did, or did not fall, time must discover;
but they that perform'd this Work being Heathens, it is to be suppos'd that they poison'd the Water.

the sorts Oaths.

Now we are upon the Subject of these Oaths or Tests, give me leave to inform you of several other sorts now in use among these wicked People: One of these is call'd Chilumbo, and which might rather be said to be apply'd than administer'd; for the Person accus'd hath a red hot Iron pass'd over his naked Leg; which if it causes any Blister, he is forthwith thought guilty; but if not, he is releas'd. The deceit of this is, that if the Patient be determin'd to be acquitted, the subtil Wizard has a certain Preparation conceal'd in his Hand, of an exceeding cold nature, with which stroaking gently over the Part, the Fire when apply'd there loses its Force; but if he be to be found guilty, that Remedy is omitted, and then the Iron is left to cause its Effect.

The following Passage happen'd when I was in my Mission at Bengo in the Kingdom of Angola, on the account of my
Vol. I.

Health: The Son of a Mulatto being sick, was order'd by a Physician to be let Merolla Blood; and a Slave of his that had been a Surgeon, undertaking to perform the Operation, through an unsteady guidance of his Lance, happen'd to prick an Artery, whereby soon follow'd a Gangreen, and in a short time the Patient dy'd.
The Father of this Youth supposing that the Slave had done what he did on purpose, resolv'd to have him undergo the trial of Chilumbo, and thereupon immediately caus'd him to be seiz'd and carry'd to one of those three beforemen-tion'd Places where the Wizards live.
This done, he was soon brought to the Test, and had not only the red hot Iron pass'd over his Thigh, which burnt him miserably; but the enraged Father likewise not contented with what he had already suffer'd, would needs bind him hand and foot, and after that thrust a flaming Torch several times into his Face. The knowledg of this coming to my ear the next day, by means of a Courier belonging to the Bishop of Loanda, who likewise heightned the Fact, alledging that the Mulletto had moreover burnt the Slave alive, and afterwards thrown his Ashes into the River; I told the Courier that I could give no credit to what he related, unless he would bring two Witnesses to vouch the Truth thereof. Hereupon they were presently pro-duc'd, but could only affirm that they saw the Mulatto thrust the Torch several times in the Slave's Face; and that they afterwards heard he was burnt and thrown into the River. Upon these Depositions I us'd all the means I could to get the Wizard into my Power, that had perform'd this Hellish Ceremony; but found it impossible, because he had suspected I should be inform'd of it, and so fled away. The next thing I had to do was to catch the Mulatto, which I soon accomplish'd by the diligence of some special Friends. Being brought before me, he accosted me after this manner: I would fain know (quoth he) for what reason I am brought before you? For having wickedly burnt your Slave (said I).
That's not so (answer'd he) for he is yet alive. Bring him then hither (said I) that I may see whether he be or not. Hereupon he immediately order'd some others of his Slaves to bring him in; which they forthwith did, but bound after that barbarous manner, that it was impossible to loose him without cutting the Cords.
Then I demanded of the Mulatto, Why he had us'd his Slave so barbarously? He an-swer'd,

Merolla. sword, For having murder'd his only Child. That was his Misfortune, rather than his Fault (said I) and therefore you have not done what you can justify. I will justify it (said he) before any Magistrate whatsoever. Then you shall do it (reply'd I) to the Bishop of Loanda. And accordingly I order'd both him and his Slave to be sent away to that City. I afterwards heard that the said Bishop had discharg'd the Slave, but shut up his Master in Prison till he had satisfy'd for his Offence.

Account of Oaths continued. There are many other Species of this Test of Chilumbo, but which I shall only hint at here, they having been more at large describ'd already by Father Montecuccolo in his Historical Descriptions.

The second way of administering this Chilumbo Test is, by taking a tender and soft Root of the Tree Banana, which is put into the Mouth of the Person accus'd. Now if this Root stick to his Mouth, and make him seem to be eating of some thing clammy, then he is immediately thought guilty, and worthy of punishment; or if it happen otherwise, then is he forthwith discharged.

The third way is, by eating the Fruit of a certain Palm call'd Emba, which yields Oil: This being first tasted by the Wizard, to shew that there is no danger in it to the Innocent, is afterwards poison'd and given to the Person intended to be convicted; but if that Person be wary, and has a mind to come off safe, he must grease the Fists of the Distributors, and by those means may escape.

The fourth trial is, by a Pot of boiling Water, into which the Wizard throws a Stone, or any other thing of the like nature, and then takes it out himself with his naked hand, ordering the rest to do the same; they that take it without being scalded, are suppos'd innocent, whereas the contrary declares their Guilt.

The fifth, and which is chiefly practis'd in the Kingdom of Congo, is to clap several Snail-shells to the accus'd Persons Temples; where if they stick he is condemn'd, but if not, discharg'd. Let the Reader judg if there may not be any fallacy in this way, or not.

The sixth, most in use among the Blacks, is to light a Torch made of a certain Bitumen distill'd from Trees, and to quench the same in Water; and afterwards to give that Water to the suppos'd Criminal to drink; which, if he be guilty, will do him harm; but if not, will cause no alteration in him.

The seventh is practis'd only by Smiths, who are sometimes Wizards, and is call'd by the Natives Nole fianzumdu. The manner of administering this Chilumbo, is by heating an Iron red hot, and afterwards quenching it in Water as before; which Water is immediately given to drink to those that take the Oath. Now if it is observ'd that they cannot easily get it down, as it sometimes happens, thro Apprehension only, then are they pronounc'd Guilty without any farther proof; or else, by their easy swallowing of it, discharg'd.

Others make this trial, by the Water wherein their Lord's Feet have been wash'd, and which is call'd Nfy-a-masa. The rest of the Kinds I shall omit speaking of, for the Reasons before mentioned.

There are other ways of discovering Theft and Sorcery, as likewise for absolving any that have taken the aforesaid Oaths.

As for the first, a subtil Wizard is commission'd with the name of Nbaci, who takes a long Thred in his Hand, either of Linen or Woollen, and holding one end himself, gives the other to hold to him that is the supposed Thief. This done, he applys a red hot Iron to the middle of the said Thred, and if it burns, the Delinquent is fin'd to the Value; or if the Theft be great, he is made a Slave; but if otherwise, absolv'd. Whether the Devil has any hand in this I cannot decide, not being thoroughly acquainted with the matter of Fact.

Concerning the Second, To discover who has been dealing with the Devil, they make the following Experiment: The Root of a certain Tree call'd Ncassa, is dissolv'd in Water; and after dissolution that Water is put up in Vessels, and given to the Person accus'd to drink. Afterwards he is delivered into the hands of several strong Men to misuse, and shake about in a manner, that in a very short time he falls down in a swoon; some imagine that this is rather occasion'd by Poison given him instead of the said Root. This Tree is pretty tall, and of a red colour, and has a wonderful Virtue for curing the Tooth-ach and sore Gums. It is likewise extremely pernicious to Birds who fly from it; for if they should once settle on its Boughs, they would immediately fall down dead to the ground.

As for the third, To absolve from any sort of Oath, it is perform'd by a Minister call'd Ganga, or Nzi, who rubs the Tongue of the Person to be absolv'd with with the fruit of the Palm that produces Oil, and after muttering some few words to himself he thereby frees him from his Oath, and so sends him home to his House.

Lastly, there is another sort of Trial, which is perform'd not by the deceitful hand of a Wizard, but by a Person of some Quality, after the following manner. Two obstinate Fellows being at Law together, and the Truth being hard to be got out of them, the Judge summons them both to appear before him, where being come he fixes to each of their Foreheads a Sea-shell, and at the same time commands them to bow down their Heads; now he that the Shell first drops from is taken for the Lier, and the other acquitted.

A Wizard condemn'd, but pardon'd. Whilst I was in Bengo above-mention'd, my Companion Father Francis da Monte Leone, having seiz'd upon one of the aforesaid Wizards, sent him to the Portuguese Governour to punish, who immediately upon Conviction condemn'd him to death: His time of suffering being come, he was exhorted by Father Francis to confess his Crime, but instead thereof, being an obstinate Fellow, he gave this Answer, What! would you have me to accuse my self where I have committed no Crime? My Practice has always hitherto been to do good to all Men and not evil; for when the poor People of my Country have sow'd, and the Earth became afterwards dry for want of Rain, if I out of mere Charity have caus'd the Clouds to dissolve to supply that Necessity, was this a Crime? If I have convers'd with Tigers, Serpents, Lions, and other wild Animals, and they have answer'd me, was there any harm in it? If at a time when there was no Boat to be found in the River, I out of pure Compassion call'd Crocodiles to carry us over, must this be accounted a Sin? After this and the like manner he justified his Crime for some time, yet however at length thought fit to own himself guilty; but because he had been prosecuted by a Missioner, he was afterwards pardon'd his Life, and sent bound to Brazil.

We had not been many months in Sogno before the People, through remorse of Conscience, discover'd to us that the Sister of a certain Nobleman of that Country cur'd Persons publickly by the help of Magick; and that moreover to make her self the better known for a Sorcerer, she went cloth'd like a Witch, and wore long dishevell'd Hair, contrary to the Custom of these Parts. They further inform'd us, that she frequently had a Merolla Drum beat before her to publish her Profession, and likewise that she had a Son who practis'd the same Art, and liv'd with her in the House. This being heard by us with great abhorrence, we immediately drew up a Charge against both Mother and Son, and at the same time made use of our utmost Endeavours to get them apprehended: But the former being timely acquainted with our designs, escap'd up in the Country, while the latter fell into our Snares, and was sent by us bound to the Count. This Prince, notwithstanding our diligence to seize the Prisoner, gave him nevertheless so much liberty, that he soon found means, tho bound, to get to his Father's House, by whom he was instantly loos'd and sent to an Island in the Zaire to be protected. This was the first Displeasure we receiv'd from the Count, whom we afterwards severely upbraided with destroying the tender Plants of Christianity in his Country, and putting a stop to all the good Works we had begun there; telling him, he imitated but ill his Predecessor Count Stephen, who after having extirpated these wicked Wizards almost totally out of his Dominions, commanded his Governors that where-ever they were found at any time to have return'd, they should immediately be seiz'd, and have their Heads lop'd off without any further Ceremony; and in case any of his Officers did not put this Law in Execution, he was liable to the same Sentence. After this manner were our Missioners assisted in their Endeavours during Count Stephen's Reign: Nay, he was so zealous in his Assistance, that he would travel about with them himself, and observe how things pass'd with his own Eyes; and if he found any Whoremonger, he would reprove him in the following words: Either this Woman pleases you, or not; if she does please you, why don't you marry her? and if not, why does she continue with you?

This Reprimand we gave the Count A cunning Trick. succeeded so well, that he seem'd afterwards inclinable in some measure to comply with our desires, alledging that he would willingly bring those Offenders to Punishment, but that he could not catch them, by reason of their being remov'd too far up into the Country. Notwithstanding the Father that had before releas'd his Son without Authority, being afraid of being imprison'd himself for so doing, thought it advisable to feign himself sick to evade that danger, and consequently sent for me to confess him: I

Merolla. immediately comply'd with his desires, and confess'd him, but soon found that what he had done was more out of Hypocrisy than Sincerity; for it is a Custom in this Country, that where any Person has receiv'd Absolution, he forthwith becomes free from any Crime, and may consequently depart at liberty, tho he were in hold before. The reason they give for this is, That if God has pardon'd them, how can Man pretend to find them guilty? The same was answer'd us by the Count, when we requested him upon finding out the fellow's Dissimulation, to have him imprison'd again. Have ye not absolv'd him? (quoth he) Is he not free? How then can I pretend to lay hands upon him? Nor would he hear any reason to the contrary, because the Offender was his Kinsman.

A Wizard escapes, but re-taken.

A while after the Count sent us another of these Wizards, with an assurance that for the future he would let none escape that came into his Power. This Person we immediately carried into a room to examine; but while my Companion went into an adjoining Apartment to fetch a Paper, leaving the Prisoner for me and the Interpreter to keep, he, notwithstanding our diligence, and the great number of People in the next room, got from us. A Dog we had in the House being alarm'd at the noise, immediately run after him, while I by another way pursu'd him so luckily that I soon met him, and trip'd up his heels, and at the same instant follow'd his Fall and leap'd upon his back, belabouring him with all my might, notwithstanding the fear the People have here of meddling with Wizards, with the Cord of my Order, invoking all the while St. Michael and the rest of the Saints to my Assistance. At the same interim my Companion came in, and could not forbear laughing to observe how lustily I laid him on. A little after the People that had brought him to us, came up and bound him in such manner that he could not stir; for you must observe they were not afraid to touch him by reason of the Agnus and other Preservatives that we had furnish'd them with. Being thus in our Power, we soon brought him to abjure his Errors, and afterwards set him at liberty. The Laws of this Country as to these cases being as follows: If the Wizard that is taken be a Freeman, and abjures, for the first Offence he is only enjoyn'd Penance; for the second he pays an Indian Piece of about the value of a Slave; but if he offends a third time, he is forthwith sold for a Slave, and the Price of him distributed among the Poor: If he be a Slave himself that offends, altho it be the first time, he is nevertheless presently sold, and sent among the Whites, a thing so much abhor'd by them that they would almost purchase their Redemption with the Price of their Lives. When any of these three last Cases happens, a Person is deputed either to receive the Money and distribute it as before, or else to take in exchange so much Linen as amounts to the value, and this to wrap the dead Poor in, after the Custom of the Country. All which is done without our concerning our selves, lest it should occasion some evil-spirited People to suggest that what we did was rather through a Motive of Covetousness than any of Charity or Religion.

So many cases of this nature hapen'd Tica to me during my Mission, that would suffice to make a Volume apart; nevertheless not to be too tiresome to my Reader, I shall content my self with relating only the most remarkable. Upon a time a certain Wizard more famous than ordinary was brought before me, whom, not to trust any more to the Count, I committed to the Custody of the Keeper of the Church (an Office of great Gain and much Honour, and which is not confer'd by us but upon Persons best qualify'd) to the end that he might imprison him the safer in his own House. This good Man, notwithstanding my particular Injunctions, not long after set his Prisoner at liberty, and plac'd in his room and in Chains a poor Slave. At my coming a little while after to examine the Offender, not finding him to be the same that I sent, I began to demand of the Keeper what was become of him? He answer'd me, that was he. Then I ask'd the Prisoner if he were the Person? To which he reply'd, He was. Hereupon I seem'd to believe both, yet being certain that I was impos'd upon, I was resolv'd to know the truth: For this end I call'd one of the Slaves belonging to the Church to me, and commanded him to go immediately and cut off the pretended Wizard's Head. Hereat the imprison'd Slave being affrighted, especially when he saw the Ax brought, began to tremble, and cry out, I am not He, I am not the Wizard but such a one is (naming him) whom the Keeper has set free, and put me in his stead. Then turning to the Keeper, I said, What say you to this? He answer'd, Father, the Wizard is gone forth to seek a Livelibood and has left this Person here as a Pledg til he returns. But (continu'd he) I'll immediately mediately go and look after him, and don't question but to find him. Hereupon I went along with him, but to no purpose, for the subtle Cunjurer had very prudently given us both the slip. For this Offence I could do no less than deprive the Keeper of his Place, and he was not a little thankful that I left him his Life. Moreover, Prisoners escape many times here through the slightness of their Prisons, for being most commonly built with Reeds they can't be suppos'd to be very strong. To remedy this, we generally took care at the arrival of any European Vessel to embark our Prisoners on board, and to transport them to other Countries.

Physicians who, and their cunning. The infernal Practice of Sorcery is even abhor'd by the Natives, and those that make use of it are for the most part the meanest sort of People, serving here either for Physicians or Surgeons, there being no others in the Country. The Remedies they have are generally the natural ones, and therefore they have recourse to Witchcraft to credit their Art, and to make People believe that the Virtues of their Medicines are communicated to them by the Devil. If their Physick fails, they excuse themselves, and say, A certain ominous Bird flew over their heads, and hinder'd the Operation of it: or else they assert some other ridiculous Lie. These sort of Incantations are always practis'd in the night-time. The first thing they say to the sick Person after he comes under their Cure is, If you have a mind to be cur'd, besure not to send for any Confessor, for his Presence will not only take away the Virtue of the Remedy, but likewise deprive you of your Life. When any one dies under their hands, they affirm that there were other occasions of his Death than those of his Distemper, which puts the Parents upon divers cursed methods of finding out the suppos'd Murderers, they being generally of Opinion that nobody dies a natural Death.

Strange Judgment. Dreadful to be remembred, tho not unworthy of Memory, was a Case that happen'd in our time, as follows: A certain Child had languish'd for some time under a desperate Disease, and which by being the only one its Parents had, was their chiefest Comfort and Support: The Relations often solicited them to send for some Wizard or other to recover its Health, but they would by no means hear of such a Proposal, alledging that they never yet had had recourse to any such People upon any occasion whatever. To this the Relations reply'd, and ask'd them, What they thought the World would say, that they who had but one only Child, should suffer it to die for want of being at the expence of a Magician? This they urg'd so home, and made use of so many other Arguments of the like nature, that they at length prevail'd upon the deluded Parents to send for a Wizard hard by: When he came into the House, the Mother had her sick Child in her Arms, which the Magician stretching forth his Arm to touch in order to begin his Charm, at the same time both the Child and the Wizard expir'd: This occasion'd so excessive an Affliction in the Father and the Mother, that blaming themselves for this impious Credulity, and looking upon this Accident as no better than Parricide in them, before they would bury the Body of their unhappy Infant, they came to Confession at our Convent.

Not unlike this was another Accident Another Judgment. that happen'd in this Country while I was there. A certain sick Person sent to a Magician to come and cure him: The Magician came accordingly, but as he was stretching forth his hand, as in the foregoing Case, he fell down dead to the ground, miserably losing his own Life, at the same time that he endeavour'd by wretched means to prolong that of another Man.

But let us return to speak a little more A further account of Oaths. of the wicked Oaths practis'd among these People. They have another sort of Oath which they call Orioncio: The way of administering this is, by putting exceeding strong Poison into the Fruit call'd Nicessi, sufficiently spoken of before, and afterwards giving that Fruit to the suppos'd guilty Person to eat: He has no sooner tasted of it, but his Tongue and Throat begin to swell to that excess, that if the Wizard did not speedily apply an Antidote, he must inevitably soon perish under the Experiment, and tho innocent he commonly remains tortur'd for many days.

The Oath call'd Oluchenche is given after the following manner: The Person that takes it has his Limbs bound tighter or looser, to force out the Truth as they term it, according to the Wizard's Inclination, to find him either guilty or innocent.

As I pass'd through the Kingdom of Angola, one of the aforesaid sorts of the Oath call'd Bolungo was administered to a Mafucca (so they call the Receiver among the Whites) a Relation to the King of Congo, and to him of Loango, one of the powerfulest along that Coast, and whose Son, as they told me, was to succeed

 Merolla. succeed in that Kingdom. To this Person the Scingbili (Gods of the Earth, being the Name they have for their Wizards) attributed the Cause of its not raining in the Month of March, at which time it always had accusom'd to have rain'd. He therefore, to satisfy the Rage of the People, was to undergo this dangerous Test, which he accordingly did, and unexpectedly came off acquitted.
 These Scingbili or Wizards boast that it is in their power to grant or prevent either wet Weather or a Drought.

A Wizard
 deceiv'd. We having put ashore in one of the Ports of this Kingdom, as we were on our Voyage to Congo, and the People having understood who I was, and that I was of a contrary Opinion to that of their Scingbili, they began immediately to murmur against me. Their Wizards, to confirm their Belief, and to oppose mine, foretold that there should be no Rain all that Summer. But it so fell out, and Providence I believe had so order'd it, that scarce was I got ashore to say Mass, but the Heavens began to pour forth their watry Wrath against these Infidels in such a manner, that these very Wizards were afterwards forc'd to own to me that their Knowledg in these Matters was not infallible.

Strange
 Superstition. In our Convent at Sogno our Fathers had built one Apartment two Stories high, on purpose to keep some of the Church Utensils by themselves. No Rain having happen'd that Season, the Scingbili attributed the Cause thereof to our raising our building contrary to the Custom of the Country. Hereupon the too credu-lous People came one day in a great rage to pull down that Apartment; when one of our Fathers immediately going out, demanded of them what they would have?
 Whom they answer'd in great fury, That they must either pull down that Building, or they should always want Rain. This soon fir'd the pious Father, and made him to go on with a great deal of Zeal, first reproaching their unwarrantable Folly, and after giving them to understand that God was the only Disposer of all Gifts, whether in Heaven, Earth or Sea, sometimes giving and sometimes withholding, according as he best saw fit and convenient; and that the Ministers of the Prince of Darkness, such as their Scin- gbili, were only qualify'd to destroy Men both here and hereafter, instead of doing them the least kindness. Make a devout Procession, said he, to our Lady of Pinda,
 I assure you God will relieve your Wants.
 So they did, and so it fell out, the Earth being soak'd with the Rain, the House remaining untouch'd, and the People sa-tisfy'd. Since then they have us'd this in time of Distress, and it has happen'd they have gone from the Banza with fair Weather, and return'd well soak'd from Pinda.

Whilst my Companion Father Joseph A Wizard was formerly travelling on his Mission in disappointed.
Sogno, he came to an open Country at a time when the Clouds were just ready to disembody their Burdens. He there overtook a Traveller likewise, who was standing stock still, and murmuring strange Words to himself. After which he mounted his Bow, and shot an Arrow up into the Air with great indignation.
 The Father perceiving this, and guessing it to be some of the devilish Practices of this Country, immediately came up to him, and after having sharply reprov'd him for his Offence, acquainted him,
That he believed all his Hellish Art would not suffice to keep it from raining that day: and as he guess'd, so it soon hapned; for presently after there fell so great a Shower, that the Father was wet to the Skin, which he was nevertheless pleas'd with by reason that it had so plentifully disappointed the wicked Sorcerer. At this the Wretch was much surpriz'd, but would not nevertheless be convinc'd of his Error, affirming, That this had hapned
thro the Power of those that went before him, who were greater Proficients in Magick than himself. These provoking Words caus'd the Black Christians that were along with the Father to seize upon the Wizard, and to give him that Chastisement which his Crime deserv'd.

In the Country about Coanza, a River Impious to be pass'd in the way to Singa, a certain Obstinacy
Soua or Lord of a Mannor caus'd himself to be accounted a Scingbili, requiring his Vassals to make their Addresses to him when they wanted Rain. One of our Fathers coming thither, and detesting the impious Abuse, did what lay in his power to get him seiz'd; but being disappointed thro the Quality of the Person, he was forc'd to have recourse to a milder Remedy; and no doubt inspir'd by God, he told the Inhabitants, That if they did not rid out of their Hearts that cursed Opini- on, they'd never have any Rain. As the Father prophes'y'd, so it happen'd; for ever since, for 17 Years together, they have not had one Drop in those Parts whereby the Earth is become so dry, especially considering the Climate, that it hayawn'd wide in most Places, and seem'd with so many Mouths to beg Pardon of

the Almighty Dispenser of Benefits for the Blasphemy of their Lord. 'Tis true, the best Come-off they have for this Offence is, that the said Father, after their Disobedience, curs'd the Air, and so caus'd it to withhold its Favours from them. Notwithstanding the Curse on his Country, and the Loss of his Vassals, who went to live in other Parts, the obstinate Soua, unwilling to own his Error, still continued to pretend to the same Power.

another Judgment. To conclude speaking any more of Oaths, I will give one terrible Instance relating to them, which hapned in the Kingdom of Matamba, being the Dominions of the Queen of Singa, and related to me by Father Francis da Pavia a Missioner there. Upon an Affair something more considerable than ordinary, a certain Frier of our Order thought fitting to give an Oath on the Holy Evangelists to two of the greatest Magicians, Counsellors to the Queen. At first they refused to take it, but at length consented, saying to themselves, What harm can happen to us by so doing? We had better satisfy the Father in so indifferent a Matter, than disoblige him by a Refusal. Hereupon they presently agreed to take it, and swore, but falsely, when a strange Accident hapned. The first of these burst, and fell down dead, while he had his Hand on the Mass-book; and the other languish'd away, and dy'd in about six hours after. Which taught others to be more cautious how they jested with God.

A Diabolical Enslavement. From the Death of these two Magicians of the higher Rank, let us proceed to speak of other Wizards, who most commonly die violent Deaths, and that for the most part voluntarily. For the present I shall only speak of the Head or Chief of these Wretches, from whom the rest take example. He is stil'd in the Country Language Ganga Chitorne, being reputed God of the Earth, and to whom is consequently paid the first Fruits of all it produces, due to him, as they say, as its Author, and not either to the ordinary Work of Nature, or to the extraordinary one of Providence. This Power he also boasts to be able to communicate to others, when and as often as he pleases. He further asserts, that his Body is not capable of suffering a natural Death; and therefore to confirm his Adorers in that Opinion, whenever he finds his End approaching either thro Age or a Disease, he calls for such a one of his Disciples as he designs to succeed him, and pretends to communicate to him his great Power; and afterwards in Publick (where this Tragedy is always acted) he commands him to tie a Halter about his Neck, and to strangle him therewith, or else to take a great Club, and knock him down dead. This Command being once pronounc'd, is soon executed, and the Wizard thereby sent a Martyr to the Devil. The reason that this is done in Publick, is to make known the Successor ordain'd by the last Breath of the Predecessor, and to shew that he has the same Power of producing Rain, and the like. If this Office were not thus continually fill'd, the Inhabitants say, That the Earth would soon become barren, and Mankind consequently perish. In my time one of these Magicians was cast into the Sea, another into a River, a Mother and her Son put to death, and many others banish'd by our Order, as has been said.

Vol. I.

Great Treachery. In the first Year of our Arrival in these Parts there happen'd a Passage worthy to be remember'd, which before I can begin with, I must go some years back with my Story. Upon the late King of Congo's Death, two very considerable Persons pretended to that Crown, either of whom did all that in him lay to procure the Count of Sogno, a powerful Elector, on his side. One of these, whose Name was Simantamba, made him several Presents of Slaves for that purpose, but which had been all taken by Force; and therefore the Fathers that were then at his Court advis'd him by no means to accept of them. To this the Count answer'd, That he had already consider'd of the Matter, and was inclinable to be of their opinion, that he ought not to accept of them. Some time after the same Simantamba, to ingratiate himself the further into this Prince, and to engage him in a stricter Tie of Friendship, requested his Sister of him for a Wife. To this the Count so readily consented, that he not only sent him her forthwith, but likewise the Crown it self, which it seems he had then in his possession, together with a Velvet Throne, several other things of great Value, and divers arm'd Troops. Simantamba having advice of the Approach of his Spouse, went out several days Journey to meet her; and the better to avoid the Snares that might be laid for him by his Rival in the Crown, thought it proper to set down and fortify himself in a very strong Wood. The Count's Army arriving some time after with Songs, Musick, and Dancing, enter'd the Wood with great Alacrity, which Simantamba's Followers perceiv-

Thus instead of a joyful Hymen, this Prince met with a barbarous Death, and which together with that of his Friends, ~~suted with the~~ Description made by Virgil in the 2d Book of his Æneids, odd Story.

Some time after the Brother of this deceased Prince got together a great number of People to revenge his Brother's Death; and his first Exploit was the taking of a great part of the County of Chiovachianza belonging to Sogno. To recover which, the Count, at our being there, rais'd a great Army likewise, and march'd directly towards the chief City of his Antagonist. At his Arrival he found all the Inhabitants fled; whereupon the Sognefe Soldiers fell immediately to ridding of the Houses, and moreover began to kill all the Living Creatures they met in their way, to satisfy their Hunger. Amongst the rest they found a Cock of a larger size than ordinary, with a great Ring of Iron about one of his Legs, which occasion'd one of the wisest among them to cry out, Surely this Cock must be bewitch'd, and is not at all proper for us to meddle with. To which the rest answered, Be it what it will, we are resolv'd to eat it. For this end they immediately kill'd, and tore it to pieces after the manner of the Negroes, and afterwards put it into a Pot to boil. When it was enough, they took it out into a Platter, and two, according to the Custom, having said Grace, five of them sat down to it with great Greediness. But before they had touch'd a Bit, to their great wonder and amazement, the boil'd Pieces of the Cock, tho' sodden, and near dissolv'd, began to move about, and unite into the Form they were in before, and being so united, the restor'd Cock immediately rais'd himself up, and jump'd out of the Platter upon the Ground, where he walk'd about as well as when he was first taken. Afterwards he leap'd upon an adjoining Wall, where he became new feather'd all of a sudden, and then took his Flight to a Tree hard by, where fixing himself, he after three Claps of his Wings, made a most hideous Noise, and then disappear'd. Every one may easily imagine what a terrible Fright the Spectators were in at this Sight, who leaping with a thousand Ave Marias in their Mouths from the Place where this had hapned, were contented to observe most of the Particulars at a distance. The cause of their Preservation they attributed to the Grace that was said before they sat down; otherwise they were of opinion that they should all have been either possess'd or kill'd. I having related this Story to Father Thomas da Sestola, one of our Order, who had been Superior of a Mission to Congo and Angola for above 7 years, he told me that whilst he liv'd in Congo he heard two Persons aver that the before-mention'd Simantamba had a very large Cock, from whose Manner and Time of Crowing he observ'd with great Superstition whether his Undertakings should be unlucky or prosperous. But notwithstanding the Infallibility of his Oracle, we find he was deceiv'd when he made that last Expedition wherein he lost his Life. Whether this Cock of his was the same mention'd before to have been restor'd to Life after a most miraculous manner, I shall not take upon me to determine.

The same Father Thomas acquainted me how he and his Companion had been abus'd in their Mission at Sogno, and sent among the Pagans into the Kingdom of Angoij, which was after the following manner. A King of Congo being desirous to be crown'd, had recourse to the Portugueses of the Kingdom of Angola for their Assistance, with condition that in case he succeeded in his Design, he would give them the Country of Sogno, and two Mines of Gold to boot. This Proffer being not unwelcome to the Portugueses, they immediately assembled themselves to take possession of it, to the end that thereby they might be more secure of having their Bargain perform'd after they had done their Work. At the same time the King gather'd great numbers of his Subjects together to join the Portugueses, adding moreover a certain Company of Giagbi under their Calangola (a Chief among this barbarous People, that delight in feeding on Man's Flesh) all which immediately set forward towards Sogno. The Count being soon acquainted with these Proceedings, rais'd a prodigious Army likewise, and there- with went out to meet his bold Invaders. But it so happen'd, that by reason the Sognefe Army were wholly unacquainted with the Fire-Arms and manner of the Portuguese Fighting, they were soon dif- comfited and routed, leaving the Field, and an innumerable Company of Priso- ners, together with the dead Body of their Count, to the Conquerors.

After this Victory obtain'd, the afore- said Calangola propos'd to the Portuguese Captain to have all the Prisoners kill'd, and given to his Soldiers to eat, alledging that the next day they should take as many more, and they would then not be able to keep both. This Proposal the Captain either thro' Clemency or Interest refused to con- sent to, telling the Calangola, that his Men, if they pleas'd, might feed for the present on the dead Bodies, and in the mean time he would consider of his Re- quest. Whilst this pass'd, the Countess Dowager, together with all the People, petition'd the said Captain, That he would proceed no further with his Hostilities, and he should be fully satisfied in what he demanded. To which the Captain answer'd, That he was resolv'd to go on as far as the farthest **Banza, to teach the Sognefe People the Bounds of their Obedience to Congo.* Hereat the People being extremely enraged, one of the principal among them being of the Blood of the Counts, stood up, and told them, That if they would elect him for their Count, he would soon rid them of their Fears of the Portugueses. To this the fright- ed People immediately consented, and at the same time chose him for their Sove- reign. Being thus chosen, he began to unite and fortify the distracted Minds of his Subjects; and to the end they might quickly be in a condition to take the Field, he gave them the following Instructions. First he order'd them to shave their Heads (which Custom continues even to this day among these People, whether Males or Females.) Next he commanded them to bind Palm-leaves about their Temples, to the end that in the Battel they might be thereby distinguished from those Blacks that accompanied the Portugueses. He further advis'd them not to be afraid ei- ther of the Noise or Flashings of Guns, since they were only as Bugbears fit to fright Children, and not Men of Cou- rage. He moreover caution'd them a- gainst minding those European Trifles which their Enemies the Whites were ac-custom'd to throw among them, when they had a mind to disorder and make them break their Ranks *. He likewise order'd them to shoot always at the Men, and not the Horses, these last being in- considerable in War, and nothing like to the Nature of Tygers, Lions and E- lephants. He commanded them more- over that if any among them turn'd his back, they should immediately strike off his Head; and if more than one did the same, the rest should serve him the like: For (says he) we are all resolv'd to die a glorious Death, rather than live a miserable Life. Lastly, to the end that his Follow- ers might go on under him with the less concern, he commanded them to kill all their domestick Animals; and the better to encourage them therein, was the first that set them an example, by killing his own in their sight. This he did likewise to prevent the Portugueses (in case they should have the better of him) from hav- ing any thing to triumph over, and feast with in his Dominions, and rather chose to have his Subjects feed on them, to hea- ten and strengthen them for Battel, than to have his Enemies fatten and regale on his Spoils. Now because his Orders had been so punctually observ'd in this parti- cular, the whole Race of these Beasts, especially of Cows, has almost been to- tally destroy'd ever since; insomuch that I my self have known a young Maid sold here for a Calf, and a Woman for a Cow. To reinforce this his Army, the last thing this Count did was to call in his Neigh- bours to his assistance, together with whom and his own Subjects having compos'd a wondrous Force, he forthwith march'd out into the Field. His Enemies through too great a Negligence and Con- tempt of his Power, soon betray'd them- selves into his hands; for marching on without the least Order, they gave op- portunity to an Ambush that lay ready for them, to break, and put them easily to flight. The first that fled were the Giaghi, being the Troops under their Calangola, and the Forces of the King of Congo follow'd soon after. The Slaves that had been taken in the Battel before, finding here an opportunity to escape, run like Madmen in amongst their Friends, and having their Arms unloos'd by them, presently turn'd all their Fury upon the remaining Portugueses, who still kept

Merella. their Ground ; but at length being over-power'd by Numbers, they were forc'd to give back, and were all kill'd in the pursuit, except six who were taken Prisoners, and brought before the Count ; who demanded of them, If they would chuse to die with their Companions, or survive to be made Slaves ? To which they answer'd, with an accustom'd Spanish Resolution, Never did Whites yet yield to be made Slaves to Blacks, neither would they. Which Answer soon caus'd their destruction, for scarce were the words out of their Mouths, but they were all kill'd upon the spot. All the Artillery and Baggage was taken by the Sognese Army ; the former of which, together with some pieces of Cannon bought of the Hollanders, serv'd to furnish a Fortrefs built with Earth at the Mouth of the River Zaire, which commands both the said River and the Sea.

Before they left Loanda, the Portuguese Army had desir'd of the Commander of the Armabilia (so they call'd their Fleet by reason of the smallness of it) that as he sail'd along the Coasts of Sogno, wherever he saw great Fires burning he should anchor. Now after the obtain'd Victory, the Sognese Soldiers spent all their Nights in Jollity and Merriment about such Fires, as had been describ'd ; which the Ships immediately perceiving, dropt their Anchors hard by, and were preparing to land their Force ; while discovering from the Shore a Portuguese Slave that hal'd them, they soon took him into a Boat, and found he had been sent by the Count to the Governor of Loanda with a Leg and an Arm of a White ; together with this insulting Message, Go carry the news of your defeat, together with this Present, to the Governor of Loanda your Master. Thus you may perceive the Seamen, if they had landed, had been in the same case with the Landmen, and instead of imprisoning the Blacks in the Shackles they had carry'd along with them for that purpose, had been undoubtedly in the like condition themselves, and had been at least made Slaves of, if they came off with their Lives.

What the Sognese say for themselves in justification of this Quarrel, is as follows : They ask first, What Right the King of Congo had to give away their Country of Sogno to the Portugueses, when it was none of his, but a Sovereignty of it self ? And next they would know, Why the Portugueses, who were not unacquainted with that Particular, should be so unjust as to be ready to accept of it, and that in an hostile man- ner ? They alledg'd moreover, That when the Hollanders some Years since had got possession of the Kingdom of Angola, a great number of Portugueses being outed thence, fled to Sogno, where they were courteously entertain'd by the Count, who gave them the Island of Horfes to live in ; and moreover furnish'd them with all manner of Provisions gratis. Now they could not but much wonder that those People whom they had so hospitably reliev'd, should have the ingratitude to endeavour to take their Country away from them. These Jars arising upon this occasion, could not but be extremely prejudicial to the Infant Growth of Christianity in this Country, insomuch that one of our Order who liv'd at Sogno dy'd for mere grief thereof : And I my self met with several People in Chitombo, the Place where the Battel was fought, who would come no more to Confession upon that account.

Now to return to our Story : The Count having receiv'd in the aforesaid Battel about thirteen Wounds, in near the compass of a Month, died thereof ; and a new own being soon chosen in his stead, he nourished in his Heart so great a hatred to the Portugueses, that he resolv'd for the future to have no more dealings neither with them nor the Capucins, whom he look'd upon to belong to them. Whereupon sending for some Flemish Merchants that were just then upon their departure out of his Country for Flanders, he writ by them to the Pope's Nuncio there, to turnish his Dominion with new Priests. The pious Prelate upon the receipt of this Letter, sent him two Franciscans and one Lay-Brother, with strict command to them, that if there were any Capucins in the Country, they should submit to them as their Superiors. These three Religious Persons being arriv'd, were receiv'd with all the Courtesy imaginable, and afterwards conducted to our Convent. The Count perceiving that he had now got other Priests, made use of several false Pretexes to send ours away ; and at last being not able to prove any Crimes against them, he had recourse to the most barbarous and arbitrary usage that could be thought on, commanding that they should be dragg'd out of his Dominions for the space of two Miles together. This was forthwith executed with the greatest rigour, for the Officers of this cruel Master, not only tore them along in their own Cords, with their Faces grating downwards upon the Sands, but likewise revild them all the way with unmerited Reproaches and Calumnies. All which which notwithstanding these Pious Fathers underwent with the greatest chearfulness, well remembring what greater Punishments and Indignities their Saviour had suffered for them before. So great nevertheless were the Injuries offer'd to these Fathers, that in no long time after one of them dy'd; and the other, who was the aforesaid Father Thomas, hardly escap'd with his Life. Being thus misus'd, and withal unprovided of all Necessaries, they were at last left on the Confines of the Count's Dominions, in a little uninhabited Island of the River Zaire. Here they made shift to support themselves for two or three days; F. Thomas, who was the least hurt of the two, going out to hunt for their Substinance: but at length they were unexpectedly delivered from hence by some Pagan Fishermen, who took them on board them, and carry'd them to a City of theirs call'd Bombangoij in the Kingdom of Angoij. Here arriving at Night, they were very courteously entertain'd by an Infidel of the Place, who gave them a Supper, and moreover assign'd them a House, and three Women to wait on them after the manner of that Country. But our Fathers not caring to trust themselves among these People, soon after they had supp'd, sending away their Women, meditated an Escape. For this purpose Father Thomas, who was the best able to walk, took his lame Companion upon his Back, and march'd out of the House; but he had not gone far, but he was forc'd, through weakness, to set down his Burden under a great shady Tree; which as soon as day appear'd, for fear of discovery, they made shift to get up into. Their Patron coming that Morning to visit his Guests, and finding them gone, much wonder'd; and well knowing they could not be got far, by reason of the condition he left them in, immediately went about to search after them. Coming at last near the place where they were, and not having yet found them, a Pagan thought came into his Head that they might have been carry'd away by some Spirits, and which he express'd after this manner; If the Devil has carry'd them away, I suppose he did it that they might make me no Recompence for my Kindness. Our Fathers hearing this, could not forbear laughing, even amidst their Miseries and Misfortunes, and putting out their Heads from the Tree, cry'd out, We are here, Friend, never doubt our Gratitude, for we only went out of the House to refresh our selves with the Rays of the rising Sun. Hereat the old Man being exceedingly rejoyc'd, immediately took them down, and putting them into two Nets, sent them away to Capinda, a Port of the Kingdom of Angoij, about two days Journey from Bombangoij. Here, if I am not mistaken, the Father that had been most harass'd, dy'd; and Father Thomas embarking himself not long after, on board a Vessel that lay there, departed for, Loanda in the Kingdom of Angola. One of the two Franciscans that remain'd yet in Sogno, the other having been gone for Angola some time before, being extremely affronted at the ill usage of these two Capucins, signify'd to the Count that he thought himself oblig'd in Charity to go in quest to his banish'd Brethren, and that either to support them if alive, or bury them if dead. This Request the Count highly approv'd of, and consequently gave him leave to go. Having hereby obtain'd his desire, he soon set out for Capinda, but never return'd, thinking it rather advisable to go on board the same Vessel with Father Thomas for Loanda.

His Companion the Lay-Brother not finding him to return, obtain'd leave likewise to go on the same Errand, as well as under pretence of hastening his return; but being once out of sight, he also was no more to be seen. Our Convent thus being depriv'd of all its Inhabitants, only one Lay-Brother remaining behind, whom the Count kept lock'd up for fear of losing him; the People rose in great fury against their Prince, and that for depriving them of the Mission design'd for their good. No Prudence being capable of opposing this Mutiny, they at last went so far that they seiz'd upon their Count, and sent him bound to an Island of his Dominions in the Zaire; where, that he might not be absolutely idle, they left him liberty to command, and afterwards chose a new Count. This Prince being but little satisfy'd with his Confinement, did all that in him lay to get himself restor'd, intriguing incessantly with the neighbouring Nations for that purpose. But which coming timely to his Subjects Ears, they once more seiz'd upon him, and tying a huge Weight to his Neck, threw him in a rage into the Sea, with these words; Over this River you made the poor innocent Capucins to pass into banishment for no Offence, and into the same go you barbarous and inhumane Monster, for so doing. Thus ended the Life of a Persecutor of poor harmless Men, who offended him only in that they were either either really, or else suspected to be Portuguese.

Whilſt Matters went thus, Father Joſeph Maria, who lived then at Loanda, after ſome time came to Sogno, under pretence of carrying away the Lay-Brother beforemention'd, with ſome Church-Utenſils belonging to the Miſſion, tho in reality his buſineſs was to ſound the Minds of the Sogneſe People. After his arrival at the Mouth of the River Zaire, call'd by the Portugueſes Pionta del Padron, before he would ſet foot aſhore, he ſent a Meſſenger to acquaint the Count with his being there. As ſoon as the People heard of it, they hurry'd away in great numbers to ſee him, and preſently acquainted him how they had diſpatch'd the Enemy of the Capucins into that River, and that for the future they would defend thoſe Holy Men to the laſt drop of their Blood. This Promiſe they afterwards confirm'd by an Oath at the Holy Altar. They alſo at the ſame time earneſtly entreated this Father that he would continue among them, and depart no more for Loanda. To this Requeſt Father Joſeph answer'd, That his Commiſſion from his Superior extended no farther than to bring away Father Leonard, together with the Church Goods. In ſhort, ſo very urgent were their Intreaties, and ſo powerful their Reaſons, that he was at length prevail'd upon to tarry with them; and that eſpecially at the return of the Meſſenger who brought him the ſame Deſires from the New Count. All this gain'd ſo far upon him, that he not only conſented to ſtay himſelf, but likewiſe, as a farther Token of Good-will, and pardoning their late Offence, procur'd alſo the injur'd Father Thomas to return once more among them; and even from thence-forward our Order has liv'd in that Country without the leaſt moleſtation.

This Earldom is very large, even if you except Chiovachianza ſpoken of before. In it there were formerly about ſix Miſſioners, but there are now for the moſt part but one or two, when there is occaſion for a much greater number. In the firſt Miſſion my Companion went on into theſe Parts, above five hundred, as well Men and Women, as Children, were baptiz'd by him in a day. I have alſo known here abundance of Mothers come five or ſix days Journey, with their Infants in their Arms, to have them chriſt-ned, or elſe to confeſs themſelves, paying the Interpreter to boot. How often does it happen among Europeans, that many put off the Sacrament of the Bleſſed Supper from time to time, with no ſmall hazard to their Souls? whereas in this Country there is only a want of Apoſtolick Labourers to make the People ſtrict obſervers of the Commandments, and conſtant in the Faith.

To preſerve as much as poſſible this new-planted Chriſtianity, it has been order'd that in every City, or Place of any Note, there ſhould be one Church at leaſt, and at my being here there were in all about 18 throughout the Count's Dominions. To every of theſe there is ſent ſome Perſon that has been bred up in our Convent, who three times a Week is to ſay over the Rosary to the People, and withal to teach every Sunday. On all Holy-days, inſtead of Maſs the Litany is only ſung, and the Chriſtian Doctrin expounded; and on the firſt Sunday of every Month there is a Proceſſion to be of the Rosary. As often as any Dedication-day of a Church happens, the Miſſioner takes care to be preſent himſelf if he can poſſible, when great Numbers appear, either to baptize their Children, to marry, or to receive the Sacrament.

Herein nevertheleſs there did not want Abuſes, introduced for the moſt part by Foreigners, rather than the Natives, of whom there are many, who through the Grace of God live ſuch good Lives, that ſometimes in their Confessions there has ſcarce been matter for Abſolution. The firſt Abuſe was in Matrimony, after the following manner: Theſe People were accuſtom'd to conſerve with their Wives ſometime before they marry'd them, to try if they could like them; and after the ſame manner the Wives were to experience their Huſbands. The Contracts were made thus: A Father and Mother ſeeing their Son arriv'd to an Age fit for marriage, ſend a Preſent (which goes alſo for a Portion) according to their Ability, to the Father and Mother of the Perſon that he fancys, requeſting their Daughter of them for a Wife to their Son. Together with this Preſent there is likewiſe ſent an earthen Pot full of Palm-Wine, call'd by the Natives Cietto à Melaffo. Before the intended Wife's Parents receive the Preſent, they and their Company are to drink up the Wine: Firſt, the Father is to drink, then the Mother; and after them it is handed about among the ſtanders by: If this laſt Ceremony were omitted, it would be accounted a conſiderable Affront. After all this is done, the Father is to return an Answer either one way or other: If he rejects the Offer, he must make his excuses; but if he accept it, he only retains the Portion. When the last happens, the Husband with his Friends and Relations goes immediately, upon notice that the Present has been accepted, to his Wife's Father's House; and having there receiv'd her of her Parents, conducts her to his own. The way of marrying, in facie Ecclesiæ, is not at all approv'd of by them, for they must first be satisfy'd whether their Wife will have Children, of which they are very solicitous; whether she will be diligent in her daily Labour; and lastly, whether she will prove obedient before they will marry her. If they find her faulty in any of these Points, they immediately send her back again to her Parents. When the Fault proceeds from the Wife's side, the Husband must have the Present he made her restor'd; but when it happens on his part, he can recover nothing. Tho the Woman through any defect, either in Person or Behaviour, be return'd, yet is she not nevertheless look'd upon as the worse for it, but soon after generally undergoes another Trial. Being oblig'd by us to marry, when once they are become so, they will live so Christian-like and lovingly together, that the Wife would sooner suffer her self to be cut to pieces, than consent to defile her Husband's Bed. If it at any time happens otherwise, which I'm confident rarely does, the Adulterer is oblig'd to give the value of a Slave to the Husband of the Adulteress, and she is to go forthwith and beg her Husband's Pardon for the Wrong she has done him; otherwise if he comes to know of her Crime, he may easily obtain a Divorce. Such as are found to cohabit together without being lawfully marry'd, are fin'd so much of the Country Money as amounts to the Value of nine of our Crowns.

It must be observ'd, that the Father of the Bride, when he receives the Present for her, tho it be never so little, must not complain, for that would be no better than selling his Daughter. Wherefore to prevent such a Crime, all Men are tax'd by the Publick in those Matters how much they shall give, and which is always rated according to their Qualities and Conditions.

All that the Bride's Parents receive upon this Account, they look upon as due to them for maintaining their Daughter to the time of her Marriage; so that you may perceive he is to be esteem'd the richest Person here who has most Daughters.

A notable Abuse is this other, tho practis'd by the meaner sort of People, and Merol that but seldom. When a Man happens to draw near his End, who has taken a Woman for his Wife, but whom he had not yet married, to save returning the Portion, he leaves the Concubine to some Kinsman. To prevent the which, we have order'd that he who receives a Woman in that nature shall be ballin'd. One of these Negroes that had taken his Cousin to Wife, was once brought before me. This Person was of the better sort; but I thought the greater his Quality was, the greater would be the Scandal if I should let him go unpunish'd; and therefore having first us'd Admonitions to him, and finding them fruitless, I proceeded to Menaces; but all the effect they had was, that instead of quitting her, he made a new Present to her Father, and thereby insinuated that he had fulfill'd the Law. Hereupon I caus'd him to be again apprehended, together with his Spouse: and having made a short Sermon to them both, and the rest of the People, to shew the heinousness of this Crime, upon their further Obstinacy, I deliver'd them up to the People to be dealt with as they thought fit; who taking them into their custody, before they parted with them, severely scourg'd them both, and moreover depriv'd the Man of a certain Office he held, which brought him in great profit.

I said before, that Women would have experience of their Husbands before they marry'd them, in like manner as the Men were to have of them; and in this particular I can aver, that they are commonly much more obstinate or sickle than Men, for I have known many of these last that were willing to be marry'd, and the Women always hung back, and either fled away or made Excuses.

Amongst the many cases of this nature that hapned to me in my Mission, I shall relate only one more. Being call'd to confess a sick Woman that had a Daughter who liv'd with a Man upon trial; before I confess'd her, I told her, That I could not make her partaker of the benefit of Absolution, unless she withdraw her Daughter from the state of Sin she liv'd in, and obliged her to marry. To which the sick Woman readily answer'd, Father, I will never consent that my Daughter shall have occasion from me to curse me after I am dead, for obliging her to marry where she does not fancy. Then I reply'd, What, do you then stand more in awe of a Temporal, than an Eternal Curse? And at the same time call-

ling the Daughter to me, I demanded of her, If she would be willing that her Mother should go to Hell upon her Account? The Wretch hearing this, began immediately to tremble and weep, and calling her feign'd Husband to her, sware before me, that she would be sure to marry him the first Holy-day that came: And accordingly she did, for soon after going a fishing with her Husband, they hapned to have good luck, and therewith they solemniz'd their Nuptials. Hereupon I presently confess'd the sick Mother, and she not long after dy'd in Peace. Notwithstanding this, ~~some~~ obstinate Mothers have rather chosen to die unconfess'd, than to concern themselves with the Marriage of their Daughters.

The Oeconomy observ'd between Husband and Wife is as follows: The Man is oblig'd to procure a Habitation, to clothe his Wife according to her Condition, to prune the Trees, to grub up Roots from the Fields where there is occasion, and also to carry home the Palm-Wine to their House as often as it rises. The Woman on her part is to find Meat for her Husband and Children and therefore only they have the care of marketing. As soon as Rain comes, she goes into the Fields, and works till Noon, at which time she is to return home to get her Husband's Dinner. Being got ready, she sets it down before him, who sits only at Table, and who after he has satisfy'd himself, gives the rest to her, and she forthwith divides it between her self and Children. I should have told you also, that the Wives here wait on their Husbands at Table.

Another Abuse is, that when the Women are with Child, they clothe themselves from the Loins to the Knees, after the Country Fashion, with a sort of Rind taken off a Tree, which is like a coarse Cloth, and so neatly interwove, that it rather seems the Work of the Loom, than the Product of the Earth. This Tree is call'd Mirrone, the Wood whereof is very hard, the Leaves like those of the Orange-Tree, and every Bough sends down abundance of Roots to the Ground. It is generally planted near the Houses, as if it were the Tutelar God of the Dwelling, the Gentiles adoring it as one of their Idols: And in some places they leave Caiabashes full of Wine of the Palm-Tree at the foot of them, for them to drink when they are thirsty; nor do they dare tread upon its Leaves, any more than we would on the Holy Cross. But if they perceive any Branch broke, they no longer worship it, but presently take off the Bark, or Rind, whereof the Women with Child make those Garments, receiving them at the hands of the Wizards, who tell them, they ease the Burden of the great Belly, and cause them to be easily deliver'd. It is not to be imagin'd how careful the Women are of this Tree, believing it delivers them from all the Dangers that attends Child-bearing. Nevertheless understanding there was one in the Liberty of our Million, I went, well attended, and cut it down. The Woman it belong'd to ask'd, Why it was cut down? I told her I wanted it to cut into Planks; and she went into her House without speaking one word more.

The fourth Abuse is, That whilst their Children are young, these People bind them about with certain superstitious Cords made by the Wizards; who likewise teach them to utter a kind of Spell while they are binding them. They also at the same time hang about them Bones and Teeth of divers Animals, being Preservatives, as they say, against the Power of any Disease. Likewise there are some Mothers so foolish, that they will hang Agnus Dei's, Medals and Relicks to the aforesaid Cords. When these Women bring their Children to be christened, if we find any of these Cords about them, we presently order them to be stop'd in their Proceedings, and instead thereof to receive several Scourges on their Knees, till such time as they recant their Error. I will relate only one of the several Cases of this nature that hapned to me. A Woman came to me to have her Son baptiz'd, and who at the same time had the Magick Cord about his Waste: I immediately order'd the Mother to be whipp'd; but scarce had she receiv'd one stroke before she fell down on her Knees, and in great consternation directed her self to me after this manner: Father, pardon me, I beseech you, for the Love of God, because that my Child having had four of these Cords on, I took off three while we were upon the Road, and the fourth I design'd to take away as soon as I had opportunity, but forgot it. This caus'd great laughter in the Standers-by, but in me it rais'd an Effect of Pity of the simplicity of the Woman, insomuch that giving her only a smart Reproof, I sent her away unpunish'd.

The fifth is, That being to wean any one of their Children, the Father and Mother together lay him on the Ground; and whilst they do that, which Modesty will

will not permit me to name ; the Father lifts him by the Arm, and so holds him for some time hanging in the Air, falsely believing that by those means he will become more strong and robust. This Ceremony they call the lifting of a Child, and is in my opinion the most impudent and superstitious that could be imagin'd. These People moreover keep their young Children always naked upon the ground, to the end they may thereby grow hardy and active ; and scarce are they able to walk alone, but they tie a Bell about them, to give notice where they are to be found when they have stray'd.

Sixth Abuse is, that the Mothers are accustom'd to present their Infants to the Wizards as soon as born, that they may foretel what good or evil Fortune is likely to befall them : For this purpose the false Prophet takes the Child in his Arms, and turning and winding it about makes his pretended Observations upon the Muscles and other parts of its Body, and afterwards tells the Parents what he thinks fit. The same Observations are made upon sick Persons, to know what has been the occasion of their Diseases : If they happen to guess wrong, and the Patient comes to die, they never want for Excuses to clear themselves.

Seventhly, It is a custom that either the Parents or the Wizards give certain Rules to be inviolably observ'd by the young People, and which they call Chegilla : These are to abstain from eating either some sorts of Poultry, the Flesh of some kinds of wild Beasts, such and such Fruits, Roots either raw or boil'd after this or another manner, with several other ridiculous Injunctions of the like nature, too many to be enumerated here. You would wonder with what religious Observance these Commands are obey'd. These young People would sooner chuse to fast several days together, than to taste the least bit of what has been forbidden them ; and if it sometimes happen that the Chegilla has been neglected to have been given them by their Parents, they think they shall presently die unless they go immediately to receive it from the Wizards. A certain young Negro being upon a Journey, lodg'd in a Friend's House by the way : His Friend before he went out the next morning, had got a wild Hen ready for his Breakfast, they being much better than the tame ones. The Negro hereupon demanded if it were a wild Hen ? His Host answer'd, No : Then he fell on heartily, and afterwards proceeded on his Journey. About four years after these two met together again, and the aforesaid Negro being not yet married, his old Friend ask'd him, If he would eat a wild Hen ? To which he answer'd, That he had receiv'd the Chegilla, and therefore could not. Hereat the Host began immediately to laugh, enquiring of him, What made him to refuse it now, when he had eaten one at his Table about four years ago ? At the hearing of this the Negro immediately fell a trembling, and suffer'd himself to be so far possess'd with the Effects of Imagination, that he dy'd in less than 24 hours after.

Eighthly, the Maids have a Custom, that in what place soever they first have their Courses come upon them they must continue, tho without doors, till one of their Kindred comes to carry them into the House ; then they have two Maids and a separate Apartment assign'd them, where they must keep lock'd up for two or three Months together, and observe certain superstitious Ceremonies, such as not to speak to any Man, to wash so many times aday, to anoint themselves with Taculla, which is the Dust of a red Wood temper'd with Water, and the like. If they should not do this, they are of opinion that they should never be fit for Procreation, tho Experience shews them the contrary. This Superstition is by them call'd the Casket of Water or Fire.

On the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, I had a mind to preach a Sermon against these Practices ; and the better to move the People, I had before plac'd the Image in Relievo of this blessed Saint cover'd on the Altar with a Dagger stuck through her Breast, and which the Blood follow'd : This done, I began to discourse against those Women that observ'd the hellish Delusions before-mention'd, proving that they thereby not only offended their loving Saviour, but likewise did great Injury to his Immaculate Mother. At the same instant I drew aside the Curtain, and discover'd the Image, which the People perceiving so wounded and bloody, began immediately to relent, and broke out into the extremest Grief. Among the many present there was one Father of a Family that had a Daughter then shut up upon the foregoing account ; who returning home in a great Passion, fell upon both Wife and Daughter, and bang'd them to that degree, that they were glad to come immediately to our Church to be confess'd.

The ninth, and last Abuse is, That all the Fields of this Country being without

Merolla. Fences, their Owners to preserve their Corn plant about them several rows of Stakes, which being bound round with bundles of Herbs by the Wizards, they tell you will kill any such as shall offer either to rob or do them damage.

Laws and Ordinances. To remedy as much as possible all these Disorders, which for the most part are practis'd either by Women or Men of no Consideration, we have thought proper to issue forth the following Ordinances.

First; That all the Mani's or Governors either of Provinces or Cities, who are not lawfully married, shall be forthwith depriv'd of their Governments, to the end that they may not by their ill Examples withhold the common People from their Duty. To get this the better observ'd, we drew on our side all the principal Courtiers, whom we perswaded to marry their Wives without desiring to have any foregoing Experience of them. This pious Endeavour of ours through the Grace of God succeeded so well, that all that embrac'd it were esteem'd, and such as oppos'd it either despis'd or punish'd.

Secondly; That all the Women which were great with Child should be confess'd, and communicate oftner than they were wont to do, and especially such as were near their time; both whom we likewise enjoin'd to wear Religious Relicks instead of the Wizards Mats.

Thirdly; That all Mothers should make the Cords they bound their Infants with of Palm-leaves that had been consecrated on Palm-Sunday, and moreover guard them well with other such Relicks as we are accusom'd to make use of at the time of Baptism.

Fourthly; That all Fathers and Mothers should at certain times offer up their Children to God, and that in the Church before some Image of our Saviour.

Fifthly; That all Mothers after the Birth of their first-born should carry it to the Church, and perform the Ceremony, which is call'd entring into the holy Place; and if it be sick, we order'd its Mother to recommend it to the Lord, together with some sort of Vow.

Sixthly; That the Parents should enjoin their Children to observe some particular Devotion, such as to repeat so many times aday the Rosary or the Crown in honour of the blessed Virgin, to fast on Saturdays, to eat no Flesh a Wednesdays, and such things us'd among Christians.

Seventhly; Those Women that should be found shut up for the future on account of their Conception were to be scourg'd, and which was forthwith executed by order from the Count: But if through necessity they were oblig'd to keep up, then they were enjoyn'd only to repeat the Rosary on common days, and to hear Mass on all Feast-days.

Eighthly, and lastly; Whipping was likewise impos'd on all such as should rob, or otherwise do damage in any Field; and that instead of the Magick Guard their Owners had planted to preserve their Corn, and to render it fertile, they should make use of consecrated Palm-Branches, and here and there set the sign of the Cross. And further, to the end that all these Preservatives should be left standing at the time of reaping the Corn, we sent always a good company of our Scholars at that season with a Standard, to run over the fields, and see that all was in order; and also to back their Authority, we procur'd several of the Count's Sons and Relations to accompany them, who might warrant the pulling down any Spells or Inchantments which they should meet with in their way.

Being thus got into the spacious Fields of Sogno, let us take a view by the by of the Situations, Possessions, Habitations and manner of Living, and Clothing of those Ethiopians. The Earldom of Sogno is absolute, except only its being tributary to the Kingdom of Congo. It is a Peninsula bordering on the East upon Bamba, a Dutchy belonging to Congo, and divided from it by the River Ambrise: On the West and South it has the Ocean, and on the North it is bounded by the River Zaire, which divides the Christians from the Pagans of the Kingdom of Angoi, and is seated in the Torrid Zone, being only six degrees distant from the Equinoctial Line. It has several Islands in the Zaire, which are all inhabited by Christians. The Election of the Count is perform'd by nine Electors, who for the most part chuse a new one before the old one deceas'd is bury'd. During the interim of the Sede vacante (Vacancy of the Throne) a Child governs, who is obey'd by all as if he were their real Prince. As soon as the Election is made, we Missioners are acquainted with it by Order, to the end that if we approve of it we may publish it in the Church, otherwise the Election goes for nothing.

The Count being dead, the Countess Dowager (like the Queen Dowager of Congo) returns with her Children to her first Habitation, where she is to exercise no Dominion, but becomes a private Woman, man, only retaining a Privilege to take place next to the Countess-Regent. Sometimes it happens that there are three or four of these Countess-Dowagers living at a time, and that because the Women in this Country are much longer-liv'd than the Men, as also that it is lawful for nobody to marry these Countesses except the Successor only.

Their duty is to observe Continence strictly in their widow'd State; for if any of them should be prov'd guilty of Unchastity, they must either undergo Death by Fire, or the Sword. If either the Son, or any other Person of the Blood has a mind to succeed his Relation even in the life-time of the dying Prince, there commonly arise great Troubles to the State; for they generally by Factions get possession of the Throne, and exclude the Electors from doing their Duty. It is therefore that the Death of all Counts is always conceal'd as much as possible, insomuch that sometimes the blessed Sacrament has been forbore to be given them, for fear of discovering the occasion by the Priests going to Court.

It once happen'd that I was call'd to Court to comfort the indispos'd Count, but the Messenger it seems had a particular Order to conduct me by the most unfrequented Road. I went, and being come into the Count's Presence, after having receiv'd me with all the Civility imaginable, he demanded of the Courtier what People he had met by the way: He answer'd, only three or four, and nam'd them. After which, without any reply to him, he address'd himself to me, and discours'd of many things relating to my Mission. I knew such Discourse could not be the cause of his sending for me, and therefore after some time intreated his Highness to discover to me the occasion of it: He answer'd, The occasion of my sending for you, Father, was only to see you, and to delight my self with your Conversation. But as I was afterwards inform'd by a Person about him, his reason was to have some Remedy from me for his Indisposition; yet altho I had been above an hour with him, he had not the Courage to open his Mind to me, fearing lest even I should discover his Illness to be greater than it really was, and therefore the better to keep me in ignorance, he immediately caus'd himself to be lifted out of the Bed. My Companion soon after returning from his Mission in the neighbouring parts, found several dead Bodies in the Road, which we discovering to the Count, fearing it was by his Order they had been murder'd, he frankly own'd that they had been sacrific'd to the Interest of the State. We told him our sense of such Practices, and withal enjoin'd him a severe Penance for the Fact.

The Sons of the deceas'd Count remain likewise no more than private Gentlemen after his Death; and if their Father in his life-time has a mind to buy them any Estates, he must publish throughout his whole Dominions, that he has done it with his own Money, legally arising from his own Rents, otherwise his Children would run a risk to be depriv'd of their Possessions, as, for want of such a Proclamation, it has often happen'd they have been. The Counts have another way to leave Livelihoods to their Children or Friends, and that is by grubbing up Woods belonging to his Crown, and thereby reducing them to Arable Lands, which he is at liberty to grant as he thinks fit. This way we have likewise made use to subvert any Slave baptiz'd into our Church, and for whom we have beg'd some of this Land for him to cultivate to his own Profit.

The Count's Dominions are very large, and in which are many Cities call'd Banza, one of the principal of which is Chioua, but the greatest of all is the Banza of Sogno, where the Count resides. This Banza is always govern'd by one of the Count's near Relations or Friends, and who has only the Name of Governor, the rest having only the Title of Mani. There are likewise several Territories and Towns subject to these Cities, which are term'd by the Natives Libattas.

Every Governor or Mani on the Feast-Day of St. James is oblig'd to appear with all his People at the Banza of Sogno, to assist at the first Mass said there. If any one be any ways hinder'd from coming, he must send a Deputy in his room; which if he neglects to do, he will both lose his Employment, and pay a Fine besides.

On the same day every one is to pay Allegiance to the Prince after the following manner. In the great Market-place near our Convent a Throne is erected for the Count, who in the presence of all the People comes to receive Benediction from the Missioner, who attends for that purpose in the Church-porch: He afterwards exercises two feats of Arms. In the first, after the Custom of the Country, having on his Head a Crown of flowing Feathers, he makes use of a Bow and Arrows: In the other being adorn'd with a Hat with Plumes of Feathers on it, a Chain and Crofs of Gold about his Neck, to which is fix'd a long Rope of Coral which hangs down to his Knees, together with a short Scarlet Cloak, all embroider'd, on his Shoulders, with two open places to put out his Arms on each side, and several other fine things, he exercises with the Fuzee. In both these he is at the same time imitated by the People, who herein use the same Gestures and Motions they would do in case they were either to attack or defend themselves against their Enemy. As soon as the Count has ended his Exercise he goes to sit upon his Throne, which is prepar'd for him under a great Tree that stands on the South-side of the Market-place before-mention'd. After him the Captain-General having receiv'd the like Benediction with his Master, performs the same thing that he had done before him, and wherein he is also follow'd by all the People, with divers ways of Attacking, Retreating, and other Stratagems of War, call'd by the Nations Saschelari. As soon as he has done, he places himself on a high Seat cover'd with Leather, built up for him on the East-side of our Church: This he does, that he may both the better be seen, and observe the Military Exercises perform'd successively by the Electors and the Mani, each being as a Captain at the head of his Company, and who every one carry a Specimen of that which they are oblig'd to offer every year to the Count for the Subsistence of himself and Court. For Example; If they are to give Fish, they carry a couple of Fish ty'd together on the head of a Spear: If Oil, then they shew the Palm-fruit that produces it: If Flesh, they carry a Horn of some Beast; and sometimes I have seen a Man wrap'd about in a Cow's Skin to demonstrate that Duty. At the same time the Mani's dispose of the Syndicship to him that is most worthy, and remove such as have ill executed their Offices from their Employments. The great number of People met together from all parts to assist at this Ceremony, occasions us also a great deal to do during the space of fifteen days: for some apply themselves to us to be marry'd, others to confess themselves, and some to baptize their Infants. I think of these last, for my share I baptiz'd about two hundred and seventy two in one day. All the aforesaid Ceremonies being at an end, the People return home each to their own Country, but not without craving a Blessing from Father Missioner.

This Ceremony is begun on St. James's day, by reason that Apostle is look'd upon as the Patron and Protector of all these Parts, and that for having given a famous Victory to the King of Congo against the Idolaters on his day. The manner according to the common Reports was this.

Giovi, the first Christian King of Congo, being dead, Don Alphonso his Son, no less Heir to his virtuous Actions than Crown, succeeded him. Pansanguitima his Brother thinking his Title not good, because he had changed his Religion for the Christian Faith, in a short time rebell'd, and having no better Warrant than his Sword, mov'd against him with a numerous Army of Idolaters. Don Alphonso not a little surpriz'd at this Attempt, march'd out to meet him with a small number, trusting to the Merits of his Cause, and the Assistance of our Saviour: They soon came to a Battel, and tho the Idolaters were very numerous, yet were they immediately routed, and Pansanguitima himself wounded. After the Battel this Prince fled to a certain retir'd place in the Mountains, where being met with by some Blacks that were Christians, they seiz'd upon and took him Prisoner, and afterwards brought him bound before the King his Brother: The King seeing him in that condition, imbrac'd him with all the Bowels of a loving Brother, and being extremely concern'd to find him so desperately wounded both in Soul and Body, made it his utmost Endeavours to get him heal'd of both. But no Christian Charity was able to prevail upon the stubborn and obstinate Pagan Pansanguitima, who giving himself up altogether to Despair, would suffer neither Remedy nor Comfort, and so in a short time died. It did not so happen to his Lieutenant-General, for he having heard the dreadful Sentence of Death pronounced against him in case he did not turn Christian, chose rather to be baptiz'd than to die a Martyr to his former Opinion. Hereupon the King immediately caus'd his Bonds to be loos'd, and set him free, only enjoyning him this Penance, That for a certain time he should be oblig'd to bring Water for all such as were to be baptiz'd. Now upon report that St. James was visibly seen assisting at this Battel, he has ever since been receiv'd for the Patron of Congo and Angola, and some other Neighbouring Nations.

The Office of the Mani is to receive off the King's Revenue, and to employ Hus- the bandmen to manure the Crown-Lands when when the Rains have render'd them fit to till. At the time of reaping, these Officers reserve a certain part of the Corn for themselves, being their due, and a Perquisite annex'd to their Employ. As for the Administration of Justice, whether Civil or Criminal, it all belongs to them except in some particular Cases, reserv'd to be determin'd either by the Prince or his Delegates. The Parties in Law having joyn'd Issue to come to a Trial, the Plaintiff first urges his Reasons on his Knees before the Judge, who sits on a Carpet with a little Staff of Authority in his hand, and under the Canopy of a shady Tree, such as are wont to grow in the Great Mens Court-yards here. Sometimes the Judge hears Causes in a great Straw-Hut built for that purpose. When he has gravely given ear to all the Proofs the Plaintiff can bring, he proceeds in like manner to hear the Defendant: After which he calls for the Witnesses, and if they do not attend, the Cause must be put off to another day: If the Witnesses appear and give their Testimony, the Judge after having seriously weigh'd and consider'd the Proofs and Allegations of both Parties, proceeds to pronounce Sentence according to the Dictates of Nature and Reason, and not through any Knowledge of any kind of Laws. He that has Judgment pronounc'd in his favour, after having paid so much to the Judge's Box, extends himself all along with his Face to the ground, being a Posture whereby to demonstrate his Gratitude. When all is over, and the Plaintiff about to return home, his Friends and Relations begin to set up their Throats, repeating all the way to his House the Conqueror's Cause, and the Judgment pronounc'd in his favour. Being got home, he is oblig'd to treat those that had accompanied him, and sometimes scarce a night and day are sufficient to bound their Merriment: If the Cause be considerable, they commonly feast for three or four nights together with no small Charge to him that invites. All this while the unfortunate Person having had the Cause gone against him, remains silent and quiet, returning to his Habitation without the least Murmur or Ill-will.

There are other sorts of Feasts which are wont to be kept by the Blacks, such as upon the Birth-days of their Patrons, their Assumption to any Dignity, or the like: It is then that every one endeavours to make his Lord a Present suitable to his Capacity, and moreover assists at the common Solemnity besides.

Having thus given a short Sketch of some Feasts in use amongst these new Christians, I will likewise take a little notice of one of the Pagans of these Parts, and that especially upon the Birth-day of the Cassangi, the most potent Emperor of the Giagbi, with some other Particulars relating to his Dominions. What I am about to tell you was communicated to me by Father John Baptist da Salesano, a Friar of our Order, who accidentally happen'd to be in this Country on the day this Feast was solemnized. The Dominions of Cassangi are very considerable, not so much for their bordering upon the Kingdom of Matamba, as because of their continued Enmity with the Queen of Singa, a Friend to the Portugueses. This Queen has formerly been very serviceable to the Whites, but now they generally make use of the Assistance of another Prince of the Giagbi, call'd Calangola, as has been observ'd before. But to speak of the Feast made by the Cassangi. His Subjects being summon'd together, appear in a vast Body in some spacious Plain. After they are thus met, they gather themselves into a Ring, leaving a large Void in the middle, where there are several Trees: On the top of one of which they erect a sort of Scaffold capable to contain the Cassangi, with the chiefest of his Lords: Afterwards, at a convenient distance, they chain down to the Trunk of a Tree one of the fiercest Lions they can meet with. When all this is done, and the Emperor with his Court placed as aforesaid, the People begin to set up a huge Noise, which join'd with the untunable Discord of a great number of odd Musical Instruments, composes a hellish Harmony. After this a sudden sign is given for all to be hush and silent, and then the Lion is immediately loos'd, tho with the loss of his Tail, which is at the same whipp'd off to make him the more furious. At his first loosing he commonly stares about, and seeing himself at liberty, tho not altogether free, by reason of the multitudes that surround him, he immediately sets up a hideous Roar, and afterwards, being greedy of Revenge, rushes upon some part or other of the Company, where tearing one and rending another, he makes a fearful havock among them: All this while the People run round him unarm'd, being resolv'd either to kill him with their bare Hands, or to perish. At last the wild Beast, having been the death of a great number of his Assailants, is nevertheless forced Merolla. forced to yield to the pressing Crouds that gather on all sides about him; when the Lion is kill'd, they all greedily devour the dead Bodys; after which their Musick begins again, and so they return singing and dancing, and crying aloud, Long live our Cassangi, Long live our Cassangi, to their Emperor's Palace, where being afterwards treated by him, they at length return with great Joy to their own Homes.

Missioners. Now let us leave the Giaphi, and return to speak further of Sogno. To maintain this Country in its due Obedience to the Christian Faith no small number of Priests is necessary. In former times there have been a Father, Superior, and six Missioners all at once. In my time there was only I and one Companion: The means we made use of to make these People live well has been hinted at before; what remains is to inform you, that as soon as any Missioner is arriv'd in any City, the Mani, or Governor thereof, at night when all the Inhabitants are retir'd to their Houses, publishes a Proclamation to acquaint the People, that a Missioner is come thither, and that they must all appear before him to have their spiritual Necessities reliev'd, and continue so long with him as such a business will require. If the Mani himself appear negligent in this, or occasion any manner of Disturbance, he will receive a deserved Punishment, for we make it our business to get such a Person remov'd from his Employment even within his year.

Wizards. At my first going out on my Mission, I found near a City call'd Tubii a place where the Wizards practised their Sorceries. No doubt Providence directed me to discover this Hellish Trade; for whilst I was walking along, I saw a large white Bird flying before me, such as I had never seen before in these parts; my Curiosity led me to have a nearer view of it, and in order thereto I follow'd it into a thick and shady Grove somewhat dark, at the end whereof I observ'd a large heap of Earth in form like a Tomb, with a great number of Arches and Calabashes at the top, and at both ends. Being pretty well assur'd what this was, I presently sent for the Mani, who came trembling to me, and protested he knew nothing of the matter; I commanded him to inform himself then, and to get me the Wizard speedily seiz'd: He said he would, but I not caring to trust to his diligence, returned the next night to the same place, expecting to have found the Wizard there; but he it seems having been acquainted with my Proceedings, took care to disappoint me by running away, as they all do as soon as they hear we make any search after them. Then I order'd the Mani, that within ten days time he should grub up and level all that place, which he nevertheless disobey'd me in; whereupon I caus'd him to be summon'd before the Count in our Convent, where after a severe Reprimand I commanded him to discipline (scourge) himself in the middle of our Church during the whole time that I was celebrating of Mass, adding withal several other Punishments in case he did not level the said Grove at his return home.

The Churches for the most part are Chur. built here with Boards, and ours, as exceed- and ing the rest, was capable of holding five hundred Persons. In the Banza of Sogno there were five other Churches, in one of which the Counts were always buried, and another was the Chappel Royal. The Houses are generally thatch'd, and the four sides of them are fenc'd with Palm-branches, or Leaves interwoven not contemptibly with each other: The Floors are of Loam well beat and hardened, and the Roofs and Cielings made of those Rushes we are us'd to bottom Chairs withal. The Lord's House is of a quadrangular form likewise, and built with Boards, but the Front is always painted with a sort of colour that issues out of the plain'd Wood: The like any of the Gentry may have, if they can obtain leave from their Lords. Within these Houses are hung with a sort of Olier Mats variously colour'd, but we Capuchins are wont to have ours done with Rushes, as more warm in Winter.

The Count's Habit differs according The C. to the several Feasts, and sometimes on Habit other occasions: His ordinary wear is a Vest of Straw-Cloth girt close about him, but of such Workmanship as may be only worn by him, or by those that he thinks fit to honour with that Privilege. This Vest hangs down to the ground, as does likewise a long Bays Cloak he wears over it on his bare back. On Feast-days he changes this Cloak for a short Scarlet one fring'd all round with the same Cloth pink'd. On the most solemn Days he puts on a Shirt of the finest Linen, as likewise yellow or Crimson Silk Stockings, and a Cloak of flower'd Silk, which bears the Name of the Spring. When he comes to communicate with us at the Altar, he has a Cloak all white, and which drails along upon the Pavement as he walks. When the Count comes to Church, which which is at least three times a week, he has a Velvet Chair and Cushion carry'd before him, being brought himself in a Net, on the Shoulders of two Men, each with a Commander's Staff in his hand, one all Silver, and the other only of Ebony tipp'd: The Hat the Count then wears is cover'd first with Taffety, and next with a sort of very fine Feathers: On his Head he generally wears likewise a little silk stitch'd Cap, which can be worn only by him and some few others. Before him marches one Musician above the rest, who has several little round Bells fix'd to an Iron two spans long, where with he gingles, and chants to it the Glory and Grandure of his Lord: Besides this there are several other sorts of Musical Instruments made use of at Festivals, the principal whereof are those which in the Country Language have the Name of Embuchi, which I mention first because they belong only to Kings, Princes, and others of the Blood-Royal. These are a sort of Trumpets made of the finest Ivory, being hollow'd throughout in divers pieces, and are in all about as long as a Man's Arm; the lower Mouth is sufficient to receive one Hand, which by contracting and dilating of the Fingers forms the Sound; there being no other holes in the Body as in our Flutes or Hautboys. A Concert of these is generally six or four to one Pipe. The Longa (which is made of two Iron Bells join'd by a piece of Wire Arch-wise) is sounded by striking it with a little stick: Both these are carry'd also before Princes, and that especially when they publish their Pleasure to the People, being us'd as the Trumpet is with us. The Instrument most in request us'd by the Abundi, being the People of the Kingdom of Angola, Matamba, and others, is the Marimba; it consists of sixteen Calabashes orderly plac'd along the middle between two side-boards join'd together, or a long frame, hanging about a Man's Neck with a Thong. Over the Mouths of the Calabashes there are thin sounding slips of red Wood call'd Tanilla, a little above a span long, which being beaten with two little sticks, returns a sound from the Calabashes of several sizes not unlike an Organ. To make a Concert, four other Instruments are play'd upon by as many Musicians, and if they will have six they add the Cassuto, which is a hollow piece of Wood of a lofty tone about a yard long, cover'd with a Board cut like a Ladder, or with cross slits at small distances; and running a stick along, it makes a sound within which pass'es for a Tenor: The Base to this Concert is the Quilando, made of a very large Calabash, two spans and a half or three in length, very large at one end, and ending sharp off at the other, like a taper Bottle, and is beaten to answer the Cassuto, having Cuts all along like it. This Harmony is grateful at a distance, but harsh and ungrateful near at hand, the beating of so many Sticks causing a great Confusion.

Another Instrument of this Concert is that which the Natives call Njambi, and which is like a little Gittar, but without a head, instead whereof there are five little bows of Iron, which when the Instrument is to be tun'd, are to be let more or less into the Body of it. The Strings of this Instrument are made of the Thread of Palm-Trees: It is play'd on with the Thumbs of each Hand, the Instrument bearing directly upon the Performer's Breast. Tho the Musick of this Instrument be very low, it is nevertheless not ungrateful.

Over and above the great Drums us'd in the Army, there are another sort of a lesser size, call'd Ncamba; these are made either of the Fruit of the Tree call'd Aliconda, or else of hollow'd Wood with a skin over one end only: They are commonly made use of at unlawful Feasts and Merry-makings, and are beaten upon with the Hands, which nevertheless makes a noise to be heard at a great distance. When the Missioners hear any of these at night, they immediately run to the place in order to disturb the wicked Pastime. It fell often to my lot to interrupt these Hellish Practices, but the People always ran away as soon as ever I came up to them, so that I could never lay hold on any to make an Example of them. The Giaghi not only make use of these Drums at Feasts, but likewise at the infernal Sacrifices of Man's Flesh to the Memory of their Relations and Ancestors, as also at the time when they invoke the Devil for their Oracle.

But to return to the Count's Habit. ^{More of the Count's Habit.} From his Neck to his Knees there commonly hang several strings of Purple Coral, together with a large Chain of the finest Gold, having a Mally Cross just before his Breast to demonstrate, his being a Christian: On his Wrists he generally wears Bracelets of high-priz'd Corals, and on all solemn days Chains of Gold of the finest Workmanship: His Fingers are almost always cover'd with Rings.

Merolla. Rings: He generally goes in Slippers instead of Shoes. There are commonly carry'd before him two Umbrella's of Peacocks Feathers, and two others of Straw, both being fix'd to the tops of long Poles: He has likewise two Horses Tails along with him, wherewith to drive away the Flies, altho seldom any come near him. Those of his Followers who are employ'd in these Offices, are commonly his greatest Favourites or Relations. While Mass is saying, at the reading of the Gospel he has a lighted Torch presented to him, which having religiously receiv'd, he gives to one of his Pages to hold till the Consummation be over, and when the Gospel is done he has the Mass-Book given him to kiss. On Festival Days he is twice incens'd with the Censor, and at the end of the Mass he is to go to the Altar to receive Benediction from the Priest, who laying his Hands upon his Head while he is kneeling, pronounces some pious and devout Ejaculations. Whilst the Priest that officiates goes out to put off his Vestments, the Count in like manner retires to his private Orizons: Afterwards he enters into the Vestry to pay his Respects to the Missioner, who receiving him courteously, accompanies him back as far as the door of the Church. As soon as he is come out, he falls on his Knees again, and the People all standing round about him give themselves several Cuffs on the Ear as a token of their Fidelity, according to the Custom of their Country, and he makes them a sign with his Fingers to signify his satisfaction. At his coming out of the Church on the principal Feast-days, he commonly practises some Warlike Exercise; and on those of less consideration either the Captain-General performs that part for him, or else his Courtiers entertain themselves with dancing to the aforesaid Musical Instruments. On all the most solemn Feasts Mass is sung by us and our Interpreters to the Glory and Honour of God, after which the Count's Guards which he brings along with him give a Volley of Musquet-shot, with Drums beating, and other Musick.

Martial Exercise.

*Habits of
and Gentry.*

The Captain-General and the Governors, or Mani's, have all their places severally assign'd them in the Church to prevent any Disputes: The Noblemen have Carpets allow'd them to kneel on, but no Cushions, that Honour being wholly reserv'd for the Countess to sit on. The Habits of the Nobility and Gentry are as follows: The Gentry have a kind of Straw Garment on their Shoulders, which reaches down to their Wastes, curiously wrought, with their Arms coming out at two slits, and ends in two Tossels which hang down on their right side. About their Waist they have a Cloth girt, which on one side hangs down to the ground: On their Heads those alone who have that Honour allow'd them, wear a wrought Silk Cap neatly quilted. The Noble Women have a sort of Straw Petticoat call'd Modello, which reaches to their Middles: From the Waste upwards to their Breasts they have a piece of Cloth which they bring twice about them, and that which goes about a second time they wrap about their Head like a Veil in the Church. Both Men and Women generally appear with long Pipes in their mouths snoaking. The Vulgar of both Sexes have only a Cloth about their Loins, which reaches no farther than their Knees. In the Inland Parts it suffices that they cover only what Modesty requires should be hid. Within doors they generally go stark naked, being accusom'd so to do in regard to the excessive heat that torments them for nine Months together, not enjoying the least fresco, only during the Months of June, July and August.

The manner of their cultivating the Earth in this Country is such, that they make use neither of the Plough nor Spade. When the Clouds begin to afford the least moisture, they are accusom'd to prepare for the Rain by gathering up the scorch'd Herbs and Roots into heaps, and afterwards setting them on fire upon the Land: Then as soon as the first Shower is fallen, they proceed to turn up the ground with a slight How, call'd by them Lzegè, which is fix'd to a Handle about two spans long: With this they cut into the Earth with one hand, and with the other scatter the Seed which they have always ready in a Bag by their sides. Now the business of manuring the Ground belonging solely to the Women in this Country, they are almost always forc'd to carry their Children upon their Backs in Swathing-rolls, thereby to prevent their being either infested with, or devour'd by the great number of Insects that come out of the Earth upon this occasion; for at home they do not care to leave them, out of an extraordinary love and fondness they have for them. The same they are wont to do when they carry any Burden, for then they have a sort of Hammock which comes about one Shoulder, wherein they secure their Children from any danger either

These People sow in March, and if the Heavens prove favourable in affording them Rain, they may gather in their Harvest in June. The Seed they sow is of various sorts of Pulse, for the most part unknown to us; but those we are acquainted with, are Indian Wheat, and a kind of little Kidney-Beans call'd Ncas-se.

Amongst many others they esteem, are the Mandois, which grow three or four together like Vetches, but under ground, and are about the bigness of an ordinary Olive. From these Milk is extracted, like to that drawn from Almonds (in Italian Mandois) and whence, for ought I know, they had their Name. There are another sort of ground Pulse call'd Incumbe, which also grows under ground, is like a Musket-Ball, and very wholesom and well-tasted. Amongst these I and others have often found Nutmegs, perhaps fallen from the Trees, the use of which is altogether unknown to these People. There are some wild ones found, which they call Neubanzampuni.

They also have a sort of Roots call'd Bataras, which being roasted, taste much like Chestnuts. Their Mandioca is a Root, which being bruised as small as Rice, is not made into Bread, but is either eaten raw, or else soften'd in Broth. This Plant casts no Seed, and therefore the way to propagate it, is by breaking off a Branch and burying it in the Ground, where it will soon spread and flourish.

This sort of Food is more us'd by the Portugueses than Blacks, either because they have a better way of planting these Roots, or by reason that they will last several Years. There is another sort us'd instead of Bread, made with sodden Roots, which is call'd Gnamn, and is very different from the foregoing both in form and kind.

The Ouuanda, a sort of Pulse not unlike Rice, grows upon a Shrub, and will last two or three Years, and which every six Months propagates it self in great abundance.

The Pulse Ncanza brought from Brazil, is exceeding white, and holds great similitude with the Indian Beans, whence the Portugueses give it the name of Brazil Beans.

Cangula, another sort of Pulse, is greatly esteemed by the Blacks, but little valued by us Europeans. Mampunni, or Maiz, is much like Indian Wheat.

Massa Mamballa shoots up in Stalks about the height of our Wheat; to which it is not unlike both in Ears and Whiteness; it yields a white Flower, and is less offensive to some Stomachs than others.

The Seed of the Herb Massango greatly resembles that of our Hemp.

The Plant Asely runs up as high as a Halbert, its Ears not unlike our Millet: It gives the Gripes or Cholick to those that are not accustomed to eat of it.

The Luuu may be preserved many Years: Its Ear is triangular; its Grain like unto that of Millet; its Colour Red, and its Substance no way prejudicial to health.

Of those Plants that grow but little above-ground, the most in esteem is the Ananas; its Leaves are like those of Aloes, and its Fruit greatly resembles Pine-Apples, and differs from them only in that these are Yellow, and when ripe all Pulp: On the top of this Fruit there grows a Tuft of Leaves, which being taken off and planted, produces a new Plant. When this Fruit is ripe, it exceeds the Melon in Lusciousness; but if you cut it green, it presently dries up and consumes.

Concerning Fruit-Trees, setting aside the Nicesi, Banane and Mamai, which I have already describ'd when I spoke of Brazil; here are not a few of other kinds, whereof the most valu'd is that which bears the name of the Count. The Fruit of this Tree is not unlike the Giant Pear, and has but an ordinary Out-side, tho inwards it is as white as Milk. Its Seed is like to a Bean, and its Juice is so exceeding pleasant, that it is commonly given to sick People to recover their Tasts. About the Mountains of Congo I have seen several of these Trees that grow wild. The Cashin Fruit is much larger than an Apple, and when ripe is plentifully beautify'd with Yellow and Crimson. From its Core it throws out another Fruit of a dusky Colour, which being roasted in the Fire, tastes like a Chestnut; and is naturally hot, tho the other be mild and refreshing.

The Guaivas are a Fruit not unlike Pears: They have short Stalks, are Yellow without, and Carnation within; and they would be more in request were their Seeds, which stick close to the Pulp, not quite so hard.

The Chichere are a sort of Plums like to those the Italians call Cascavelle, which being a little eager, are given to People in Fevers.

Merolla. The Plant Colas affords various kinds of Fruit; which being inclos'd, as it were, in a Crimfon Purse (its Husk) is much valu'd by the Portugueses, inso-much that whenever they meet any Lady in the Street whom they design to honour, they presently offer her some of these Fruit; they say that chewing it makes Water drink pleasant.

Palm-Trees. Palm-Trees here are of different kinds: Those esteemed the most, are such as produce both Oil and Wine. These are to be seen thinly planted up and down in the Fields. The Oil they have is got from the Fruit which grows in Clusters, but so close that they seem to be all one piece. These Clusters are so large, that a very strong Man must not pretend to carry above one or two of them. In the Language of the Country they have the name of Cachij, and their Seeds, or Stones, whereof they have a great number, are call'd Embe. From these which are like a Date, being pounded small with hot Water, they extract an Oiliness, which they make use of as we do of our Oil.

Wine. At certain times of the Year the Natives ascend these Palm-Trees, by help of a Hoop, to tap the Wine: The manner of doing which is thus; Wherever they perceive any Flower blown, they presently whip it off with a Knife, and thrust the Stalk into a very large Calabash call'd Capaffo, which they cover and fasten to the Tree. When this is done they leave it, and in a short time have their Bottle full of Liquor as white as Whey. This they let stand to purge it self for about a day after they have taken it down, which it will always do to that degree, that its Fermentation seems rather to be rais'd by a good Fire, than any natural Heat. When this is over, they rack it off the Lee, and there remains a perfect taste of Wine, call'd by them Melaffo, which often makes the Blacks drunk. They are oblig'd to drink it soon after, for in three days time it will turn to Vinegar, and in four coagulate and stink. The nature of this Tree is principally hot, tho it produces Oil as well as Wine, which is naturally cold, and every body knows will congeal like Butter.

There is another sort of Wine call'd Embett, of a colder nature, drawn much after the same manner from another sort of Palm-Tree; but this Tree generally yields a greater quantity, and is planted on the side of a River, and no where else. The Tree is call'd Matome.

In those Countrys where these Palm-Trees that produce Wine do not grow, the People have artificial ways of procuring it. For this end they let Inda Wheat soak in Water for some time, in like manner as we do Wheat to make Starch of. This they afterwards take out, and having well beaten and press'd it, they put the Liquor into a Pot, whence it is after a while drawn off into another, and then they drink it with a great deal of pleasure. This Liquor they call by the name of Guallo.

There is another kind of Palm call'd Tamgra, which bears a Fruit like Olives; but these having little or no taste, generally fall to the share of the Apes and Monkeys. Another sort there are, whose Fruit are long strings of little Balls extremely hard; which nevertheless, after they are pounded and mixed with the Poulder of the Engalla, or wild Boats Teeth, compose a wonderful Cordial. These Trees are call'd Mateba.

That Palm which is very like the Matome, if it be not the same, affords a sort of Thred from its Leaves, whereof the Natives weave Cloth. Its smallest Branches being both smooth and pliant, serve to make travelling Nets of, and which the better sort of Blacks, but especially we Whites, use for that purpose. Of the greater Branches, both they and we commonly build our Houses.

The Fruit of the Tree call'd Mabocche, is not unlike our Oranges: They are exceeding round, and having very tough Rinds. Within they have several Seeds like unto those in Pomegranats but plac'd more confusedly: The Taste of them is so very pleasant and delightful, being somewhat inclin'd to the sharp, that they are commonly given to Persons that lie sick of Fevers to rectify and refresh their Palats. Of these there are two sorts, the greater and the lesser; but by how much the latter must yield in Bulk, by so much it for the most part gains in Perfection.

The Donno-Tree has its Bark only to boast of, being in virtue and fragrancy not much unlike to our Cinnamon. Altho this Country has not the Plant Garlick it self, yet has it nevertheless a Tree, whose Wood not only smells like it, but has its taste also, and moreover is commonly made use of after the same manner.

The Aliconde is a Tree immensurably great; within the Cavity of whose Trunk, it being generally hollow at the bottom, Hogs are commonly kept from the

the Sun. The Fruit of it is very like to our Pumpions, with a Stalk about the bigness of a man's Finger, and in length ^{about} two or three foot. The use of the Shells of these Fruit, is commonly either for Vessels or Bottles. The inner Rind of this Tree being well soak'd and beaten, yields a sort of matter to spin, much more durable and finer than our Hemp, and which is made use of here for that purpose. Cotton here is to be gather'd in great abundance, and the Shrubs it grows on are so prolifick, that they never almost leave sprouting.

Having thus spoken of divers Plants and Fruit-Trees of the least note, I will proceed to describe others of both kinds, that have Physical Virtues ascrib'd to them.

Amongst these the Tree Angariaria has the first place: Either the Wood or Root of this Tree is said to be good to drive away any pains in the side, occasion'd by the Stone, Gravel, or the like; but however the most efficacious part of it is its Fruit, which is not unlike to our Acorn. Hence it comes to pass, that no Disease of this kind was ever known to have continu'd long in these parts.

Another Tree of Medicinal Virtue is the Chisecco, any part of which being reduc'd to Pouder, and mix'd with Water, is good against Fevers; and being apply'd either to the Forehead or Temples of the sick Person, infallibly prevents his Fainting.

The Chicongo, a Tree likewise, has a purgative Power attributed to it.

What is most surprizing, is the nature of the Tree Mignamigna, which produces Poison in one part, and its Antidote in another: If any Person be poison'd either by the Wood or Fruit, then the Leaves serve to cure him; and if he be poison'd by the Leaves of them, then he must have recourse either to the Fruit or Wood: The Fruit of this Tree is like a little Lemon.

Our old Lay-Brother Leonard, whom I have had often occasion to mention in this Relation, and who had liv'd in this Country many and many Years, told me he had seen there, Plants of Storax, Gum-Benjamin, and Cassia; but that neither of them were held in any esteem by the Blacks.

As to Pepper, what I have to say is only this; Being one day grievously tormented with Wind, I ask'd a Noble Negro, If he could not help me to a Remedy? He answer'd, Yes; and immediately fetch'd me some Pepper. I took it according to his Prescriptions, and receiv'd Merolla Relief. I afterwards demanded of him, Whence that came? He told me, It was brought from a Wood just out of the Count's Dominions. And doubtless there are many other excellent Products in these Parts, which for want of being sufficiently known, lose their esteem.

I should have told you before, that Oranges & Lemons within the Dominions of Sogno, there are many excellent Lemons; and wherewith one particular Island so abounds, that there are no other Trees to be found in it except here and there an Orange-Tree. In the way to Singa you meet with vast Woods of Orange-Trees, which go by the name of Portugal, but rather deserve that of China, for their thin Rinds, and luscious Pulps.

As to Birds, this Country has two Birds sorts like ours, which are Sparrows and Turtles: The first of which, in time of Rain, change their Colour to Red, tho they afterwards return to what they were of before, which is usual with other sorts of Fowl. Here are also Eagles, but to say the truth, not so large as I have seen elsewhere. I have moreover observ'd divers kinds of Parrots here, which were very different from those of Brazil. The Crows of this Country are white upon their Breasts, and on the top of their Wings, but Black every where else like ours of Europe.

Pelicans are often to be met with as you travel to Singa: They are all over Black, except on their Breasts, which Nature has adorn'd with a kind of Flesh-colour like to that of the Neck of a Turkey. Whether this be the true Pelican, or not, which Naturalists say feeds her Young with her own Blood, and at the expence of her Life, I shall not undertake to determine.

Father Francis da Pavia, my Companion into these Parts, through his long Experience has inform'd me, that whilst he was on a Journey to Singa, he observ'd certain large white Birds, with long Beaks, Necks, and Feet, which whenever they heard the least sound of an Instrument, began immediately to dance and leap about in the Rivers where they always resided, and whereof they were great Lovers: This, he said, he took great Pleasure to contemplate, and continued often for some time upon the Banks of the Rivers to observe.

There are another sort of Birds so exceeding white and fine, especially in their Tails, that the White Ladys buy them up at any rate to adorn themselves with. Merolla. There are divers other kinds of Birds, and Fowl, which for brevity sake I omit speaking of.

Concerning these and other Birds building their Nests, I observ'd that Sparrows, and such-like little Birds, built them after the form of our Swallows-Nests. The Materials they make use of, are for the most part the Thred of Palm-Leaves, which they draw out thence with their Beaks, and afterwards carry to the place where they design to build. The manner of their building is round a slender Bough, whereby when the Wind blows, their Young are rock'd about in their Nests, like Children in their Cradles.

The greater sort of Birds build, either on the Top, in the Trunk, or on the thorny Boughs of the Tree call'd Majuma. The Prickles of this Tree are exceeding hard, and its Fruit something resembles a green Citron; and which when open'd throws forth a wonderful fine Wool, (no Silk finer, softer, nor cooler) whereof are commonly made Pillows and Bolsters for sick People.

Of wild Hens I have spoken in another place, and here I again affirm, that they are in this Country much better tasted, and more beautiful than the tame ones. The same I have to say of the Partridges, which are much like to ours, but neither of which are any ways valu'd by the Natives, and therefore they seldom or never look after them.

But among all the winged Inhabitants of this Climat, none pleas'd me so much as that little Bird describ'd by Father Cavazzi in his Historical Descriptions, Book 1. Pag. 50. Numb. 153. This Bird, not much unlike a Sparrow, at first sight seems wholly black, but upon a nearer view may be discover'd to be of a kind of blue. As soon as Day breaks, he sets up his Notes and sings; but the excellency of his Song is, that it harmoniously, and almost articulately, pronounces the Name of Jesus Christ; which repeated by many of them in concert, is a Heavenly Musick worthy our special observation, seeing those Heathen Nations excited to own the True God by irrational Creatures. They are excited by the Heavens forming a Cross of Stars under the Zone, which many have describ'd, and I beheld; they are excited by the Mountains, which have the Cross carv'd on them, as has been said, without knowing by whom; they are excited by the Earth, which draws the Crucifix on its Fruit call'd the Nicefo, as we have observ'd. In fine, these little Angels excite them with their Voices, yet all these things are of little force to move the harden'd Hearts of those Gentiles.

It is a wonderful Bird mention'd by our Father Coprani, in his Cambr. Illust. whose Song consists of these plain words, Va dritto, that is, Go right. Nor is there less to be admir'd in another Bird in these parts, and particularly the Kingdom of Matamba, which as Travellers are on their way, harmoniously sings, Vuichi, Vuichi, which in the Language of the Blacks signifys, Hony, Hony; and skipping from one place to another, rest upon the Tree where the Hony is, that the Passengers may take it, and the Bird feed on what remains. But it sometimes falls out, that following the Cry of the Bird, the Passenger falls into the Clutches of some Lion that lies hid, and so meets his Death instead of Hony; therefore when the Bird crys, if he sees not the Hony, they are aware of the hidden Lion, and fly in time.

Among the variety of numerous Quadrupeds, the most wonderful are the Elephants, being, as it were, living and moving Mines of most curious white Ivory, whereof so great a Trade is made; but these being vulgarly known to all Persons, I will give no other account but only of the manner of killing them.

When these Beasts are gathered together in a Herd, the Hunter anointing himself all over with their Dung, gets in sily with his Lance in his hand among them; there does he creep about from one to t'other, under their Bellys, till he sees an opportunity to strike any of them under the Ear, by which Wound they are easy to be brought to the ground. After the stroke given, the Hunter takes immediate care to escape, before the Beast can well turn about to revenge himself; and the other Beasts being deceiv'd by the smell of their Dung, take no notice of his crying out, and flouncing, supposing it to be only one of their Young. By these means the rest of the Herd walking on, and forsaking their falling Companion, leave him a Prey to the successful Hunter. If the wounded Elephant happens to pursue his Assaulter, he can easily baffle him, by taking to many Roads, for it is a very difficult thing for this Beast to turn his Body so often as such a dodging would require. The Negroes are wont to distil a Water by the Sun from the Bones of this Animal's Legs, which is held to be good against Asthmas, Sciaticas, or any cold cold Humors. Some of the Pagans of these parts, particularly the Giaghi, have a kind of Devotion for the Tail of this Beast; for when any one of their Captains or chief Lords comes to die, they commonly preserve one of these Tails in memory of him, and to which they pay a sort of Adoration, out of an opinion they have of its great strength. For the sake of cutting off these Tails only, they often undertake this hunting; but which amputation must be performed at one blow, and from a living Elephant, or their Superstition will allow it no Virtue.

No Beast of Prey suff'rd. In this Country of Sogno there are no Lions, Tigers, nor Wolves to be met with; which nevertheless other Parts of this side of Africa are not exempt from. When any of these Beasts, especially Tigers, happen to enter the Count's Dominions, he that first discovers them is oblig'd to go immediately to a Governor, or Mani, and acquaint him therewith: Whereupon an Alarum is presently beat to raise the Country; and the People being so rais'd, forthwith apply all their Endeavours, whether by Shouts, Drums, or Instruments of War, to force the Beast into the open Field. After they have got him there, they single out one among them to assault him; which the Person pitch'd upon performs, with a sharp long Knife in one hand, and a slight manageable Shield in the other. As often as the Beast leaps at him, the Combatant receives his Attempts on his Shield; till at last taking his opportunity, he whips off one or more of his Legs with his Knife, whereby the Beast being disabled, easily becomes a Victim to the Conqueror's Fury. The Royal Lions, so call'd for their generosity, carry themselves with Majesty, and do no hurt unless provok'd by some accident.

Wild Dogs and Wolves. In Sogno there are a sort of wild Dogs, who going out to hunt in great numbers, whenever they met with any Lion, Tiger, or Elephant in their way, set upon him with that fury, that they commonly bring him to the ground, tho they lose never so many of their Company by the Attempt. These Dogs, notwithstanding their wildness, do little or no damage to the Inhabitants. They are red-hair'd, have small slender Bodys, and their Tails turn up upon their Backs like a Grey-hound's.

The Wolves that sometimes infest these Parts, are so very subtil, that they will scratch through the Walls of the Houses built here with Palm-leaves, on purpose to come at the People, whom having found, they immediately devour or tear to pieces. A certain Woman once happening to go a little further from her House than ordinary, left her Child within asleep: Whilst she was gone, a Wolf broke in, and lay down close by the Child that was asleep. The Mother coming soon after, went in to feed her Child, and spy'd the Wolf; who seeing himself discover'd, immediately fled.

At some Huntings there have been taken in this Country both wild Men and Women: Which to confirm, Father Leonard once told me, that before my coming thither there had been one of that kind presented to a Frier of our Order, which was again bestow'd by him on the Portuguese Governor of Loanda.

Monkeys there are here of divers kinds; such as the Baboons, which are the largest sort; another kind Party-colour'd as big as a Cat; and a third sort least of all, which nevertheless like the others have all Tails longer than their Bodys.

Here are likewise great numbers of wild Goats, and many wild Boars are to be found in the Woods. The tame Goats of this Country are so exceeding fertile, that they will bring forth three or four young ones at once.

The Sheep here do not produce Wool, but Hair; neither are the Rams furnished with Horns as with us, nor are the Ewes so fruitful as the Goats before-mention'd. Goats-flesh is in much greater esteem in these parts than Mutton, and therefore the Natives chuse rather to geld their young Goats than their Lambs.

Serpents are not in the least wanting here; those seen by me of greatest note, were the Copras, a sort of Serpents whose Poison is in their Foam, which tho at a great distance they spit into the Eyes, and cause such grievous pains, that unless there be some Woman by at the same time, to assuage the Pains with her Milk, the Party will become immediately blind. These climb about in the Houses and Trees night and day.

There are another sort of Serpents, as I have been told, in this Country, which as soon as they are molested by any Traveler, will leap upon him, and twining themselves round about his Body, fix a sharp Sting they have in their Tails into his Breast, whereby he soon bursts and expires. The name of this Serpent is Embambe, and the way the Natives have to cure themselves of his Wound, and save save their Lives, is by cutting him in two with a Knife, which they carry about them for that purpose, as soon as ever he has enter'd his Sting.

More memorable Matters.

But from hence let us proceed to give an account of more memorable Matters. In the second Year of my Mission I was forc'd to do my Duty for some time alone, by reason that our Superior being dead, my Companion Father Joseph was advanc'd to that Dignity, and was gone to reside in the Kingdom of Angola. At the same time the most Reverend Cardinal Cibo writ us a Letter in the name of the Sacred College, complaining, That the pernicious and abominable Abuse of selling Slaves, was yet continued among us, and requiring us to our power to remedy the said Abuse; which notwithstanding we saw little hopes of accomplishing, by reason that the Trade of this Country lay wholly in Slaves and Ivory. Nevertheless meeting together not long after, we join'd our Addres'ses to the King of Congo, and Count of Sogno, and obtain'd the Favour from them, that the Hereticks at least should be excluded from dealing in this Merchandize; and that especially the English, who made it their chief business to buy Slaves here, and to carry them to Barbadoes an Island of theirs in the West-Indies, where they were to be brought up in the Protestant Religion, so very contrary to ours. This Letter was first read by me to the Count, and afterwards on a least-day I made the Contents of it known to the People, earnestly recommending to them, to have a compassionate regard to so many miserable Creatures, their Countrymen, that were daily suffer'd to come under the Power of Hereticks, that would not only enslave them, but likewise pervert the good Principles we had instill'd in them. I moreover urg'd, That if there were a necessity for a Trade of this kind, they should sooner have to do with the Hollanders, who were oblig'd to deliver so many Slaves at Cadiz every Year, whereby their Countrymen might have still the happiness of continuing among Catholics, tho in Bonds.

I propos'd likewise for them to trade in this nature with the Portugueses, rather than the Hollanders. Which they would not hearken unto for several Reasons.

First, Because they would by no means have that Nation establish themselves in their Country. Secondly, By reason that they would give them no opportunity to sell their Arms and Ammunition amongst them: And, Thirdly, because they always undervalu'd the Slaves, and never offer'd so much as they were worth.

These, with some others, have been the Reasons that the Portugueses have never yet been able to get any footing in Sogno.

A Year almost past before there was any Ship appear'd in this Country; at last an English Vessel came to an anchor there. This I immediately advis'd the Count of, requiring at the same time, That if she were really English, she should not be suffer'd to land any Person whatsoever. The Count's answer was, that I should obey'd: But which I observ'd to be spoke by him with such coldness, that I could easily discover in him a contrary Intention; and which I was the more confirm'd in, when I reflected upon the Profit he was to make, both by the Buyer and the Seller. All this while the Captain of the Ship pretended that he would tarry only three days to take in fresh Provisions; which being past, he scarce shew'd the least sign of being gone. While he was yet in the River, I happen'd to go down to the Shore to speak with the Masucca, or Receiver of the Whites. Being but just enter'd his House, I saw two English men, who I thought had been no nearer than their usual station; they seeing me, drew in, and I turn'd my back to go out again; but scarce had I reach'd the Threshold, before I heard a brace of Pistol Bullets whiz by my Ear. At this being astonish'd, I look'd about, but saw no body. Then I fell on my Knees, return'd Thanks to Heaven for my Escape; and afterwards went in again boldly to make my Complaint to the Master of the House of the Villany, which I suppose was design'd me by these English men: But to my great disappointment, he return'd me neither a Complement nor a Resentment.

The day following the beforemention'd Captain came to me, but that rather to affront, than confer with me; demanding of me, at first sight, What I had to do to oppose the English trading in that Port? To which I reply'd, That pursuant to an Agreement between me and the Count, all Hereticks were to be excluded from dealing in Slaves throughout the Dominions of Sogno, but as to all other Matters of Traffick they were at liberty. What do you mean by Hereticks? (quoth he) Is not our Duke of York a Roman Catholick, and chief of our Company, from whom I have a full Power to trade, where, and in what Merchandize I please? Granted (said I)

but then I alledg'd further, That I was sure it was not the Intention of that Duke, that Christians should be bought and sold for Slaves, nor that such as he (meaning the Captain) should be allow'd not only to trade, but likewise to rob and infest the Shores where-ever they came, in like manner as another English Captain had done there the last year; who as soon as he had taken in all his Lading, fell to wasting the Country, and forc'd away several of the Natives into Slavery, and kill'd many others that he could not get away. This (I told him) I would assuredly acquaint the Dutches of York my Country-woman with, that the Duke her Husband's Reputation might not suffer, and such Offenders might be punish'd as they well deserv'd. To this the Captain began to reply with great Heat, defending both himself and his Country-man the other Captain, thinking to overcome Reason with Noise; and if some People had not come in to my assistance, I know not what might have come on it. I afterwards sent to let the Count know, That I should not open the Church Doors, till those Hereticks that were Enemies both to our Church and him were gone. This Message soon brought the Count to our Convent, where when he enter'd to speak with me, there came in with him only one Man who had a long Knife in his hand drawn about four Inches out of the Sheaf: This Knife as he knelt on the ground, he held with one hand on the Haft, and the other on the Sheaf. For the better understanding of this you must know, that whenever the Count comes to speak with us, nobody has leave to enter the room with him but the Interpreter; and when any extraordinary Case requires another's coming in, he must kneel all the while in like manner as the Interpreter is oblig'd to do. The Count began with me very low, endeavouring to convince me, That considering the many Enemies that surrounded him on all sides, he ought to provide himself of Arms and Ammunitions of War, and which he could best do from the European Ships that came to trade in his Dominions. This and the like he urg'd with a great deal of cunning, but at length perceiving by my Answers that he gain'd but little upon me, he began to gather up his Countenance, and to move his Lips quick in order to thunder out some dreadful Menaces against me; but which I timely perceiving, started up upon my Feet, and prevented his fury with the following words. The reason (said I to him resolutely) of my coming into your Dominions, was for the Service of God, and the Salvation of your Souls; and in order to that Duty incumbent on me, I cannot dispense with the bazzarding even of my Life, in withdrawing so many poor Souls from out of the power of Lucifer (meaning the Slaves to be bought by Hereticks) which nevertheless you seem by your Arguments to be willing to give wholly up to him. Think then, my Lord Count (continu'd I) on your own case in so palpable an Act of Disobedience; for as for my part, I shall always endeavour to persist in my Duty. Having spoke these words, I immediately offer'd to go out of the Room, but the repenting Count catching me fast hold by the Arm, and changing his Countenance almost from black to yellow, would by no means suffer me so to do, crying out, Hear my Reasons first, Father; Hear my Reasons before you go. Then clapping himself down upon a Bench he fell into a long Discourse, but in which I often interrupting him, he at last flew away in a great Passion, muttering and mumbling to himself, That he was the Head of the Church in his Dominions, and that I without him could do nothing, no not so much as baptize a Child. By these and other such like Speeches of his I could easily perceive that he sided with the English, and I was thorowly convinc'd thereof afterwards, when he caus'd Proclamation to be made at three of the Clock in the Morning, to forbid all his Subjects throughout the whole Banza to go any more to our Church; but this he nevertheless did without laying any Penalty on those that disobey'd him, and consequently his Subjects being true Servants of God, took no manner of notice of his Proceeding, but continu'd to come to Church as before. Notwithstanding their good Dispositions, I thought my self oblig'd to excommunicate the Count by fixing a Schedule on the Church-Doors, and which I did by an Authority sent me from the Bishop of Angola. Hence it follow'd that our Slaves that belong'd to the Offices of the Church, as likewise those that serv'd in the Convent, immediately forsook me, and that I suppose by instigation of their Prince who had withdrawn them, to cause me the sooner to comply. Whilst I yet continued firm in my Resolutions, a Dutch Ship appear'd in the Harbour: soon after her arrival the Count's Secretary brought her Captain, according to custom, to me for my Benediction, which nevertheless the English Captain had neglected to ask; I gave it him, and by those means extinguish'd part of the fury instill'd into the Peoples

Merolla. Peoples Breasts by the Magicians and Wizards against me; for they had made it their business to make the People believe, that I purposely oppos'd the aforesaid Contracts with the Europeans, that their Nation might be unprovided of Arms and Ammunition when their Enemies the Portuguese came against them, and which they likewise affirm'd I by secret means encourag'd. The anchoring this Ship in the Harbour occasion'd the speedy departure of the other; for in less than thirteen days after she hoisted sail and put to Sea, carrying away with her about fourteen or fifteen of the Natives of Sogno, besides near a hundred more which the Captain said had been sold him by the Pagans.

pents.

Finding an opportunity to acquaint my Superior in the Kingdom of Angola with these matters, I immediately set about it, and dispatch'd away two Letters, but which were both intercepted by order from the Court. This coming to my Ears, I writ three more, one of which I confided to a faithful Black, promising him a considerable Reward if he deliver'd it; the other two I sent publickly which were intercepted, as before. About the same time the Count likewise writ a Letter to the Bishop of Loanda, complaining, that I would neither administer the Sacraments, nor open the Church; and besides, that I had condemn'd the Wizards to death in an open Congregation. To this the said Bishop, well knowing both the Treachery and Hypocrisy of the Blacks, gave no Answer, but however soon after sent my Superior, accompany'd with Father Benedictà Belvedere, to assist me. Here mark the Providence of God! Whilst the Count continu'd in his Obstinacy, a certain Disease that reign'd in the neighbouring parts, call'd in the Portuguese Bexigas, but in ours the Small Pox, had reach'd his Dominions, and whereof great numbers dy'd daily. The People being sensible that this must be sent as a Judgment among them, gather'd forthwith together, and address'd themselves with great earnestness to the Count, advising him to retract and atone for the great Error he had been guilty of, or, besides the just Judgments of God both upon him and them, they would infallibly rise against him for Redress. To this the Count answer'd, That it had never been his desires that they should suffer any ways upon his account; and that what he had forbid by his Proclamation was only to frighten the Missioner into Obedience: but since they were of opinion that what had befallen them was occasion'd by this Injunction, he was willing, if he might thereby confirm their Safety, to take it off. Tho he soon after was as good as his word, yet were the People not wholly satisfy'd, affirming, That they would not die like Dogs, but like true Christians, as they had been bred, and therefore will'd him to present himself before me to ask forgiveness for his Crime, to the end that the Church-doors might be again set open to them. This he soon after accomplish'd in the following manner, but whether through Sincerity or Hypocrisy I shall not pretend to determine. Having cloth'd all his Carriers in like manner as they are wont to be when they go to receive Ambassadors, he alone appear'd in Sackcloth, unshod, with a Crown of Thorns on his Head, a Crucifix in his Hand, and a large Cable-rope about his Neck: In this manner coming to our Convent, he prostrated himself humbly at the Gate, beseeching me to pardon him his Crime, and only excusing himself, that what he did was done rashly and without consideration, but that he was now ready to make me all manner of satisfaction for his Disobedience. He remember'd me moreover of the Presumption of David, and hop'd, that like him having repented, he should likewise receive Mercy. Having said thus much, he gave his Crucifix to one of his Attendants to hold, and afterwards kneel'd and kiss'd my feet: Hereupon I immediately rais'd him from the ground, took off the Crown of Thorns from his Head, and Rope from his Neck, and then repeated to him those words which I formerly utter'd to another Person on the like occasion, If you have sinned like David, imitate him likewise in your Repentance. After this I waited upon him out as far as the Street, and then left him.

He afterwards came a second time in the aforesaid manner to have his Excommunication taken off; but I told him, that I would willingly have comply'd with his desires, but that in about three days time my Superior would come into those parts, and that it was more proper for him to absolve so great a Person as he. I further told him, That as for his Accomplices, I would undertake to give them Absolution, which I soon after perform'd both to his and their satisfaction. At last the expected Father arriv'd, and I having acquainted him with what had been already done, he after a delay of a few days gave the penitent Count Absolution. Having receiv'd this great favour and assistance from the Bishop, I thought my self oblig'd to return him my most humble Thanks

Thanks and Acknowledgments, and withal to inform him of the cause, manner, and time of my shutting up the Church, as likewise with the reasons I had to threaten the Wizards with the Punishment the Count had writ to him about.

The Dutch all this while follow'd their Trade close. A certain Captain among them call'd Cornelius Clas, having acquir'd a Reputation with the Natives by his Subtilties, went about sowing his Heretical Tares amidst the true Corn of the Gospel. Amongst other (damnable) Doctrines he maintain'd, That Baptism was alone necessary to Salvation, because it took away Original Sin, as the Blood of our Saviour did Actual Sin. The better to comply with the Blacks, whom he knew to be desirous of greater Liberty in those matters, he affirm'd, there was need of no other Sacrament than that of Baptism; and that if they had a mind to communicate they should do it, but that Confession was not necessary, being only to be understood figuratively. And he further (impudently) disown'd the real Presence of Christ in the consecrated Host. To procure himself the greater Credit, he often invoc'd the Saints to his Assistance, and especially St. Anthony, tho his Tribe generally deny the praying to Saints to be of any use to us. He afterwards repeated several Expressions here and there out of our Sermons in Lent, and then proceeded to ridicule them after the following manner. O (cry'd he) your Father's an able Preacher and a great Scholar, he hits the Nail on the head, and talks to the purpose; but if he would improve you thoroughly, he ought to advance such and such Doctrines (which by the way were most perniciously heretical.) Thus he run on for above an hour together, exploding our Opinions and recommending his own, till he had at last so far prevail'd upon those miserable Negroes, that their Hearts were become as black as their Countenances. Altho this Person's Principles and Designs came at length to be known, yet were the most ignorant nevertheless affected with his Arguments and Perswasions, but notwithstanding these Mischiefs came not to our knowledg till after the departure of their Author.

Let us now come to other Matters not unlike the foregoing. In the fifth year of my Mission another English Ship happen'd to come to an Anchor in the River: As soon as I perceiv'd it, I went to the Count and said, Behold, my Lord, another English Ship appears in the Harbour! and at the same time beg'd of him not to permit any of the Men to land for fear of the like Inconveniences that had before happen'd: He seem'd to comply readily with my Desires, and promis'd that none should; nevertheless Self-interest blinding him again, he receiv'd the accustom'd Presents, and suffer'd them to trade again within his Dominions, which we would by no means agree to. The Captain came with his Commission to our Convent, and endeavour'd to find me out, but could not. In the mean time without any further delay we publish'd a Manifesto, that upon pain of Excommunication none should presume to sell any Slaves to the English; but as for bartering Ivory, Ebony, or the like with them, they might freely do it. The Captain hereupon could get but five Negroes, and those he bought before the Manifesto was publish'd. He came a second time to my Apartment accompanied by a Dutch Captain, and with a great deal of Subinssion said to me, Father, what reason have I given you to deny me, so much to my disadvantage, a free Trade in this Port, when I have suffer'd so many Hardships, and undergone so great Peril in my Voyage hither? To which I courtcouly answer'd, That I would do any thing that lay in my power to serve any Christian, and him in particular, who appear'd to be so very civil, but that in this matter I could do nothing without an Order from my Superior. I told him further, That tho I was against his trading ashore, as being an Englishman, and consequently a Heretick, I could not prevent his doing it by Sea and therefore if he could find any to traffick with him he might freely do it: That's what I would rather have (reply'd the Captain) for thereby I may trade Custom-free. Now I perceive (continued he) that these Brites (meaning the Negroes) have always their Hands open to receive Presents, but when there is any favour to be return'd, they immediately shrug up their Shoulders and excuse themselves, pretending the Missioners will not let them grant it. But why (added he) did they not explain themselves at first, that I might have sav'd my Present, and sail'd about my business elsewhere? It shall go hard but I'll make them know whom they have to deal with. Then turning to me he said, Well, Father, I cannot but thank you heartily for acquainting me with the Truth, and let them restore to me what I gave them and I'll be gone. But first (quoth he) give me leave to present your Reverence with a Barrel of Wheat-flower to make your Hosts of, a small Vessel of Merolla. Aquavite, and something else that may lie within the verge of my Capacity. I return'd him a thousand thanks for his kind Proffers, and told him, that tho I had occasion for the Wheat-flower I would by no means accept it of him, and afterwards having forc'd a Basket of Fruit upon him dismiss'd him. The Count having dispos'd of the Present was given him, could by no means restore it, and besides durst not for fear of Excommunication provide him the Slaves he had promis'd. This so vex'd the Captain, that taking only along with him two Slaves, and a little Ivory he had got before, he left his House in the night-time, and went immediately aboard his Ship: His Landlord soon missing him got up betimes, and went after him for his Rent; but the Captain having caus'd three Patereroes to be turn'd against the Negro's Boat, dar'd him to come near him after the following manner. Come hither Slave (quoth he) and I will pay you in a certain Coin that you very well deserve. After which bestowing a great many Curses on him, he set sail and departed. The Count was again excommunicated for his Disobedience, but not by a Paper fix'd up at the Church-doors formally, which he took with much patience: Tho a Black, he is an absolute Prince, and not unworthy of a Crown, tho he were in Italy, considering the number of his Subjects, and large Dominions.

Before the Englishman had weigh'd Anchor to be gone, another Dutch Ship came into the River, which my Companion Father Benedict da Belvedere perceiving, immediately oppos'd the landing any of her Men: His reason was, that they were Hereticks, in like manner as the English, and which he confirm'd by the Heresies the above-mention'd Dutch Captain had not long before spread amongst us. I could not well dissent from this Opinion of his, nevertheless for quiet sake I told him, That since we had justly got rid of the English, we must of necessity admit of the Dutch, or the People would be apt to rebel; for not caring to trade with the Portugueses for some reasons not known to themselves, they would have nobody else to utter their Commodities to, which would prove no small detriment both to the Church and the State. He understood me I don't question, but notwithstanding took little or no notice of what I said, being transported with too great a Zeal for the Church's good, which had it not been so excessive, might have succeeded better than it did.

On Easter-day there was a great Feast held throughout the Count's Dominions, when the Electors and Governors were oblig'd to come to Court to wish their Lord a happy Easter, according to custom: He that voluntarily absented himself was look'd upon as a Rebel, and those that came were treated at the Count's Charge; the Electors and Governors dividing the Provisions amongst their Followers. My aforesaid Companion hearing a confus'd sound of Instruments, and many loud Acclamations from the People gather'd together in vast numbers, made what haste he could to them that he might prevent those Festivals, which he look'd upon as not proper to be celebrated in a place where the Count assisted, who then stood excommunicated. For my part I could not well fathom his Intentions, for he only came to me and demanded my Blessing and Leave to go out of the Convent, which I could not refuse him. At his first coming the chief Elector came up to him to salute him, which he coldly receiv'd and return'd: After a few Compliments they came to Complaints. My Companion began to blame them for having so courteously admitted of the Hollanders, as also for solemnizing of this Feast, which they ought not presume to have done as matters went. This so exasperated the Elector, that he cry'd out with a great Passion, What Hereticks! What Christians! What Catholics! Are we not all to be sav'd by Baptism alone? Father Benedict being out of patience at these words, and truly moved for the Honour of God's Service, tho a little too exorbitantly, without any Reply stept up to him, and gave him a sound box on the Ear by way of Admonition. This Affront the Elector's People so greatly resented, that they immediately gather'd about him to defend him, and those that were without the Walls likewise made at the same time an attempt to get into the place. The Count, Captain-General, and Great-Captain being soon inform'd of what had happen'd, presently interpos'd to prevent the Missioners receiving any damage from the fury of the Multitude, and afterwards conducted him safe to our Convent. The chief intent of this Father's extraordinary Zeal, was to make known to so great a company of People got together, what danger their Souls were in by conversing with Hereticks.

For my part, I judg'd a speedy Reconciliation with the Elector highly necessary, and therefore some few days after

after I sent for him to our Convent, he came, and after having courteously receiv'd him, I desired him to recant sincerely what he had said, and ask Father Benedict's pardon, and I would absolve him. To which he answer'd smiling, That would be pleasant indeed; I am the Sufferer, and yet I must be guilty; He was the Aggressor, and yet I must beg pardon. Must I receive a Blow, and notwithstanding be thought to have offended? Then I reply'd, That must not be taken for an Injury, which was not so intended. The Blow was not to offend, but defend you, being as it were a Remembrance not to hearken to the Errors of Hereticks. Besides, you ought to consider that it was given out of Paternal Affection by your Spiritual Father, and whom it did not misbecome to give it. Moreover, you know among us the Bishops do it in cases of Confirmation, and the Person that receives it takes it rather for an Honour than Affront. You ought to confess that you deserv'd Correction for venting so dangerous an Opinion in the presence of so many true Catholics. Being convinc'd by these Reasons that he had been in the wrong, he consented to recant his Error, which he did after Mass at the Church-door, confessing that what he had done was merely occasion'd thro Passion, and not out of any Disobedience to the Doctrine of the Church, for which he had a sincere Veneration. Afterwards begging pardon of the aforesaid Father, and kissing his Feet, he was again received into our Communion. After all this he made his humble Acknowledgments to the Count for having presum'd to encline his People to a Rebellion within his Dominions.

To extirpate this Heresy effectually out of the Minds of the People, we took an occasion, after we had given Absolution to the Elector and his Followers, to preach a Sermon to them to this purpose: That whereas Paradise was allow'd by all to be a Place of the greatest Purity and Brightness, so ought to be the Minds of those who are in Election to be admitted Inhabitants thereof. Lucifer the Prince of Light, for having suffer'd himself to be contaminated with Pride, occasion'd his being thrown headlong into Hell, together with his Adherents. Can it seem possible to you that so pure and peaceful a Place should admit of the Haughtiness and Unclean? Some among you are like your own Maccacos, or Monkeys amongst us, who keeping possession of any thing they have stolen, will sooner suffer themselves to be taken and kill'd than to let go their Prey. So impure Swine wallow in their filth, and care not to be cleans'd. To remedy this our Sa- viour instituted the Sacrament of Repentance, to the end that when Man had sinn'd, he might come and purify himself from his Transgressions. These and many other Spiritual Memorandums were given by us, proving at the same time, That God being all Goodness, could not possibly be the occasion of any Evil. We then demanded of them, if they were not convinc'd that this was true by the Light of their natural Reason? They all answered with a common consent, That it was, and that they had been deceiv'd by the Heretical Seducer, who had impos'd Doctrines upon them which were contrary to the Word of God. We hope therefore that for the future these Heresies will be totally extinguish'd, since we have taken so much pains to decry them both in the Pulpit and elsewhere. The same night that the Count had been made acquainted with his falling again under the Sentence of Excommunication, for having design'd to furnish the English with Slaves, contrary to the Manifesto publish'd by us, his Countess was seiz'd with a fainting Fit, occasion'd either by her being with Child, or else thro the disgust she had conceiv'd at her Husband's Proceedings. Being thus ill, she immediately dispatch'd her Son to me to desire me to come to her, who doubting whether I would comply or not, thought himself oblig'd to swear, that his Mother was at death's door. Being mov'd by Charity, I went accompanied by Father Stephen da Romano, who had some small Skill in Phylick. By his means, and thro God's Grace, she soon recover'd, and was confess'd. This Lady was, to give her her due, a very religious Woman, and a great Frequenter of the blessed Sacrament; and besides, one that upon many occasions, when the Count her Husband and we were at variance, would send us divers Refreshments of Oranges and Lemons, and the like. The Count having observ'd at a distance the Civility and Kindness we shew'd to his Wife, seem'd to be mightily pleas'd with it. Thinking to take him in this good humour, I went up to him, and desir'd him to excuse what I had order'd him to be made acquainted with, having been thereto oblig'd by the Duty of my Function, and were for that end come into his Country. I likewise told him, that if he would needs follow his own Inclinations, he must be a Pagan, and could not deserve the Title of a Christian; and moreover inform'd him what a strict account I had to give not only to my Superiors, but also to my own Conscience, and therefore exhorted him to submit himself to the Censures of the Church. I desired him to remember likewise how I had expos'd my Life for his good, and that I could not but have a particular kindness for him, being my spiritual Pupil. This I spoke to prevent his flying out into Passions and Disdain, as he was wont to do upon occasions of Reproof.

From Mid-Lent to Whitsuntide the Count had not been within the Church-doors, except sometimes incognito; but generally stood at a distance, whence he might see the Priest at the Altar, and where he heard Mass. On Ascension-Eve he sent to beg of me for the love of God to absolve him. I would have willingly comply'd with his Request, but was prevented by Father Benedict, who alledg'd that it was by no means proper to take him again into our Communion, till the Hollanders had weigh'd Anchor, and were gone. On Whitsunday he sent a Messenger to me again, giving me to understand, that his Subjects not seeing him appear in the Church as formerly, might probably rise in a Tumult; to prevent which he propos'd to agree to all I had requir'd of him, provided I would absolve him. My Answer was, that he should appear next Morning at the second Mass dress'd in Mourning like a Penitent, and should moreover bring along with him all the Electors, together with the two Captains, the General, and Great-Captain. As I had commanded, so it was perform'd. Those others that ought to have been present, and could not come, were excus'd upon sending Proxies. Being all met, I address'd my self to the Count, and endeavour'd to make him sensible what damage he might do to so many poor Souls as he was Master of, by encouraging them to have Commerce with Hereticks. I remember'd him also of the late Affronts received from the English, and indulg'd by him. Upon hearing this, and a great deal more, which I don't think necessary to repeat here, both the Count and all the rest, took an Oath upon the Holy Missal, that they would sooner lose their Lives than suffer any English Ship to enter any of their Ports again, which is observ'd and perform'd even to this day. The Penance I impos'd upon the Count was, that he by his Authority should oblige three hundred of those that liv'd in unlawful Wedlock to marry. He gladly accepted the Proposal, and afterward enter'd the Church with great Pomp and universal Joy, and never in the least offended after.

The reconciled Count not only perform'd what had been enjoin'd him, but brought over four hundred to the Holy State of Matrimony. Amongst the rest there was one Mani, who not only married himself, but also caused two Sons, and as many Daughters of his to do the like at the same time. My Companion Father Benedict observing and wondering at the great Care and Diligence the Count employ'd in reducing so many stray'd Souls to Matrimony, cried out, As long as all is secure here, I'll go on in my Mission, and try what I can do with others abroad, by urging these good Examples to them. As he hop'd, so it came to pass; for in less than six weeks he had caus'd above six hundred to marry. This was a very laborious Work, and put him into a violent Fit of Sickness two days journey from our House. As soon as I heard of his being ill, I sent for him home; but he would by no means comply with me, affirming, That a good Souldier ought to die with his Sword in his hand: and further, That if he lost that Opportunity of recovering so many poor Souls from Perdition, he knew not when he might have the like again offer'd him. His Death not long after, together with my being sick, put a stop to so great and so good a Work but just begun.

It is necessary here to inform you, that in the Dominions of Sogno, those that are lawfully married live with all manner of Love and Amity together, and particularly the Women, who are constant to their Husbands, whether Blacks or Whites. The many years that the Europeans have traded here, there has not been found one Bastard among them, which are nevertheless so frequent to be met with in other Countries. These Women have a particular aversion to Hereticks, as may be perceiv'd by what follows. A Dutch Captain walking one day in this Country, and observing a married Woman taking a Pipe of Tobacco after the Custom of the Country, sent his Slave to her to desire her to let him have a Whiff. The good Woman hearing the Message, took her Pipe out of her Mouth, and hugg'd it in her Arms, and without answering a word proceeded on in her way. The Slave nevertheless prosecuted his Master's Request, and follow'd her, repeating often what he had before required, till at length perceiving her obstinate and fixt in a refusal, the better to encline her to resign the Pipe to him, he gave her a box o'th' Ear, threatening her with worse, if she persist-ed in a Denial. The Woman notwithstanding standing bore all patiently, and would not consent to gratify him, whatever he could do to her. I should have told you, for the better understanding of this that 'tis a Custom in this Country, that when any one obtains a Pipe out of a Woman's Mouth, it is a probable earnest of further Favours. From hence may be learnt what a Propensity the Women have to Chastity in these Parts, many of whom meet together on the first Day of Lent, and oblige themselves to a strict Continence till Easter; insomuch that if any one among them should happen to deviate from the Vow they had jointly engag'd in, she would immediately think her self guilty of a great Fault, and consequently undergo voluntarily some severe Penance. They are likewise most rigid Observers of all Fasts enjoind by the Church, and which they will not transgress even where Necessity requires they should, and in which cases we are obliged to command them to do it to save their Lives.

At length my Companion Father Benedict finding himself worse and worse, sent a Messenger to me to desire me to afford him some Succour. I thereupon immediately dispatch'd four Slaves belonging to the Church, to bring him in a Net to the Convent, that being the easiest way I could propose to have him brought. The better to insure the Performance of my Commands, I threatened the Slaves with Transportation, a thing they are more than ordinarily afraid of, in case of Disobedience or Treachery. They brought him soon after, and being arriv'd, he immediately enter'd upon a general Confession of his Sins, even from his Youth upwards to that Day. The Malady he was afflicted with was the Gout, which getting not long afterwards into his Stomach, at once ended both his Life and his good Actions, which were many. His Funeral Obsequies were perform'd suitable to his Character, at which assisted the Count with a vast number of People, I my self saying Mass, tho I languish'd at that time under a violent Fever. Father Benedict was a Native of our Kingdom of Naples, tho he first received the Habit of the Order of St. Francis in the Roman Province. He was a publick Preacher in the City of Rome, as likewise a Confessor to the Nuns. The Death of this good Man may well be said to be lamented by all, since the very Birds and Beasts had their share of concern at it: For it was to be observ'd, that whilst the Corps was upon the Bier, it was attended by several Parrots and wild Hens, which hover'd about waiting till it should be inter'd. A Dog likewise that had belong'd to the deceased Father, missing his Master after he was buried, would neither eat nor drink, but lay howling after an extraordinary manner at the Church-door. I gave him afterwards to the Captain General to be transported into some distant Island: but this availed little, for in less than a Months time he return'd, and placing himself at the Door of the deceased Father's Cell, continu'd to howl as before, till at length having eat nor drank nothing for many days, and being thereby quite famish'd, he groan'd out a dismal Farewel to his loving Master, and so dy'd.

It may not be here amiss to insert a certain Quarrel that hapned among the Negroes in the fourth Year of my Mission, and whilst the aforesaid Father was living; but wherein no body was kill'd thro the timely Orders sent to prevent it. The difference was this: The Captain-General, Son to the Count's Brother, being at variance with the Count's other Nephew, Son to his Sister, while they were mutually provoking each other with ill Language, the latter hapned to throw down the former, and falling atop of him, began to belabour him lustily with his Fists, which nevertheless no body saw. The Person aggriev'd complain'd of this Usage to the Count, who having heard him patiently, at length said to him, What justice would you have me to do between you two that are so nearly ally'd? The Captain-General having receiv'd the like Affront once before from the Countess's Brother, briskly reply'd, What, would your Excellency have me put up this Affront too? No, it is not in my power, and I would have my Enemys to know that I am not so much to be despis'd. This said, he withdrew, and taking up Arms together with his other three Brothers, he beat an Alarm to challenge the Count's other two Nephews to Battel, who nevertheless were not able to appear against him without the Assistance of their Uncle's Troops that were already gone all over to the Captain-General's side; and this caus'd them not to appear at all.

The better to understand the manner of challenging in this Country, I must acquaint you that the Negroes, when they have any private Quarrels among them, do not care to decide the matter singly; but each gets as many of his Friends as he can together to do it for him. When they are come to the appointed pointed Place, and drawn up in sight of Merolla. their Adversaries, they begin to argue the Case coolly; then proceed to abusing each other with Invectives, till at length their Blood being stir'd by injurious Language, they fall to it helter skelter. Then their Drums begin to beat confusedly, which are made of thin Wood all of a piece, and in form like our great earthen Jars. These being cover'd with a Beast's Skin, are founded, not with little Sticks, but with the Hand, and which make a much greater Noise than our Drums do. They that have the use of Guns, after the first Onset throw them away, having them more to fright than offend the Enemy. They set them against their Breasts, without taking any aim, by which means the Balls generally fly over their Enemies Heads, without doing them any harm; for they perceiving the Flash in the Pan, are likewise accusom'd to squat down, and after having so receiv'd the Firing, rise up of a sudden, and run forwards. After they have thus thrown away their Fire-Arms, they betake themselves to their Bows and Arrows. When they are at a distance, they send their Arrows up into the Air, that by their falling they may do their Enemies the greater Mischiefs; but when they are nearer, they shoot them in a direct Line. They are wont sometimes to poison their Arrows, the Wounds made by which they recover by Piss. When the Arrows fall, the adverse Party immediately gathers them up to make use of them again. The short Arms they imploy are great and small Knives, Axes, and the like, which they buy of the Europeans. When they come to engage, the Persons that are conquer'd become Slaves to the Conquerors, if they are taken; and if not, they often kill themselves for Anger. In Congo, when there are no Priests there, Christians make Slaves of Christians, which they often do upon very slight Quarrels.

But to return from whence we have stray'd, let us go on with our Story. After a little while two Electors, whereof one was the Mani Enguella, the Count's Cousin, came up to the Captain-General, who together with his Friends stood with their Arms in their Hands, and endeavoured to pacify him. They found him sitting Majestically under an Umbrella, as it were a Canopy; when with a more than Kingly Gravity he broke forth into these words: He that has a mind to speak with me, let him do it prostrate on the ground. This the two Electors would by no means condescend to do, since that would be to make him no less than Count. Whereupon the haughty General leap'd up in a Passion, and dispos'd himself to a Rebellion, marching with his Followers two days Journey off from the City. His three Brothers posted away immediately to his Government, which was a Country given him by the Count, in gratitude for having suppress'd a dangerous Rebel, who call'd himself Duke of Bamba of Sogno. Hither he was soon after to follow, but was happily prevented by our interposing; for had he gone, the Consequence might have been no small prejudice to the Count. The Arms and Ammunition he carry'd along with him were several small Field-pieces, three hundred Muskets, thirty Barrels of Powder, a great number of Bows, Arrows, and the like, with great Quantities of Provisions. The manner of our interposing was this. On All-Saints Day, after the first Mass, the Count came to me with Concern in his Countenance, and told me what a Rebellion was rais'd against him. I answer'd, that as soon as I observ'd the first Motions amongst the People, I leapt forth of my Cell, and went to enquire what was the matter. I was acquainted that the Barretti (so the Family of these Rebels was call'd) were got together to divert themselves. To which I reply'd, that their Exercise did not at all seem to me to be tending that way; but I rather suppos'd it to be occasion'd by some Contentions among them. Having then the Chalice in my Hand to say the second Mass, and being somewhat mistrustful that this might arise from the Captain-General's Influence, I caus'd it to be enquir'd into when he had been at Church, and was inform'd that he was present at the first Mass. Now if this had been true, I had soon prevented all future Miscarriages; but being impos'd upon, I could not. I then offer'd the Count to do what in me lay to quiet the Disturbance, and promis'd to go find out the Captain-General for that purpose. Hereupon my Net was speedily got ready, and I set forth, but had not gone above three or four Miles before I was stop'd by a Guard of Soldiers, who told me I should go no farther. This caus'd me to come out of the Net to know the reason, thinking when they saw me they would let me pass; but I found it quite otherwise. I ask'd their Commander if he knew me? He answer'd, This Post was assigned me to let no body pass whatsoever, and your Reverence never yet baptiz'd me, nor have I confess'd to you. Then I went to go on, but this Captain fell down on his Knees, and hinder'd me. I believ'd positively that this was an Act of Humiliation and Submission, it being the Blacks Custom always to speak upon their Knees to the Priests and their Lords: But see how I was mistaken; for as I offer'd to go forward, he clap'd the But-end of his Musket to his Shoulder, and was about to fire at me, which I perceiving, retired, and giving a small Crucifix to one of his Souldiers, bad him to carry it to the Captain-General, as a Token that I was coming to speak with him. In the mean time I took to another Road, which altho it was three Miles about, yet by the Grace of God I got to Chitombo before Midnight. In our way we pass'd thro several Villages, whose Inhabitants were all fled to the Sea-shore; theretore not finding any body to relieve my poor Net-men, as they expected, they were forc'd to carry me patiently, without resting a Minute, for fear of losing time. Manichitombo sent we word that he would have me come on no forwarder, lest I should lose my way in a huge Wood, which I must necessarily pass thro, and which I might very well do in the Night-time: and moreover that if I continu'd at Chitombo, he would come and wait on me there. My Answer was, that if he had a mind to shew himself an obedient Spiritual Son to me, he should continue where I was till I had known the Count's farther Pleasure in the matter; and I withal request'd of him, that the Letters I should send for that purpose might not be intercepted by any of his Faction; and to the end that they might be able to distinguish which they were, I let him know that I would order them to be carry'd aloft upon a Pole. Whilst I was in expectation of an Answer from the Count, Manichitombo's Brother and Secretary sent me my Crucifix again, and withal gave me to understand that his Brother would not have me by any means to give my self the trouble to come to him, for that he would comply with me in all I desir'd and came about; and therefore beg'd of me to pray for him and his Friends. Having this Answer from the Captain-General, I thought it to no purpose to stay any longer in Chitombo; and therefore I immediately set out for Sogno again, and arriv'd there about Midnight. Next Morning I order'd my Interpreter to go and acquaint the Count what I had done; but tho he seem'd to comply with my Commands, yet did he not nevertheless obey them, fearing to fall under Mer Disgrace thereby: for it is common among the Blacks to suspect what the Interpreters tell them, if there be not a Priest by to confirm it, and sometimes such Messengers have been taken and punish'd barely upon suspicion. When I came to understand this, I went to the Count my self, and having inform'd him of all that had hapned, he seem'd in some measure to be pacify'd; however desir'd to be satisfied in two Questions: The first was, why I had not excommunicated the Captain for having so impudently set up his Standard against his Sovereign? And the second was, that he desir'd to know from me what Punishment so great an Offender deserv'd? As to the first I answer'd, That I could not have excommunicated him for two Reasons: First because he had not rebell'd against the Church; and secondly, in that he comply'd with my Demands, which I presum'd were for his Excellency's benefit. As to the Count's second Question, I plainly perceiv'd that it was both deligning and politick: for could he have procur'd me to declare the Captain-General a Rebel, he would have soon had him caught, and struck off his Head. But I thank God, being aware of his Intentions, I prudently avoided them, telling his Excellency in a jesting way, that I would send the little Boy (a Youth that had been brought up in our Convent, and whom the Count dearly lov'd) to satisfy him in that Question. This caus'd all the Standers by to laugh, and I my self was not a little pleas'd that I had avoided answering to so ensnaring a Demand. The third or fourth day after, the Governour of Chioua, the Count's eldest Son, appeared with a powerful Army, which he had rais'd to defend his Father. This Person at his first coming was indeed extremely courteous and humble; but he afterwards soon became proud and haughty. How much pains we took to reconcile these two disagreeing Parties, need not be express'd. In a word, we happily compos'd the Differences between them, and we thought the Captain-General had agreed to appear only with his three Brothers. But wherever the Mistake was, he came at the time appointed attended by his whole Army, which having drawn up before our Church, in sight of that of the Mani of Chioua, he waited for the Count's coming to give him a Remission of his Crime. I fix'd my Eyes upon the Multitude, and could not imagine what the Event of this Interview would be. I told the Count's second Son, that was then in our Convent, that in my opinion it was not at all proper for his Father to appear in any Passion at this juncture. He answer'd, that the way to meet one that came to ask pardon after this manner, was to come with Bullet in Mouth, and the Musket ready to receive it. Not so fast, Sir, quoth I, perhaps I may find a Remedy. Then I went and spoke to the Captain-General's Secretary, who of all his Brothers was the wisest and most prudent. I told him my Sentiments concerning the hostile Appearance of so great a number of Men, and his Answer was, that they should be all sent home to their Houses, which was the same day performed. Of all this I immediately inform'd the Count, and he appointed the four Brothers to appear before him next Morning, without any Attendants. They accordingly came, and three Leathern Chairs being set out before our Church, one for the Count, another for me, and a third for the Captain-General, the Count after his wonted humble manner took the Left Hand. After a little while the Captain General making three low Bows to the Count, humbly acknowledg'd his Offence, and received Pardon. When this was done, the Count started up, and nodding his Head with a fierce Countenance, to shew he was not altogether pleased with what had pass'd, and turning towards me said, Is there any thing more, Father, that you desire of me? Are you satisfied? Are you contented? Which having spoke, he in a kind of Passion left us. Happy was it for these four that I had interpos'd; for otherwise they would not have recovered their former Posts, as they did. Nor was it a matter of small labour to get the Captain, the Secretary, and the other Lieutenants restor'd. Yet I observ'd with admiration that the Count laid hold of this Opportunity to put several Mani's from their Governments, who depended on the Captain-General, and among the rest, those that had Commands nearest his Banza, putting into their Places such as he most confided in, retrenching by degrees his exorbitant Power: And thus the General was humbled, his Master satisfied, and the People quieted.

Rebellion of a Son against his Father.

Having given an account of this Rebellion of a Nephew against his Uncle, I will conclude this first part with that of a Son against his Father a Portuguese, and the dreadful Punishment God inflicted upon him for his Disrespect to his Parents: A Passage no less dreadful than memorable, and which may serve for a Warning to unruly Persons to be more respectful to those Nature and the Law of God have plac'd over them. Some few days before the Arrival of the Fathers Missioners, F. Andrew da Pavia, and F. Angelo Francisco of Milan, at the Mission of Sogno, as shall appear hereafter, a runaway Souldier embark'd at Loanda for this Place aboard a Dutch Ship, in order to pass into the Kingdom of Loango, and thence into Europe. He, tho he arriv'd at Sogno, succeeded not in his Designs, as he projected; for being often rejected by the Dutch, he was left forsaken upon that Point of the River call'd el Padron, the landing Place of the aforesaid Earldom. This Place being on one side hemm'd in by the River, and on the other by the Waves of the vast Ocean, and the Land being cover'd with a thick Wood of Mango Trees, he durst not stir one step in that intricate Labyrinth. He often desir'd the Heathen Fishers resorting thither from the Kingdom of Angoij, and the Sognese Christians to carry him into their Countries; but both of them excus'd themselves, alledging they could not do it without their Master's Leave. He having nothing but his Sword, thought to prevail by force, which they perceiving, forsook the Place, for fear of embroiling themselves with the Portugueses, and to shun him that took their Fish away, and abus'd them. The Wretch being in this Condition, surrounded with Misfortunes, saw the two aforesaid Fathers coming from Angola, and conceiv'd hopes they would relieve and conduct him to their House, Hunger pressing him. Coming out to meet them, and perceiving they did not so much as look at him, but went away without speaking a word, he cry'd out, Fathers I fly to your Compassion, and desire to be receiv'd by you. We cannot, reply'd they, banish that Charity from our Hearts which is due to all Men like ourselves; but God forbid that at our first appearance among these new converted Christian Blacks, we should introduce with us the Example of a most enormous wicked Action committed by a white Christian as you are. Thus they left him forsaken in that Place. The Case was thus: This Wretch had given a full Loose to all his lewd Inclinations, and being often reprimanded by his Father, he never took the least notice. On the contrary, to remove all Obstacles that hindred his proceeding in his wicked Courses,

A Voyage to Congo.

Courses, he resolv'd to destroy him of whom he had receiv'd his Being. Accordingly he inhumanly fir'd a Pistol at his Father, the Bullet whereof hitting him on the Forehead without any hurt, rebounded back upon the Son, and wounded him sorely, who as he was, took Sanctuary in a Church; but fearing the Punishment he deserv'd, endeavour'd to make his Escape with the Hollanders, as has been said. The most remarkable thing in this cursed Action was, that the ablest Surgeons could never heal his Wound, the Flesh ever remaining raw, as a Brand on his Forehead for so barbarous an Action, and an Example to all others to dread committing the like Inhumanity. As I was going by Water to the Kingdom of Angoij, I saw him walking with his Sword in his Hand instead of a Staff; and he call'd to the Seamen, who were his Countrymen, but durst not come near, because the Governour of Angola would have punish'd them severely, had they presum'd to transport a run-away Souldier.

To the former I will add one Passage more, well known to all this Earldom, where the Witnesses to it are still living;

it was thus: A certain Christian being often admonish'd by one of our Missioners to leave his wicked Course of Life, he was so far from it, that running on in his lewd Courses, he scoff'd at him. This Man being one day to pass a River with two Companions, he was visibly taken up by an invisible Hand into the Air. One of his Companions going to take hold of him by the Feet, had such a Cuff given him, that he fell down in the Boat, and the Offender was seen no more, the two Companions being left to proclaim what had hapned all the Country about.

But since I have spoke of a Son that was so ill a Liver, I will conclude with other Children born in this black Ethiopia, to the astonishment of those that beheld and gave an account of them. One of these came from his Mother's Womb with a Beard and all his Teeth; perhaps to shew he was born into a World grown old in Vice. A white and a black Child were also born at one Birth; and a Black Woman brought forth a Child quite white. Thus I conclude this first Part with three wonderful Births.

*III Liver
punish'd.*

P A R T II.

ETHIOPIA, so call'd either from Ethiops the Son of Vulcan, or from the Greek word Aitho, I burn; according to Pliny's Opinion, who expresses it thus, Nam solis vicinitate ejus regionis Incolæ torrenture, Ap. dictio. 7 Lingu. and which either by means of its scorching Sands, the Nature of the Climate, the Odness of the Food, and Variety of the daily Diet, produces nothing but blackness among its own Native Inhabitants, may with good reason be term'd the dark and dismal Tomb of Europeans, and the fatal Grave of White People. The blackness of these footy Nations, some will have to be caus'd by the Climate, or nearness to the Sun; but others, with more reason, derive it from their Original, Family and Descent: for Sevil being in about 38 Degrees of North Latitude, produces white People. Near the River of Plate, in the same Latitude Southward, the Men are of a Chestnut, and rusty Iron Colour; and near the Cape of Good Hope, which thomore Eastward, is in the same Latitude, the Natives are quite black as Pitch. And therefore with Cardan we may say, the Blackness does not proceed from the Temper of the Climate, but from the Race. Ut videantur stirpe potius quam aeris natura tales evadere. Card. lib. 2. de variet. c. 4. Which the Poet confirms thus.

Ethiopum populos nigrum traxisse colorem.*

Ovid. lib. 2. Met. v. 235.

S. Isidorus quoted by the most Illustrious and most Learned Monsigneur Paolo Aresi in his Essays, is of opinion, that the Ethiopians are descended from Chus the Son of Ham, curs'd by Noah for his unbecoming Curiosity in looking upon his Father's Nakedness. Certissimum est originem ingredi non a regione, ut hactenus existimatum est ob solis ardore, sed a stirpe & sanguine Chus provenire.

In the second Year of my Mission, I ^{The At} fell sick of, a violent Fever in Aethiopia, ^{thor's f} insomuch that I found my strength to fail ^{ness and} me so fast, that I thought it but prudence ^{recovery} to prepare for my last Mission into another World. The Remedy we Europeans make use of here upon these Occasions, is, to let almost all our Blood out of our Veins, and to replenish them with such as the Food of the Country produces, which being more connatural to the Climate, agrees best with us. And if it pleases God to spare Life, it is no less painful, or requires any shorter time to recover; for Days and Months pass away in accustoming the Body to the unusual Food, but it is the work of two or three Years, with continual care and application, to reestablish Health. If the probability of this be question'd, I appeal for confirmation of it to Father Cavazzi da Montecuccolo in his Historical Descriptions before-mention'd, where he speaks of it in many places, viz. in his first Book, Pag. 146. his third, Pag. 330, &c.

If the Torments this Fever occasion'd my Body were so grievous, much more must they needs be to my Soul, since I had only the poor Lay-Brother Leonard to administer the Sacraments to me: Who nevertheless in Temporals was as serviceable as I could expect or wish, but in Spirituals could only sprinkle me now and then with Holy-Water, and call sometimes for me on the Names of Jesus and Mary.

Whilst I was thus labouring under an Uncertainty, whether I should live or die, die, an Envoy was introduc'd to me from the King of Cacongo, who writ me word that both he and his whole Kingdom were dispos'd to receive our Holy Faith, and therefore desir'd I would make what haste I could to him to have those good Intentions accomplish'd. At that time I was ignorant that the Count of Sogno had married his Sister to this King, on condition that he should embrace the Christian Communion, but which not long after I was acquainted with by the said Count himself. This good News I must own was no small relief to my Malady, tho it did not absolutely recover me. I therefore entreated his Excellency, the Count, that he would please to supply the want of Ability in me, and give the Envoy an answer which might demonstrate my Gratitude, and great Obligations to his Master for his Proposal.

This King sent afterwards to our Count to offer him the Island of Zariacacongo, which being nearest to his Dominions, might be better govern'd by him, and continued in the Christian Religion when once planted there. With the Messenger that brought this Offer, I dispatch'd another to the King, to let him know that for the present I was extremely ill; and besides that there was no other Missioner throughout the Count's Dominions besides my self, but that if God in his Infinite Mercy should please to spare my Life, I would take such care that he should be serv'd in his Request, either by me or some other. I desir'd his Majesty moreover to order the Governor of the Island, that whenever any of my Interpreters should come there, to set up a Cross as an Original Sign of Christianity, he would permit them to do it without molestation. I likewise beg'd of his Majesty to assign some place in his Dominions for a Church to be built. All I had so desir'd, was punctually granted not long after by this good King, who testify'd a more than ordinary inclination to see me; but which my weakness, occasion'd through the great loss of Blood I had undergone, hinder'd me from obeying him in. One of our Fathers being come to me, set forward immediately to forward so good a Work, as the Conversion of a whole Kingdom; who coming to Romancoij, a City on the other side the River Zaire, and Metropolis of the Kingdom of Angoij, heard that the King was dead, and a new one elected. This caus'd him immediately to return homewards, imploying himself by the way in other Missions among the Islands belonging to Sogno: he thought it not amiss to touch at the Island of Zariacacongo, to pry into the Dispositions of that People; and finding a Cross erected amongst them, he took thence an occasion to ask them, If they desir'd to be Christians? The Governors answer'd, That they could not receive any new Law without leave from the present King; which if he would grant, they were most ready to embrace it. There were not wanting some among them that said scoffingly, When we are sick, forsooth, the Wood of this Cross will recover us! This they spoke, I suppose, by the Instigation of the Wizards, who knew well enough that the Christian Religion should be no sooner establish'd there but they would be persecuted; and therefore, no doubt, thought it advisable to oppose it. The Father having done all he could to please them, and finding his Endeavours ineffectual, left them till a more favourable opportunity offer'd it self. The Count finding these Islanders to oppose the Commands of their late King, resolv'd to compel them by force to perform them, and consequently set out against them with an Army for that purpose; and we seeing it involv'd in Troubles, thought fit to put off our going thither till another time.

This Island is none of the smallest, and is situate in the midst of the River Zaire, ^{of an Island.} It abounds with all sorts of Provisions, and great Numbers of Inhabitants. It is plain, rais'd eight Fathom above the Water, and is divided from the Kingdom of Congo by a River, over which there is a Bridg.

About the end of the fifth Year of my Mission, arriv'd at our Convent the two Milanese Fathers formerly mention'd, viz. Father Andrew da Pavia (who was appointed Superior in my stead) and Father Angelo Francesco da Milano; together with a Lay-Brother, one Giulio d'Orta. They brought along with them several Refreshments from Europe, whereby having greatly comforted me, I began to recover my strength, insomuch that I resolv'd speedily to set forth in my Mission, but knew not well whither to go. If I went to Chiovachianza, I was afraid I should not succeed there, by reason, as Father Leonard told me, they had not seen the Face of a Priest for many Years; and moreover, since they had had any among them, they had been subdu'd, as I told you before, by Simatamba. And if I went to the new King of Cacongo, I distrust'd my Security there, because he had never invited me. At length it was the Advice of all, rather Merocha. to repair and support what had been already built, than to think of laying a new Foundation in another place, and the rather, because there was no extraordinary Understanding between the Count of Sogno and the new King of Cacongo, altho the Count had given him his Vote as one of his Electors. I was nevertheless not yet resolv'd to go for Chiovachianza, having heard what happen'd there to one of our Order, who coming thither from Sogno, and being for that reason ill look'd upon, did little or no good; and besides happening to take a small quantity of Talk, where-with that Country greatly abounds, he was taken and clap'd up into Prison, besides other ill usage offer'd him; and was at length releas'd, more out of Covetousness, than either Charity or Justice. Notwithstanding this Consideration, I was at last prevail'd upon to go: For this purpose I resolv'd to carry with me Interpreters of the best Quality I could get; and therefore procur'd, tho with some difficulty, the Count Don Stephano's Son, a Person extremely belov'd throughout these Dominions, together with the Secretary and his Brother, both Nephews to the present Count, and who have been mention'd by me before. Having got all things in readiness for so long and dangerous a Journey, taking up four or five days at least, the Interpreters thought themselves oblig'd, according to the custom of the Country, to go and ask their Lord and Masters Benediction: Which he gave them with a pleasing Countenance; but nevertheless could not help saying, What, will you leave your Prince to hunt after Bonghi? (the Monny of that Country) to which they readily answer'd, That they were going in the Service of God, and not in search after Bonghi. This did not pass so secretly but it came to my Ears, and which I observ'd to have had that effect upon the before-mention'd Persons, that I resolv'd to alter my Resolutions, and instead of Chiovachianza, to embark for Angoij, and thence to go to Cacongo.

If it was not my good fortune to go to Chiovachianza my self, give me leave to tell you who did. We had a certain Native of Sogno, whom we had bred up in our Convent from a Youth. This Person being very virtuous, and of a more than ordinary Capacity, our Friers caus'd him to be made a Priest for the benefit of Christianity, to the end that being naturally more proper to bear Fatigue and Labour than they, he might be sent out on a Mission where they could not go. Him we forthwith dispatch'd to the abovemention'd Country, where in a few days he baptiz'd above five thousand Children. Having remain'd there for some time, and work'd like a faithful Labourer in his Lord's Vineyard, at the Request of our Fathers, he obtain'd a Canonship in the Bishoprick of Loanda in the Kingdom of Angola, where he now resides, with a great deal of Honour due to his Behaviour and Character.

I went to wait on the Count to take The Author leave of him, telling him, That I had in lets out some measure been hinder'd from making my likewise. Mission by Land, and therefore I was resolv'd to perform it speedily by Sea. His Answer was little to the purpose, which nevertheless savour'd more of Craft than any thing else. He told me, That since my departure was so sudden, he could only furnish me with a brace of Goats, and some Pulse.

I embark'd, and the first Port I touch'd at was Capinda in the Kingdom of Angoij, where the Portugueses trade all the Year, as do the Dutch. I was no sooner landed, but I set about my Spiritual Imploiment; yet whatever pains I took, and however I inculcated the Truth, I could gain over but one single Person, whom I baptiz'd. I confess'd several Christians that came thither about Business, together with some Flemish Catholics that liv'd there. I continued ashore all the day to say Mass; at which assisted not only the Roman-Catholics, but the Pagans, especially the Women of these last, who were so well pleas'd with the Picture of the Virgin Mary, that they clap'd their hands after their manner of Devotion, and cry'd out in their Language, Eguandi Ziambabunga magotti, benchi, benchi! that is, This is the Mother of God, O how beautiful she is! Which said, they all fell on their Knees and worship'd her. This Act of Tendernefs so wrought upon me, that it quickly brought Tears of Joy into my Eyes, to see so much Devotion and Acknowledgment in so ignorant a People.

Angoij is a Kingdom rather in Name King of than in Dominions, being but a very small Angoij. Territory. Here formerly a certain Mani hapning to marry a Mulatta, Daughter to a very rich Portuguese, his Father-in-law would needs make him King of Angoij; and for that purpose caus'd him to rebel against the King of Cacongo his lawful Sovereign. The manner in short thus: The King of Congo having sent a Governor, or Vice-Roy, to govern the Kingdom of Loango; that Person being rather ambitious to reign absolutely, than rule under another, got himself to be proclaim'd King of all that Country; and moreover took in so much more Land belonging to his Master, that his Dominions are at present extremely large, and wholly independent of Congo. Cacongo lying in the middle between Congo and Loango, that Mani declar'd himself Neuter, and set himself up for King of Angoij, rebelling against his lawful Sovereign the King of Cacongo.

Kingdom of Congo.

The Kingdom of Loango lies in five Degrees and a half of South Latitude. The Christian Religion was first planted there in the Year 1663, by the Labour and Diligence of one Father Ungaro a Frier of our Order. This pious Father had run through divers Countrys and Kingdoms, when at last coming to Sogno, and lodging in our Convent, a Portuguese Traveller happening to come that way, was very courteously receiv'd and reliev'd by him, insomuch that in a little while they had contracted a great Friendship together. After some time the Portuguese went his way, and coming to Loango, related to that King the great Integrity and Honesty he had found in this Capucin Missioner. The King giving credit to what he told him, was easily induc'd to send two of his younger Sons to Sogno, to be instructed by this Person in the Principles of the Christian Religion; which after they had well been, and baptiz'd, they were sent back to the King their Father.

These Princes confirming the Character the Portuguese had given of Bernardino Ungaro, the King had a great desire to see so good a Man, and keep him always with him; and therefore wrote forthwith to the Governor of Angola to send him to him. This Governor having obtain'd leave of the then Superior, Father John Maria da Pavia, dispatch'd him accordingly to Loango, without any manner of delay: Where arriving soon after, and having instructed the King and Queen for some few days, he proceeded to baptize them both, and then to marry them after the manner of our Church. His next business was to baptize the King's eldest Son, and after him successively the whole Court, which consisted of above three hundred Persons. In a word, within the space of a Year that he liv'd there, he had baptiz'd upwards of twelve thousand People. At last this zealous Missioner finding himself oppress'd with a grievous Indisposition, and believing he should not live long, sent for our Lay-Brother Leonard; who coming not long after to him, the pious Father dy'd the same Morning he arriv'd, well provided, as we may imagine, of Merits for another World. The good King hearing this, and being desirous to keep up what had been so happily begun, sent Brother Leonard to the aforesaid Superior to acquaint him with Ungaro's Death; and to desire of him to send him speedily another Missioner; but however, these his good Intentions were afterwards disappointed by a Rebellion rais'd against him by a Kinsman, who being ambitious of his Crown, and having been assisted by some Apostate Catholicks, depriv'd the good King of his Life. This King's extraordinary Zeal for propagating of the Christian Religion, appears, in that he has been often heard to say, that he would shed his dearest Blood in the defence of it.

Merolla.

The Tyrant and Usurper that dispossest him, liv'd not long after to enjoy his ill-gotten Throne, but was snatch'd away from it by a sudden Death. This wicked Person being dead, another Christian King arose, who tho he did all he could, by the help of one Capucin, to promote what had been begun by Father Ungaro, yet was he not able to bring his Intentions about, and that for want of more Missioners; wherefore this Kingdom remains at present, as formerly, bury'd in Idolatry. In my time were several Attempts made to recover our Interest there, tho to no purpose; yet there is now a greater probability of succeeding in it than ever, the present King having prohibited the Hereticks to Traffick within his Dominions, by reason that they had sold his Subjects Fire-Arms, which he imagin'd might in time prove prejudicial to him.

I never heard there was any Christian Prince that reign'd in the Kingdom of Angoij, that Country having been always inhabited by a sort of People extremely given to Sorcery and Magick, and who have likewise ever been profess'd Enemies to the People of Sogno and Cacongo. Before I left those Countrys, those Missioners I had left behind me in Sogno, writ me word that the Count had declar'd War against Angoij; and having conquer'd that King, had taken all his Guns, Arms, and Ammunition from him, vowing withal never to suffer any Person to enjoy any Office or Dignity in that Kingdom, unless he were a Christian. This put put me in mind of the Saying of the Merolla. Christian Poet Claudian,

Asperius nihil est humili cum surgit in altum.

In Eutrop. lib. 1. v. 181.

And I believe the chiefest Motive of the King of Caçongo's seeking the Count's Friendship, was to have the People of Angoij kept under, he being a kind of Check upon them.

Manner of Fishing.

Whilst I continu'd at Capinda, I observ'd a sort of fishing which I never saw elsewhere. The Fishermen threw into the Sea a large Net with Weights, which having long Canes fix'd to it at equal distances from each other, by their bobbing down shew when there is any Fish taken: This Net has large Mestres only to detain the great Fish. It is made of Thred of a certain Root, which being beaten, becomes like unto our Hemp. What our Author tells for a Wonder, is now very common, for all Draw-nets have Corks fixt at equal distance to do the same Office that he ascribes to the Canes.

I saw all along these Shores Oyster-shells lie in great numbers; and being desirous to find those with Oysters in them, although the Negroes would not direct us, we soon loaded our Boat. We found them lying one upon another in great heaps, and resembling a Rock: It requires no great strength to loose them, but only a little shaking.

Civit-cats.

I had here an opportunity to see the Civit-cats, call'd by the Natives Nzime, and by the Portugueses, Gatte d' Angelia. This Country abounds with them, and they are sold in great numbers to the Whites. They are White and Black, and of about the bigness and make of a large Cat. The Civit is taken from the Male, when shut up in a Cage, by catching him by the Tail that he may not turn; and then skimming the Sweat off from his Limbs with a kind of Spoon. There are other sorts of Wild-cats, which are call'd by the Natives Nzusi.

Habits.

The most civiliz'd Habit here is a piece of Cotton thrown over their Shoulders, and another girt about their Loins; which they purchase in exchange for Slaves and Ivory: Others content themselves with a short Apron, only to show they are Gentiles. They wear a little Horn about their Necks, hanging like a Jewel; and which they anoint every Full-Moon with an Oil that their Wizards give them, and afterwards bind them about with divers Spells. They wear their Hair according to their Quality: The Queen that I saw, had hers shav'd close on the Crown, and little Tufts left all round on the sides. Others have it left in a Circle like that of a Monk, and others have theirs plaited down in Points towards their Foreheads and their Necks, insomuch that if there were the least stragling Hairs, they would be cut away, and the rest shav'd close to the Head.

The Houses for the most part are of Howse Reeds, whereof some are built round, and others square: They are generally such miserable Huts, that they are rather fit to receive Insects wherewith this Country abounds, than to afford a tolerable Habitation for Men. The House of the Mafucca, Receiver of the Whites, tho it was built with the same Materials, yet was it nevertheless very large and well-contriv'd, having several arch'd Rooms, within each of which were two small Brass Cannons, which, together with two great ones at the Gate, made in all eighteen. These Cannons they had got in exchange for Negroes, Ivory, and the like, from the Whites. The King's Palace seem'd to me not unlike the foregoing. What mov'd my wonder most was, the Governor of Bomangoij's House, which at a distance seem'd to be a well-fortify'd Cittadel encompass'd with Walls, and unlike the Workmanship of the Blacks: But as you come nearer, you find its Walls to be only compos'd of large Stakes (Palisadoes) stuck into the Ground, five thick, and then raddled up to the top with others of the same bigness: Within there were two large Ways, which subdivided into several lesser Paths. The Rooms are all hung within with a delicate sort of Mats, made of Oziers of divers colours. It seem'd to me a ridiculous thing nevertheless, that their Houses should be but off Straw, Stakes, and Oziers, and yet defended with Brass Guns.

The People here for want of Laws to No Adul prevent it, take as many Wives as they tery please; and she commands the rest that best pleases her Husband, but he has always a power to put her away as well as the rest. The Ladies of the Blood-Royal have a liberty to choose for themselves what Man they please, whether Noble or a Plebeian; but woe be to that Man that happens to disappoint them in their Expectations, for they have likewise absolute power of Life or Death. Whilst I was in this City, one of these Ladies sent a young Woman to be sold to the Portugueses, strictly commanding her Guardian

Guardian to let her go at any Price, but not to dispose of her to any but Whites: Her Crime it seems was a bare suspicion of being too familiar with the said Lady's Husband. Those Women that receive Strangers into their Houses are oblig'd by a barbarous Custom to admit them to their Embraces for a night or two, depriving their Husbands of that right in the mean time. Where we Capucine Missionaries come, our Interpreters immediately give notice, that no Woman may come within our doors.

These People abound so in Superstition, that it would scarce be believ'd by any but those who saw it; and to go about to prevent it would be to little purpose, since the chief amongst them are such as encourage it. I declin'd seeing the King altho I had made him Presents, and he had return'd the Favour, by reason I had been told that he wore enchanted Bracelets on his Arms, and had divers other Magick Charms about his Body, resolving at my return both to visit and make him sensible if possible of the cursed State he was in without Repentance. Whilst I was here I heard several Proclamations made publicly by the Wizards, That all Thieves and Robbers should speedily make Restitution, or they would have recourse to their Arts to discover them. I saw likewise at a distance an Oath administred, which that it might be done with the greater Efficacy, it was propos'd to be taken in the presence of their Idol: This Hobgobbling resembled in some measure a Mountebank's Merri-Andrew, having a divers colour'd Vest on, and a red Cap on its Head, and standing on a little Table. As soon as the Company that stood round in a ring saw me, they immediately dispers'd and hid their Idol. This they did not out of any fear of us, by reason that being Pagans we had no Jurisdiction over them, but because (said they) the Presence of a Priest deprives them of the power of acting. Before the Gates of their Houses almost all have one of these Idols, whereof I have seen some five or six foot high; others are smaller, but both are generally clouterly carv'd: They place them likewise in their Fields where they are never worshipp'd, but on account of finding out some Theft, for which the Thief when discover'd must die. They that keep Idols in their Houses, every first-day of the Moon are oblig'd to anoint them with a sort of red Wood powder'd, as was said above. At the appearance of every New Moon these People fall on their Knees, or else cry out, standing and clapping their hands, So may I renew my Life as thou art renewed. If it happen that the Air is cloudy at that time, then they do nothing, alledging that that Planet has lost its Virtue. This sort of Devotion is observ'd mostly by Women. As I was travelling over Hills and Vallies to transport my self to Congo, I chanced to light upon a place where they were invoking of evil Spirits: The place was a poor wretched despicable Hut built on a small rising ground: On one side hung two coarse nasty Aprons which stunk so that they were enough to strike any one down that came near them. In the middle of this Hut was a Wall rais'd about two foot with Mud and Dirt, behind which stood the Wizard to pronounce his fallacious Oracles on account of the Prince of Darkness. He had on his Head a Tuft of Feathers variously woven, and in his hand two long Knives without Sheaves. Having a mind to enter this Temple of the Devil's, I perceiv'd a very large Fire before me, but nevertheless found so insupportable a stench that all my Senses were in a manner taken from me. I resolv'd notwithstanding to proceed, arming my self frequently with the sign of the Cross, and recommending my Protection to the Almighty: Whilst I was endeavouring to go forward, for you must imagine the Stink was no small Obstacle, I heard a great many of the poor deluded Pagans come murmuring and muttering behind me, exclaiming against my rude attempt to enter their hellish Tabernacle. This prevented my going any further, fearing I might otherwise provoke their blind Rage to do me a mischief. But to return to my Subject.

When I had continued sometime at Capinda, the Mafucca told me he had from a King Orders from the King of Congo, that whenever any Capucine Friars appear'd in those parts, he should send them to him. I answer'd, that coming from Sogno I knew not if I should be well receiv'd or not. The Mafucca reply'd, I will write to know his Majesty's Pleasure, and I advise your Reverence to write likewise. I ask'd him, How many days journey the King was off from thence? He answer'd me, Three by Water, and four by Land. If it be so (added I) I will write. Then I consider'd with my self, that if I did go I might lose the opportunity of the return of my Boat from Loango to transport me further, according to my Intentions, and therefore I resolv'd not to go. To this purpose I writ to his Majesty, humbly suppo-

supposing that he was indifferent whether I came to him or not; and therefore having set out from Sogno with no other design but to go to the Kingdom of Cacongo, I was preparing speedily to go thither. Coming to an Anchor not long after in a Port of that Kingdom, I dispatch'd a Letter to the King, acquainting him that I was the Person that had receiv'd so many Favours from his Predecessors, having been sent for by him to Sogno to preach the Gospel, and that then being greatly indispos'd I could not possibly wait upon him according to his Commands. This Letter was contriv'd by me to be presented him by two Persons, the one a White, namely one Ferdinando Gomez a Portuguese, whom I did not care to trust wholly, by reason I knew him to be covetous, and therefore sent another with him who was a Black, and a Relation to the said King. To him I consign'd a Present to his Majesty, which was a Chrystal Crown, and another of blue Glas for the Queen. This Present was so well receiv'd by the King, that as a token of his being pleas'd he took it and put it on his Head, which not a little surpriz'd the Standers-by, they having a Law amongst them that prohibits their King wearing any thing that comes from the Whites, which Law they call Chegilla; His Majesty nevertheless dispens'd with this Law, telling the People that this Crown had been sent him by his Capucin Father, and that therefore he highly priz'd it, and commanded his Queen to do the like by hers: He then order'd my Messengers to be treated with all the Civility imaginable, and after eight days stay dismiss'd them with a Letter to me, wherein he thank'd me heartily for my kind Intentions towards him, and proffer'd me, that if I would come and see him I should be very honourably receiv'd, advising me to bring some rich Portuguese Merchant along with me to be my Conductor, with some considerable Merchandizes to please the People. This Answer of his was to the purpose, and had three serviceable Consequences, first to himself, secondly to me, and thirdly to the Portuguese.

Great Treachery.

As to the first, It was commonly reported among the Missioners, and remain'd fresh in the Memories of the Negroes, that some years since a certain King of this Kingdom having been baptiz'd by a Religious Person, and afterwards causing a Proclamation to be made, That within such a time all Wizards should depart his Dominions, or suffer Death for their neglect; these wicked Wretches incited his Sub- jects to a Rebellion against him, which at length increas'd to that degree, that they ran like Madmen to the Palace with Weapons in their hands to assault their Prince. The prudent King having timely notice of their Motions, retir'd in great haste to a Son's of his, who was at that time Governor of an adjoining Territory, thinking he could be no where so safe as under his Protection, who was indebted to him for his Being. The Son seeing his Father hotly pursu'd by his mutinous Subjects, I know not whether through fear of Death, or out of Policy, soon discover'd, and deliver'd him up to their Mercy. What could the afflicted Father do upon this occasion, but have recourse to the holy Crucifix which he always wore about him, and which had been given him at the Font by the Priest that baptiz'd him, kissing it over and over, and crying out, If I must die through the Treachery of a Son, ought I not to do the same on account of my Saviour, who was betray'd and dy'd for me? Yes; if I had a thousand Lives I would lay them down all for his sake. This said, hugging the Crucifix close in his Arms and kissing it, he yielded down his Head to the fatal Steel, which at one stroke depriv'd him both of Head and Life. His perfidious Son did not remain long unpunish'd, for soon after, being first depriv'd of his Government, he dy'd miserably. The same hapned to that wicked Kinsman, and infamous Conspirer against the King of Loango, who in like manner by a commendable Death, resign'd his Breath on account of his endeavours to propagate the Christian Faith within his Dominions.

The cause of my going to Cacongo, was principally the spiritual Comfort of those poor Souls, and the performance of my Duty, but I had likewise a desire to see the Body of the former of the two before-mention'd Kings, which was not much reverenc'd by the said People, but highly respected by me, and which was not difficult for me to find it, having been the custom there, as with us, to bury their Kings by themselves. That strange Accident having left so indelible an Impression on the mind of the present King, he had good reason to desire a Trade with the Portuguese in expectation of their Assistance both spiritual and temporal, which he also expected from his good Friend and Ally the Count of Sogno.

To confirm as much as in me lay the good Intentions of this King, I had signified to him among other things, that to lay the surer Foundation of the Christian Religion

Religion in his Country, I must desire the favour of him, that either all, or at least the chief of the Magicians and Wizards of his Kingdom would meet me to defend their Opinions, and oppose mine; and if they declin'd coming on account of Ignorance, I desir'd I might exercise my Sacerdotal Power on their Charms, and disprove and annul all their Devices, and thereby show that the performances of Christ's Ministers are always above those of the Devil's.

The second Consequence to me and all true Catholicks was, that by the introducing of Christianity into that Kingdom, the Hereticks that traded there would be discountenanced and confuted, and not suffer'd for the future to make the Port of Capinda their way to the Kingdom of Loango.

The third good Consequence was to the Portugueses, to whom we have been so much oblig'd not only in Trade, but likewise in matters of Religion.

Ferdinand Gomez press'd me extremely to give the King of Cacongo an Answer, and therein to signify to him that if his Majesty pleas'd he would wait upon him as a Merchant, and had prepar'd great variety of Merchandize for that purpose. My Answer was, that if the King spent some days in considering on his Answer, I had reason to study mine many more. His design it seems was to vend his Commodities aboard, and then sail away without leaving any thing ashore. This the Negroes nevertheless discover'd, and thereupon told him, that if he had a mind to trade for Slaves in their Country, he must first land all his Merchandize. This honest Man hop'd to have had his Rogueries authoriz'd by me, tho he knew it to be my business to preach nothing but Truth and Sincerity. I thought it proper to go and speak with the King, who resided about eight Miles off, to the end he might not think either himself or his Subjects impos'd upon by me, or my Acquaintance. Gomez would needs accompany me, we found the Journey extreme troublesome, especially I who had been sick. From the Sea we had a very steep Ascent to make, which oblig'd me to come out of my Net, and to walk afoot, but at length through extreme Weakness I fainted: Whereupon I was lifted again into the Net, and with much ado drag'd up the Hill. This fainting was occasion'd by my Indisposition, which never left me, and by the slender Provisions we had in the Ship, which consisted of nothing but Horse-beans, Indian Wheat, and Flower made of the root of an Herb; and yet this Man told me before our Fathers of Sogno, that his Bark was well provided, especially with Sweetmeats, tho indeed I found nothing but big words, and had like to have paid for it with my Life.

When we came to the Mafucca's House, who was the King's Relation, and liv'd about a Mile from Court, I call'd him aside, and told him what Gomez had design'd: He seem'd very angry, but was nevertheless soon appeas'd by my Intermediation. I afterwards ask'd him seriously, If I should go to the Banza where the King resided, whether he thought his Majesty would be baptized or not? To which he, tho a Pagan, civilly answer'd, That it was certain he would, according to his Promise, provided that Trade were settled within his Dominions with the Whites pursuant to their Contract; but if that were neglected, the performance of his Promise would be accordingly procrastinated. Away then (reply'd I) go tell your Master, that by the help of God I will transport my self to Loanda in the Kingdom of Angola, on purpose to settle that matter with the Portuguese Governor; and afterwards, if not prevented, I will return hither my self, but if I cannot, my Father Superior shall come and baptize your King. Then turning to Ferdinand Gomez, who stood by me all the while, I spoke to him thus in the presence of the Mafucca, You see I have ended my business, go you and make an end of yours, and do not endeavour to put tricks upon these poor People. Hereupon he contented himself with six Slaves in exchange for his Goods, and so prepar'd for his departure.

I nevertheless remain'd in the Mafucca's House, and towards Night an Ambassador, with five others, came to me from the King of Congo. Before their coming I had two Messengers from the Mafucca of Angoij, to signify their Master's Concern for my departure from Capinda without his knowledg. I acquainted them that the reason of my so doing was, because I had no House near the Sea to reside in, his being above a day's Journey off. I afterwards open'd the King of Congo's Letter, wherein he intreated me, for God's sake, to come and comfort him, many Years having pass'd since he had any Capucins within his Dominions; and his Mother Donna Potentiana was desirous to see me, having several things to communicate to me for the benefit of Christianity. Together with the Embassy the King sent a Present of two Slaves, one for me, and the other for the Mafucca, for Services done him. Mine I refus'd, and yet I never saw him, but afterwards considering that if I did not accept of him the Mafucca would have both to sell to the Hereticks, I gave him to Ferdinand Gomez, for having given me a flask of Wine for the Sacrament, and some other small things. Then I took leave of the Mafucca of Cá Congo, thanking him for his Civilities, and bidding him to acquaint the King his Master that I was gone to Loanda to accomplish what his Majesty had commanded. I desir'd the Captain of the Ship or Smack, that if he did not meet with me at Cá-pinda, he should do his best to come to the Port of Sogni, which he did faithfully, being a Venetian, and my Countryman, notwithstanding both the Wind and Tide were against him. For the Civilities I had receiv'd from the Mafucca, I presented him with several small things, in all to the value of about a Slave: This I did that he might be the more willing to furnish me with Provisions for my Voyage. I punctually observ'd his Orders in satisfying the People that were to carry me over the River, which oblig'd him so much, that he procur'd me several Companions besides the Congolans, which made us in all thirteen.

The Fathers Journey to Congo.

On the 7th of March 1688. without any farther delay we set forth towards Congo, and having gone about two days Journey by Land, arriv'd at the Banza of Bomangoi, where by a Correspondent of the Mafucca, a well-bred Man, I was very courtcouly receiv'd and welcom'd, as I was by the Governor, who receiv'd me with sincerity, and procur'd a Boat to carry me further up the River. This Voyage was extremely irksome to me through the excessive Heat, the Sun being then in Leo, which is the time of the Rains; and I believe I could never have endur'd it, had I not been particularly assisted by Almighty God. Anights I was oblig'd to lie ashore on the wet ground, continually tormented with a multitude of Gnats call'd Melgos, which rather deserv'd the name of Horse-leeches, for they would never quit their holds till they dropt off and burst, and so rather chose to lose their Lives than baulk their Appetites. Or else I lay expos'd to the Air in the Canoo, which was a much greater Plague. All this was nothing to what follows: The Mafucca's Servant having receiv'd his Money beforehand, would not allow me enough to subsist for four days, having agreed with the rest of the Blacks, who took their turns, to go by Land and divert themselves, meeting the Boat at the turn of the River, till we came to Boma. As for my Interpreter, they gave him now and then a little, but I was fain to owe all my Support to a little Wine I had by me. The Congheses sent to me by the King, bid me to have Patience, for it would not be long before I were in their Master's Dominions, and then I might have an opportunity to revenge my self on those wicked Infidels.

The Island of Boma is well situated, pretty large, extremely populous, and abounds with all manner of Sustenance proper for the Climate. It is tributary to the King of Congo, and has several small Islands about it belonging to the Count of Sogno. The Inhabitants do not use Circumcision like some Pagans their Neighbours, whose Wizards circumcise them on the eighth day, not out of any regard to the Mosaical Law, but for some wicked Ends and Purposes of their own. When our Missioners came to exercise their Function in the Islands of Sogno, these People carry their Children to them to baptize. In this they do well, but as to other matters they observe little or no Religion, and that I believe chiefly for want of Priests to instruct them. As soon as they perceiv'd my arrival, the Mothers run like mad Women with their Children in their Arms to get them baptiz'd: This the Mani would not nevertheless permit me to perform, till he had known his Lord and Master's Pleasure therein. As we row'd up the Canal, the Lord of the Island sent to speak with me, being ready to receive me not far off, but first let me know that I must not pretend to touch him, for that he was a true Gentile: His Arms were all cover'd with great numbers of enchanted Iron and Brass Hoops, and he superstitiously avoided my touching him, for fear they should lose their Virtue. When I came to him, I found him sitting in a sort of Leather Chair under an Umbrella; he had a sort of Linen Apron about his middle, and the rest of his Body was wrapp'd about in a kind of Scarlet Cloak, which having lost both its Colour and Nap plainly shew'd its Antiquity. I also sat my self down in a little Leather Chait, which I carried always about with me to hear Confessions. After a little Discourse I presented him with some-something after the Custom of his Country; for if something of this kind be not done to the Prince, a Million will not be very likely to succeed. Afterwards this Prince having assign'd me a House near to his, I began to baptize the Children.

The Prince gave me to understand that he had a mind I should baptize a Slave of his, which I told him I could not do till I had catechiz'd her; and moreover, that after Baptism there were several things to be done by her, among which one was, that she must be forthwith marry'd according to our Law, which we enjoin'd on all the converted Pagans in other parts. I was answer'd by one of the Standers-by, that this Woman was not only a Slave, but likewise Mistress to their Lord, and therefore I ought not to insist on the same from her as another. I told him, her being a Mistress was so much the worse, and bid him acquaint his Lord, that I could by no means comply with his desires: The Prince seem'd very much displeas'd at my refusal to baptize his Slave, but I nevertheless persisted in my Resolutions.

I baptiz'd many at that time, and thereby not only reap'd a spiritual Benefit, but likewise a temporal one; for almost every one brought me something or other as a Present. Being scarce able to stand on my feet, I turn'd about to the Mafucca's Servant, and said to him, See what difference there is between your Religion and ours; for where yours allows you to be ungrateful, ours enjoins us to give even to those that have us'd us ill: Take therefore you all these Presents, and leave me only sufficient to support me to Night. According as I had bid him so he did, what was left for me being only a Pot full of Pullet-broth, and a few Pease. Here the custom is to have the Kitchen without doors for fear of firing the House, which is but of Straw. My Interpreter only remain'd with me, the rest of my Companions being gone, some one way and some another. As soon as we had prepar'd my Supper with an addition of two Eggs, I fell to it heartily: My Broth I sup'd up, and tasted my Pease, but I had not so done half an hour before I felt those Pains that People are wont to do with the twisting of the Guts: I thereupon lighted a Candle, and threw myself upon the Bed, which seem'd much farther from me by reason of my Torments than it really was. What I suffer'd is only possible for them to express that have experienc'd the Torture. Providence, which seldom fails the wretched in extremity, at last directed me to a little Basket I had by my Bed-side, wherein I had preserv'd some Antidotes, for I now began to think I was poison'd: Amongst the rest there was an Elk's hoof, which I took and apply'd, but it did me no good; finding myself rather worse than before; for my Teeth began to be set, and my Sight to be lost; then I had recourse to a sort of little Lemmon which I would willingly have put into my mouth at once, but could not by reason of the too strait Passage: At last I found I must break it, which I did; the first drop that came into my mouth gave me some Ease; but when I had got the rest of the Juice into my Stomach I began immediately to grow drowzy, insomuch that I quickly fell asleep with the Lemmon in my Mouth, and Hand upon my Cheek. How long I continued in that condition I cannot tell. My Companions coming, and perceiving me to lie in that posture, thought verily I had been dead, but at length through the only Intercession of the Virgin I came to myself. Then turning about to the Congolans, I cry'd, God forgive ye, and was going to say more, but found my Tongue unable to express any thing but broken Tones. The occasion of my breaking forth into that Expression, was on account of the poisoning of six of my Order near Bamba, as they were travelling through Congo, being the common Road from the Kingdom of Angola. This way I resolv'd to avoid, for fear the like fate might have happen'd to me. As for my Distemper, it began to work off by Vomits, which continu'd upon me for eight days and nights together, in four of which I had little or no Rest, and besides brought up whatever I eat. Being tolerably recover'd, some short time after I was impatient to be gone: For that purpose I sent to know if my People were in readiness, but had for Answer, that the Chest wherein the Altar and its Furniture were kept, was left on the shore and the Canoo gone. It seems the Lord of that Country had sent the night before to the Watermen, that if they offer'd to carry me off they should lose their Heads. I hereupon sent civilly to that Prince to suffer me to procure another Boat: His Answer was, that if I wanted a Boat, he also wanted a Cloak, my Present which I formerly made him not having been sufficient. I hapned to have two pieces of Cotton-Cloth by me, which it seems he had been inform'd of; they were woven in divers Colours, and came from Guinea, being a Present to me from Father Francisca da Montelione: One of these I immediately sent to this Prince to obtain his Favour, which I heard he would not nevertheless afford me, unless I sent the other also: This I was unwilling to do, alledging I kept it for the Service of God, to which he reply'd, that the Boat was kept for God's Service likewise, and therefore I should not have it. Finding my self thus indispensably oblig'd to let him have it, I sent it him, and three days after he return'd me a Boat and Men.

Before I continue my Voyage on the River, give me leave to acquaint you with some other Passages of this nature which happen'd in this Island, and were told me by Father Thomas da Sestola our Superior, which may serve to confirm what has been related before. A certain Missioner coming to this Island, the Mani or Lord seiz'd upon some of the Goods belonging to his Mission; the Frier here-upon acquainted the Count of Sogno from whence he came therewith, who immediately sent orders to have the things restor'd again to the Capucin, or he would proclaim War against the Mani: This had so good effect, that the Goods were forthwith restor'd, and the Missioner highly treated and presented. Nevertheless to prevent any misunderstanding between these two Princes, the before-mention'd black Priest call'd Don Francisco was sent hither, who being of the same Colour and Country with these Islanders, made a good beginning in his holy Function. Whilst he was one day celebrating Mass, the Mani, who was much more devoted to Riches than Religion, instead of assisting at those Divine Mysteries, did nothing but gaze upon the Priest's Chasuble and Silver Patten; of one he had a fancy to make a Coat, and of the other a Breast-plate. As soon as Mass was ended, he very boldly ask'd for them: The prudent Priest here-upon answer'd him, that he would very willingly let him have them, the Capucins abounding in those things, provided he would let him have them to officiate with during his stay there, but he stole away that very night. Whether it was the Mani himself, or any other that design'd me harm, I am not able to determine; but I am certain that if I had known the foregoing Story, I had walk'd more warily, and given nobody an opportunity to make me undergo so great a danger as I did.

It may not be here amiss to take notice of two things more relating to the foregoing: First, as to the small sort of Lemmon which I made use of as an Antidote, it is to be noted that the Poison of these parts, which lies chiefly in certain Herbs, is not be expell'd any other way than by the Juice of this Fruit, and this is a secret known to very few. As to the Poison in Wood or the like, nought can prevail against it, but the Bark of the Tree call'd Mignamigna, as has been hinted at before in the Description of the Plants and Trees of these Countries.

Over and above the six Capucine Missionaries that were poison'd at the time of my being in Congo, I must add the like sad fate which happen'd to Father Joseph Maria da Sestri a Genoese, who in his way from Sogno, where I then resided, being accompanied with about thirty five Persons sent with him by the Count, he went aside to a Conghese City call'd Incusso: At the time of his departure he told me that six had been poison'd before him, and he should be the seventh. Staying at Incusso about a year, he took what care he could to get into his hands all the Impliments that had belong'd to the deceas'd Missioners, and which he was commanded to do by the then Father Superior. Whilst he was doing this, he was earnestly requested by the Vicar-General Don Michael de Castro a Mulatto to come to him, professing himself desirous to fulfil the Easter-Duty of receiving the Sacrament and confessing, being then an old Man, and wanting one to assist him in administering the Sacraments. The pious Father went innocently to wait on him according to his Request, carrying along with him what things he had recover'd, purposing to send them to the Superior: About four a Clock he got safe to the Vicar-General's House, but before night he was taken with fainting fits, and dy'd not without a reasonable suspicion of being poison'd. He was no sooner dead, but the Vicar-General caus'd all the People to depart the Room where he lay; and then proceeding to rip up his Bundles, took thence, as we are credibly inform'd, four Silver Chalice, two Censers, with their Boats, and two Pix's all of the same Metal, with several other things, part of which he pretended were given him by the dying Missioner, and the rest he promis'd he would send to our Superior at Loanda, but did not.

I report this from the People that were with Father Sestri when he dy'd, and and who told me moreover, that he took a great quantity of Treacle without any Relief. This Action of the Vicar-General hinder'd his Son from being admitted into Sacred Orders when he solicited for it. As soon as the old Vicar was dead, the Chapter of Loanda thunder'd out one Excommunication against the Son, then Deacon, and the new Bishop another, to the end that he might thereby be oblig'd to restore what his Father had so unjustly got; all which serv'd to little or no purpose. The old Vicar had 6000 Slaves at his command, besides Subjects, with which he design'd to have forc'd his Son's Promotion to the Priesthood, to the end that he might crown him King of Congo, without considering whether he could get himself to be elected, and at that time he was decrepit. But I must return to give an account of the further progress of my Journey.

Journey to Congo continued. The first day after I was got over the River, I had a very steep Mountain to go up; which being impossible to do in my Net, I was fain to perform it on foot, being supported all the way by two Men, by reason of my weakness. We came at length to a Village, where I observ'd Coleworts planted like ours in Europe, brought thither it may be by some Missioners. There are of them in the Kingdom of Angola, but they produce no Seed, and are multiply'd by planting the Sprouts, growing to a great height. This Village was called Bungu, where I baptiz'd fifteen Children.

The morning of my departure hence, those that had the care of me being gone back again, as it is the custom in these Countrys to do, being assign'd fresh Conductors by the Mani of the place, they would not stir a foot forwards till they were paid, tho' it be our Privilege to travel always at the Charge of the Town where we came last. In answer to their Demands I told them, That I was going to wait on their King upon this account, and therefore if he would have me to come, he must bear my Charges. They reply'd, in great fury, We will be paid, clapping their Hands, and stamping with their Feet as if they had been mad. This Action I confess made me smile, whereupon I told them, that if they would repeat the same three times over they should be paid. This made them to laugh too, when shrugging up their Shoulders, and performing what I requir'd, they stoop'd and took me up. It seems this ridiculous Action of theirs was to have frighted me into a Compliance; but however they were disappointed in the manner of procuring it, tho' they succeeded in what they expected.

In my second days Journey I was carry'd to the City of Norbie, where I baptiz'd 126 Persons. This place is the best situated of any I had hitherto seen in Ethiopia. Here the King's Son met me, being come for that purpose, and I staid a day and a half to baptize the People.

Here, as I understood, had never yet been any Priest, and that because this Town was somewhat out of the Road, the People having been us'd to carry their Children about six days Journey off, to a place where the Missioners commonly resided. The Crowd that gathered here about me was very great, and the Court of the House where I was but very little, so that I determin'd for my greater ease, to perform my Office in the Market. This the Mani observing, told me, that if I pleas'd I might go to the Church, which was not far off. I was glad to hear there was one, and therefore immediately went to it. When I came near it, I perceiv'd it was a pretty large one, and had a great wooden Cross standing before it, which I was glad to see. Fixing my Eyes upon the Door of the Church, I found it was quite different from what others had; whereupon calling to the Mani, with a great deal of concern, I desir'd him to cause it to be open'd. But he, instead of gratifying me in my Request, immediately fled, together with all the rest of the Company, which were very numerous. Being thus left to my Resentments, I clapt my foot against the Door, and broke it open, when I saw what I could never have believ'd, had it been barely related to me: Instead of an Altar there was a great heap of Sand, wherein was stuck a straight Horn about five spans long, and on one side another of a lesser size. On one part of the Wall hung two coarse Shirts, such as I had before seen in the Kingdom of Angoiij. Being astonish'd at this sight, my Hair stood an end, my Tongue cleav'd to the Roof of my Mouth: and I began to cry out aloud, enhancing the Offence as much as possible, Are these the Effects of the Instructions ye have learnt from our Missioners? Is this the Fruit of so much Toil and Anguish as has been undergone in your Conversion? with several more Expressions of the like nature. I desir'd administering the Sacrament of Baptism for some time, giving for reason, that it was by no means proper to baptize the Children of those Parents that had rejected the Worship of the True God, for that of an abominable Idol, such as their execrable Cariabemba was, for so they call'd their Devil. I afterwards told them that I would not stir a foot from their Town till they had utterly thrown down and destroy'd that Temple of Idolatry.

Retiring to recommend my self to God, and to pray for the illumination of his Spirit, I said to my self, If I should now clap Fire to this Building, and burn it down, what Damage may it not do to the Inhabitants, whose Houses are all adjoining, and moreover built with Reeds? I concluded therefore to execute my Purpose more mildly at my return, after I had been secure of the King's Favour; for should I now have done it, I might have incur'd the same Damage or Danger as others have done. Amongst the rest, Father Bernard da Savona, a few days before he came to Sogno, was left with his Baggage, by his Conductors, in a large Forest, where, for fear of being torn to pieces by wild Beasts, he was forc'd to leave his Bundles, and wander alone in great haste; till at last coming near the Sea, he was discover'd by Fishermen, who giving us at the Convent notice of it, we went speedily out for him, and had him conducted safe to us. He was travelling, on account of his Mission, to Emcassu in Congo.

The like Misfortune befel Father John Baptist da Malta, as he travel'd through Bamba; who perceiving himself forsaken by the Persons that were to attend him, had recourse to the Father of Miracles, the glorious St. Anthony of Padua, for assistance. When he had watch'd in a Tree almost a whole Night for fear of becoming a Prey to the wild Beasts, he heard himself all of a sudden call'd by his Name. The poor Father thinking some of his Companions had call'd him, beg'd, for the Love of God, to be conducted to some Road. A little while after two Gentlemen coming by that way with Servants, and observing the Father alone, and so much misus'd, took him upon their own Backs, and carry'd him to the City of Bamba, not suffering any of their Servants to take turns with them, for fear of being depriv'd of the entire benefit of so charitable an Action. The poor Father coming to the Vicar of Bamba's House, and being kindly entertain'd by him, after some time enquir'd after his Companions; and meeting with them not long after, he demanded of them how they could be so cruel as to leave him alone in such a Forest? Also, why they did not come to assist him when he call'd to them, and they heard him? Their answer was, That as for hearing him they took care not to do that from their first leaving him, flying from him as fast as they could, and had not been near him since till then. By their Answer the Maltese easily perceiv'd that it was the Saint to whom he had recourse, that had both call'd and deliver'd him. This was told me by the said Father himself in our Convent at Loanda, in the Kingdom of Angola.

I was likewise afraid such an Accident might have befallen me, as hapned to one of our Order, Father Philip da Sa-lyblessia, a Missioner, into the Kingdom of Congo. The Story is this: After the Death of the pious Don Alvaro King of Congo, a new King was chosen, who was no less zealous and devout than his Predecessor. This Prince putting out a Proclamation to have all the Wizards that should be found within his Dominions burnt, those wicked Wretches gathering together in the Dukedom of Sundi, still persisted to exercise their damnable Callings in their Huts, notwithstanding the Prohibition. To prevent this, the Duke's Forces march'd thither in great haste, carrying along with them the aforesaid Father. Being arriv'd at the Place, they began to set fire to the Huts: As soon as the Wizards perceiv'd the Flames about their Ears, they came out in great fury; whereat the Duke's People immediately fled, leaving the poor Father to shift for himself. The Wizards perceiving him alone, soon seiz'd, and murder'd, and devour'd him, both to satisfy their Revenge and Appetite. The Truth of this was attested and told us by the Persons that fled, who said, they had observ'd it by the light of the Blaze of the Houses. We were then at our Convent in the City of San Salvador.

The young Prince of Congo, who was about eighteen Years old, perceiving I show'd him little respect, especially after what I had discover'd in the Church, having drawn up his Men in order, departed. I was told I had not done well to shew so little regard to their King's Son, and was therefore desir'd to send for him back again. My Answer was, That since his Departure was voluntary, so should be his Return for me; but withal, that if he would come back he should be well receiv'd. In short, he did come back, and at length both he and his were well satisfy'd, and tarry'd with me till next day at Noon, when we went all away together.

Having travel'd another days Journey and a half with the aforesaid Prince, we met with the King's Uncle, and a Relation of his, who had Drums, Trumpets, and a great Train of Followers. When we came within half a mile of the Banza of Lemba where the King was, I was told I must not go any nearer till farther order, and therefore was forc'd to remain behind alone with my Interpreter. At last the Order came, attended with several Persons, to bring me to Court. When I came near the City, I was stop't again to wait for the Secretary, who was to receive me there. He presently came and conducted me into the Market-place, where the People, almost innumerable, and divided into two Choirs, were singing of the Rosary in the Conghese Tongue. At the upper end sat the King with a long Cloak upon his Shoulders, a Satin Waistcoat strip'd with Silver on his Back, and his lower Parts from the middle were cloth'd with a fine Vest after the Mode of the Country. Being led up into his Majesty's Presence, he reach'd out an Ivory Crucifix a span and a half long, on an Ebony Cross of a proportionable length, for me to kiss. When I had done it, and he had deliver'd it to a Favorite, he would needs kiss my Crucifix; which he did, and afterwards falling on his Knees, receiv'd Benediction. In the mean time the People were marching in great Order towards the Church, whilst the King and I brought up the Rear. When I came into the Church, after a short Prayer, I went up to the Altar, and preach'd a Sermon to them upon these words of the Apostle to the Corinthians, Ecce nunc Tempus acceptabile, ecce nunc dies salutis. Declaring, that I came amongst them for no other End, than to revive in their Hearts the Love and Fear of God, and of his Son Christ.

My Sermon being ended, I waited on the King back to his Palace, where he entertain'd me lovingly, and gave me a hearty welcome into his Dominions. After we had spent some time together, I took my leave, but his Majesty would needs see me out to the Street. His Nobles had Orders to accompany me farther, for they conducted me to a House belonging to the King's Uncle, where I was to reside. I must needs say I was not a little surpriz'd to observe how punctually those Lords would come every Morning wrap'd up in their long Cloaks, and walking two by two, to receive and conduct me to Church, and after Mass march back again with me in the same order as they came.

After the reciprocal Visits between the King and me were pretty well over, I one day ask'd his Majesty for what reason he had so earnestly and so often sent for me from Sogno. He answer'd, That he might have a Priest and Preacher of the Holy Gospel within his Dominions. That I believe (reply'd I) but I presume your Majesty had some other End. Tho he made me no answer to this, yet I could easily perceive he had some Thought thereupon that pleas'd him, and that by his smiling. Your Majesty must give me leave to guess at it, reply'd I, and therefore I fancy you sent for me to put the Crown of Congo upon your Head. These words were scarce out of my Mouth, but I heard a great clapping of hands, and humming (which are Tokens of great Joy among these People) together with a confus'd noise of prating among the Courtiers, and Drums beating, Trumpets sounding, and other Noisy Instruments playing; all which were only grateful to my Ears, as they proceeded from pleasure conceiv'd at what I had said.

The Kings of Congo have a Bull from Pope Urban VIII. which gives them leave to be crown'd by the Capucin-Missioners after the Catholick manner, and which in former times their first King was by the said Authority. And afterwards the Missioner, Father Januario da Nola, did the same Office for Don Garcia Alphonso, who was crown'd in the time of Pope Innocent X. The like were others down to this present King. I told his Majesty that his Election having been by Votes, and that in Writing, by reason the Electors liv'd so far off, I desir'd to see them. He readily comply'd with my Request, and among the rest I found the Count of Sogno's Name, which I was glad to see, there having been some difference formerly between those two Princes.

Having gone thus far, my next Business was to procure the Regal Crown of Congo, which had been formerly sent hither by the aforesaid Pope Urban, and remain'd at present in the custody of the Portugueses. It may not be amiss to tell how they came by it: The manner in short was this, Don Garcia II. and 17th Christian King of this Country, being desirous to establish the Succession of his Throne

Merolla.

A miraculous Victory.

Mevolla. Throne to his Children, amongst other tyrannous Actions, extirpated several of the Chief Familys of his Kingdom; and at last to show that he was resolv'd to die as wickedly as he had liv'd, instead of invoking the Assistance of Heaven in his Sickness, he had recourse only to Wizards, Necromancers, and such kind of ill People. These Wretches bearing a more than ordinary hatred to the then Prince Don Alphonso, as well knowing and fearing that if they suffer'd him to come to the Crown, he would not only persecute, but banish them; possess'd the Mind of his sick Father, that to make his way the sooner to his Dominions, he had design'd to poison him.

Garcia thereupon blinded by their Subtilties, immediately declar'd his Son unworthy of his Throne, and consequently got him murder'd, recommending for his Successor Don Antonio I. his second Son. Not long after Garcia dy'd, in the twenty-first Year of his Reign, leaving his Son Antonio to succeed him: but no body can imagine the wickedness of his Reign; besides the Murder of his Brother, wherein he was not a little concern'd, he put to death all his Relations. He caus'd his Wife to be murder'd, giving out, tho' falsely, that she was guilty of Adultery; and afterwards marry'd a near Kinswoman, whom he had formerly been in Love with, against all Law and Reason. Then he proceeded to extend his Cruelty towards her Relations, as unjustly as he had done towards his own. Thus began the Reign of that monstrous Tyrant Don Antonio, who having scarce wrap'd himself in his Purple, dy'd it in Scarlet, and became abhor'd and hated by the Portugueses and Whites, who having signify'd their dislike to his Practices, and which coming to his Ears, he vow'd he would speedily have them beat and whipt out of his Dominions.

To effect this, confiding more in his Multitudes, than their Knowledg in Military Affairs, he rais'd a prodigious Army of 900000 Men; the Truth whereof I know not whether it may be question'd by the Reader; but besides my own, I have the Authority of Father Cavazzi for it, who in his Second Book, pag. 286. and Eighth Book, pag. 868. affirms the same thing. Moreover it may appear credible, if we consider the excessive largeness and populousness of these Countrys, as likewise that all this King's Subjects are not only oblig'd, but accusom'd voluntarily to follow him to the Wars at his least Command.

Before this Army march'd, the King was advis'd by Father Francis de San Salvador, his Chaplain and Relation, not to hazard the Lives of so many poor Slaves, against so warlike a People as the Portugueses. This Frier had receiv'd the Habit of our Order from Father Giacinto da Vetralla; he was a Learned Man, and was admitted by Order of the Sacred College.

The King not caring to hearken to his Chaplain's Advice, the Army march'd against the Portugueses. On the very first day of their march, the Heavens let down such a Deluge, as one would have thought sufficient to have drown'd all Ethiopia, and mourn'd in Thunder for the dreadful slaughter that was to ensue. The good Frier perceiving the Displeasure of Heaven, renew'd his former Petition and Advice to the King; Observe (quoth he to the King) these Drops are as so many Tongues, that exhort you not to fight against the Whites; and these Claps of Thunder are as so many Groans, that good Heaven sends forth for the woful Effects of your Obstinacy. The haughty King nevertheless persisted in his Resolution, and march'd forwards; when at length stepping aside a little way from his Army, with a few Followers to repose himself, behold a dreadful Tiger, as it were, for a second Warning, leap'd suddenly out of a Forest, and ran full drive at him. Father Francis, who never went from the King's side, seeing this, drew out a Scimiter he had at his Girdle, and opposing the furious Beast, at one stroke cleft him in two. The King little mov'd at this Action of his Preserver, rather attributed his safety to Magick, than to his Kinsman's Valour.

The Portugueses, being resolv'd to find those Mines of Gold which the Mocicongolans had so long promis'd, and still delay'd to discover to them, got together about four hundred brave Europeans, with near two thousand Blacks their Slaves, and lodg'd themselves in the Marquisat of Pemba, where they not long after were assaulted by above 80000 Ethiopians. The Portugueses, tho' they saw their Enmys march as thick as Locusts, and tho' they themselves were but a handful in comparison of them, and had but two pieces of Cannon, yet were they not disheartned, even when they saw them encompass and surround them. The Capucin plac'd himself in his Vestments between the two Armys, endeavouring to make Peace, which was approv'd of by the Portugueses. But the obstinate King would not hearken to his Mediation, but forth-forthwith gave the signal of Battel, and seeing a Woman with a Child in her Arms, suppos'd to be the Virgin Mary, standing by the Portuguese General, he shew'd her to his Men, alluring them of Victory, because the Portugueses had the Impediment of their Women with them. Then began the Shot to fly like Hail from the Portuguese Guns, especially from two pieces of Cannon they had, which made such a dreadful Slaughter among the Blacks, that one part of the Army giving way, the other was not long before it follow'd. In short, the Portugueses got the Victory; which the proud King perceiving, he thought to secure himself behind a huge Rock; which being overthrown by a Cannon Ball, bury'd and kill'd both the King and his Chaplain, the good Frier. Those few that sav'd themselves by flight, left nevertheless behind them all the Baggage, with the King's Utensils of pure Gold. Now because this memorable Slaughter was chiefly occasion'd by Gold, the Natives have never since car'd to dig it for fear of losing their Country, and becoming Slaves thereby.

The Head of the dead King was immediately lop'd off by the Conquerors, who carry'd it to Loanda, together with the Crown and Scepter. There they bury'd it, the whole Chapter assisting at the Obsequies. This Battel, commonly look'd upon to have been miraculous, I my self have seen painted upon the Wall in the Church of our Lady of Nazareth, where the Head is bury'd; and have also had it related to me, after the manner as I have told it, by a Portuguese Captain that was present at it. He also told me, that after the Battel, while they were in pursuit of the Enemy, he hapned to come into a House where he saw two Breasts of Meat roasting by the fire. Having driven out the People, according to the military Custom, and being exceeding hungry, he fell to taking them off the Spit, but had no sooner touch'd them than he perceiv'd them to be Mans-flesh. By this may be seen, that tho generally speaking there be no Anthropophagi (Man-eaters) in Congo, yet the Necessities of War drove the People to great Shifts in this Marquisate.

The Portugueses did not pretend to any Right to the Crown of Congo, having been sent by the Pope, tho they had taken it in War, but said, they were ready to resign it whenever they should be so requir'd. Now because by the death of Don Antonio, so many Disorders arose, and every one thought it his Right to command, rather than Duty to obey; thence insu'd innumerable Slaughters, and great Destruction. I propos'd to the King to go with his Army and take possession of San Salvador, a City where formerly his Ancestors resided, whence he might send an Ambassador for the Crown and Scepter to the Governor of Loanda, without a Letter, and through the Province of Pemba, for otherwise he might be hinder'd by the Duke of Bamba his Enemy: and if he happen'd to be stop'd by those People, he should have Orders not to tell them he was an Ambassador, lest they should detain and put him to death, which instead of preventing Mischiefs, would cause more. The King hearkning attentively to all I said, after I had ended my Proposition, turn'd about to his Relations and Friends, and spoke after this manner: The Father (says he to them) knows all; meaning, that I had discover'd the Designs of the Ethiopians; and adding moreover, that he approv'd of my Proposal, but that it could not be well put in execution till the Corn was off the Ground; but as soon as Harvest was in, he promis'd me that he would march with his Troops to San Salvador, to grub up the Woods, and take possession thereof, together with the Lands and Habitations thereabouts. In times past that City had been Metropolis and Capital of Congo, where the King resided with his Court. There also liv'd a Bishop and his Chapter, a College of Jesuits, and a Monastery of our Order, all maintain'd at the cost of the King of Portugal. In our Convent always resided the Father Superior of our Order in these Parts. But since, through frequent Wars, both this City, and the Country about it, was become a Den of Thieves and Robbers.

Without this City is the Pombo, or great Market, built by the Giaghi, where Mans Flesh was accustomed to be sold like to that of Sheep and Oxen. The Portugal Merchants, who resided here in great numbers on account of Traffick, refus'd to buy this Flesh, and rather chose to have the Slaves alive, whereby to fill their Purfes with good Gold, than to have their Bellies stuffed with such barbarous Food; and on this account they pretend they have a Licence to buy Slaves, which however they could never produce to this day. The Giaghi above mention'd are the most barbarous People in Nature, of whom, or of the Conversion of the Queen of Singa, I shall not treat, because that Subject is handled at large Merolla. by F. Francis Moria Gioja of Naples.

I told the King likewise I would go to Sogno, and expect the return of the Smack from Loango, and therein transported my self to Loanda. I advis'd him not to let August pass before he dispatch'd his Ambassador, assuring him he should no sooner arrive at Loanda, but have all the Respect paid him which was due to his Minister; and the present Portuguese Governour being almost out of his time, would deliver the Crown for a small Present, which perhaps another would not; and that the F. Superior and I would crown him, which being done with the Portugueses Consent, none would dare to question it.

I then ask'd two Favours of his Majesty; First, That he would please to pardon a certain Rebel that had caus'd himself to be proclaim'd King of Congo, but was now a Fugitive in the Dominions of Sogno, and that ever since his Army had been routed by that of his Majesty: I requested him likewise not only to forgive him, but also to afford him the Government of some City, palling my word that he should prove an Obedient and Loyal Subject for the future. The King gave his Word presently that he would do all I desir'd; but I not caring to trust altogether to that, caus'd him to give me his Oath upon the Crucifix to perform it, to the end the Criminal might not afterwards be disappointed and punish'd. My other Request was, That his Majesty would restore to the Count the Country of Chiovachianza, to the end that having that Prince for his Friend, as well as the Portugueses, he might reign secure for many years. This likewise without any scruple he consented to.

How little reason I had to ask any Favour on behalf of the aforesaid Rebel, may appear by what follows. This Mock-King Don Garcia (for so was his Name) coming to visit a Missioner of our Order, one F. Michael da Torino, then in the City of Cussa in Congo, after he had been very courteously receiv'd by him, and whilst the Father and he were talking together, a Fire suddenly broke out in the Church: The Mock-King soon perceiving it, immediately order'd all his Followers to do what they could to extinguish it, which yet gain'd so far upon them, that in a short time not only the Church was burnt to the ground, but the Sacrists or Vestry. Don Garcia seem'd extremely concern'd, which nevertheless was all but feign'd, he having been the Contriver of all, as I was afterwards told by Father Michael, who by a Stratagem got it out of one of the Followers, that Don Garcia made the whisp of Straw himself, and giving it to one of the Negroes, order'd him to fire the Church. This he did to make his Zeal appear the more by his endeavours to quench the Fire, not thinking the Flames would have increas'd as they did. As a Reward for this great Diligence of his he was forthwith excommunicated by the said Missioner, who soon after departed that Country. Don Garcia not long afterwards coming to Sogno, was absolv'd of his fault by my Companion F. Benedict, upon his Repentance.

Whilst I continu'd in Lemba, which was about twenty days, the Church was very much frequented: At day-break the third part of the Rosary was sung by those that were going Journeys, especially by the Women who went to work in the Fields: Three hours after the same was perform'd by the better sort of People, adding moreover the Saints Litany; and sometimes, as often as ever I could, I said Mass: At night was sung the other part of the Rosary, together with the Litany of our Lady. This present year they kept Lent fifteen days before ours, by reason they regulated it according to the course of the Moon, but which they did not let me know for fear I should put it off fifteen days longer; they nevertheless observ'd the ordinary course of forty days. To prevent my coming to know the Conclusion of it, the Saturday before they came to me with an Amusement, saying, If your Reverence bears a great shooting and shouting to morrow morning, you must know it is on account of some new Acquisition added to our King's Dominions. I could not but believe them, tho I knew what they spoke of happen'd the night I came into the City, for then the Marquis of Martari enter'd in Triumph for having subdu'd two Princes, whose Dominions border'd on the Kingdom of Micocco; and the same night the said Marquis came to give me welcome, looking upon my arrival as a good Omen. The next morning according to my Information, whilst we were in the Saints Litany, I heard a great firing of Muskets, beating of Drums, sounding of Trumpets, and other Noises of various Instruments. God forgive you (cry'd I) for having thus impos'd on me: If I had but known that your Lent was at an end, I could have bless'd the Palms last Sunday, and all should now have been done that was necessary for a Preparation for Easter: Nevertheless I have that Charity as to dispense my Blessings to all such as have observ'd this holy Time faithfully.

The mentioning of Micocco puts me in mind of a memorable Story told me by

by the Superior Father Thomas da Seftola, concerning a certain Millioner who travel'd into this Country, and after having baptiz'd about fifty thousand Souls died there. His Name I have forgot, but the Particulars of his Labours are known to all.

This Person would needs go to wait on the King of Micocco, by whom having been courteously and kindly receiv'd, he began to treat with him about introducing the Christian Religion into his Dominions. At the very first proposal the King shew'd an inclination to believe that was the true Faith which the Millioner propos'd, and consequently offer'd to be baptiz'd: The Priest told him that before he could admit him to the Font, he must submit to be catechiz'd: He seem'd very willing to comply with what was requir'd, and after having been well instructed, prepar'd himself to receive Baptism; when all of a sudden a thought came into his head, suggested no doubt by the Devil, which he deliver'd after this manner: Father, before I am baptiz'd I would beg two Favours of you, which you must not deny me, and they are, first, to grant me half of your Beard: and, secondly, To afford me a Successor from your Loins, for which purpose I will cause all my Women to be brought before you, to the end you may chuse her you like best: We are all mortal you know (proceeded he) and therefore if you should either die, or take a fancy to leave us, who shall support or maintain the new Religion which you have planted among us? To what purpose should I submit to entertain a new Law, if I have no prospect of its continuance? Grant therefore that I may have a Son of your Body, who possessing his Father's rare Qualities, may be a means to transmit this Doctrine more securely to Posterity. I must beg of you not to refuse me, for I cannot consent to be baptiz'd if you do. The modest Father was much surpriz'd, and smiling, answer'd, That the strangeness of his Request was so extraordinary, that he could neither gratify him in one nor the other of his Desires. The King's reason for his first Request was, only that he might lay up the Hair, and shew it upon occasion to have belong'd to the Introducer of the Christian Religion into his Country; and who knows but his Subjects out of blind Zeal might have worshipp'd it? The second needs no explaining. 'Tis certain we have been always exceeding cautious how we let the Negroes have any thing from us that they might probably pay Adoration to. As concerning the before-mention'd Bull call'd by the Congbeses of the blessed Sacrament, and their lighting Candles when they open it, the Portuguese Nuncio was acquainted with it, and answer'd, that that venerable Effigies being on it, the People might be permitted in their simplicity to worship it.

When I had been about eight days at Lemba, I was seiz'd with a double Tertian Ague, and moreover broke out from the Navel upwards in so many Boils and Scabs, that I had not the least rest either night or day. But my greatest trouble was, the want of an Interpreter to administer the Sacrament of Penance, which I had not provided, because the Letters sent me were well writ, and the Language good. The Secretary was old, and a Boy I had with me too young to be trusted with Confessions. Whilst I was thus sick, I was not only frequently visited by the King himself but he would likewise send every six hours to know how I did: The Queen also, and the Infanta Donna Monica sent often to enquire after my Health, and withal presented me with several Refreshments. Having a mind to be let blood, the King's Uncle would needs do that Office for me, not caring to trust any body else, which he perform'd with that niceness that I scarce felt the Lance enter my Vein: This, with the help of a certain Purge I brought from Venice, did me a great deal of good. Being somewhat recover'd of my Indisposition, I forthwith resolv'd to be gone, and in order thereto made the King acquainted with my Intentions: He seem'd much displeas'd, but notwithstanding, perceiving my Resolutions was fain to acquiesce. I told him I did not intend to go by the way of Roma for several Reasons, but design'd to go by Sogno, to the end I might meet with the Smack if I could possible: I beg'd of him he would send some of his People along with me to conduct me as far as Chiova, a Country belonging to Sogno, or to Zariambala, an Island of the same Dominions. His Answer was, that he would willingly comply with any reasonable Request of mine, but much wonder'd at my so sudden departure, especially if I design'd to go without taking leave of his Mother. I told his Majesty, that the reason I had not hitherto done it was on account of my Indisposition, of which I was but just then recover'd, but that I design'd to wait on her, God willing, that very night. Pursuant to my Promise I went not long after towards her Majesty's Court, and at my first entrance I met two Servants with Torches, in the second room two more with four Servants, and two in the third with more Attendants, it being night: They introduc'd me into the Queen's Presence, whom I found sitting wrapt up in a Cloak, which was likewise thrown under her Arm, having nothing but her Smock under it, and her Daughter sitting on a Carpet by her. After having address'd my self briefly to her by way of taking leave, she started up in a Passion, and setting her hands to her sides, said, What will the World say, if after having obtain'd a Minister of the Gospel with so great difficulty, we should part with him so easily? No, no, it must not be: I will speak to the King my Son, that he by no means shall suffer you to go. Madam (reply'd I smiling) if your Majesty has done me the honour to buy me, I desire to know in what Pombo or Market it was, and what you gave for me, that I may restore the Price to you, with Thanks, for be gone I must. The hearing of this caus'd no small laughter in the Company, especially in the Queen her self. I added further, If I am not suffer'd to transport my self to Loanda, how can I pretend to bring about what I have promis'd, and you so earnestly desire? This said, I was immediately dismiss'd. The Name of this Queen was Donna Potentiana, her Nature agreeing therewith, having always endeavour'd to be powerful, and a great Enemy to the Queen-Dowager Donna Anna, and to Donna Agnes another Queen. These three Women have often put this poor Kingdom into a flame, each having desir'd to have her Husband crown'd, and for that purpose did all separately endeavour to get a Capucin Missioner amongst them, which has occasion'd the death of so many Priests, and made our Superior not very ready to let any Missioners go to Congo.

Being just upon setting out on my Journey, the King offer'd me a Present of Slaves, which I refus'd, telling his Majesty that we had more than sufficient in our Convent at Sogno: I nevertheless accepted one to wait on me during my Journey, tho I had thirteen at home whom I employ'd in the Service of the Church, and in that of those that came to visit us. His Majesty seeing I had refus'd his offer of Slaves, resolv'd to send some People to accompany me, which indeed I desir'd, among whom were two of his Relations, to the end that I might be the better receiv'd where-ever I came. Over and above the two things formerly mention'd, I requested two Favours more of the King, and they were, first, That I might have leave to level that obscene and sacrilegious Place before-mention'd, if it were yet in being, where so many Sorceries and Villanies had been practis'd: And, secondly, That I might take away the Banners from the Burial-places in the Fields, being both superstitious and blameable. Having obtain'd these my Demands, I took my leave of his Majesty and departed.

When we were got as far as the River which bounds the Kingdom of Congo that way, my Companions and Followers being many, some arm'd with Guns, and others with long Pikes, after the manner of the Country, by reason we had no Boats on that side, we made signs to the Inhabitants of the other to come and fetch us over in their Canoos. When this was done, our People call'd three Assemblies among themselves, I not being able to guess at the Conclusions of either, tho I partly thought that the reason must have been, either that they were afraid of being render'd suspected by coming arm'd, or else that they did not care to venture themselves in the Dominions of Sogno, out of a distrust they had of the People. At last three great Canoos came over, but not near sufficient to transport all of us: Into one of these having put me with my Interpreter, they promis'd they would soon follow, but were worse than their words; for leaving me to the mercy of the Winds and Tide, they went their ways, and having reach'd the other side of the River, the Mani of the place propos'd to me to stay there all night to baptize some Children, and next morning I should be going as early as I pleas'd onwards of my Journey. This Proposal was not at all displeasing to me, especially since I had a more than ordinary desire to see whether the Congbese People would follow me or not; those two that were of the King's Relations having promis'd me that they would conduct me as far as our Convent in the Banza of Sogno. As soon as Morning came, the Mani thunder'd in my Ears, That if I would needs be gone, I must unloose my Purse-strings before I enter'd the Boat again: With all my heart (quoth I) altho I had already satisfy'd those Watermen that brought me over. Tell me (said I) how much you demand, and you shall have it. Fifteen Libonchi (reply'd he) which are about ten Roman Giulios. When I was about to pay him what he demanded, he cry'd he must have thirty Libonchi, having been mistaken before. There are thirty for you (answer'd I) which which having laid down, up starts a Fellow and cries, 'Tis a sign the Mani has not been very conversant in Wateridge, since he takes thirty for what he should have three-score. Be they ten times as much I will pay them (reply'd I) since once paying goes for all. This said, I laid down the full of what they demanded, and went into the Boat. Towards night when I thought we were got near the Land of Sogno, I discover'd an Island where the Watermen immediately run ashore. I was not landed, when a monstrous Fellow, with a Countenance like to a great ugly Wizard, came up to me, and told me in a haughty tone, that he had Orders from the Secretary of Congo to bring me ashore. How can that be (reply'd I) when I left the Secretary of Congo in Congo my self, how then should he come here? I say (reply'd he) the Secretary of the Kingdom of Congo requires your Presence. Now it seems the Mani of this place laid claim to that Title. I answer'd then this proud Messenger, Pray tell the Secretary your Master, that I desire to be excus'd from waiting on him, being not well, and besides going to Sogno for recovery of my Health. He came a second time, and more importunately than before commanded me to come ashore: Whereupon I desir'd him with that meekness that became me to acquaint his Lord that I was a Missioner, and, tho unworthy, Superior of the Mission into Sogno, being just come from Congo, where I had three hundred arm'd Men assign'd me by the King Simantamba for safe Conduct, all whom I had nevertheless sometime since parted with, for the truth whereof I appeal to the Watermen that brought me. The Mani or Secretary hearing this, call'd for the Watermen to inform himself of the truth, who attesting what I said, he then sent for a Sognese to see if he knew me, who confirming what he had heard before, he immediately dispatch'd away this Muscivongo or Sognese to me, to beg of me for God's sake that I would come to him; or that, if I so pleas'd, he would come in Person to fetch me, excusing himself for having sent so saucy and ill-bred a Messenger at first, who having exceeded his Orders should be surely punish'd. This Language is something like (quoth I) and since he intreats me for God's sake, in God's Name will I go to him. Then after having recommended my self to the Protection of the Almighty, I went ashore. The Mani gave me to understand that he would come forthwith to pay me a Visit, but I desir'd the Person that brought me the Message, to acquaint his Master, that betimes in the Morning I would wait on him without giving him the trouble of incommoding himself by a Night-visit to me. He treated me with a Goat, Fruit, and a Pot of the Country Wine, together with a flask of Brandy mixt like a Julep, which I could not imagine how he could get, and for the 30 Libonchi's I had paid his Subjects he restor'd me sixty. The same hour of my arrival I began to baptize near a House where the Mistress was a Bed. In the Court of this House were planted several Goards with Leaves like unto ours, but the Fruit was green and pulpy, and of an excellent taste. This Court being not well able to contain the great concourse of People that throng'd thither, they must necessarily exceedingly trample the Woman's Ground: She began to bawl out therefore as if she were mad, but the People taking little or no notice of her, crowded rather the closer. Whilst I was administering the holy Sacrament of Baptism, this Woman cry'd out with greater vehemence than before, which caus'd me to hold out my staff to her, wherewith I supported my self being scarce able to stand, to make her quiet, not knowing at that time that she was the real Mistress of the House: When she, either taking that sign for a Threat, a thing always abhor'd by me, or else mov'd by some other wicked design, catch'd up a Spade angrily, and fell to digging round her ground where the People were (an Action always superstitiously observ'd by them) without any body so much as speaking a word against it: After she had so done, she began to bawl out again as if she had been bewitch'd. I perceiving her to persist in her Obstinacy, made the same sign to her as before to be quiet, whereupon she immediately run as hard as she could drive to call a Witch to bewitch me: As she ran along she cry'd to herself, What shall a Stranger thus abuse a Native? Must I be drove out of my own House by I know not who? No, no, if I cannot get him away by fair means, I will have his Soul out of his Body by foul. She soon after appear'd again, bringing along with her a Witch and a Scholar of hers. As soon as the People were gone, these two laid themselves down on the ground, leaning against a Wall. I knew them well enough to be what they were by the fashion of their Cloths. On their Heads they had a piece of Cloth folded round like a Turban, so that one Eye was only to be seen; with this the old Witch look'd look'd stedfastly upon me for some time, grumbling after a brutish manner to herself all the while: Then with her hand she proceeded to scrape a small hole in the ground; at the sight of this I immediately order'd my Interpreter to be gone, being more concern'd for him than myself; for as a Priest that had always trusted in God, I doubted not but to render her Charms ineffectual as to myself. I commanded the Devil that he should not come near, but she little regarding what I did, went on with her Sorceries. I order'd the evil Spirits a second time to be gone, which she perceiving, giving her Scholar a lusty slap over the face, she bid her be gone and leave her alone: At my third Command she departed also, but return'd next Morning betimes, practising over her devilish Arts as before. I resolv'd not to stand long in one place, thereby to avoid the design she had upon me to bewitch me to death, that having been the reason of her making a hole in the Earth. It seems their custom is, that when they have a mind to bewitch any one mortally, they put a certain Herb or Plant into the hole they have so dug; which, as it perishes and decays, so the Vigor and Spirits of the Person they have a design upon will fail and decay. I propos'd to myself to spend my time in baptizing, till the Watermen that belong'd to my Boat return'd to me; but it so happen'd that I had done all that I had to do before any one of them came. I then went down to the River-side a little way distant, whither the Witch follow'd me: When I had gone down thrice, endeavouring all along to avoid her, and finding I could not, I sat me down by the Water-side in expectation of the Watermen's coming: This the Hag perceiving, she likewise squat her self down over against me. The People being curious to know what would be the event of this Contest, had hid themselves in an adjoining Field of Millet, which grew about ten or twelve hands high, which I knew nothing of. Whilst I was thus sitting, and observing that vile Wretch so near me, it put me in mind of the saying of the wise Man, Mulier nequam Plaga mortis: A wicked Woman is a deadly Wound. Then I address'd my self to God, saying, O Lord, the Cause is thine, thy Honour lies at stake, and so much the rather by reason that the Inhabitants of this Island are but very little acquainted with thee. As for me, I am but a poor Worm in respect of thy Majesty: Do thou work in me, for without thee I can do nothing. This said, I commanded her once more in the name of the Blessed Trinity and the Holy Virgin to be gone, and withal blowing gently towards her, she all of a sudden giving three leaps, and howling thrice, fled away in a trice. The swiftness of her Motions were so extraordinary, that they were wonder'd at by all that saw them, and thought impossible to be perform'd by any human Power. When the Witch began to fly, the People came forth of their holes, and running after her with several reproachful Exclamations, cry'd out, The Devil is fled and the Priest not mov'd: The Devil take all Witches and Witchcraft. I being surpriz'd at the hearing of so great a number of Voices in my favour, gave immediate Thanks to the Supreme Disposer of all things, and more especially when I heard them cry further, God prosper Christianity! God prosper Christianity!

Soon after the Watermen appear'd, The Father returns to Sogno. whom I thought to have hid themselves likewise as the others had done, but it seems they had not: I gave them all the good words I could, that they might go off presently, which they did not long after. The second night after our leaving this place, we came to the Island of Zariambola belonging to Sogno, where I thought myself secure: As I went up the Canal, before I landed, I met with a Nephew of the Count's, whom I acquainted that I was just come from Congo with good News for the County of Sogno. This was not spoken to a deaf Person, for it was immediately carried to the Count's Ears. Next morning the Mani of the place pretended that he would provide me another Boat to transport me farther, but after a good deal of time lost none appear'd. It was my good fortune that the afore said Relation of the Count's hapned to return again that way, who perceiving that I had been made a fool of and abus'd by the Mani, fell into a great Passion, and kicking against the ground, began to reprove him after this manner; Is it thus that you behave your self in my Uncle's business? I will take care that as soon as I get to Sogno you shall be sure to be depriv'd of your Government. The Mani began to excuse himself, affirming that he had assign'd me a sufficient number of Watermen, and that if I were not gone it must have been their fault. Coming to an Anchor afterwards about midnight in the Port of Pinda, my Boatscrew fled, not giving me an opportunity to return their Kindness. I then landed, and and went straitway to our Convent. Next morning the Count, with a greater Attendance than ordinary, came to see and welcome me home. As soon as I saw him, I broke forth into these words, Did not I tell your Excellency, that if I could not well accomplish my Mission by Land, I would do it by Water? When he, without answering me a word, fell down immediately on the ground to kiss my Feet, which he would needs do, tho I hinder'd him all I could, and my Brethren that were then present much wonder'd at it. Being much asham'd of what he had done, I presently lifted him up, and we afterwards slep'd aside to discourse of the Particulars of my Expedition. I acquainted his Excellency with what had pass'd between me and Don John Simantamba, concerning the restoring of Chiovachianza. He seem'd very well pleas'd with the News, and said, that was what he had most desir'd. I then advis'd him to reestablish Don Garcia, who at that time liv'd within his Dominions. Which Counsell of mine he readily agreed with, having been all along hitherto forc'd to maintain him at his own Charge, and contrary to his Inclinations, only through Policy. As soon as our private Discourse was at an end, Father Andrew da Pavia, one of the two Missioners that I had left behind me, told me, that there was a Dutch Ship ready to set sail for Loanda and that if I thought fit I might take that opportunity to carry so much good News to our Superior there, and the Governor. To which I answer'd, that I did not much care to go so quickly to Sea again, desiring rather to repose my self till the return of the Smack from Loango, according to my Promise given the Commander thereof. Hereupon Father Andrew undertook himself what I refus'd, and in order thereto took leave of the Count that very Minute. Making this Voyage in a Dutch Ship, which are commonly pretty good Sailers, he return'd to us again in less than a Months time. Having brought the News to the Governor, he said, he embrac'd him heartily, and told him, he could never have wish'd for any thing better, since the Way would probably be now open'd to Congo, to the great benefit of the Portugueses.

In confirmation of this I must further add, that when I was going a second time to Sogno from Loanda, as I was taking leave of the Governor, he earnestly recommended to me to procure leave from the Count for the Portugueses to trade within his Dominions. When the Farmers of the King's Revenue that stood by, answer'd; A free Trade with Sogno can signify little or nothing to us, that Country being like a large Tree, where nothing is to be met with but Branches and Leaves; when a Voyage to Congo would furnish us with not only Leaves but Fruit.

Lobo the late Governor of Loanda, whilst he was in Office, acquainted the Royal Chamber, that he desir'd to have the Crown of Congo in his possession; but whatever diligence was made use of for that purpose, it could by no means be found. Then he commanded a new one to be made of Silver gilt, to the end that when the Conghefe Ambassador came for it, he might have it ready to give him. The King of Portugal coming to the knowledge of the Crown's being lost, writ both to the Bishop and Governor, that they should make it their Business to find out in whose hands it was last, and punish him as if he had stolen it. Father Andrew, through the short warning he had of his Journey, was not able to give any account when the Conghefe Ambassador was to arrive; but afterwards, at the return of the Smack from Loango, I going to Loanda in it, acquainted the Governor that it would be in the Month of August. August came, yet no Ambassador appear'd, which made us Missioners not a little concern'd, having given out every where that he would certainly come then.

A little after meeting with some Negroes newly come from Congo to this City, they inform'd us that they had met the Ambassador on the Road with a great Retinue. The Sognefe Ambassador being likewise in this City at that time, to congratulate the Bishop's access to the Bishoprick, had information that he was stop'd by the Duke of Bamba's Orders, as he came through his Dominions, that Prince having been always an Enemy to Congo, on account of his Pretences to that Crown, founded on his descent from Donna Anna, one of the before-mention'd Rival-Queens. The Portugueses were satisfy'd with his sending, and all things had taken effect, but for some Troubles that ensu'd: For the new Governor was about making War on the Queen of Singa, who had destroy'd a Territory belonging to the Portugueses with Fire and Sword, and carry'd away the Sova, or Lord of Singa and his Wife into Slavery.

Amongst other Services done the King of Portugal, by Lewis Lobo the former Governor

Disappointment in the Affairs of Congo.

Merolla. Governor of Loanda, one was, that he laid the first Foundation of a Communication with Congo, and render'd that Kingdom dependant upon Portugal, as likewise made a Crown for the King thereof, at his own proper Costs. The crowning of this King we did not doubt shortly to effect, notwithstanding what had happened, especially since Father Andrew da Pavia was negotiating earnestly about it.

Whilst this was in agitation, the Father Superior, with the rest of us, did all that in us lay to promote the replanting of Christianity in Cacongo, calling in to our assistance the Governor himself, and the Royal Chamber, who were so well affected to our Proposals, that they told us, that whatever small Benefit they could propose to themselves by Traffick with this Kingdom, yet would they assist us to their Power in the introducing of Christianity there; and that the first Ships they had at liberty should be employ'd in that Mission. The new Governor was extremely diligent in furthering this Affair, and the Bishop rather more than he. I told them that not only Portuguese, but likewise Italian Priests would be necessary to alienate the Minds of that People from Jealousies and Suspicions. To the same purpose I had formerly writ to the then Vice-Superior, Father Joseph Maria da Bufetto, when I was sent for by the King of Cacongo, and he had sent my said Letter to the Sacred College. Our Father Superior likewise had dispatch'd my second Letters to the same College, which I sent to him on the same account.

Another Attempt for the Conversion of Cacongo. Matters being thus dispos'd, a certain Head of a Convent in this City, having been fully inform'd by Ferdinand Gomez of the King of Cacongo's Inclinations to embrace the Christian Faith, resolv'd to take the Task of Preaching it to him upon himself. For this end he gave out, that he had receiv'd Orders from his Superiors to transport himself to Capinda, well knowing that I could not go by reason of an Infirmary I then labour'd under. He also procur'd Letters from our Superior, to recommend him to our Convent at Sogno, where he was consequently very courteously receiv'd. Thence he sent a Portuguese Priest, his Companion, to Cacongo, enjoining him to speak with the King. Without this Person he could never have had any hopes of the Success of his Mission, being not at all skill'd in the Congheze Language, which this Priest spoke very well. He nevertheless could not obtain the Speech of the King, which caus'd him to write to him in his Superior's Name; but getting no Answer, he began to despair: Whereupon returning back, they both came again with shame to Loanda.

Afterwards Father Andrew da Pavia took upon him to write to the said King, signifying to him that he would come and baptize his Majesty, whenever he should please to appoint him. It was reported about this time that all Foreign Missioners were to depart by Order of the King of Portugal, and that all our Convents were to be surrender'd to those (a bad Report for us Capucins, as you shall hear more hereafter) of the aforesaid Order. Whereupon the aforesaid Superior, tho he did not well care that Pavia should go, yet that he might prepare the way for him, and build a Convent there, he earnestly press'd him to it. At Pavia's arrival the King sent him word, that he could not consent to see him, having formerly given his Promise to me whom he expected; and that with me he look'd not only for an Exercise of the Sacred Ministry, but likewise for Trade and Commerce, by means of a Merchant I was to bring along with me to settle in his Dominions for that purpose.

Among all the Kingdoms which I have seen in this Part of Ethiopia, none pleas'd me so much, either for Commodiousness or Profit, as this of Cacongo; which good Qualities inclin'd not a few besides myself to be desirous of going thither. The Commodiousness of it consists in its lying between three Ports much frequented by Strangers. The first and most famous of these is that of Loango, the second that of Capinda, and the third and last that of Cacongo it self, but which is not very secure. This Kingdom for the most part is flat, with an Air indifferently wholesom, and a Soil not unfruitful, by reason of frequent Showers, and the Moulds being generally black, whereas in others Parts of Ethiopia it is either sandy or chalky. The Inhabitants of this Country, considering they have been born Pagans, are more courteous and humane than ordinary; and tho they are Infidels, they cherish and respect our Priests. Whilst the Plague was amongst them, they burnt their Idols, saying, If they will not help us in such a Misfortune as this, when can we expect they should? This Passage I heard whilst I was in Sogno; and it griev'd me extremely that I had not an opportunity to go, and further such good Motions in them for their Souls sakes.

Thus

Thus much for Cacongo and its Inhabitants.

An Account of Angola. I must now give some short account of the Kingdom of Angola, tho I have been only perfectly acquainted with the Provinces of Dante and Bengo.

Loanda. Before we proceed, let us stop a while in the City of Loanda, where I have been 3 times, once upon Business, and the other two times I lay there a great while sick. To speak only of what I know, Loanda is the Metropolis, not only of this, but of all other neighbouring Kingdoms that belong to the Portugueses. Here resides the Bishop of Congo and Angola, together with a Chapter of about eight or nine Canons. The Governor of this City preceeds all others in any of the Portuguese Conquests in Ethiopia. Here are three Convents of Religious Persons, viz. one of Jesuits, another of bare-foot Carmelites, and a third of Friars of the third Order of St. Francis. As to these two last, the Carmelites have a Mission out of the City in the said Kingdom, where at present lives a Secular Priest, through the great scarcity of Regulars. Among the Jesuits there was a famous Missioner, adorn'd with many good Qualities, and a virtuous Life, who travelling about indefatigably into all Parts of the Kingdom, to throw down and grub up the Idols and Trees that the Pagans worshipp'd, was thought to have been made away by some of those People. Here is likewise a House of our Order, where our Father Superior resides, who is thence to support the Missions by the Charity of the good People there. Our Church here is more than ordinarily frequented on account of its being dedicated to the glorious St. Anthony of Lisbon, so call'd by the Portugueses; as likewise that there are several Martyrs Bodys kept in it, which have been transported hither from Rome. It is a Royal Chappel, and has two Congregations of the Rosary, allow'd by the Dominicans who have no abode here. Here three times a Week is sung a third part of the Rosary, and three times more throughout the Year Discipline is us'd. The Brotherhood has built a Chappel eight square, with a large Cupola of an extraordinary height; which being a thing uncommon here, is extremely admir'd. Under it there is a Vault for Burial, which is not customary in the other Churches. This Vault was first built for the Body of Father Francis Licodia, a bare-foot Frier of the Province of Syracuse, who died sometime before my arrival here: A great concourse of People assist'd at his Burial, his Death having been proclaim'd throughout the City by Boys. The Peoples Devotion was so remarkable at his Funeral, that tho a prodigious Whale was cast ashore at that time, yet did it not in the least raise their Curiosity. The Jesuits with whom we entertain'd an affectionate correspondence, put him under-ground, and Father Ribera of the same Convent preach'd his Funeral Sermon. This Father was zealous in breeding up Children in the Fear of God; for he had got a great company of white Boys, whom he habited like Capucins, teaching them the Principles of the Christian Religion adays, which they repeated and sung over anights. Of those in my time I found to the number of sixty, tho Father Francis was dead. While I was here, this good Person's Body was discover'd on account of burying our Superior, Father John da Romano, in his Vault. His Corps was entire in the Coffin; on the Lid of which his Picture was painted to the Life. When it was open'd, some body out of Zeal took out two of his Teeth, and the Point of his Hood. How extremely devout these Citizens are towards our blessed Patron S. Francis, is fitter for another Pen to express than mine.

All I can say is, that without carrying Great Charity our Wallet at our Back, which is not here the custom, we rather abound with necessaries than want them, in such manner, that he that has a mind to bestow his Charity upon us, must send it betimes or he will have it sent back again. These good Citizens not only support our Convent in this City, but likewise several other Missions into divers Kingdoms, otherwise we could not be able to subsist. True it is, we endeavour to make some return of what is rare in those Places.

To give farther Instances of the Goodness of this People, I will add a word of the Governor. When we came hither, we found Don John di Sylva in possession of the Government of this Kingdom, who shewed so entire an Affection towards us, that whatever Memorials and Petitions we presented to him, he forthwith granted and sign'd, scarce reading them. It hapned that a certain Priest of his own Nation coming to ask a Favour of him on account of a Friend, the Governor would by no means grant it. Whereupon the Priest broke out into these words, You scarce read the Petitions of the Capucins who are Strangers, but bestow Favours on them; and to us your Countrymen you deny all we ask. To which Sylva reply'd, I do

neither open nor read the Capucins Petitions, Merolla. because I am well assur'd they will ask nothing but what is fit for me to grant; and besides, what they require of me on other Peoples accounts, I know well to be done merely out of Charity, and without any expectation of a return from those they oblige. The same Favour we found with the late Bishop, and the present. And to conclude with this Matter, I will here tell you a Story of the foresaid Father Francis: Two Fellows going to be hang'd, Father Francis mov'd by mere Charity, told the Governor, that in case he would pardon one of them, he would suffer Death in his stead. The Governor answer'd, that if he would be as good as his word, one of them should presently be unloos'd and sent away; and if he could find another would do the like good Office for the other, they should both be freed tho they were great Offenders. But tho this Proffer was made on Father Francis's side, none would appear on the other; so that one must unavoidably die for want of a Frier to release them. When they came to the place of Execution, the Governor sent to take the Halter off from Father Francis's Neck, when he was dispos'd to die, and knew nothing of any Mercy design'd him; and if Father Leonard da Nardo his Companion would have done the same, they had both escap'd, but for want of it one was hang'd.

Let us now come to the Customs and Manners both of the Portuguese and Strangers that live in this City. They are of three sorts: First, Those that come merely on account of God's Service, and for no worldly Interest, tho these are but few. The second sort are such as come to command or trade there, who are many. The third kind are likewise no small number, tho nothing comparable to the foregoing, and they are those condemn'd Persons that are sent hither by Courts of Justice, amongst which the Spiritual Courts send several descended from the Jewish Race, which are nam'd by the Citizens New Christians; these are kept from coming to the Sacred Function for several Reasons, amongst which one is for a Crime frequently practis'd by them, which I shall forbear to name for fear of offending chaste Ears. Notwithstanding this, these People are the greatest frequenters of Churches, and give the most liberally to our Convents and the Poor.

The Women being bred among Blacks, suffer themselves to be so much perverted, that they scarce retain any thing white about them except their Skins; but be this spoken with a reservation of the Good of that Sex, whereof there are some few. The worse sort take upon them to lord it over their Husbands, insomuch that if they will not live according to their Fancies, they do all they can to drive them out of their Houses, or else humble them so far, as never to go out nor take their pleasure in their Net, and under their Umbrella, according to custom. But still the worst is, that while they are under this Confinement, they may choke for want of Water, this City having none fresh but what comes from an Island about two days Journey distant. This makes good the Saying of the Wife Man, Melius est habitare in Deserto, quam cum Muliere rixosâ; 'Tis better to live in a Desert than with a scolding Wife. Likewise in eating, the Wife and the She-Black generally starve the Husband, upon which occasion I hear him, methinks, to cry out with the Poet,

O Conjux male grata Seni, male grata
Marito,
Sola tuis, Conjux, dedita Deliciis.

Some of these Women keep their Husbands Clothes from them, out of a pretence that they do not belong to them alone, but to their Family in general. The Law here is, that what comes by the Mother descends to the Daughters, and that because the Sons have wherewithal to maintain them by Marriage. When the Maids are marriageable, if their Mothers carry them to Church, they are said to do so to sell them, and therefore for the most part they keep them close. When they are marry'd, they also generally keep themselves up for one Reason or other, either on account of being big with Child, Heat, Wet-weather, or the like. When they come to be old, they don't care for being seen for fear of discovering their Wrinkles. The better sort go to take the Air in their Nets, with a Carpet thrown over them, and attended at least by twelve Persons: Two of these carry the Net, and two more bear Umbrella's on each side, and eight Moccama's (Negro waiting-Maids) four of which hold each a corner of the Carpet, and four walk before to spread the Carpet to kneel on when their Mistress goes into the Church. Whenever there is any Stage-play or Tilting, the Women, all without exception, go to it even tho they were sick.

On Holy-Tuesday they always walk on foot, and without Attendance, which they never do at any other time. To obviate such Disorders, Father Paul da Varella, and our Superior, obtain'd of the Bishop that Mass should be said in three different Churches, viz. in the Cathedral, the Parish by the Sea-side, and thirdly in our Church, two hours before day; at which great numbers assisted, which was continued in my time. At last a certain Person hapning to be kill'd coming out of a suspicious House, some ill People took thence an occasion to get this pious and good Custom suppress'd.

Of the Mulattoes, born of a White and a Black, whereof there are great numbers here, I can never say enough. They hate the Negroes mortally; nay even their own Mothers that bore them, and do all they can to equal themselves with the Whites; which is not allow'd them, they being not permitted to sit in their presence.

The Mulatto Women wear no Smocks nor Petticoats, and have only a piece of Cloth girt under their Arms; but this is nevertheless to be meant of such as have no known Fathers. The Male Mulattoes wear Stockings and Breeches, and become commonly either Priests or Soldiers, above which Condition they never rise. It was no small trouble to me to observe, that wherever these Mulattoes were born, they were presently design'd for Priests. There are great numbers of them, who not knowing how they came into the World, or whether they are descended from Jews, cannot be expected to be able to instruct others. To remedy this Disorder therefore, the new Bishop brought Orders from Rome, that none should be dispens'd with as to their irregularity. Of this these Mulattoes believing us Capucins to have been Authors, by reason that we had frequently preach'd against these Abuses, they bore us a mortal ill-will, nevertheless it has never hitherto been in their powers to do us any harm.

Those among these People that are Soldiers, and travel about the Kingdom, exact as much Service and Respect from the Negroes as the Whites, causing themselves to be carry'd about in Nets; and if it so happen that the Soua, or Mani (Governor) be not immediately ready to provide them with People for their Service, or do not treat them as they require, they will presently draw their Swords, and take whatever they can find in this Governour's House, tho they are going, not about their King's, but their own Business. If perchance they have occasion to eat on the Road, they take whatever Edibles they can meet with, without thanking the Negro they have them from; and if he should happen to murmur but in the least at their injustice, instead of making him Satisfaction, they will pay him with Bastinadoes and Blows.

Others that turn Pomberos (buyers of Slaves) and go up and down in the Country for that purpose, commit a great many unjustifiable Actions, amongst which this one seems to me most unpardonable: They will lie with the Negro-Women, and get them with Child; and some Years afterwards returning that way, will take those very Children they have so got from their Mothers, under pretence of better educating them in the City of Loanda; but instead thereof, at a certain Age, do sell or barter them away for such Commodities as Slaves are wont to be exchange'd for, and thereby grow rich by trading in their own Flesh and Blood. A barbarous Custom in truth, and not fit to be suffer'd amongst Christians, especially where Christianity is in its Infancy, as it is in these Parts. This is the Reason likewise why the Pagans do not come in faster to be converted, because they observe how many ill Actions the Mulattoes are guilty of, and yet go unpunish'd.

To prevent in some measure this bad Custom, the Governor in my time forbade the Mulattoes to trade any more this way, and order'd, that if they had a mind to travel any whither, they should pay for the Carriage, both of themselves and their Baggage, affirming, that if they went on the King's Business, they would infallibly be paid again; but if on their own, they ought to rest satisfy'd with the Expence. By these means this Mischief was for a while discontinu'd.

But this Abuse would not have been so much if it had lain only among the Mulatto's; the Whites also had their share in it, and traded like the others in their own Flesh. This comes to pass when their Black Mistress brings them forth a Child, and being of that hue it is naturally a Slave, which coming afterwards accidentally to offend, is forthwith sold according to custom. But the worst is, this is done upon the smallest Offence, and without any regard to Nature or Relation.

Merolla. A Father had two Daughters, the one a Widow, the other a marriageable Mulatta; having a mind to marry the latter, he took away the others Goods, and all she had to give with this Mulatta: The Widow in my hearing said, I will not displease my Father, let him do what he pleases, I will never oppose him; but when he dies I will sell his Daughter, because she is born of my Slave, and thus without trouble or contest will recover what is taken from me, giving her Father to understand as much in a civil way. In short, unless the Father declare one of these to be his lawful Son or Daughter, they are ever look'd upon as Slaves.

cks. As to the Negroes which inhabit this City and Kingdom, except some few that are free as being Natives, they are all Slaves to the Whites: Some are sent to the Arimi (Farms) about one or two days Journey off from the City, as to Bengo and Dante, which are well water'd with Rivers, when the other Provinces are almost parch'd up for want of Rain, and consequently not fit for Tillage. The way of manuring the Ground here is this: They cast up the Earth with Spades into a Ridge, leaving thereby a Furrow on either side, into which when the Rivers are well fill'd by Rain from the Mountains, they cut their Banks and let in the Water: After it has remain'd there some time, and the Earth is pretty well moistned, they let it out again into their Canals, and close up their Banks. When this is done, after a little while the Earth becomes proper for their Seed, which when sown after three months time is fit to be reap'd. Others of these Slaves are sent to fishing, whereby their Master maintains his Family, and sells what he has more than sufficient for that purpose. It is not to be imagin'd what a great quantity of Fish they have in these Seas, and how cheap they are to be bought. A great Providence truly! for otherwise it would be almost impossible to subsist here, especially in this City. I must confess in all my Travels I never met with the like, tho I have read in Peter Coboero's Voyages, written in Spanish, that he had been in a Country bordering upon a River wherein there were such great abundance of Fish, that the Inhabitants dry'd and made Bread of them, Bones and all. Upon these Fish the Blacks generally live altogether, whereof the Whites eat sometimes, especially anights, affirming they are much easier to be digested than Flesh. Altho these Fish have not that pleasant Taste which ours in Italy have, yet are they nevertheless well enough lik'd by the Inhabitants for want of knowing better.

These Slaves are likewise employ'd in building, which is commonly very slow. Whenever any of their Masters have a Child born, a House is begun, and goes on no faster than that Child grows. I speak this of those Whites that are able to build a House for every Child they have. The Plaister here is made of Sea-shells, whereof there are great quantities on these Shores. They have Furnaces of much the same make with ours, wherein they burn the said Shells, which make as white and good Lime as ours.

Many of these Slaves do the Office of Barbers, wherein they are more expert than the Whites, and that not only in the use of the Scissors and Razor, but likewise in that of the Lancet to open a Vein. In short, some follow one Trade, and some another; and when they have no business to do for their Masters, they are hir'd out at so much a week or month, the Profit whereof goes to their Masters; so that he that has most Slaves here is always accounted the richest Man.

The current Coins here are the Macuta's, being certain pieces of Straw-Cloth of about the largeness of a Sheet of Past-board each, and which are equivalent to our Brass Money in Europe. Those that correspond to our Silver are the Intaga's, being pieces of thick Cotton-Cloth, and of about the bigness of two large Handkerchiefs, and worth about 18 d. of our Money. They have another sort of Money call'd Folingas of Cotton likewise, but of a finer sort, and like that which Seamen use to tie about their Waistes: These are worth 3 s. 6 d. each. Those Coins that are of greater value, and answer to our Gold, are the Birami, made of fine Linen, whereof each parcel goes for 7-6, or 8 s. No Brass, Silver or Gold Coins are made use of either by Foreign Merchants or others in these Countries.

From the great variety of Slaves of different Nations in these Countries, must needs proceed the like variety and difference in Humours and Customs; and altho they are all Christians, yet I observ'd that the Law of God was not so religiously observ'd amongst them as it ought to be; for that they seem'd to me to perform the Duties of their Religion more out of fear of their Masters that had instructed them, than out of any value they they had for Divine Worship. The She-Slaves are commonly guilty of a fault, which is partly occasion'd by the White Money.

Customs of Slaves.

White Women, who not caring to be depriv'd of their Moccas, will not suffer them to marry, and therefore they steal from their Mistresses to maintain Men to satisfy their Brutal Appetites. If they happen to become with Child, no Shame is imputed either to them or their Mistresses. For our parts we do all we can to prevent it, and some Ladies say upon this occasion, that they cannot be always looking after their She-Blacks; and if any of them chanc'd to be now and then with Child, they conceiv'd it no great matter of harm: Nevertheless we often have them chastis'd both in publick and private for these and the like faults, and afterwards force them to marry the Person that had debauch'd them. But O what pains do we take to bring them to it, and how many ridiculous Arguments and Reasons do they bring to excuse themselves from this Duty and Restraint!

There are those among these Slaves that after they are thus married, will exchange their Wives with each other for a certain time, alledging in case of Re-proof, that they are not able to eat always of the same Dish. Those of the Women likewise that live out in the Country in their Masters Farms, will hire each of them a Man, upon condition that he shall not leave them till they have a Child by him, tho they are to maintain him all the while he is with them. It is mighty ridiculous to observe that the Women here, contrary to the Custom of other Nations, buy and sell, and do all other things which the Men ought to do, whilst their Husbands stay at home and spin or weave Cotton, or busy themselves in such other effeminate Actions. These Women also are so jealous of their Husbands, that if they see them but speak to any other Women they are presently in a flame, and make the place ring where they so discover them. The Bishop order'd that all Masters of Blacks should oblige them to perform the Easter-Duty under pain of forfeiting a certain quantity of Wax for every one, obliging them to bring the Certificate of their receiving and confessing to their Masters, and then all together to the Curat. These because they are often involv'd in the immediate occasion of Sin, make use of a crafty Deceit to extort Absolution from their Father Confessor: which is, that the first day of Lent the Men part, from the Women, leading a chaste Life for the present, and then appearing before the Priest, tell him they have left off their lewd

Courses, and promise never to return to them. A week or fortnight after Merolla Easter they go about till they are provided with one to satisfy their Lust all the year, without having any more to do with those they forsook before Confession.

Let us come now to the Death and Burial of these People, who being of so many different Nations, and the Remains of the Pagans, differ likewise in their Rites and Ceremonies. As to the manner of their Deaths, that may be guess'd at by their Lives, according to the Proverb, Qualis vita, finis ita. And for what relates to their Burials, I have been an Eye-witness, that in the Kingdoms of Congo and Angoij they do not bury any of their Relations, till all the rest of the Kindred be gather'd together, tho that be sometimes many days in accomplishing: Being once met, they begin the Ceremony with several superstitious Actions, as killing of Hens, with the Blood of which they besprinkle the House of the deceas'd both within and without, and afterwards throw the Carcases of the said Fowls upon the top of the House, affirming that thereby they prevent the Soul of the dead Person from coming to give the Zumbi to any of the future Inhabitants. The word Zumbi in the Language of the Country, signifies an Apparition of the deceas'd Person, they being of opinion, that to whomsoever it shall appear, that Person will presently die. This Perswasion has been so deeply rooted in the minds of these poor ignorant People, that the Imagination alone oftentimes brings them to their ends. We have seen several Accidents of this kind, insomuch that a Person that was before very well in health, shall of a sudden die miserably through the impression of these vain Delusions. Those that survive affirm, that the dead Person had summon'd him that died, especially where there had been any difference betwixt them whilst both were living.

The Ceremony of the Hens being ended, they proceed to lamenting over the dead Person; and if it so happens that any amongst them be not able to weep naturally, they have recourse to Art by holding Siliquastro, or Indian Pepper to their Noses, which causes the Tears to flow plentifully, which, without wiping they suffer to trickle down their Cheeks as fast as they please. When they have howl'd and wept for some time, they all of a sudden pass from Sorrow to Mirth, feasting heartily at the expence

Merolla. of the Person that is nearest akin to the Deceas'd, who all that while lies unburied in the House. When they have fully satisfied their ungodly Guts, they soon forget their deceas'd Friend, and never think of him more: Then the Drum beats, and they go from the Table to Dancing, and so the Ball begins: When one Company is weary another begins, and not only the Kindred, but likewise any others are admitted to dance. After they have done dancing, they retire into appointed places, where being lock'd up together in the dark, they practise all manner of abominable Pleasures, alledging, that at such a time it is lawful for them to intermix with each other at liberty. This sound of the Drum seems to be the Devil's Summons to assist at these execrable Ceremonies, and which these People run to with a more than ordinary Inclination. It is almost impossible for the Mothers to hinder their Daughters, and less possible for Masters to prevent their Slaves, who will break down Walls, or force Iron-Bars to come at them. As soon as this is done, they apply themselves to superstitious and idolatrous Practices, and so from one to the other for some time. When any Master of a Family dies, his principal Wife exposes her self to all that have a mind to enjoy her, on this condition nevertheless, that none offer to speak the least word in her Chamber.

That these Abominations are practis'd among Pagans is not to be wonder'd at; but would to God that these Tambi (Funeral Ceremonies) were not us'd among some deprav'd Christians, not only in the Kingdom of Angola, but even in Loanda it self. At the time of my residing here I was told, that not far out of this City such Enormities were committed. Our Superior accompany'd with one only Companion and some trusty Persons, immediately ran to prevent them; but being by night (the properest time for these hellish Practices) he met with the Guards, who well knowing that it was not our custom to go out of the City at that time, unless upon account of doing God some Service, presently offer'd themselves to accompany them, which being refus'd by our Superior, they persisted in their Resolutions, alledging that otherwise some hurt might happen to him, and therefore they went along with him. Being arriv'd at the place where these Ceremonies were performing, the Souldiers, to the end they might the better take the Offenders, rang'd themselves about the Walls, which consisting only of Mud and Stakes they easily broke down, hooping and hollowing like mad while they were doing it. The wicked Wretches that were not few in number, perceiving their Walls broke down, and their House surrounded, immediately betook themselves to flight, leaving only the Wife of the Deceas'd behind them, who being oblig'd by her infernal Priest not to stir nor speak, was easily taken, and by the Governor afterwards, who very well knew what she and her Company had been doing, order'd to be publicly whipt through the City.

In Massangano, a Garison of this Kingdom, so many Stones were hurl'd at a Companion of mine, for endeavouring to oppose these People in their Wicked Ceremonies, that he very narrowly escap'd having his Brains beat out by them.

When any great Lord, or considerable Person dies, the Pagans are accusom'd to spread the way where the Corps passes with Leaves and Branches. He must likewise be carry'd in a streight Line to his Grave; and therefore if any House or Wall happen'd to hinder his Passage, it is immediately pull'd down. To show themselves kind to the dead, they are commonly very cruel to the living, shutting up both together in a Tomb with Meat and Drink, to the end (say they) that the dead Lord may want for nothing in his Grave: In this they imitate the Tyrant Mazentius King of the Tyrrhenians, who in Virgil is said to join dead and living People together, till the stanch has brought them to one condition.

The Giaghi offer up human Sacrifices to the dead, as they do likewise oftentimes to the living, when they can suppose the Person they intend to honour to have occasion for Assistance either in War, or any other Urgency.

One of our Fathers having understood that within a certain Sepulchre of a great Person among these Pagans, there were two People immur'd alive, went thither in great haste to free them from their infernal and noisom Dungeon, but found to his great grief that they had some time before perish'd. But the Wickedness of these People sometimes goes further; for at the death of any of their Friends they have been accusom'd to kill one of their Slaves, to the end that he may go and serve them in the other World: To this Sin they will moreover add a Lie; for when we accuse them and get them corrected for so doing, they will excuse themselves and pretend Innocence, affirming they know nothing of the matter, even tho we had never so plain proof of it. An Instance of this follows: One of our Order having been advised that a poor Negro was just going to be sacrific'd as a Victim to his dead Master, this Father immediately ran to the Wife of the deceased Person to prevent it, who perceiving her Villany was discover'd, tho she at first deny'd it, yet afterwards confess'd it, and gave Orders to have those inhuman Proceedings stopt. In my time also there were several of these wicked Actions done, but the Persons concern'd in them always found so many shifts and subtle evasions to conceal their Offences, that we could never proceed methodically against them in order to bring them to Punishment. Now if these things are practis'd among Christians, how can we expect they should be omitted among those Negroes that have scarce heard of the Name of Christianity?

The Buryal-places among the Pagans are for the most part in the Fields, with something or other plac'd over them, according to the Quality of the Person that is buried: Some have a long and streight Horn of I know not what Beast fix'd over them; others have a large heap of Earth rais'd upon them; some have an Earthen Platter or Pipkin, or any other vessel made of Earth set over them; others make Arbours over their Graves, with a thousand superstitious interlacings and interweavings that are perform'd by their Wizards: They do not make use of a Coffin, Chest, or any other wooden thing to put the Corps in, but wrap it up in good Cotton Linen sow'd close together, and adorn'd without side with several superstitious Foole-ries, being at an Expence sutable to the Quality of the Person deceas'd. As for the poorer sort they make use only of a sort of Straw Mats, after the mode of the Country, to wrap their dead Bodies in.

Within the Dominions of Sogno every City and Province has a certain peculiar place with a Cross in the middle, where those that have not satisfy'd the Easter-Command, or that die before they are confess'd, are bury'd by themselves without the Missioners concerning themselves therein. But as for those who have receiv'd all the Sacraments before their deaths, and have been found to have religiously observ'd the last Leut, they are allow'd Christian Burial, without its being any manner of Charge to them. Also during their Sickness, and after they are confess'd, we frequently furnish them with Refreshments out of Charity, such as Confections of Tamarins, a Fruit of the Country, and the like, both cooling and cordial Juleps. Besides this we have several Slaves belonging to our Church which are skill'd in Phlebotomy, Surgery, Physick, and what not, who all do what lies in their power to recover these People when sick, or out of order: This we take care is done for them gratis, to the end they may have no occasion to run to the Wizards for help. For those that are poor and old, fatherless, lame, blind, or the like, there is an Hospital built near to our Convent, where both their spiritual and temporal Wants are supply'd by us as often as there is found occasion, or that it consists with our Abilities. This is a Charity which has not a little promoted the increase of Christianity in these parts.

Let us conclude speaking any farther of the Tambi, or Funeral Rites among the Pagans, with a Pallage that happen'd some years since in Benin, a Kingdom lying on the back Coasts of Africa, and towards Guinea, being very near the Equinoctial Line. Father Francis da Romano, Superior in the Kingdom of Ouueri, and Father Philip da Figuar, being both here on a Mission, they endeavour'd to disturb a certain abominable Sacrifice custom'd to be perform'd every Year to the Devil, for the benefit, as they alledg'd, of their dead Ancestors. This Sacrifice sometimes consisted of above three hundred Men, but at present there were only five to die, yet those all of the better sort. These Missioners under the Conduct of a certain Negro their Friend, came to the third Inclosure capable of holding many hundreds of People: Here perceiving a great multitude gather'd together dancing and singing to divers Instruments of their Musick, they clap'd themselves down in a private place, the better to observe what they were going to do. This place hapned to be that where they kept the Knives design'd to perform so inhuman an Action. Not being able to conceal themselves long, they were quickly discover'd by these wicked Wretches, who coming towards them leaping with great Indignation, they soon drove the poor Fathers out of the place they had so taken possession of. Father Francis hereupon was so little dismay'd, that crowding boldly through the thickest of the Negroes, he was not afraid to reproach their King of unheard of Cruelty: Some Courtiers hearing this, immediately

Aferolla. diately flew upon him, and beating, and using him very unmercifully, tore him out of the Crowd; when closing up their Ranks again, they perform'd their inhumane Sacrifice. Afterwards they gave the Fathers to understand, that it was their King's Pleasure, that they should forthwith depart his Kingdom. Which Command they being not very ready to comply with, the next Morning they set upon them again, with intention to have kill'd them; which they nevertheless did not do, by reason they were inform'd by two of the Courtiers there present, that the King would have them brought alive before him. Going therefore courageously to the Palace, they were notwithstanding admitted to no other Audience but Stripes and Reproaches in great plenty; and afterwards told, in reviling terms, that it was the King's express Order that they should forthwith be gone out of his Dominions. Notwithstanding which, great numbers of these insolent Negroes flew upon them like so many Hornets, and hurry'd them away to a noisom Prison. Here they remain'd no less than three Months, being buffeted, scoffed and scorn'd at all the while. At last, not contented with this ill usage, they sold them for Slaves to the Hollanders; who taking more pity upon them than these Infidels had done, set them ashore not long afterwards, safe and sound, in the Prince's Island. Hence they writ to the Sacred College to inform them of what had hapned to them; but were answer'd, that the Church had already Martyrs enough, and but two Missioners in that Kingdom, and therefore they should not for the future expose themselves so much in its Service, but proceed warily among those new Converts.

Another Persecution was undergone with chearful Countenances, and undisturb'd Souls, by two other Friars in the Island of St. Thomas, in their Journey to the Kingdom of Ouveri, contiguous with that of Benin, in both of which there were new Missions establish'd, and the Father Superior, at that time Father Francis da Monteleone, liv'd in the aforesaid Island. The Vice-Superior, Father Angelo Maria d' Aiaccio of the Province of Corfica, together with Father Bonaventura da Firenze, having but just set footing in the Kingdom of Ouveri, they were very courteously receiv'd by that King. This Prince was better bred than ordinary, having been brought up amongst the Portugueses, whose Language he was an absolute Master of, and could besides write and read a Qualification, unusual among these Ethiopian Princes. Almost at the first sight of the King, the Vice-Superior broke out into these words; If your Majesty does desire to have me to continue within your Dominions, you must lay your Injunctions on your Subjects, that they embrace the Holy State of Matrimony, according to our Rites and Ceremonies; and moreover, that whereas now the young Men and Women go naked till they are marriageable, I desire your Majesty to command that they may all go cover'd. To which the King answer'd, that as to what related to his Subjects, he would take care they should comply with his Request; but as for himself, he could never consent to do it, unless he were marry'd to a White, as some of his Predecessors had been. But what White would care to marry with a Black, even tho he were a Crown'd Head, especially among the Portugueses, who naturally despise them? Nevertheless the pious Father trusting in God's Providence to promote his own Glory, gave no repulse to the obstinate Monarch, but seem'd to approve of all he said. To bring this good Work to effect, he immediately departed, taking his way towards the Island of St. Thomas, situate under the Equinoctial Line, and reckon'd one of the nine Countrys conquer'd by the Portugueses in Africa. There he made it his Business to enquire after a White Woman that would marry a Black that was a Crown'd Head. Whereupon he was inform'd that there was one in that Island, tho of mean Condition, whose Poverty and Meanness were nevertheless ennobled by a virtuous Education, and a comely Personage. Notwithstanding he was told that this Woman was proper for his purpose, yet had he not the courage to speak to her Uncle about her, under whose Care and Protection she was; but contriving how to bring about his design, with a lively Faith in God, one day while he was saying Mass, he turn'd himself about to the aforesaid Person, conjuring him, in the presence of all the People, in the Name, and for the Service of the most high God, not to deny him one Request, which was, that he would let his Niece marry the King of Ouveri, which would greatly contribute to, if not totally effect the Conversion of that Kingdom. At the hearing of this, the good Man being wrought upon by the Pious Missioner's Reasons, could not prevent weeping, and bowing down his Head, as a Token of his Consent.

The

The young Lady not long afterwards, having first taken leave of her Relations, set out with some few Portugueses, and the Missioner, for the aforesaid Kingdoms.

Being just enter'd the Confines, she was joyfully and universally saluted by the People for their Queen, having triumphal Arches rais'd to her, and several other demonstrations of Joy paid her by the Inhabitants.

Being arriv'd at the King's Palace, she was receiv'd by that Monarch like another Rachel by Jacob, Esther by Abasheus, or Artemisia by Mausolus; and afterwards marry'd by him after the Christian manner, thereby giving a good Example to his Subjects, who soon forsook their former licentious Principles, and submitted to be restrain'd by the Rules of the Gospel, that is, were all marry'd according to the Rites and Ceremonies of the Church.

After four Years Mission into these Parts, the aforesaid two Fathers transported themselves into the Island of St. Thomas, partly to proceed further in the Dutys of their Office, and partly to oblige the King who commanded it. This good Intention of theirs, it seems, the Devil envy'd, for he rais'd up a certain Ecclesiastical Person there against them, who extremely envy'd our two Missioners. This Person had been accus'd, before their arrival, to go every six Months to the Kingdom of Ouueri to baptize that People, which brought him in the Profit of a Slave a Month, and another from the King, in consideration of his Charge and Trouble; but now finding himself depriv'd of this Gain for four years, he, together with others not well affected to Religion, rais'd the cruellest Persecution against these poor Fathers that could possibly have been thought on. He accus'd them to the Governor of the Island for Enemys to the Crown of Portugal, and that they travell'd about those Countrys with false Passes; and moreover, that to his knowledg, and in his hearing they had debauch'd the Minds of the King and Queen of Ouueri, and besides held correspondence with the Enemys of the Portuguese Dominions. All this the Governor heard patiently, yet did not immediately resolve to have these innocent Fathers seiz'd; whereupon one of those that had accompany'd the Queen to Ouueri, said to him, Take care, my Lord, of what you do, lest apprehending these Apostolical Missioners, you create a Difference between the Crown of Portugal and the See of Rome. We are much oblig'd to these Holy Men for raising our Countrywoman to a Crown. The Governor would not meddle with these Holy Men, but order'd them to be sent to Loanda, where there were likewise great Complaints made against them by the aforesaid Priest and his Adherents.

Hence they were sent to the Tribunal at Lisbon, where being declar'd Innocent, in that they had sufficient Authority from the Crown for what they had acted, their Accusers were cited to appear to make good, if they could, their Allegations; which not being able to do, the chief Calumniator, the Ecclesiastick, fled to Brazil, and the others to other Places for protection.

Father Bonaventura da Firenze, on account of his great Indispositions, return'd to Italy; but Father Angelo Maria directed his Course anew towards the Island of St. Thomas; where having perform'd the part of a good Missioner, and a good Christian, teaching by his exemplary Life what his Tongue omitted, he return'd after some time to Lisbon, and dy'd there. Until our coming into this Part of Ethiopia, these Kingdoms had not seen the face of any other Missioner; and every time any Ship came to anchor in their Harbors, the Natives would ask the Seamen if they had any Capucin on board? And if they were answer'd that they had not, then would they fly into a passion, and cry out, Must we then always lead our Lives thus like Beasts, and never have any Priests come to teach us better?

Whilst I was at Loanda, they writ to our Superior, Father John da Romano, to send them some Spiritual Labourer. He sent their Letter to the Sacred College, who writ back, that for the present Father Monteleone should go to the Island of St. Thomas and build a Convent there, to the end that whenever any Missioners came thither, they might the easier transport themselves into these Kingdoms. If there were Missioners sufficient sent, especially from the Sacred College, and the Apostolick See, I dare be positive they would find the Conversion of this part of Ethiopia easy enough, the People thereof confessing already, that they believe the Successor of St. Peter to be a most Holy Person, and one that cannot err; and consequently those that are sent by him are like him, and therefore they have no suspicion of the Italians, which would not be in respect of other Nations, in regard to their Political cal State. This Happiness, peculiar to our Nation, gives us Authority to go in our Habits into their innermost Recesses, which Priests of other Countrys would not be permitted to do. Nevertheless the Devil, the Author of all Ill, does oftentimes work so by his Ministers, that he gives us some disturbance, which notwithstanding signifies little or nothing, great numbers having been in few Years converted here. If I should say my self that I have done that good Office for thousands and thousands, I'm sure I should not lie, for I can be positive that of Men, Women, and Children, I have baptiz'd no less than 13000, and caus'd very many to marry. The short time I did this in will be the less wonder'd at, if the great numbers of People here be consider'd; and that, as I have said before in another place, one of our Order alone baptiz'd upwards of 50000. Also Father Jerom da Montefarchio of our Province of Naples (whose painful Travels and good Qualities have already been made known to the World by another hand) told me himself, before his Death, that within the space of twenty Years continuance in these Parts, he baptiz'd above 100000 Persons, and amongst the rest, the King, or rather Duke of Congobella, Tributary to the King of Micocco, together with his Nephew, and several other Persons of Quality.

Conversion of an obli-viate Black.

That these sort of People have been given to Idolatry, and the eating of Man's Flesh, I cannot deny; but then I must affirm, that they readily imbrace Christianity, and reap the Fruit of it, as may appear by what hapned to me. Our Interpreter had a certain black Slave, a very strong Fellow, but blind and obstinate to the good Advice was given him by his Master to abjure Paganism, and embrace the Christian Faith. His answer in defence of his Principles was, That the Elephant never eats Salt (so they call Baptism in their Language) and yet he became fat and large, and liv'd a long while. It seems the Holy Baptism in their Dialect is call'd Mincmungu, which is as much as to say, to season the Blessed Salt. If any one should ask, If such a one were a Christian or a Pagan? If a Christian, they would answer, He is a Christian, for he has tasted of the Salt that has been bless'd by the Priest. You must observe, that if any of these had been baptiz'd with Water alone, he would not have been very well satisfy'd. Now this Slave spoken of before, happening to be grievous sick, I went to visit him, and using a great many Spiritual Arguments to him, found it not difficult to convert him. He yielded to my Proposals, and was baptiz'd, to the great satisfaction of his Master, as well as himself, and afterwards marry'd to a Christian Woman there present. The third day after he dy'd, changing his Slavery in this Life for a glorious Liberty in the other.

To say that the Negroes, and especially the Giaghi, are always obstinate and perverse, and Man-eaters, is not to be made an Objection against them, because our Saviour says, Those that are well do not stand in need of a Physician; and the worse the Distemper, the more need of cure. This will appear by the only Instance of the Conversion of the Queen of Singa: This Queen, with the greatest part of her People, was converted by the great Pains of Father Anthony Laudati da Gaeta of our Order; the manner whereof was told me by a Portuguese Captain that was present when it was done. He said, the Queen and the aforesaid Father Anthony were standing together discoursing, when all of a sudden the Frier thus bespoke the Queen; Madam, when I behold so many large and fruitful Valleys, enrich'd and adorn'd with so many Christal Streams, and defended from the Injuries of Weather by such high and pleasant Hills, all under your Majesty's command, I cannot forbear being so bold, as to ask you who was the Author of all these? Who fecundated the Ground, and afterwards ripens the Fruit? To which the Queen, without the least hesitation, readily answer'd, My Ancestors. Then (reply'd the Capucin) does your Majesty enjoy the whole Power of your Ancestors? Yes (answer'd she) and much more, for over and above what they had, I am absolute Mistress of the Kingdom of Matamba. The pious Frier hearing this, stoop'd to reach a slender Straw that lay upon the Ground, and having taken it up, cry'd to the Queen, Madam, pray do me the favour to cause this to hang without holding in the Air. The Queen turn'd away her Face, and look'd scornfully at a Request so insignificant and inconsiderable. The Frier reforc'd his Petition, earnestly entreating her Majesty to comply with his Desires; whereupon proffering to put it into her Hand, she let it fall. Father Anthony stoop'd again to take it up, but the Queen being the more nimble of the two, got hold of it before him; The reason (quoth the Frier) why the Straw fell was, because your Majesty did not command it not to fall;

but now be pleas'd to order it to hang of it self, without help, in the Air. She did so, but it would not obey. Whereupon the zealous Frier broke out into the following Expressions, Be it known to your Majesty, O Queen, that your Ancestors have no otherwise been Authors of these fair Fields and Springs, than you are of the support of this Straw; but that the great Creator of Heaven and Earth, Christ Jesus, the only Son of God, and Second Person of the Trinity, whose Image you have here upon this Crucifix, made those and all things else, that is, was the first Cause of All. Then the Queen humbled her self, and bowing her Royal Head, submitted to own the Truth, embracing the Holy Faith, wherein she not long after dy'd; and which she had before receiv'd in her younger days, but apostatiz'd from it.

Cunning of the Blacks. The Ethiopians are not so dull and stupid as is commonly imagin'd, but rather more subtil and cunning than ordinary, as may appear by what hapn'd to a certain French Sea-Captain at Mina, on the Coast of Africa, which he told me himself, and was confirm'd to me by a Portuguese of the Island of St. Thomas, who was an Eye-witness to it. This Captain sailing along the Coasts where the Mines are, and thinking to exchange his Merchandize for Gold, was unfortunately made a Prize by a Hollander, who seizing his Ship, and putting the Seamen into Irons, carry'd their Captain, under a strong Guard, ashore before the Governor, who for a welcome, order'd him to a close Prison, loaded with Irons, and to be look'd after by about thirty strong Blacks, where he expected nothing but Death. The chief of these Negroes perceiving the Prisoner to bear so manfully what was so wrongfully offer'd him, by an earnest and stedfast look on him, discover'd both his Pity and Concern for so great Injustice done him. At last being encourag'd by the Gravity and Modesty of his Countenance, which promis'd a great deal of Prudence and Discretion, he approach'd him, and said to him, Since you have done no body any harm, and your Enemies have behav'd themselves immoderately rigorous towards you, not only in imprisoning, but likewise in depriving you of your Goods and Life, I offer my self, led thereunto by a Principle of abhorrence of such Actions, to free you. The Captain taking heart at this Proffer of the Negro's, answer'd him, If thou hast courage sufficient to deliver me from Death, and conduct me in safety to my Ship, I will in recompence reward thee with whatever thou canst ask. But how (continued he) is it possible for me to have so good fortune, when there are so many appointed to look after me? Leave that to me (reply'd the Ethiopian) for I do not doubt but I shall be able, by the help of six of my Companions whom I have already engag'd, to carry you off safe to your Ship. The way I have propos'd to do it is, by making the rest of my Companions dead drunk with good Wine, which will give us that are your Friends a liberty to act as we please. He was not long afterwards as good as his word, and the success of his Endeavours answer'd his Expectation. The Captain look'd upon his Deliverer to be rather an Angel sent from Heaven to his assistance, than a Black Ethiopian. As soon as they were got out of the Prison, they made all the haste they could, directing their Steps all that Night through thick Woods and unfrequented Paths, till at length they got safe to the Port. The Negro went aboard the Ship, where he acquainted the Dutch Guard, that the Governor had set at liberty both the Captain and his Crew, and therefore advis'd them to free their Prisoners from their Fetters, and set them at liberty. The Hollanders immediately obey'd this Order, giving credit to what word the Negro had brought them, he having been always look'd upon for an honest Fellow; and receiving a small Reward, departed.

The Captain seeing himself Master of his Ship, return'd his unfeigned Thanks to Heaven for his Preservation, and then setting open all his Chests, offer'd his Preserver what Recompence he would have: All which the Negro refus'd, alledging that what Service he had done him, was wholly on account of his being a Man of Honour, and in commiseration of his condition, and not out of any Interest or Advantage which he propos'd to himself thereby: And further, that if he pleas'd to accept of his and his Companions Service, they would follow him wheresoever he went. If that be your Intentions (reply'd the oblig'd Frenchman) let us set Sail and be gone, and I shall always endeavour to proportion my Gratitude and Acknowledgments to your Merits. This said, the Seamen did not weigh their Anchors, but cut their Cables, and hoisting Sail at the same time, to avoid falling afresh into the Hollanders Hands, stood their Course directly for France. The great Civilities shew'd both to this Negro and his Companions throughout the whole Voyage, are not to be express'd: The Seamen would often complement them; and especially their Chief, calling him their Deliverer. When they came to Land, the Captain's Relations and Friends strove which should oblige these Blacks most. When they had been about three months ashore, the Negroes advis'd the Captain to freight his Ship anew with some rich Merchandize and Curiosities, and to sail towards a place call'd Chinea, where they could conduct him to a Port not subject to the Hollanders, and known to them, where he might gain what Profit he pleas'd without any danger. Who now could have mistrusted the Preservers of their Lives? The Captain therefore considering of the Proposal, and knowing it to be as they had told him, the place they nam'd being below the Mines, freighted his Ship accordingly, and set sail again towards the Eastern Coasts of Africa. Coming to an Anchor in the Island of St. Thomas to take in fresh Provisions, where the Wind and Current are always fair for Chinea or Mina, he made what haste he could to put again to Sea: At his first coming out he had a very gentle Gale, but stood ready against the Trade or settled Wind came up, which the Portugueses call Viracao, which there rises and falls every six hours with the Tide. Then spreading their Sails, the Mariners, except the Pilot, Steersman, and another Person, together with the subtle Negroes who watch'd for some ill purpose, fell asleep. One of these Negroes set himself to cutting of Wood, to the end that with the noise of the Ax he might drown what the others intended to do. The others knock'd out the Brains of four of the Seamen, together with the Pilot, and their designs were to have murder'd all; but as Providence would have it, the Captain hearing of what had hapned by means of a little Boy, snatching up a Cut-lace and two brace of Pistols, and finding the Door bolted without, he was forced to get out at a Porthole: When he came upon Deck, and saw some of his Men lying dead, and others defending themselves, he call'd out to wake the rest of the Seamen, and then falling on soon dispatch'd four of the Negroes, amongst whom was their Chief, whose Head was instantly cut off, and his Body sent to feed the Sharks. The three that remain'd, having first confest, that their Plot was to have murder'd all the Ship's Crew, and afterwards to have run away to their own Country with the Vessel, boasting what a trick they had put upon the Christians of Europe, paid the Merit of their Folly, for they were immediately hang'd up at the Yard-arm. This happening in sight of the Island of St. Thomas, the People from the shore fir'd upon the Ship to know the occasion of it; but the Captain hanging out a white Flag, sent his Boat ashore to acquaint them how he had been us'd by the Negroes, which extremely surpriz'd both the Islanders and some others that heard it; but they more especially wonder'd how those subtle Blacks could harbour so ill a design so long. The Captain further told me, that after this he would needs go to Sogno to see the River Zaire, and try if he could thereby get into the Kingdom of the Abyssine: belonging to Prester-John. He was inform'd that that River by reason of the great number of Islands in it, and the several Canals and Rivers that run into it, was not at all safe for great Ships to sail in: He nevertheless was resolv'd to venture to satisfy himself in what he had propos'd. Being oblig'd to pass by the Kingdom of Angoij, which lay on the other side of the River, the Inhabitants thereof perceiving a Ship coming along with such People on board as they had never seen or heard of before, sent out a Canoo to them to tell them they must come and anchor in Capinda, a Port of the said Kingdom. And likewise having further understood that they were going to make Discoveries up the River, they let them know, that if they would comply with their Request, and come to harbour in their Port, they should thence be conducted in their Discovery, and buy as many Slaves and as much Ivory as they pleas'd. But above all things they advis'd them not to touch upon Sogno, affirming that People were Enemies to the Whites, and not many years before had made a great slaughter among them. The Captain, to satisfy these People, left a Boat laden with Goods with two Mariners in it, and sail'd away. The Negroes carry'd them up into the Country, and divided the Merchandize among themselves. Fifteen days past, and no news was heard of the said two Seamen, nor even of any Trade or Traffick settled by their means, and yet the Negroes gave good words, and went daily aboard the Ship to preserve a good Correspondence, drinking and carouzing at the Captain's Expence. At length the Mami or Governor of Capinda coming on board himself, accompany'd with five or six Followers, the French Captain on a sudden caus'd them to be seiz'd and clapt under Hatches in Irons, threatening that unless the two Mariners with their Merchandize

were speedily restor'd, he would not only carry them away for Slaves, but likewise as many others of that Kingdom as he could meet. We Capucines perswaded the Count of Sogno to do the Captain Justice, who upon the apprehending the Mani and his Companions, recover'd the Seamen and part of the Goods. To satisfy for the rest, the Angoij were order'd to pay twelve Slaves, which not coming, the Captain set sail with the seven he had got, putting the eighth ashore to conduct the twelve Slaves assign'd to Sogno, where he traded for three hundred Slaves, whom he carry'd to sell in the Island Hispaniola. The Captain himself told me he was extremely pleas'd that he had got a Negro Governor to present to his King cloth'd after the fashion of that Country.

By this Relation the Reader may perceive that the Negroes are both a malicious and subtle People, and I likewise must allow that they spend the most part of their time in circumventing and deceiving; yet I cannot allow, that because they are a stubborn Soil, they must be left uncultivated: Being of so perverse a nature as they generally are, they require the greater application of Instruction. But this still is to be said for them, that when you come once to eradicate their vicious Principles, they seldom or never return to their state of Damnation again.

Grievous no doubt are the Sufferings of the Missioners in these parts, whether you consider the length of their Travels, their frequent want of Necessaries, the various Climates of the Countries they pass through, the suffocating and insupportable Heats, especially to us Europeans, who fry within our Woollen Cloths, the travelling over Rocks and frightful Precipices, the often sleeping upon the bare ground, the being persecuted by Wizards and such sort of Wretches, and sometimes by bad Christians; and lastly, the losing so much Blood as we are fain to do to preserve our Healths, and a thousand other Inconveniences in Life, which cannot be here enumerated: All which are nevertheless pleasing to those who undergo them on account of its being for God's Service that they suffer, who being a Remunerator Animarum, both can and will reward them.

As to my return from Africa, it was truly thro mere Necessity, and at which I was not a little concern'd when I consider'd that I must leave so much Work undone behind me, and whereof those poor Kingdoms have so much need to conduct them in their way to Heaven. My Departure was principally occasion'd by my Illness; but had I recover'd my Health in Brazil whither I was going, as I propos'd to my self, my Intentions were to have return'd once more to Ethiopia; but my Recovery prov'd so very slow, and I found my self so exceeding weak, that I laid all those thoughts aside. Arriving not long after at Baia the principal City of Brazil, I was for a short time entertain'd very courteously in a French Convent of our Order, whose Friers us'd their utmost diligence to procure me a good Captain to transport me sick as I was to Lisbon. They first spoke to a Country-man of theirs, and who offer'd to carry and provide me a convenient Cabin because I was sick, but I must go as a Passenger, and not as Chaplain, and that because he would not submit to the Laws of Portugal, which make it a Crime for any Ship to sail without one. I told him, as I had formerly done the other Captain at the beginning of my Voyage to Africa, that if he would needs exclude me from the Duties of my Function, I must necessarily refuse his offer, being willing to earn my Diet and Passage, and so we parted. I was afterwards request-ed by the Governor of Massangano, who came with us from the Kingdom of Angola, and from whom I had receiv'd several Civilities in our Voyage, to go along with him to Portugal; I thankfully accepted his offer, and in three months time in company of a Fleet of 28 Ships laden with Tobacco and Sugars, by the Assistance of a favourable Wind and good Weather, we reach'd the height of Lisbon.

It being almost night before we got near the Port, but three of our Ships could get in, viz. that I was in, the French-man, and another, the rest being oblig'd to keep out at Sea all that night and the greatest part of the next day, by reason the Tide was against them. At day-break the Physician came on board us three, to see what state of health we were in; but before he approach'd, the French-man thinking it had been a Custom-house Felucca, went to hide a certain quantity of Tobacco he had in his Powder-room, but through a fatal Miscarriage letting a spark from the Candle fall on one of the Barrels, the Powder took fire and blew up the Poop of the Ship, whereby the Water flowing into the rest of the shatter'd Vessel, it sunk in a trice: None of the People that were in her escaped, but only only such as could swim, and they made shift to get to shore, or else were taken up by Boats. If this Ship had not sunk as she did after she was blown up, what damage might she not have done us that were very near her? Having observ'd the great Escape I and my fellow-Voyagers had, I fell on my Knees, and return'd my unfeign'd Thanks to the most High for our Preservation, and especially in that I hapn'd not to go in that unfortunate Ship. This Accident was reported about among the Vulgar to have been a Judgment on the said Ship for not having a Chaplain on board her.

At length we landed, which we had no sooner done, but I and Father Francis da Parua, a Chaplain in another Ship, and my Companion all the way from Ethiopia, fell down on our Knees again to return Heaven thanks for our safe arrival in Portugal: We then went immediately to wait on the King, who being gone that day out of the City to visit the Infanta his Daughter, we were fain to defer that Intention. At his return his Majesty being inform'd of our Designs, and having scarce alighted, sent presently for us; but the Messengers not finding us in the City, came to our Convent, where they met us and gave us to understand, that we might go to Court whensoever we pleas'd, the King being very desirous to see us. We lost no time, but immediately repair'd to Court, and were admitted to Audience.

The King's Countenance was extremely pleasing, and his Reception of us very friendly, standing out of respect to us with his Hat all the while in his hand: He kiss'd our Habits, and then began to speak of our Order and Mission, and especially of us Italian Missioners, for whom he said he had a very particular respect, having been often inform'd how much good we had done, and did daily in Ethiopia for God's Service; and that altho it was true that he had forbid any Foreign Priest to exercise their Function within his Conquests in those Parts, yet he did by no means design to exclude his Italian Capucines thereby. These words he spoke not only once, but repeated as often as any opportunity offer'd in discourse.

I must not forget the Civilities shew'd me here by Signior Nicolo Bonacursi, a Gentleman of Florence, who took me from our Convent at Lisbon to transport me to Leghorn, profering me withal a necessary Subsistence for the whole Voyage. Herein nevertheless the Captain of the Ship oppos'd him, telling me that I should eat at his Table; but Signior Nicolo notwithstanding would not be refus'd the sending a Servant along with me to wait on me, which I must own the Fellow did with a great deal of Obsequiousness and Diligence. Signior Nicolo would also have hir'd a Felucca to carry me to Naples; which I refusing, he recommended me to the Marquess Pucci at Leghorn, to the end that he might see me provided with Necessaries for my further Voyage to Genoa, whither I was bound. We not long after set sail, and arriv'd at Leghorn in a short time, whence in a few days I went on board again a Ship call'd The Holy Rose, and with a prosperous Gale soon got to Genoa. As we were going to enter the Port about midnight, the Wind all of a sudden chopt about full in our Teeth, forcing us back to Sea again. About break of day, while we were making for the mouth of the Bay to get in, a French Man of War was just coming out, who perceiving us sail'd made up to us, keeping to windward: Her Captain as he came nearer haul'd us to send our Boat on board, but ours taking little or no notice of him sail'd on: Whereupon the French-man came up to the windward of us again, giving us to understand, that being we were a Man of War like himself, he was oblig'd by an express Order from his King either to force us aboard, or to sink us. At the hearing of this all our Ship's Company were extremely concern'd, and that especially because the day before at the discovery of Genoa we had discharg'd all our Cannon except thirteen, which we reserv'd to salute the Holy Cross in the said City. Our Muskets likewise were all laid up in the Gunroom, and our Seamen had put on their best Cloths to go ashore: Nevertheless laying aside all fear or delay, two of our Officers got ready what Arms they had, and rang'd both Passengers and Seamen, except only those that were quarter'd at the afore-said great Guns on the Decks, in expectation of the Enemy's being as good as his word, since we had absolutely refus'd to comply with his Commands. What a buz and rumour was to be heard every where then amongst the arm'd Souldiers and Seamen! For my part I almost thought I was in Hell, and which put me in mind of that Verse of Virgil's in his sixth Aeneid.

At length, to prevent what Inconveniences might have ensu'd so rash an Engagement, the French Captain sent his Brother on board us to see who we were, who coming near us, and perceiving what Preparations we had made for a Fight, and moreover hearing from us that we were Genoeses, cry'd out, To what purpose are all these Warlike Preparations, since there is Peace between us and Genoa? We answer'd him, that at Sea we ought always to be on our Guard against Accidents we might meet with, and for ought we knew his Ship might be no French-man of War, because it was a common thing to put out false Colours. He then demanded what number of Men we had on board, having perceiv'd a great many on the Decks: We told him we were four hundred, and in truth we were so many. At last he acquainted us that he had Orders from his Master to demand all French-men he could meet with except Merchants on board any Vessel whatever, and desir'd to know if we had any such among us; search was made, and all that were found deliver'd immediately, except a Drummer who hid himself so that much time was spent before he could be found, but at last he went with the rest. This done, the French man departed peaceably, and left us to pursue our entrance into the Port, which we immediately did, and being safely got in, cast Anchor before the City.

It might have prov'd a more than ordinary damage to us had we engag'd this French Vessel, by reason that over and above a great quantity of Merchandize of different kinds which we had on board, we had likewise above a Million and a half of Money belong to Merchants, as also a great deal of uncoin'd and unwrought Silver. Our Ship carry'd besides all the Money that had been collected that year in Spain by the Commissary of the Croisade, as likewise several other Sums given in Charity towards the Canonizing of two Saints at Rome.

As I observ'd some things in my way through the City of Lisbon when I went to Congo, so I cannot help taking notice here of another Particular which I heard there as I came back: It was about a Law made by the King of Portugal concerning excess in Apparel. It seems the French Merchants had before been accusom'd every year to introduce new fashions in Clothes after their own fancies, and dressing Babies in them, to expose them to the view of the People, who presently bought up those Garments, and so had a new fashion every year, whereby the Sellers were enrich'd, and the Buyers impoverish'd; so that most of the Coin of Portugal fell into the hands of the French, to prevent the Exportation whereof the King rais'd the value of it. But this he was nevertheless disappointed in, for the French Merchants observing what had been done, rais'd the Value of their Goods proportionably, and the People were so far infatuated, that they were resolv'd to have them whatever they cost them. The King seeing this, publish'd another Proclamation to prohibit his Subjects the wearing of any Silk, Gold or Silver, and withal commanded them to confine themselves to Bays, or such Stuffs as were the Manufacture of the Country, prohibiting also Foreign Hats and Stockings. And the more to encline his Subjects to the observing of this Law, he himself first set them an Example. As for what Silk, Gold, or Silver the Church requir'd, he order'd certain Commissioners to procure what was necessary for that purpose from Venice, and elsewhere, but which was to be seal'd to prevent any greater quantities being imported. By these means superfluous Expences have been wholly banish'd this Kingdom and its Conquests; and if other Nations would take example by them, Luxury would not be so rampant, nor Vice so triumphant. More might be said upon this Subject, but I fear I have sufficiently tir'd my Reader already, and therefore shall here conclude the Relation of my Voyage into Southern Africa.

An Appendix to the Voyage to CONGO, &c.

A Letter from the King of Congo to the Author, upon his arrival at the Port of Angoij. Written in Portuguese, and thus in English.

The Superscription.

To the very Reverend Father, Father Jerom da Sorrento, a Capucin and Apostolick Missioner, whom God preserve.

Most Reverend Father,
I Receiv'd your Reverence's kind Letter, with a great deal of joy and satisfaction for the Favour your Reverence has done me. Having understood your safe arrival at Capinda, I was very glad of it, and do beseech God always to preserve you in the like State of Health for the future, to the end that we the unworthy Servants of God may reap the benefit of it. For my part I shall ever be ready to obey all your Reverence's Commands as your Spiritual Son, as will likewise your Spiritual Daughter Donna Potentiana my Mother. We both earnestly desire to our power to show our readiness to serve you. Most Reverend Father, I have comprehended all your Reverence writ to me, extremely well; but, O my Father, I know not how I shall be able to be sufficiently thankful to God for his Mercy, in promising me the Sight of your loving Countenance! Come then speedily and personally to the Assistance and Relief of these poor Souls that desire to receive Benediction from your Sacred Hands. It is most true what I tell you, for our Souls are all on a fire to see your Reverence as they ought; and therefore, most Holy Father, hasten your Reverence's Journey, pursuant to your Promise by your Messenger, that we may receive you with Joy and Festivals. I conjure you, prostrate at your Holy Feet, as an Apostolick Missioner and Son of the Blessed St. Francis, to hearken to my words. I beseech you let me hear from your Reverence from Loanda, for I have several important Matters to communicate to you, which will extremely contribute towards the increase of Christianity. For this purpose I sent my Favorite Garzia Michael to wait upon and conduct your Reverence to my Palace. He will bring a Slave along with him, whom I beg your Reverence to accept, tho but an inconsiderable Present. I shall trouble your Reverence with no more; God preserve you, and I humbly recommend my self to your Holy Sacrifices.

Lemba,
 Feb. 22.
 1688.

Your Reverence's Spiritual Son

the Prince of Congo,

Don John Emanuel Gritho,

Who treads on the Lion in the Kingdom of his Mother.

I believe I shall not greatly displease my Reader, if I add here the Customs of these Ethiopians in their Eating and Drinking at Feasts, which they commonly celebrate with great numbers, and at Night. A great company being got together, they sit round in a Ring upon the green Grass; which having done, a large thick round wooden Platter is plac'd in the midst of them, this Platter is call'd by them Malonga: The eldest of them, whom in their Language they call Maculuntã, or Cocolocangi, is to divide and dispense to every one his Portion, which he performs with that exactness, that if there happen to be a bit better than ordinary, that is likewise divided proportionably among the Company. By these means there are no Complaints or Murmurs to be heard amongst them, but every one is contented with what is allotted him. When they drink, they make use of neither Cups nor Glasses, to the end that every Man may have what is judg'd sufficient for him, and no more. The Judg of this is the Maculuntã, who holds the

the Moringo, or Flask, to the Person's Mouth that drinks; and when he thinks he has drank sufficient, he pulls it away. This is practis'd all along even to the end of the Feast. That which seems strangest to me is, that if any Person whatsoever, Man or Woman, great or small, though not known to them, happens to pass by where the Guests are eating, he or she thrusts into the Ring, and has an equal share with the rest, without the trouble of making any Complement, or speaking a word. If this Stranger happen to come after the Portions are allotted, then is the Carver to take something from every Man's Mese to make up a Share for him. If it so chance that many uninvited Guests come, they all have the aforefaid Liberty, and may eat and drink as freely as if they had been invited. When the Travellers perceive the Platter empty, they rise up and go their ways without taking any leave, or returning Thanks to the Company. And tho' these Strangers have never so great plenty of Provisions along with them of their own, as it very often happens they have, yet do they forsake their own for that of these People. Another thing I much wonder'd at is, that they never ask these Intruders any Questions, as whence they come, whither they go, or the like, but all Matters pass with so great silence, that one would think that they therein imitated the antient Law among the Loeri, a People of Achaia, reported by Plutarch, which importeth that if any one demand'd of another what was done, what was said, or the like, the Person that ask'd those Questions was to pay a Fine. Loerentium Lex quæ si quis peregre recursus rogabat; Nunquam Novi; cum multâ afficiebat. Plut. de curiosit. Laudandâ.

It has happen'd to me, that being about to entertain some Persons that had been serviceable to me, at Dinner-time I observ'd the number of my Guests greatly encreas'd; whereupon asking who those New-comers were? They answer'd, they did not know: Which caus'd me to reply, Then do ye allow of those to eat with ye, who have had no share in your Labour? To which all the Answer I could get from them was, that it was the Custom so to do. This Charity of theirs seem'd to me so commendable, that I order'd their Commons to be doubled, being not a little pleas'd to find so great Love and Amity even amongst Pagans. If the like good Custom were practis'd amongst us, we should not have so many poor indigent Wretches die in the Streets, and other places, merely for want, as there almost daily do in all Countrys.

If this Custom of theirs be so well worthy of Commendation, another they have no less deserves blame, that relates to their Behaviour towards their Wives, who being enjoin'd to work in the Fields till Noon, whilst their Husbands enjoy themselves at Home, are oblig'd at their return to get all things ready for Dinner; and if they happen to want any thing, they must either buy it out of their own Mony, or barter Clothes for it according to the Custom; I say out of their own Mony, or otherwise at their Expence, by reason that the Wives here are oblig'd to find their Husbands with Meat, and they are to provide Wine and Clothes for them. Dinner being got ready, it is first set before the Husband as Master of the Family, who sits down alone to Table, while the Wife and Children wait diligently about him to serve him in what he wants. When he has eat as much as he can, the remainder comes to the Wife and Children, who may sit down if they please; yet who generally stand, looking upon it to be their Duty so to do. But if after all the Husband has a mind to eat the whole Dinner, he may do it, and no body can call him to account. I having ask'd several of these People, Why they did not admit their Wives to sit with them at Table? They answer'd me, That Women had a Portion given them to that purpose, and that they were born to serve and obey the Men: Which perhaps they would not have said, if they had known what the Poet Claudian affirm'd, That Women were born to keep up the Race of Mankind, and not to be Slaves to Men.

These are good things for Travellers, to eat free-cost at other Peoples Tables; but sometimes it happens that many are eaten and devour'd themselves by a sort of Serpent as big as a Beam, which they meet in the Road in their way to Singa, which by looking on them only kills and consumes them. A Person that was assaulted by one of these prodigious Serpents, hapned by a lusty stroke of a Scimeter, to cut him in two. The Monster having been thus cruelly us'd, and yet not kill'd, being you may imagine not a Merolla. little enrag'd, lay upon the catch among the thick Bushes, to revenge it self on its Enemys; and soon after two Travelers happening to come by, it immediately crawl'd out, wounded as it was, and seiz'd upon them, devouring them almost whole. The Neighbours thereabouts hearing what had hapned to those two Men, resolv'd to fall out in a numerous body upon this maim'd Monster; which they not long afterwards did, but could never meet with it. At last a Portuguese Captain taking a considerable number of Men along with him, arm'd with Muskets, set forth in search of the Serpent; but not discovering it, presently he let all the Company march on before, and staid himself behind a little. The Serpent perceiving him alone, confiding in his remaining force, crept out of his hole to leap upon him; the affrighted Portuguese cry'd out at the sight of it, and most of the People that were gone before, returning in great haste, sent so many Bullets into the Monster's Body, that they soon dispatch'd it, after it had been the death of so many unfortunate Passengers.

From the Death of this Monster, I proceed to speak of the Sufferings of two of our Missioners, caus'd to be dragg'd by the Count of Sogno, and then expell'd his Dominions. These two Fathers were, Father Andrew da Buti, and Father Peter da Sestola. The then Count's Name was Don Pedro de Castro, who sending for them into his Presence, and they obeying his Commands, he thus spoke to them; How comes it to pass, Fathers, that amongst the Pagans there is Rain enough and to spare, and we Christians have not had the least drop? What can the Cause of this be, and whence does it proceed? The People affirm'd that the want of Rain proceeded from some Relicks Father Andrew had by him, and that they could expect none as long as he kept them. The Count upon this immediately commanded him to throw them away, and that if during all the next day there were not some Rain fell, both he and his Companion must look to themselves, and expect to be very ill us'd. At that time the Sky was extremely clear, and so continued till about Midnight; when all of a sudden the Heavens began to be overcast, and the Clouds pour'd down so plentiful a Shower, as was sufficient alone to prepare the Earth for Seed. Notwithstanding this which had happen'd through the sole Prayers of the two Missioners, the Count not caring to have them any longer within his Dominions, order'd them to undergo the Oath of Chilumbo, to prove that they were innocent; but they thinking such a Trial the most diabolical that could possibly be imagin'd, absolutely refus'd to submit to it; whereupon they were immediately seiz'd, and most inhumanly misus'd, dragg'd about, and all they had taken from them. He that was handled worst was Father Buti, who dy'd not long after of his Hurt in the Kingdom of Binquella the Place of his Mission. This Relation is to be found confirmed by Father Cornelius van Wouters a Dutch Franciscan Frier, who affirms it as an Eye-witness.

Sir THOMAS ROE,
Embassador from his Majesty King
JAMES the First of England, TO CHAN GUIRE, the Mighty Emperor of India,
Commonly call'd the GREAT MOGUL.
Containing an Account of his Voyage to that Country, and his Observations there.

Taken from his own Original Manuscript.

The P R E F A C E.

SIR Thomas Roe has before appear'd, in part, in Purchas his Collection of Travels, and since translated into French, and publish'd in the first Volume of Thevenot. Now he comes abroad again with considerable Additions, not foisted in, but taken from his own Original Manuscript, which it is likely Purchas had not, but some imperfect Copy of it. It is true, the Additions here are not great in bulk, as any will judg that shall compare this with the other Edition, but they are valuable for the Subject; and because this being a Journal they are here more continu'd, and several Matters that in the other were brought in abruptly, are here more methodical. His Sailing Table is inserted to satisfy their Curiosity who have not seen the like, to show the method of setting down those Observations at Sea, that these Volumes might not want any thing of Information. His Account at the latter end, of all the Provinces subject to the Mogul, and of the Extent of his Dominions, is not to be rejected; for, tho Time and Experience have produc'd more ample and exact Relations, yet his are just as to the main, such as he receiv'd upon the spot, and pleasing to those that read of this mighty Monarchy. Some Extracts of Letters are added out of a vast multitude, still preserv'd in two Volumes; and in these Extracts all that is remarkable, or of use at this time, the rest being only Business of Trade, as directed to the several Factories in those parts, and to the East-India Company in England. But that nothing might be omitted to satisfy the most curious, there is one List made out of many of his, containing all things that are fit for Presents in India, and consequently they are good saleable Commodities. In fine, here is all that is valuable of Sir Thomas Roe, and nothing that may cloy the Reader.

Giving an Account of his Voyage to India, and his Observations in that Country, and particularly at the Court of the Great Mogul, where he resided as Ambassador from James the First King of England.

MArch the 6th we lost sight of the Lizard, and began our Course for the Cape of Good Hope. The 26th we saw the Coast of Barbary; 27th had Cape Bojador E. by S. whence the Current sets swift S. S. W. April the 14th we cut the Line, May the 2d the Tropick of Capricorn, and on the 5th of June came to an Anchor in the Bay of Saldanha, next the Cape of Good Hope. The Land is fruitful, but divided by high inaccessible rocky Mountains cover'd with Snow, the River Dulce falling into the Bay on the East-side. The People are the most barbarous in the World, eating Carrion, wearing the Guts of Sheep about their Necks for Health, and rubbing their Heads, which are curl'd like the Blacks, with the Dung of Beasts and Dirt; and having no Clothes but Skins wrapp'd about their Shoulders, the Flesh-side next the Body in Summer, and the Hair in Winter. Their Houses are but a Mat rounded at the top like an Oven, which they turn as the Wind changes, having no Door to keep it out. They have left off their custom of stealing, but know no God or Religion. The Air and Water are very wholesom. Here are abundance of Cows, Antelopes, Baboons, Pheasants, Partridges, Larks, Wild-geese, Ducks, and many other sorts. On the Isle of Penguin is a sort of Fowl of that Name that goes upright, his Wings without Feathers, hanging down like Sleeves fac'd with white. They do not fly, but only walk in parcels, keeping regularly their own Quarters; they are a sort of mixture of Beast, Bird and Fish, but most Bird. The Commodities here are Cattel, Nangin-roots, and I believe there is a Rock yielding Quick-silver. The Table-Mountain is 11853 foot high. The Bay is full of Whales and Seals: The Latitude is 33 deg. 45 min. The 21st we came up with the Cape of Good Hope; July the 8th with the Isle of Madagascar, and the 22d with that of Molalia: This is one of the Islands of Comera, the other three are Angaresia, Juanny and Mayotta, lying almost East and West of one another, in the same Meridian with Cape S. Augustin. Angaresia bears N. by W. from Molalia, it is the highest Land I ever saw, inhabited by Moors trading with the Main, and the other three Eastern Islands, with their Cattel and Fruits for Callico's, and other Clothes to cover them. It is govern'd by ten petty Kings, and has plenty enough of Kine, Goats, Cows, Oranges and Lemmons. The People are counted false and treacherous. Juanny lies East from Molalia and Mayotta, the Coast between them both. All these three Islands are full of Refreshments, but chiefly Molalia, and next to it Juanny. Here liv'd an old Woman who was Sultaneß of

Roe. all these Islands. Under her there were three Deputies in Molalia, Children of the Old Woman. The Sultan in whose Quarter we anchor'd, is so absolute, that the People dare not sell a Coco-Nut without his Leave. Four Boats were sent to his Town to desire this liberty, which was granted; and Capt. Newport going ashore with 40 men, found the Governour sitting on a Mat, under the side of a Junk that was building, attended by about 50 men. He had on a Mantle of blue and felt Callicoe wrap'd about him to his Knees, his Legs and Feet bare, on his Head a close Cap of Chequer-work. Being presented with a Gun and a Sword, he return'd four Cows, and proclaim'd Liberty for the People to trade. He gave the English Coco-Nuts, and himself chew'd Betel temper'd with Lime of burnt Oyster-shells, and the Kernel of a Nut call'd Areca, like an Acorn: It has a biting Taste, voids Rheum, cools the Head, strengthens the Teeth, and is all their Physick. Those that are not us'd to it are giddy with it, and the Spittle is red, which in time colours the Teeth, and is counted a Beauty. They all use this at all times. From the Governor's they were conducted to a Carpenter's House, who was a chief Man in the Town; the House was built with Lime and Stone, plaister'd with White-lime, low and little, cover'd with Rafters, and over them Coco-Leaves, the out-sides wattl'd with Canes. They are kept cleanly, and their poor Household-stuff neat, their Gardens inclos'd with Canes, containing Tobacco and Plantain Trees. For Dinner a Board was set upon Tressels, cover'd with a fine new Mat, and Stone Benches about it, on which they sat. First Water was brought to every man in a Coco Shell, and pour'd into a Wooden Platter, and instead of a Towel they use the Rinds of Cocos. Then they set before them boil'd Rice, with roasted Plantains on it, Quarters of Hens, and Pieces of Goat broil'd. After Grace said they fell to their Meat, with Bread made of Coco's beaten mix'd with Honey, and fry'd. Their Drink was Palmisio Wine and Coco Milk. Those that went to see the Sultan, whose Name was Amor Adell, found all things much resembling what has been said before of the Governour; but that in his Behaviour he was more light, and made haste to be drunk with some Wine the English carry'd. The People are strict Mahometans, very jealous to let their Women and Moschs be seen: For some of the English coming near a Village, they shut them up, and threaten'd to kill 'em if they came nearer. Many of 'em speak and write Arabick, and some few of 'em Portuguese, as trading to Morambique in Junks of forty Tun Burden, and built, calk'd and rig'd all out of the Coco Tree. Here we bought Oxen, Cows fat but small, Arabian Sheep, Hens, Cocos, Oranges, Lemmons, and Limes in abundance, for Callicoes, Hollands, Sword-Blades, Pieces of Eight, Glasses, Knives, and other Trifles.

August the 2d we weigh'd, and stood our Course for Socotora, and on the 10th repast the Equinoctial to the Northward. The 18th we made Cape Guardafu eight Leagues to the Westward, which is one of them that makes the Entrance into the Red Sea; and came to an Anchor in 12 Fathom Water in a small Bay, where we continu'd the 18th, and saw some People in Turbants. Ashore was a Tomb of white Stone, with a Pillar at each end of it. The Latitude 11 Deg. 55 min.

The 24th we came to an Anchor in the Bay call'd Delicia in Socotora, having been before separated in a Storm, and warn'd by the Sultan not to anchor at Tamara, which was too much expos'd to the Violence of the Winds. Socotora is an Island at the Mouth of the Red Sea, being the Dioscuria or Dioscorida of the Antients, lying in 12 Deg. 55 Min. of North Latitude, govern'd then by a Sultan call'd Amar Ben-Seid, Son to the King of Fortaque in Arabia Felix. The Kingdom of Fortaque lies from 15 to 18 Deg. along the Coast of Arabia. The King was at Peace with the Turk, on condition to assist him with 5000 men, if he requir'd it, and they to be paid by the Turk; to whom he made no other acknowledgment. Near the Sea about Dofor, was another petty King, whom he durst not meddle with, because he was under the Grand Seignior's Protection. The Sultan of Socotora came down to the Shore with about three hundred men, having set up a Tent near the Bay. He was a Horse-back, as were two of his chief Servants, and another on a Camel; the People running before and behind him shouting; and two Guards, one of his Subjects, and the other of 12 hir'd Guzarats, some with Turkish Bows, some with Pistols, some with Muskets, but all with good Swords. He had also a few Kettle Drums, and one Trumpet. He receiv'd the General in a courteous manner, and was so absolute, that no man could sell any thing but himself. His People sat about him very respectfully, his Clothes were of Surat Stuffs after the Arabian bian manner, with a Caslock of red and white wrought Velvet, and another, whereof the Ground was Gold. He had a very good Turbant, but was bare-footed. Every night they all stand or kneel towards the Sun, the ~~X-rife~~ throwing Water on their Heads. As for Religion, they are Mahometans. The King's Town of Tamara is built of Lime and Stone whited over, with Battlements and Pinnacles, the Houses being flat at the top. At a distance it looks well, but when in, it is poor. Mr. Boughton, who had leave to see the King's House, found it such as would serve an ordinary Gentleman in England. The lower Rooms serv'd for Warehouses and Wardrobe, some Changes of Robes hanging about the Walls, and with them about 25 Books of their Law, Religion, History, and Saints Lives. No man was permitted to go up Stairs to see his Wives, which were three, nor the other Women; but the ordinary sort might be seen in the Town, with their Ears full of Silver Rings. In the Mosque the Priest was at Service. Mr. Boughton had for his Dinner three Hens with Rice, and for Drink Water and Cahu, black Liquor, drank as hot as could be endur'd. (This was certainly Coffee, which Sir Thomas Roe was not acquainted with.) On a Hill a Mile from Tamara is a square Castle, but Leave could not be obtain'd to see it. The People are of four sorts; Arabs come in by Conquest, who dare not speak in the Sultan's Presence without leave, and kissing his Hand. The 2d sort are Slaves, who when they come to him kiss his Foot, do all his Work, and make his Aloes. The third I suppose are the old Inhabitants of the Country, call'd Bedvins, tho not the oldest of all, whom I suppose to be those commonly call'd Jacobite Christians, because Mr. Boughton going into a Church of theirs, which the Arabs had forc'd them to abandon, found Images in it, and a Crucifix, which he took away; and the Mahometans would not say much of them, fearing lest other Christians should relieve or support them. They have had Wars with the Arabs, and live retir'd from them in the Mountains. The fourth sort are a Savage People, poor, lean, naked, with long Hair, eating nothing but Roots, riding on Buffaloes, conversing with none of the others, and afraid of all, without Houses, and almost as brutal as Beasts, which by conjecture are the antientest Natives of the Place. The Island is very mountainous and barren, having some Beeves, Goats, and Sheep, a few Dates and Oranges, a little Rice, and nothing else of Sustenance. All its Commodity is Aloes, which is the Juice of a Leaf like our Houfleeck. The People make a poor sort of Cloth for the Slaves. The King had some Dragon's Blood, and Indigo of Labor, as also Civet Cats and Civet. The Dead are here all bury'd in Tombs, and the Monuments of their Saints are held in great veneration. The chief of these is Scidy Hachim, bury'd at Tamara, who being kill'd 100 Years before, they said still appear'd to 'em, and warn'd 'em of Dangers at hand; and they imputed the high Winds to his Walking, having him in wonderful veneration.

The 31st we weigh'd, and stood our Course for Surat, where I landed on the 26th of September, and was receiv'd in an open Tent by the chief Officers of the Town well attended. Much Controversy was about searching my Servants, but at length they pass'd free to the City, where we went into a House provided for us, and there continu'd till the 30th of October, suffering much from the Governour, who by force search'd many Chests, and took out what he thought fit. The 30th aforesaid I departed Surat, and travel'd but four Coffes to Cumaria, the 1st of November 11 Miles to a Village, the 2d to Biarat 21 Miles, where there is a Castle, this Town being on the Borders of the Kingdom of Guzarat, subject to the Mogul, and belonging to Abraham Chan. The 3d entred the Kingdom of Pardaffsha, a Pagan Lord of the Hills, subject to no body, and at 15 miles end lay in the Fields near a City of note call'd Mugher. The 4th 9 miles rocky way, lay in the Fields by a Village call'd Narampora. The 5th 15 miles in the Fields. The 6th 20 miles to Nunderpar a City of the Kingdom of Brampor subject to the Mogul. Here we had first Bread after coming from Surat, because the Banians who inhabit all the Country make no Bread, but only Cakes. The Country is plentiful, especially of Cattel, the Banians killing none, or selling any to be kill'd. One day I met 10000 Bullocks loaded with Corn, in one Drove, and most days after lesser Parcels. The 7th 18 miles to Ningul. The 8th 15 to Sinchelly. The 9th 15 to Tolmere. The 10th 18 to Chapre, where having pitch'd the Tents without the Town, the King's Officers attended me all night with 30 Horse and 20 Shot, for fear of the Robbers on the Mountains, because I refus'd to remove into the Town. The 11th 18 miles, the 13th 18 miles, and the 14th 15 miles to Brampore, which I guess City.

to be 223 Miles East from Surat. The Country miserable and barren, the Towns and Villages built with Mud. At Batharpore, a Village two Miles short of Brampore, I saw some of the Ordnance, which is most too short, and too open in the Bore. The Cutwall, an Officer of the King's so call'd, met me well attended with 16 Coulers carried before him, and conducted me to the Seraglio, where I was appointed to lodg. He took his leave at the Gate, which made a handsome Front of Stone, but when in I had four Chambers allotted me like Ovens, and no bigger, round at the top, made of Brick in the side of a Wall, so that I lay in my Tent; the Cutwall making his excuse, that this was the best Lodging in the Town, as I found it was; all the place being only Mud Cottages except the Prince's House, the Chan's, and some few others. I was conducted by the Cutwall to visit the Prince, in whose outward Court I found about a hundred Gentlemen a Horse-back, waiting to salute him at his coming out. He sat high in a Gallery that went round, with a Canopy over him, and a Carpet before him. An Officer told me, as I approach'd I must touch the Ground with my Head bare, which I refus'd, and went on to a place right under him rail'd in, with an Ascent of three Steps, where I made him Reverence, and he bow'd his Body: So I went within, where were all the Great Men of the Town with their Hands before them like Slaves. The place was cover'd over head with a rich Canopy, and under foot all with Carpets: It was like a great Stage, and the Prince sat at the upper end of it. Having no place assign'd, I stood right before him, he refusing to admit me to come up the Steps, or to allow me a Chair. Having receiv'd my Presents he offer'd to go into another Room, where I should be allow'd to sit; but by the way he made himself drunk out of a Case of Bottles I gave him, and so the Visit ended.

The 27th of November I was carry'd sick from Brampore three Cosses to Raypora. The 28th fifteen Cosses to Burgome, and the 30th seven Cosses. December the first ten Cosses to Bicangome, the 2d seven Cosses, the 3d five Cosses, the 4th eleven Cosses to Echarpur, standing on a good River that falls into the Sea near Baroche. The 5th pass'd the River call'd Narbodah, the 6th travel'd eight Cosses, and lay in a Wood not far from the King's famous Castle of Mandoo, which stands on a steep Hill, of a vast Extent including fifteen Cosses within the Wall. The 7th ten Cosses, the 8th eight, the 9th ten, the 10th twelve, the 11th sixteen, the 12th fourteen, the 13th six, the 14th lay still to rest, the 15th six Cosses, the 16th six, the 17th twelve, the 18th five to Cytor. This is an antient ruin'd City on a Hill, but shows the Footsteps of wonderful Magnificence. There are still standing above a hundred Churches all of carv'd Stone, many fair Towers and Lanthorns, many Pillars, and innumerable Houses, but not one Inhabitant. There is but one steep Ascent cut out of the Rock, and four Gates in the Ascent before you come to the City Gate, which is magnificent. The Hill is enclos'd at the Top for about eight Cosses, and at the South-west End is a goodly old Castle. Isis in the Country of Rama, a Prince newly subdu'd by the Mogol, or rather bought to own Subjection. It was brought under by Echbar-Sha Father to Ichhan Guire. The Indian Prince Rama is lineally descended from Porus, that warlike Indian Monarch overcome by Alexander the Great.

The 19th I proceeded on my Journey twelve Cosses, the 20th ten, the 21st ten, the 22d nine, the 23d ten to Adsmere. The first six days Journey from Brampore towards Adsmere were West, or North West to compass the Hills, but after that due North, so that they bear from one another almost North by West, and South by East, the whole Distance 209 Miles English; the Cosses here being longer than near the Sea.

January the 10th I went to Court at four in the Afternoon to the Durbar, where the Mogul daily sits to entertain Strangers, receive Petitions and Presents, give out Orders, and to see and be seen. And here it will be proper to give some Account of his Court. None but Eunuchs come within that King's private Lodgings, and his Women, who guard him with warlike Weapons. These punish one another for any Offence committed. The Mogul every Morning shows himself to the common People at a Window that looks into a Plain before his Gate. At Noon he is there again to see Elephants and wild Beasts fight, the Men of Rank being under him within a Rail. Hence he retires to sleep among his Women. After noon he comes to the Durbar afore mention'd. After Supper at 8 of the clock he comes down to the Guzelcan, a fair Court in the midst whereof is a Throne of free Stone, on which he sits, or sometimes below in a Chair, where none are admitted but of the first Quality, and few of them without leave. Here he discourses of indifferent things very agreeably. No Business of State is done any where but at one of these two last Places, where it is publicly canvass'd, and so registred; which Register might be sent for two Shillings, and the common People know as much as the Council: so that every day the King's Resolutions are the publick News, and expos'd to the Censure of every Scoundrel. This Method is never alter'd, unless Sick-ness or Drink obstruct it; and this must be known, for if he be unseen one day without a reason assign'd, the People would mutiny; and for two Days no Excuse will serve, but the Doors must be open'd, and some admitted to see him to satisfy others. On Tuesday he sits in Judgment at the Jarruco, and hears the meanest Persons Complaints, examines both Parties, and often sees Execution done by his Elephants.

Before my Audience, I had obtain'd leave to use the Customs of my Country. At the Durbar I was conducted right before him; entering the outward Rail, two noble Slaves met to conduct me nearer. At the first Rail I made a low Reverence, at the next another, and when under the King a third. The Place is a great Court, to which all sorts of People resort. The King sits in a little Gallery over head; Embassadors, Great Men, and Strangers of Quality within the inmost Rail under him, rais'd from the Ground, cover'd with Canopies of Velvet and Silk, and good Carpets under foot. The next Degree, like our Gentry, are within the first Rail, the Commonalty without in a Bass Court, yet so that all may see the King. In fine, it is rising by degrees like a Theatre. His Reception was very favourable, but needs not particularizing.

March the 1st I rid out to see a House of Pleasure of the King's, given him by Asaph Chan, and two Miles from Adsmere. It is seated betwixt two mighty Rocks, so defended from the Sun, that it scarce any way sees it. The Foundation is cut out of the Rock, as are some Rooms, the rest is Free Stone. There is a handsome little Garden, with fine Fountains, and two great Fishponds, one 30 Steps above another. The way to it admits of but one, or at most two Men a-breast, and that very steep and stony. It is a Place of Melancholy, Delight, and Safety, all the Company about it being wild Peacocks, Turtles, Fowl, and Monkeys that inhabit the Rocks hanging every way over it.

The 11th of March in the Evening began the Festival of the Norose. This is a Custom of solemnizing the New Year, but the Ceremony begins the first New Moon after it. It is kept in imitation of the Persians Feast, and signifies in that Language nine Days, because antiently it lasted no longer; but now it is doubled. The manner of it is thus. A Throne is erected four Foot from the Ground in the Durbar Court; from the back whereof to the Place where the King comes out, a Square of 50 Paces in length, and 43 in Breadth, was rail'd in, and cover'd with fair Semians, or Canopys of Cloth of Gold, Silk, or Velvet, join'd together, and held up with Canes cover'd after the same manner. At the upper end were set out the Pictures of the King of England, the Queen, the Lady Elizabeth, the Countesses of Somerset and Salisbury, and of a Citizen's Wife of London. Below them another of Sir Tho. Smith, Governor of the East India Company. The Ground is laid with good Persian Carpets very large, into which Place come all the Men of Quality to attend the King, except some few that are within a little Rail right before the Throne to receive his Commands. Within this Square there were set out for show many little Houses, one of them of Silver, and some other Curiosities of value. The Prince Sultan Corome had on the left side a Pavilion, the Supporters whereof were cover'd with Silver, as were some of those also near the King's Throne. The Form of this Throne was square, the Matter Wood inlaid with Mother of Pearl, born up with four Pillars, and cover'd with Cloth of Gold. About the edg over head, like a Valence, was a Net Fringe of good Pearl, from which hung down Pomegranates, Apples, Pears, and such Fruit of Gold, but hollow. Within it the King sat on Cushions very rich in Pearls and Jewels. Round about the Court before the Throne, the Principal Men had erected Tents, which encompass'd the Court, and lin'd them with Velvet, Damask, or Taffety for the most part, but some few with Cloth of Gold; into which they retir'd, and sat to show all their Wealth. For antiently the Kings us'd to go to every Tent, and take thence what they pleas'd; but now it is chang'd, the King sitting to receive what New-year's Gifts are brought him. He comes abroad at the usual Hour of the Durbar, and retires in the same Order.

Here great Presents are offer'd him by all sorts, tho not equal to report, yet incredible enough : and at the end of this Feast, the King in return for the Presents receiv'd, advances some, and adds to their Entertainment some Horse at his pleasure.

Audiences of Sir Tho.

The next day, being the 12th of March, I went to visit the King, and deliver'd him a Present, where I saw abundance of Wealth, but being of all sorts put together without order, it did not look so regular. The same day the Son of Rama, the new Tributary before mention'd, did his Homage, touching the ground three times with his Head. The 13th at night I had Audience at the Guzalcan, and press'd to have the Peace and Commerce with England settl'd after a solemn manner, and all the Articles settled, which the Mogul order'd should be done. The 15th I went again in the Evening to the Norose, and according to the Mogul's order chose my place of standing, which was on the Right-hand of him on the rising of the Throne, the Prince and young Rama standing on the other side ; so I had a full view of what was to be seen, Presents, Elephants, Horses and Whores. The 23d the Mogul condemn'd one of his own Nation upon suspicion of Felony ; but being one of the handsomest Men in India, and the Evidence not very clear against him, he would not suffer him to be executed, but sent him to me in Irons for a Slave to dispose of at my Will. This is look'd upon as a great favour, for which I return'd Thanks ; adding, that in England we had no Slaves, nor thought it lawful to make the Image of God equal to a Beast, but that I would use him as a Servant ; and if he behav'd himself well, give him his liberty. This the Mogul was well pleas'd with. The 26th I went to the Guzalcan, and deliver'd the Articles I had drawn up, which were refer'd to Asaph Chan, who a while after sent to me to remove from the standing I had taken before the King, because I stood alone, and that was not the Custom. I refus'd at first, but he insisting I should rank my self among the Nobility, I remov'd to the other side to the place where only the Prince and young Rama were ; which more disgusted Asaph Chan, who perswaded the Prince to complain of me, which he did ; but the Mogul having heard their Complaint, and my Answer, that I remov'd by Asaph Chan's order, answer'd, I had done well, and they were in the wrong to offer to displace me in his sight. So I kept my place in quiet.

The substance of the Articles deliver'd to the Great Mogul was, 1. That there be perpetual Peace and Amity between the King of Great Britain and his Indian Majesty. 2. That the Subjects of England have free Trade in all Ports of India. 3. That the Governors of all Ports publish this Agreement three times upon the arrival of any English Ships. 4. That the Merchants and their Servants shall not be search'd, or ill us'd. 5. That no Presents sent to the Mogul shall be open'd. 6. That the English Goods shall not be stop'd above 24 hours at the Custom-House, only to be there seal'd and sent to the Merchant's House, there to be open'd and rated within six days after. 7. That no Governor shall take any Goods by force, but upon payment at the Owners price ; nor any taken upon pretence of the King's Service. 8. That the Merchants shall not be hinder'd selling their Goods to whom they please, or sending them to other Factories, and this without paying any other Duty than what is paid at the Port. 9. That whatsoever Goods the English buy in any part of the Mogul's Dominions, they may send down to the Ports without paying any Duty more than shall be agreed on at the Port at shipping them, and this without any hindrance or molestation. 10. That no Goods brought to any Port shall be again open'd, the English showing a Certificate of their numbers, qualities and conditions, from the Governor or Officers of the Place where they were bought. 11. That no confiscation shall be made of the Goods or Mony of any English dying. 12. That no Custom be demanded for Provisions during the stay of English Ships at any Port. 13. That the Merchants Servants, whether English or Indians, shall not be punish'd or beaten for doing their Duty. 14. That the Mogul will punish any Governor, or Officer, for breach of any of these Articles. 15. That the English Ships shall suffer all others to pass and repass freely to the Mogul's Ports, except their Enemies ; and that the English ashore shall behave themselves civilly as Merchants. 16. That they shall yearly furnish the Mogul with all Rarities from Europe, and all other such things as he shall desire, at reasonable Prices. 17. The English to pay the Duty of three and a half per Cent. for Goods reasonably rated, and two per Cent. for Pieces of Eight, and no other Duty elsewhere. 18. That the English shall be ready to assist the Mogul against all his Enemies. Lastly, That the Portugueses may come into into this Place within six Months; or if they refuse, the English be at liberty to exercise all Hostilities against them. These were the Articles presented, but they were delay'd and oppos'd, and what was the conclusion we shall see hereafter.

The 31st of March the Mogul din'd at Asaph Chans House, all the way from the Palace to it, which was an English Mile, being laid under foot with Silks and Velvets sew'd together, but roll'd up as the King pass'd. They reported the Feast and Present cost six Lecks of Roupies, which is 60000 l. Sterling. (Note here that Thevenot says a Leck is 100000, and a Roupee worth a Crown French and 5 Sols, after which rate the 6 Lecks must amount at least to 150000 l. Sterling.)

From this time Sir Tho. Roe continues his Journal as before; but there being nothing in it remarkable for many days, all the business being soliciting for Money due to the Merchants, and such other Affairs in which there is nothing worth observing, that Part is thought fit to be wholly left out here, as it was also done by Purchas in his Account of this Embassy.

Tom June the 18th, the King commanded Ma- one of his Brother's Sons, who had been persuaded to become a Christian, with a design to make him odious to the People, to lay his hand on the head of a Lion that was brought before the King, which he refus'd out of fear; upon which the King bid his youngest Son go touch the Lion, who did so without receiving any hurt: whereat the King took occasion to send his Nephew away to Prison, where he is never like to see day-light. The 19th, the King remov'd with the Prince and all the Court to Havar Gemal. The 23^d the King return'd to his own House, and sat in Publick according to custom. The 24th Prince Couron, whose favour I was labouring to gain, and with whom I had many contests, had a Son born; and he preparing to lead the Army to Decan, the eyes of all Men were fix'd on him; some flattering, others envying him, and others to make their advantage, but none loving him. He receiv'd 20 Lecks of Roupies towards his charge, which amounts to 200000 l. Sterling, (Note that according to Thevenot, who says a Roupee is worth a Crown, this should be 500000 l.) and began to bestow his Money bountifully. Yet notwithstanding this show of his Father's affection and greatness, a Chan told the King that the Expedition would prove dangerous in respect of Prince Pervis, whose Honour was so deeply concern'd that he would not go unreveng'd. The

Vol. I.

King answer'd, Let them fight, I am so satisfy'd, and he that proves himself the better Commander shall pursue the War.

The 25th I had Audience of the King, being sent for by Asaph Chan, and was receiv'd with the usual courtesy by his Majesty. This Asaph Chan was the Prince's Favourite, and therefore I was unwilling to disoblige him, tho he had given several provocations. And at this time Mocreb Chan, another great Man, made me offers of his Service, being of a contrary Faction to the other; but I thought best to make Friends of them both. Mocreb told me, among other things, that the English carry'd too much Cloth and bad Swords, and scarce any thing else, and therefore advis'd to forbear two or three Years, and rather bring such rarities as China and Japan afforded, which would be more acceptable; and from England the best Cloth of Gold, and the richest Silks wrought with Gold and Silver, but above all a good quantity of Arras Hangings. The 30th I visit'd Abdalla Hassan, having need of his Friendship; and what is rare in that Country, he receiv'd no Presents. He has the command of all Soldiers entertain'd at Court, and is Treasurer to all the Armies. He entertain'd me with much civility, and we sat to see his Soldiers shoot with Bows and Guns. Most of them with a single Bullet hit the Mark, being about a hands breadth in a Butt.

July pass'd most away in soliciting the Prince to sign and seal the Articles I had presented to the King, of which an Abstract was given before. On the 13th at Night I went to the Durbar to visit the King, who sent Asaph Chan to tell me he was inform'd I had an excellent Painter at my House, which I told him was only a young Man that drew upon Paper, and that very indifferently; however I promis'd to bring him to his Majesty, who at this time us'd so many expressions of kindness to me that all Men were amaz'd at it, and profer'd me any thing I would ask for in his Kingdom. I went from him to Asaph Chan's House, where I continu'd till the King came out again, when I was conducted back to him, carrying with me Mr. Hughes the suppos'd Painter, with whom the King had some discourse. After this I presented the King with a curious Picture I had of a Friend of mine, which pleas'd him highly, and he show'd it to all the Company. The King's chief Painter being sent for pretended he could make as good; which I denying, a wager of a Horse was laid about it be-

This done, the Mogul fell to drinking of Alicant Wine I had presented him, giving tastes of it to several about him, and then sent for a full Bottel, and drinking a Cup sent it to me, saying, It began to four so fast it would be spoil'd before he could drink it, and I had none. This done he turn'd to sleep, the Candles were popt out, and I grop'd my way out in the dark. This day a Gentlewoman of Normals, the King's favourite Queen, was taken in the King's House in some action with an Eunuch. Another Capon that lov'd her kill'd him. The poor Woman was set up to the Arm-pits in the Earth close ram'd about her, with her feet ty'd to a Stake, so to continue three days and two nights without any Sustenance, her Head and Arms bare expos'd to the violent heat of the Sun. If she dy'd not in that time, she was to be pardon'd. The Eunuch was condemn'd to the Elephants. This Damsel was found worth in Pearls, Jewels, and ready Mony, 160000 Roupies.

A strange Execution.

Free Trade jetted at Baroche.

The 22^d I receiv'd Letters from Brampor, in answer to others I had sent long before to Mahobet Chan, who had granted all I desir'd of him, sending his Order to Baroche in ample form to receive the English there, and give them a House for a Factory near the Governor, strictly commanding all Men not to molest them, either by Sea or Land, not to take any Custom of them, or any way trouble them under such pretence. In short, that they might buy, sell, and transport any Commodity at their pleasure, without any molestation, giving a strict charge for the execution of this Order. Besides, I receiv'd a Letter from him full of Civility, and all kind Offers, far exceeding all I had found in India. This was a noble and generous Man, well belov'd by all Men, and the King's only Favourite, but car'd not for the Prince, so that this was a good retreat in case the Merchants should be drove away from Surat by the Prince. As for Customs the King takes none, but the Governors exact them for their own private gain, which this worthy Man scorn'd to do, saying he would not abuse the Liberty of the King's Ports.

Good Painters in India.

Nothing remarkable happen'd till August the 6th: I was sent for to the Durbar, where I had much talk with the King, who ask'd me many Questions to satisfy his Curiosity, and bid me come to the Guzelcan at night, and I should see my Picture so exactly copy'd, that I should not know the one from the other. I came at Night and he shew'd me six Pictures, five of them painted by his own Painter, all pasted upon a Board, and so like that by Candlelight I could scarce know one from another. Neither did I at first sight know my own, at which the Mogul was much pleased; but looking closer upon them I show'd it, and the difference between it and the others. The Mogul was overjoy'd, and I surpriz'd at their Art, not thinking they could have perform'd so well; and the King after many Civilities promis'd me his own Picture.

The 9th a hundred Thieves were brought chain'd before the Mogul with their Accusation: Without further Ceremony, as in all such cases is the Custom, he order'd them to be carry'd away, the chief of them to be torn in pieces by Dogs, the rest put to death. This was all the Process and Form. The Prisoners were divided into several quarters of the Town, and executed in the Streets, as in one by my House, where twelve Dogs tore the chief of them in pieces, and thirteen of his Fellows having their Hands ty'd down to their Feet, had their Necks cut with a Sword, but not quite off, being so left naked, bloody, and stinking to the view of all Men, and annoyance of the Neighbourhood. The 10th, 11th, and 12th, I spent in giving the King and Prince advice that a Dutch Ship lay before Surat, and would not declare upon what design it came, till a Fleet arriv'd; which was expected with the first fit season. This I improv'd to fill their Heads with Jealousies of the Designs of the Dutch, and the Dangers that might ensue from them, which was well taken; and being demanded, I gave my Advice to prevent coming to a Rupture with them, and yet exclude them the Trade of India. The last of these Days I went to visit Gemaldin-Ussin, Viceroy of Patan, and 70 Years of Age. He receiv'd me with extraordinary Courtesy, offering me a Leck of Roupies, or all his Interest at Court; informing me of all the Customs of the Country, and showing me a Book he had compos'd of all memorable things that had happen'd under three Kings, whom he had serv'd; and offering me a Copy, if I could get it translated. It also treated of the King's Revenue, and the manner of raising it. He show'd me that the Government of every Province did pay a yearly Rent; and for instance, he for his Government of Patan gave the King eleven Lecks of Roupies; the Roupie is two Shillings two Pence (Thevenot says a Roupie is a Crown.) All other Profits were the Governour's, and he had Regal Authority to take what he pleas'd; which in his Vice-royship of Patan was valu'd at 5000 Horse: the Pay of each at 200 Roupies a year, whereof he kept 1500, and was allow'd the Surplus as dead Pay. Besides this the King gave him a Pension of 1000 Roupies a day, and some smaller Governments; yet he assur'd me there were several that had double his Allowance, and above twenty equal to him. He prais'd the good Prophet Jesus, and his Laws, and had much pleasant and profitable Discourse. Some Days had pass'd after this Visit, and I thought his Kindness had been at an end; when he borrow'd the King's Pleasure-house and Garden call'd Havar Gemal, a Mile out of the Town, to treat me in, and invited me over night. At midnight he went himself, and carry'd his Tents and all his Furniture, and fitted up a Place by the Pond-side very handsomly. I went in the Morning; he met me with much Civility, and carry'd me into his Room prepar'd for me, where he had some Company and a hundred Servants attending two of his Sons, he having thirty. He show'd me the King's Closets and retiring Rooms, which were painted à l'Antique, and in some Panes the Pictures of the King of France, and other Christian Princes. He told me he was a poor Man, Slave to the King; that he was willing to give me some content, and had therefore brought me to a slight Banquet to eat Bread and Salt together to seal a Friendship, which he desir'd me to accept; That others might treat me better, but were not so sincere, but would deceive me, and my Interpreters would never deliver the Truth, but what those Men pleas'd; and therefore I should never do my business to any purpose, till I had an English-man that could speak the Persian Tongue, and declare my Mind freely, which the King would grant, if I could find one, because he had conceiv'd a good Opinion of me: and the last night the Jewels of Sheck Ferid being brought before him, he remember'd me of himself; and finding among them his own Picture well done, he had deliver'd it to Asaph Chan to send it to me to wear for his sake, with many Expressions of his Favour, which would make all the Great Men respect me. By this time Dinner came in, and we sat down on Carpets; a Cloth being laid, and Variety of Dishes set before us, as was a little on one side for the Gentlemen that accompany'd him, to whom he went to eat, they looking on it as a sort of defiling to mix with us. Hereupon I told him he had promis'd we should eat Bread and Salt together, and that I had little Appetite without his Company. He rose presently and sat by me, and we fell heartily to our Meal; there being Dishes of several sorts, as Raisins, Almonds, Pistachoes, and Fruit. After Dinner he play'd at Chess, and I walk'd; and after some time offer'd to take my leave. But he said he had desir'd me to come to eat, and what we had before was but a Collation, and therefore I must not depart till we had sup'd, which I readily consented to. About an hour after the Embassadour of one of the Decan Kings came to visit him, whom he presented to me, using him with Civility, but much below the Respect he shew'd to me. He ask'd me whether his Majesty, my Master, would not take in scorn the Offer of Service from so poor a Man, and would vouchsafe to accept of a Present from a Stranger; for he would send a Gentleman with me to kiss his Majesty's Hands, and to see our Country. I return'd a civil Answer; and he went presently, and ask'd one if he would undertake the Voyage. The Gentleman seem'd willing, and he presented him to me, saying he would provide some Trifles, such as the Country afforded for his Majesty, and send him in my Company. This to me seem'd by the manner to be meant in earnest. At last Supper came; two Cloths being spread, as in the Morning, and before me and my Chaplain were set several Dishes of Sallads, and Meat roasted, fry'd, boil'd, and Variety of Rice. He desir'd to be excus'd himself, because it was their Custom to eat among themselves, and his Countrymen would take it ill if he did not eat with them. So he and his Guests, and I and my Company made much of our selves. The Meat was not amiss, but the Attendants and Order much better; his Servants being very diligent and respectful. He gave me for a Present, as is the manner when any one is invited, five Cases of Sugar-candy dress'd with Musk, and one Loaf of the finest Sugar as white as Snow about fifty Pounds weight, desiring me to accept of a hundred such Loaves against I went away; which, said he, you refuse of me thinking I am poor, but it costs me nothing, it is made in my Government, and comes gratis. I offer'd to accept when I was going, but he press'd to take it now for fear he should be then unprovided. Thus calling himself my Father, and I my self his Son, we took leave of one another.

The 17th I went to visit the King, who as soon as I came in, call'd to his Women, and reach'd out his own Picture set in Gold, hanging at a gold wire Chain, with one Pendant of foul Pearl, which he deliver'd to Asaph Chan, warning him not to demand any Reverence of me, but what I was willing to make; it being the Custom, whensoever he bestows any thing, for the Receiver to kneel down, and put his Head to the Ground, which has been requir'd of the Embassadors of Persia. Asaph Chan came to me, and I offer'd to take it in my Hand; but he made Signs to take off my Hat, and then he put it about my Neck, leading me right before the King. I understood not his meaning, but fear'd he would require the Custom of the Country mention'd above, which they call Size-Da; and was resolv'd rather to return my Present than submit to it. He made signs to me to give the King thanks, which I did after my own manner; whereupon some Officers call'd to me to make the Size-Da, but the King in the Persian Tongue said, No, No. So I return'd to my Place: But that you may judg of the King's Liberality, this Gift was not worth in all 30*l*. yet was it five times as good as any he gives in that sort, and look'd upon as a special Favour. For all the Great Men that wear the King's Image, which none may do but those to whom it is given, receive only a Medal of Gold, as big as a Sixpence, with a little Chain of four Inches to fasten it on their Heads, and this at their own Charge; some set it with Stones, or adorn it with Pendants of Pearls.

The 19th Gemaldin-Ussin, who I said before invited me to Havar Gemal, being newly made Governor of Syndu, came to dine with me, with two of his Sons, two other Gentlemen, and about a hundred Servants. He ate some of the Banquet provided in my House by a Moorish Cook, but would not touch such Meat as I had dress'd after my own Fashion, tho his Appetite was very good; but he refrain'd out of a sort of Superstition. Yet he desir'd that four or five Dishes might be sent to his House, such as he would chuse, being all bak'd Meats, which he had never seen before; and said he would dine on them in private, which was accordingly done. He offer'd me the Town of Syndu, and all other Courtesies in his Power; made haste to fill his Belly, and I gave him a small Present according to Custom.

The 20th, and the Night before it, fell a Storm of Rain, which they call the Elephant, and is usual at the end of the Rainy Season; but this was extraordinary, for there ran such Streams into the Pond, that tho it is inclos'd with Stone, very strong in appearance, yet the Water was so fierce that it broke thro in one place, which caus'd a sudden Fear and Consternation, lest it should drown all that part of the Town where I dwelt: infomuch that the Prince and all his Women forsook their House; my next Neighbour carry'd away his Wife and Goods on his Elephants and Camels to fly to the Hills side. All Men had their Horses ready at their Doors to save their Lives; so that we were much frighted, and sat up till Midnight, because we had no help but to fly our selves, and lose all our Goods; for it was reported it would run three Foot higher than the Top of my House, and carry all away, being poor mud Buildings: Fourteen years before having show'd the dismal Experience, the Bottom of the Pond being level with our Dwelling, and the Water extraordinary great and deep, so that the Top was much higher than my House, which stood in the Bottom, in the Course of the Water; every ordinary Rain making such a Current at my door, that it runs not swifter through the Arches of London Bridge, and is for some Hours impassable for Man or Horse. The King in the Night caus'd a Sluice to be open'd to discharge the Water another way, yet the very Rain had wash'd away a great part of the Walls of my House, and so weaken'd it all, breaking in at several Places, that I fear'd the Fall more than the Flood. Thus were we every way afflicted; Fires, Smokes, Floods, Storms, Heat, Dust, Flies, and no temperate Weather or safe Season. The 27th I receiv'd Advice from Surat that the Dutch had obtain'd leave to land their Goods there in a Warehouse, and trade till the Prince's Pleasure was known, upon condition they should depart upon the first Warning.

The 29th the King went to Havar Gemal, and so a hunting. It was resolv'd to remove to Mandoo, a Castle near Brampore, where there is no Town; that the King having sent away his Son Sultan Pervis to Bengala, might be near at hand to countenance his Son Sultan Coron, who he design'd should command in Decan contrary to the Inclination of all the Great Men. The 30th the King returning from hunting sent me a wild Boar so large, that he desir'd the Tusks might be sent him back for their extraordinary Size, sending word he had kill'd it with his own Hand, and bidding me eat it merrily.

The second of September was the King's Birth-day, and kept with great Solemnity. On this Day the King is weigh'd against some Jewels, Gold, Silver, Stuffs of Gold, Silver, and Silk, Butter, Rice, Fruit, and many other things, of every sort a little, which is all given to the Bramas or Bramans. The King commanded Asaph Chan to send for me to this Solemnity; who appointed me to come to the Place where the King sits at Durbar, and I should be sent for in: but the Messenger mistaking, I went not till Durbar time, and so miss'd the Sight; but being there before the King came out, as soon as he spy'd me, he sent to know the reason why I came not in, since he had order'd it. I answer'd according to the Mistake, yet he was very angry, and chid Asaph Chan publickly. He was so rich in Jewels, that I own in my Life I never saw such inestimable Wealth together. The time was spent in bringing his greatest Elephants before him; some of which being Lord Elephants, had their Chains, Bells, and Furniture of Gold and Silver, with many gilt Banners and Flags carry'd about them, and eight or ten Elephants waiting on each of them, cloth'd in Gold, Silk, and Silver. In this manner about twelve Companies pass'd by most richly adorn'd, the first having all the Plates on his Head and Breast set with Rubies and Emeralds, being a Beast of wonderful Bulk and Beauty. They all bow'd down before the King, making their Reverence very handsomly; this was the finest show of Beasts I ever saw. The Keepers of every chief Elephant gave a Present. Then having made me some favourable Complements, he rose up and went in. At night about ten of the clock he sent for me. I was then abed. The Message was, that he heard I had a Picture which I had not show'd him, desiring me to come to him and bring it; and if I would not give it him, he would order Copies of it to be taken for his Women. I got up, and carry'd it with me. When I came in, I found him sitting cross-leg'd on a little Throne, all cover'd with Diamonds, Pearls, and Rubies. Before him a Table of Gold, and on it about fifty Pieces of Gold Plate, all set with Jewels, some very great and extremely rich, some of them of less value, but all of them almost cover'd with small Stones. His Nobility about him in their best Equipage, whom he commanded to drink merrily, several sorts of Wine standing by in great Flaggons. When I drew near, he ask'd for the Picture. I show'd him two; he seem'd astonish'd at one of them, and ask'd whose it was. I told him a Friend of mine that was dead. He ask'd if I would give it him. I answer'd I valu'd it above all things, but if his Majesty would pardon me, and accept of the other, which was an excellent Piece, I would willingly bestow it on his Majesty. He thank'd me, and said he desir'd none but that Picture, and if I would give it him, he should prize it above the richest Jewel in his House. I reply'd, I was not so fond of any thing, but I would part with it to please his Majesty, with other Expressions of Respect. He bow'd to me, and said it was enough I had given it him; that he own'd he had never seen so much Art, so much Beauty, and conjur'd me to tell him truly, whether ever such a Woman liv'd. I assur'd him there did, but she was now dead. He said he would show it his Women, and take five Copies, and if I knew my own I should have it again. Other Compliments pass'd, but he would restore it, his Painters being excellent at copying in Water Colours. The other Picture being in Oil, he did not like. Then he sent me word it was his Birth-day, and all Men made merry, and ask'd whether I would drink with them. I answer'd, I would do whatsoever his Majesty commanded, and wish'd him many happy Days, and that the Ceremony might be renew'd a hundred years. He ask'd me whether I would drink Wine of the Grape, or made, whether strong or small. I reply'd, what he commanded, but hop'd it would not be too much, nor too strong. Then he call'd for a Gold Cup full of mix'd Wine, half of the Grape and half artificial, and drank; causing it to be fill'd again, and then sent it by one of the Nobles to me with this Message, That I should drink it off twice, thrice, four, or five times for his sake, and accept of the Cup and Appurtenances as a Present. I drank a little, but it was stronger than any I ever tasted; insomuch that it made me sneeze, which made him laugh; and he call'd for Rais-lins, Almonds, and slic'd Lemons, which were brought me on a Gold Plate, bidding me eat and drink what I would and no more. I made Reverence for my Present after my own manner, tho Asaph Chan would have had me kneel, and knock my Head against the Ground; but his Majesty accepted of what I did. The Cup was of Gold, set all about with small Rubies and Turky Stones, the Cover with large Rubies, Emeralds, and Turky Stones in curious Works, and a Dish suitable to set the Cup on. The Value I know not, because the Stones are many of them small; and the greater, which are many, not all clean, but they are in Number about 2000, and the Gold about 20 Ounces. Thus he made merry, and sent me word, he esteem'd me more than ever he had done, and ask'd whether I was merry at eating the wild Boar sent me a few days before; how I dress'd it, what I drank, assuring me I should want for nothing in his Country: the Effects of all which his publick Favours I presently found in the Behaviour of all his Nobility. Then he threw about to those that stood below two Chargers of new Ronpies, and amongus two Chargers of hollow Almonds of Gold and Silver mix'd; but I would not scramble, as his Great Men did, for I saw his Son take up none. Then he gave Sashes of Gold, and Girdles to all the Musicians and Waiters, and to many others. So drinking, and commanding others to do the same, his Majesty and all his Lords became the finest Men I ever saw, of a thousand several Humours. But his Son, Asaph Chan, two old Men, the late King of Candabar, and my self forbore. When he could hold up his Head no longer, he lay down to sleep, and we all departed.

Seven Months were now spent in soliciting the signing and sealing of the Articles of Peace and Commerce set down above, and nothing obtain'd but Promises from Week to Week, and from Day to Day; and therefore on the third of September, the English Fleet being hourly expected at Surat, I went to the Prince, and deliver'd him a Memorial containing the Articles I desir'd him to give an Order to be observ'd for the unloading of the Ships. The Articles were,

1st. That the Presents coming for the King and Prince should not be open'd at the Port, but sent up to Court seal'd by the Custom-house Officers.

2^{ly}. That Curiosities sent for other Presents, and for the Merchants to sell, should also be sent up to Court seal'd, for the Prince to take the first choice.

3^{dly}. That the gross Merchandize be landed, reasonably rated for the Custom, and not detain'd in the Custom-house; but that the Merchants paying the Custom, have full Liberty to sell or dispose of it; and that the Ships be supply'd with Provisions without paying Custom.

On the 4th, Asaph Chan sent me back my first Articles, after so long Attendance and so many false Promises, some of them alter'd, others struck out, and an Answer, that there was no articling at all, but it was enough to have an Order from the Prince, who was Lord of Surat, to trade there: but for Bengala or Syndu, it should never be granted. Notwithstanding all this Vexation, I durst not change my Method of proceeding, or wholly quit the Prince and Asaph Chan: Therefore I drew up other Articles, leaving out what was displeasing in the former, and desiring Asaph Chan to put them in form and procure the Seal, or else to give me leave to apply my self to the King, to receive his Denial, and depart the Country. The Substance of the new Articles was as follows. That all the Subjects of the Mogul should receive the English in friendly manner; to suffer them to land their Goods peaceably; to furnish them with Provisions for their Money, without paying any Customs for them; to have liberty, after paying Custom for their Goods, to sell them to any Person, and none to oblige them to sell any under rate; to have liberty to pass with such Goods to any Parts, without any thing being exacted farther of them more than at the Port; to have the Presents for the Mogul and Prince seal'd without opening, and sent to the Ambassador; to have the Goods of any that die secur'd from Confiscation, and deliver'd to the other English Factors; and in short, that no Injury in any sort be offer'd to any of them.

The 8th of this Month Asaph Chan sent me word in plain terms, he would procure nothing for me seal'd; but I might be satisfy'd with an Order sign'd by the Prince: which made me resolve to apply my self directly to the Prince, and apply no more to Asaph Chan. Accordingly I was with the Prince the 10th, and the 11th he sent me an Order, but so alter'd from what I had given in, that I sent it back. But at night I receiv'd a new Order from the Secretary, containing all my Articles; tho some Words were somewhat ambiguous, which the Secretary interpreted favourably, and at my request writ to the Governor of Surat, explaining them to him, as he had done to me. He gave me many Assurances of the Prince's Favour; and being a Man not subject to Bribery, I gave the more credit to him. So I accepted of the Order, which when translated, I found very effectual. The 16th I visited the Prince, resolving to seem wholly to depend on him, till I had heard what Entertainment our Ships met with. I found him sad for fear of Prince Pervis's coming to Court, he being but eight Coffes from it; but the power of Normal the Favourite Queen diverted it, and he was order'd away directly to Bengala. The Mogul was retir'd, but whither no Man could certainly tell.

Abdala
Chan's coming to Court as a criminal.

Several Days pass'd in soliciting the King and Great Ones, and paying court to them, without any thing remarkable; till on the 9th of October I receiv'd Letters from Surat with an Account that four English Ships were arriv'd there. Abdala Chan the great Governor of Amadabat being sent for to Court in disgrace, for many Insolencies and Contempts of the King's Authority: It was at first thought that he would stand on his Guard, and refuse to appear; but the Prince Sultan Corone, whose Ambition laid hold of every Advantage, desiring to oblige so Great a Man, as being one of the chief Commanders in India, prevail'd with him, on his Word, to submit. So he came sixty Miles on foot in Pilgrim's Clothes with forty Servants, counterfeiting great Humility, and perform'd the rest of the Journey in his Palankine, till he came near the Court; but had 2000 Horse one Day's Journey behind him. On the 10th of October he was brought to the Jarruco (the Place where the King sits in publick to see Sports, and hear Complaints) with Chains at his Heels, and barefoot, led between two Noblemen. He pull'd his Turbant over his Eyes, that he might see no Man, before he had the Happiness to behold the King's Face. After Reverence made, and some few Questions, the King forgave him, caus'd his Irons to be knock'd off, and him to be cloth'd with a new Vest of Cloth of Gold, with a Turbant and Girdle futable.

Sultan
motion.

The Prince, who intended to advance his Honour in the Wars of Decan, which his elder Brother had left with Disgrace, and the great Commander Chan-Channa did not prosper in, as being suppos'd to receive a Pension from the Decannins; caus'd his Father to recal Chan-Channa, who refusing to come, desir'd the King not to send Sultan Corone to that War, but one of his youngest Sons about fifteen years of Age. This Sultan Corone took to heart, but holding his purpose of carrying on that War, promis'd Abdala Chan the Command of the Army under him, removing of Chan-Channa. The King fearing Troubles, and being sensible of this Son's Ambition and factious Contrivances, of the Discontent of his two elder Sons, and the Power of Chan-Channa, was desirous to accommodate matters by accepting of Peace, and confirming Chan-Channa in his Post. To this purpose he secretly writ a favourable Letter, and design'd to send Chan-Channa a Vest, according to the Ceremony of Reconciliation; but before he dispatch'd it, he made it known to a Kinswoman of his living in the Seraglio. She, whether it was out of Falshood to her Friend, or that she was corrupted by Sultan Corone, or out of pride of Heart, seeing the Top of her Family, who had so well deserv'd, stand on such ticklish terms, said plainly, she did not believe Chan-Channa would wear any thing sent by the King, knowing his Majesty hated him, and had once or twice offer'd him Poison, which he putting into his Bosom instead of his Mouth, had made trial of; therefore she was confident he would not dare to put on his Body any thing that came from his Majesty. The King offer'd to wear it himself before her an hour, and that she should write to testify it. She reply'd, he would trust neither of them with his Life; but if he might live quietly in his Command, would do his Majesty good Service. Upon this the King alter'd his purpose, and resolv'd to send Sultan Corone; and to countenance his Reception, would himself follow after with another Army. Chan-Channa perceiving the Storm, practis'd with the Decannins, who were at his Devotion, to offer Terms of Peace for some time, as finding no other way to dispel this Cloud that hung over both, till the King and Prince were departed and settled further off. To this purpose two Embassadors arriv'd at Court this same 10th of October from the Princes of Decan. They brought Horses with rich Furniture for Presents. At first the King refus'd to hear them, or receive their Gifts; but turn'd them over to his Son, saying it was in his Breast to chuse Peace or War. The Prince puff'd up with this

this Favour, resolv'd to proceed on his Journey; tho the Conditions, I was told, were very honourable, and such as the King would have accepted of; answering, he would treat of no Peace, till he was in the Field with his Army, and Chan-Channa should not so defraud him of the Honour of finishing the War. This young Prince's Ambition is notorious, and become the common Talk of the People; yet his Father designs not the Crown for him, for Sultan Corforone the eldest Brother is belov'd and honour'd of all Men, even to a degree of Adoration, and that deservedly for his excellent Qualities. The King knows it and loves him, but thinks his Liberty would be a lessening of his own Glory, yet sees not that this sly Youth darkens him more by his ambitious Practices than the other would by virtuous Actions. Thus he nourishes Division and Emulation among the Brethren, and puts such Power into the hands of the younger, believing, he can reassume it at pleasure, that the wisest Men foresee great Distractions and Troubles like to follow in this Kingdom upon the King's Death, and that it is in danger to be torn in pieces by a Civil War. The History of this Country for variety of Matter, and the many subtle Practices in the time of Ezbar-Sha, Father to this King, and these later Troubles, were well worth writing; but because they come from such remote Parts, many will despise them; and by reason these People are esteem'd barbarous, few will believe them, and therefore I forbear making them publick, tho I could deliver as many rare and notable Acts of State, subtle Evasions, Policies, Answers and Adages, as I believe, for one Age, would not easily be equall'd: Yet I cannot omit one thing that happen'd lately, to show Wisdom and Patience in a Father, Faith in a Servant, Falshood in a Brother, and impudent Boldness in a Faction that dare attempt any thing, when the Supreme Majesty allows them a Liberty beyond either the Law of their own Condition, or the Bounds of Policy and Reason.

The Prince Sultan Corone, Normaball of the beloved Queen Aunt to this Prince's Wife, Asaph Chan his Father-in-law, Brother to the Queen, and Etiman Doulet Father to them both, being they that now govern all, and dare attempt any thing, resolv'd it was not possible for them to stand if Prince Sultan Corforone liv'd, he being belov'd by the Nobility, and like to punish their Ambition in time, if deliver'd: Therefore they practis'd

how to get him into their power in order to take him off by Poison. Normaball attempts the King with Crocodile Tears, telling him that Sultan Corforone was not safe, nor his aspiring thoughts laid aside. The King heard and seem'd to assent, but would not understand more than she deliver'd in plain terms. This failing, they took the opportunity of the King's being drunk, when Prince Etiman-Doulet and Asaph Chan mov'd, that for the safety of Sultan Corforone, and his Honour, it were fitter he were in the keeping of his Brother, that their Company might be a Comfort to one another, and he better taken care of than in the hands of a Resbote Idolater, to whom the King had committed him: Therefore they humbly desir'd his Majesty that he might be deliver'd into the hands of his dear Brother, which the King granted, and so fell asleep. They thought themselves so great, that using the King's Authority no Man durst refuse them, and if he were once in their possession they would dispute the restoring of him. So the same night Asaph Chan, sent by the Prince in the King's Name, came with a Guard to demand and receive Sultan Corforone at the hands of Annarab, a Rajah Rasboot, that is, a Prince, to whose Custody the King had committed him. He refus'd to deliver his Charge, with this Answer, That he was Sultan Corone's humble Servant, but that he had receiv'd his Brother from the hands of the King, and would deliver him to no other: That he should have patience till the Morning, when he would discharge himself to his Majesty, and be wholly at his disposal. This Answer broke the Design. In the Morning Annarab came to the King, and acquainted him with the Prince's Demand, his Refusal, and Answer, adding, That his Majesty had given him charge of his Son, and made him Commander of 4000 Horse, with all which he would die at the Gate, rather than deliver up the Prince into the hands of his Enemies. If his Majesty requir'd, he was ready to obey his Will, but he would clear his own Innocency. The King reply'd, You have done honestly and faithfully, you have answer'd discreetly, continue your Resolution, and take no notice of any Orders; I will not seem to know this, nor do you stir further in it; preserve your Fidelity, and let us see how far they will carry it. The Prince and the Faction the next day finding the King took no notice of any thing, and therefore hoping he had forgot what pass'd in his Wine, made made no mention of the Grant, or of the Refusal; but the Business fell on both sides, yet not without jealousy. This I infer, that the Company may not scatter their Goods, or engage too far into the Kingdom, because the time will soon come when all will be in a Combustion; and if Sultan Corforone prevail in asserting his Right, this Kingdom will be a Sanctuary for Christians, whom he loves and honours, favouring Learning, Valour and Warlike Discipline, and abhorring Covetousness, and the base Custom of taking Presents us'd by his Ancestors and the Nobility. If the other be superior, we shall be losers, for he is zealous in his Superstition, an Enemy to all Christians, proud, false, and barbarously Tyrannical.

The Mogul's eldest Son a virtuous Prince.

The 13th of this Month of October the King returning from hunting, sent me a wild Pig. I receiv'd Advice that the four English Ships before mention'd were safe in the Port of Soali. There came six out of England, but they lost company of one in bad Weather, and another was sent to Bantam. By the way they had fought a Portuguese Galeon bound for Goa, which burnt it self. Upon this News, on the 14th I sent for a Portuguese Jesuit residing at the Court, and gave him an account of it, offering a Peace upon equal terms, which he promis'd to acquaint the Viceroy of Goa with. Then I visit'd the Prince, and proposing to him that we might have a Port and place to fortify, and we would defend his Ships against the Portugueses, he rejected it with scorn. In the Evening I waited on the King with the same account of our Ships arrival, and he presently ask'd me what Presents came for him, which I could not give him an account of. He order'd I should have such things as I requir'd sent up to Court seal'd, without searching or paying any Custom. The 16th being with the Prince's Secretary about the dispatch of our Affairs, he mov'd me by his Highness's Order to procure him two Gunners out of our Fleet to serve him in the Decan Wars for good Pay, which I undertook to perform, knowing that indifferent Artists would serve there. This day Abdala Chan came to visit the Prince, so greatly attended that I have not seen the like: His Drums and Musick a Horse-back, being about 20, made noise enough, then follow'd 50 Persons carrying white Flags before him, and 200 Soldiers well mounted in Coats of Cloth of Gold, Velvet and rich Silks, who entred the Gate with him in order. Next his Person were 40 Targetiers in such like Liveries. He made humble Reverence, and presented a black Arabian Horse with his Furniture studded with Flowers of Gold, enamel'd and set with small Stones. The Prince according to custom return'd a Turbant, a Vest, and a Girdle.

The Prince holding his Resolution of finishing the Decan Wars in Person, would not give any Answer to those Embassadors, but detain'd them till he came near the Frontiers. Being to depart, neither he nor his Party thought themselves secure if Sultan Corforone remain'd in the hands of Annarah, because in his absence the King might be reconcil'd, and he getting his Liberty, all the Glory and Hopes of their Faction would vanish, and their Ambition and ill Practices hardly be pardon'd. On the 17th of this Month therefore they again attack the King's Constancy, desiring him to deliver up his Son into the hands of Asaph Chan, as his Guardian under Sultan Corone, pretending it will fright Chan Channa and the Decans, when they hear this Prince is so favour'd, who comes to make War upon them, that the King has deliver'd up his eldest Son to him, and in him as it were the whole Kingdom, the hope of Succession, and the present Power. The King, who had yielded himself up into the hands of a Woman, could not defend his Son from her Practices. He either sees not the Ambition, or trusts it too far in Confidence of his own Power, and consents; so that this day he was deliver'd up, the Soldiers of Annarah discharg'd, and a Supply of Asaph Chan's plac'd about him, with an addition of 200 of the Prince's Horse. His Sister and many Women in the Seraglio mourn, refuse their Meat, exclaim against the King's Dotage and Cruelty, and declare that if he dies an hundred of his Kindred will burn for him in memory of the King's Inhumanity towards his worthiest Son. The King gives fair Words, protests no harm is design'd the Prince, promises his Delivery, and sends Normahall to appease these enrag'd Ladies, who curse, threaten and refuse to see her. The common People murmur, and say the King has not deliver'd his Son but his own Life into the hands of an ambitious Prince, and a treacherous Faction. That Sultan Corforone cannot perish without Scandal to the Father, or Revenge from him, and therefore he must go first, and after him his Son, and so through their Blood this Youth must mount the Throne. New hopes are spread of his Redeliv-

News according to his Fears or Desires;
but the poor Prince remains in the Paws

Persian Embassador his Entry and Audience.

The 19th the Persian Embassador Mahomet Raza Beg made his Entry into the Town about Noon, with a great Train, partly sent out by the King to meet him with 100 Elephants, and Musick, tho no Man of greater Quality than the ordinary Receiver of Strangers. The Embassador's own Retinue were about 50 Horse well equipp'd, and in Coats of Cloth of Gold, their Bows, Quivers, and Targets richly garnish'd, 40 Shot, and about 200 common Foot, and Attendants on the Baggage. He was carried to rest in a Room within the King's outward Court till Evening, when he came to the Durbar, before the King. I sent my Secretary to observe the fashion of this Ceremony. When he approach'd he made at the first Rail three Tefelins, and one Sizeda, which is prostrating him-self and knocking his Head against the ground; he did so again within, and so presented Sha Abas's Letter, which the King took with a little motion of his Body, only asking, How does my Brother? without mentioning the Title of Majesty. After some few words he was plac'd in the seventh Rank against the Rail by the Door, below so many of the King's Servants on both sides, which in my opinion was a very mean place for his Master's Embassador; but he well deserv'd it, for doing that Reverence which his Predecessors refused, to the Dishonour of his Prince, and the Regret of many of his Nation. It is said he had order from the Sophy to give Content, and 'tis therefore suppos'd his Message is for some Supply of Money against the Turk, which has often been liberally granted, tho at the same time it is pretended he comes only to mediate a Peace for the Decans, whom Sha Abas pretends to protect, being jealous of the increase of this Empire. The King according to custom gave him a handsome Turbant, a Vest of Cloth of Gold, and a Girdle, for which again he made three Tefelins, and one Sizeda, or Inclination down to the ground. He brought for Presents three times nine Arabian and Persian Horses, this being a ceremonious number among them; nine Mules very fair and large, seven Camels laden with Velvet, two Sutes of European Hangings, which I suppose were not Aras, but Venetian Velvet wrought with Gold; two Chests of Persian Hangings, one rich Cabinet, 40 Muskets, five Clocks, one Camel laden with Persian Cloth of Gold, 8 Carpets of Silk, two Rubies Ballaces, 21 Camel-loads of Wine of the Grape, 14 Camels of distill'd sweet Waters, 7 of Rose-water, 7 Daggers set with precious Stones, 5 Swords set after the same manner, 7 Venetian Looking-glasses, and these so fair and rich, that I was out of Countenance when I heard it. These Presents were not deliver'd now, but only a Note of them. His own Equipage was rich, having nine led Horses trapp'd in Gold and Silver. About his Turbant was wound a String of Pearls, Rubies and Turky Stones, and three Pipes of Gold answering to three Feathers. I caus'd his Reception to be diligently observ'd, and found he was not favour'd above me in any point, but much less in many particulars, being plac'd much inferior than I, and only exceeding in being met out of Town, which by reason of my Sickness was not demanded; nor did the King receive Sha Abas's Letter with such respect as he did my Master's, whom he call'd the King of England his Brother, and the Persian barely Brother, without any addition; which was an Observation of the Jesuit, who understood the Language.

The 20th of October I receiv'd the Prince's Letter to send for Surat, with Orders to the Governor of that Place to sit with the Judge of the Custom-house, and take care that no wrong was done the English. But as to the matter of sending up the Presents to me seal'd and unsearch'd, 'twas so unintelligible that it was subject to various Constructions, which I judg'd to be done designedly, that they might be sent to him to be his own Carver. This made me send it back to his Secretary, and it being return'd more intricate than at first, I went to the Prince on the 21st, and desir'd him to have that part better explain'd. He ask'd me how he should have his Presents, or such other Curiousies as came up? and mov'd me to go with him where they were. I answer'd, I could not do it till I had deliver'd my Message and Tokens to the King, but would then attend his Ground for a considerable time, which extremely pleas'd the King, and was base, but profitable Flattery. The 25th the King return'd to Court, having been far gone over night in Wine. Some either accidentally or maliciously spoke of the last merry Night, and that many of the Nobility drank Wine, which none must do without leave. The King forgetting his Order, ask'd who gave it; and Answer was made, the Buxy: for no Man dares say it was the King, when he seems to be willing to make a doubt of it. The Custom is, that when the King drinks, which is alone, sometimes he will command the Nobility to drink after him, which if they do not, it is look'd upon as a Crime; and so every Man that takes a Cup of Wine of the Officer, has his Name writ down, and he makes his Tefelin, tho perhaps the King's Eyes are clouded. The King not remembring his own Command, call'd the Buxy, and ask'd whether he gave the Order; who falsely deny'd it, for he had it from the King, and by name call'd all that drank with the Embassador. The King then call'd for the List, and Persons nam'd in it, and fin'd some one, some two, and some three thousand Roupies; and some that were nearer his Person he caus'd to be whip'd before him, they receiving a hundred and thirty Stripes with a terrible Instrument, having at the ends of four Cords, Irons like Spur-rowels, so that every Stroke made four Wounds. When they lay for dead on the Ground, he commanded the Standers by to spurn them, and after that the Porters to break their Staves on them. Thus most cruelly mangled and bruise'd they were carry'd out; one of them dy'd on the spot. Some would have excus'd it by laying it on the Embassador; but the King reply'd, he only order'd a Cup or two to be given him. Tho Drunkenness be a common Vice and an Exercise of the King's, yet is it so strictly forbidden, that no Man can enter the Guzelcan, where the King sits, but the Porters smell his Breath, and if he have but tasted Wine, is not suffer'd to come in; and if the reason of his Absence be known, it will be a difficult matter to escape the Whip: for if the King once takes offence, the Father will not speak for the Son. Thus the King made all the Company pay the Persian Embassador's Present.

The 28th, the King's Day of Removal being at hand, I sent to Asaph Chan for a Warrant for Carriages. The Merchants having sought all the Town to remove their Goods to Agra, could find none. I being enrol'd by his Majesty, receiv'd Order for twenty Camels, four Carts, and two Coaches at the King's price. Of these I allow'd the Factors as many as they needed for their use. I cannot here omit a Passage either of wonderfull Baseness in this great Monarch, or else a Trial put upon me. The King had condemn'd divers Thieves, among which were some Boys. There was no way to save their Lives, but to sell them for Slaves. His Majesty commanded Asaph Chan to offer two of them to me for Money; which he appointed the Cutwal, that is the Marshal, to do. My Interpreter made answer, without my knowledge, that Christians kept no Slaves; that those the King had given me I had set free, and it was in vain to propose it to me. Yet afterwards of himself he told me of it. I suspected it might be a Trial of me, to see whether I would give a little Money to save the Lives of two Children; or else, I thought, tho it were in earnest, it were no great loss to do a good Deed, and try the Baseness or Scope of this Offer. I commanded my Interpreter to go to Asaph Chan, and tell him he had acquainted me with the Motion, and his Answer; that I had reprov'd him for pretending to deliver my Thoughts in any case: and therefore my own Reply was, that if there were any Money to be paid to redeem the Lives of two Children to those whom they had rob'd, or to redeem them from the Law, I was ready to give it, both out of respect to the King's Commands, and for Charity; but I would not buy them as Slaves, only pay their Ransom, and free them: and therefore if he would know the King's pleasure, that I might give them their Liberty without offence, I was very willing to do it. Asaph Chan reply'd, I might dispose of them as I pleas'd; that it was an extraordinary Goodness, and with many Commendations accepted of the Money; desiring me to send it to the Cutwal, and to use my own Discretion with the Boys; never offering to inform the King, which was one end of my Liberality. But I resolving not to be impos'd upon, lest this should be only a trick of the Officers to get Money, sent to let the Cutwal know what had pass'd betwixt me and Asaph Chan, and that if at Night he would acquaint the King that I had offer'd to redeem the Prisoners out of Charity, and his Majesty would consent to their Liberty, I was ready to pay the Money, but Highness with his Presents, and all Rarities that came to my hands should be sent after him. He press'd me to give my word for the Performance, and so I obtain'd an Order to my mind. His Highness looking on a white Feather in my Hat, ask'd if I would give it him. I reply'd, I would not offer that I had worn, but if he pleas'd to command it, that or any thing in my power was at his service; and I took his Acceptance as a great Honour. He ask'd whether I had any more; I said, three or four of other Colours: and he again, whether I would give them all, because he was to show his Horses and Servants to the King within two days, and wanted some; they being very rare in those Parts. I promis'd to bring them all on the morrow, that his Highness might take what he pleas'd.

The Prince's wealth.

Abdala Chan in a gallant Equipage both as to his Person and Retinue, tho the Apparel was strange and antick, but Soldier-like in those Parts, presented the Prince a white Horse, the Saddle and Furniture of Gold enamel'd, the Beast of delicate Shape, mettlesom, and bold. The Prince return'd a plain Sword with a Leather Belt. Many others were brought before him with Silver Hilts, and Chapes set with small Stones, and Targets cover'd with Velvet wrought with Gold, and some painted and boss'd with Gold and Silver, which he gave to his Servants against the Review. Many Saddles and Furnitures of his own all of Gold set with Stones for led Horses were shown, his Boots embroider'd, and all other Accoutrements of State. The Value is wonderful, and the Wealth daily seen inestimable.

It is reported, that this last Night six of the Prince's Servants went to murder Sultan Corforone, but were not admitted by the Porter; and that the Queen Mother is gone to the King with an account of all the Practice.

Persian Ambassador's Audience.

In the Evening I went to the Durbar to visit the King, where I met the Persian Ambassador with the first Show of his Presents. He appear'd more like a Jester or Jugler, than a Person of Gravity, running up and down, and acting all he said like a Mimick. He deliver'd the Presents with his own Hands, which the King receiv'd with Smiles, a cheerful Countenance, and Expressions of Satisfaction. His Tongue was a great Advantage to him in delivering his Business; which he did with so much Flattery and Obsequiousness, that it pleas'd as much as his Gift: ever calling the Mogul King and Commander of the World, forgetting his own Master had a Share in it; and upon every slight occasion he made his Teselins. When all was deliver'd for that Day, he prostrated himself on the Ground, and knock'd it with his Head as if he would have enter'd it. The Gifts were a Quiver for Bow and Arrows delicately embroider'd; all sorts of European Fruits artificial in Dishes; folding Purfes, and Knacks of Leather wrought with Needle-work in colour'd Silks; Shoos embroider'd and stitch'd; great Glasses in Frames inlay'd; one square piece of Velvet embroider'd high with Gold in Panes, between which were Italian Pictures wrought in the Stuff, which he said were the King and Queen of Venice; of these six Pieces were given, but only one show'd. There were besides many other Curiosities of small value; after which came three times nine Horses, which had either lost their Fleck or Beauty, for I thought them all, except two or three, unfit to be sent to, or receiv'd by Princes; the Mules were handsome. After this he return'd with many antick Tricks to his place, far inferior to that allow'd me, which was alone, and above all Subjects. This is but the first Act of his presenting, the Play will not be finish'd in ten Days.

Roe.

The 22^d the Letter the Prince had promis'd me for the sending up of the Presents unsearch'd, being again detain'd, I went to his Secretary, who said they could not be sent up without visiting, lest the Merchants under that pretence should steal Customs. I was offended and going away, but the Secretary prevail'd with me to go with him to the Prince, who accepted of some Feathers I brought him; and knowing my Resolution, order'd I should be dispatch'd to content.

Sultan Corforone's faithless Dealing.

At night I went to the Durbar to observe the Persian Ambassador, and found him standing in his Rank, but often remov'd and set lower, as Great Men came in. The King once spoke to him, and he danc'd to that Musick, but gave no Present, and the Mogul order'd he should be feasted by the Nobles. The 24th the King remov'd to Havar Gemal, and sent for the Persian Ambassador, who at night eat and drank before the King with the Nobility in the same manner as I had done on the Birth-day. The difference was, that the Mogul gave him 20000 Roupies for his Expence, for which he made many Teselins and Sizedaes, not rising from the

would not buy them as Slaves; and desir'd his Majesty to pardon them upon my Redemption. Thus I put them to the Test of their own Offer. The Sum demand'd did not exceed ten Pounds. The Cutwal answer'd, he would know the King's pleasure. Some would persuade me this is one of the Mogul's signal Favours, to pitch upon such Great Men, to whom he will offer the Opportunity of doing good, as the redeeming of Prisoners; and that the Money is to make satisfaction to the Party that was rob'd; and that these so appointed by the King to ransom others, make the Sizeda, as for some Benefit receiv'd. I went to the Durbar to see if his Majesty would himself speak to me; the Cutwal made many Motions, but I understood nothing. This Day I sent my Secretary to the Persian Embassador, to let him know I would visit him, if he would give his word to repay the Visit, with other Compliments. Who answer'd with all Respect, that it was the Custom of the Country for Embassadors not to visit one another without the King's leave, which he would move for, and then receive me with all Friendship, and repay my Visit; with many more Expressions of Civility.

November the first, Sultan Corone took his leave and went to his Tents. The King at Noon sat out in the Durbar, whether the Prince brought his Elephants, being about 600 richly trap'd and furnish'd, and his Followers by computation 1000 Horse; many of them in Cloth of Gold, with Herons Feathers in their Turbants, all very gallant. The Prince himself in a Coat of Cloth of Silver embroider'd with great Pearl, and glittering with Diamonds like the Firmament. The King embrac'd, kiss'd, and show'd him much Affection. At his Departure he gave him a Sword, the Scabbard all of Gold set with Stones, valu'd at 100000 Roupies; a Dogger at 40000; an Elephant and two Horses, all their Furniture of Gold set with Stones; and for a Close, one of the new Coaches made in imitation of that sent by the King my Master; and commanded the English Coachman to drive him to his Tents. The Prince went into the Coach, and sat in the middle, the Sides open, his chiefest Nobles afoot, walking by him to his Tents about four Miles distant. All the way he thrę Quarters of Roupies, being follow'd by a Multitude of People. He reach'd his Hand to the Coachman, and put into his Hat about 100 Roupies.

The second the King remov'd about three Miles to his Tents with his Women and all the Court. I went beforehand to attend him; and coming to the Palace, found him at the Jarruco Window, and went upon the Scaffold under him. Not having seen this Place before, I was glad of the Opportunity. Two Eunuchs stood on two Trellises with long Poles and Feather Fans at the end of them, fanning him. He bestow'd many Favours, and receiv'd Presents. What he bestow'd he let down by a silk String rol'd on a turning Instrument; what was given him, a venerable fat deform'd old Matron, wrinkled and hung round with Gimbels like an Image, pull'd up at a hole with such another Clue. At one side in a Window were his two principal Wives, whose Curiosity made them break little Holes in a Grate of Reed that hung before it to gaze on me. I saw first their Fingers, and then they laying their Faces close, first the one, and then the other, I could sometimes discern their full Proportion. They were indifferently white, with black Hair smooth'd up; but if there had been no other Light, their Diamonds and Pearls had suffic'd to show them. When I look'd up, they retir'd; and were so merry, that I suppose they laugh'd at me. On a sudden the King rose, we retir'd to the Durbar, and sat on the Carpets, attending his coming out. Not long after he came, and sat about half an Hour, till his Ladies at their door had mounted their Elephants, which were about fifty, all of them richly adorn'd, but chiefly three with Turrets on their Backs all enclos'd with Grates of Gold Wire to look through, and Canopies over of Cloth of Silver. Then the King came down the stairs with such an Acclamation of Health to the King, as would have out-roar'd Cannon. At the foot of the Stairs, where I met him, and shuffled to be next, one brought a mighty Carp; another a Dish of white Stuff like Starch, into which he put his Finger, and touch'd the Fish, and so rub'd it on his Forehead; a Ceremony us'd prefaging good Fortune. Then another came, and girt on his Sword and hung on his Buckler set all over with Diamonds and Rubies, the Belts of Gold futable. Another hung on his Quiver with thirty Arrows, and his Bow in a Case, being the same that was presented by the Persian Embassador. On his Head he wore a rich Turbant with a Plume of Herons Fathers, not many but long. On one side hung a Ruby unset, as big as a Walnut; on the other side a Diamond as large; in the middle an Emerald like a Heart much bigger. His Staff was wound about with a Chain of great Pearl, Rubies, and Diamonds drill'd. About his Neck he wore a Chain of three Strings of most excellent Pearl, the largest I ever saw. Above his Elbows, Armlets set with Diamonds, and on his Wrists three Rows of several sorts; his Hands bare, but almost on every Finger a Ring. His Gloves, which were English, stuck under his Girdle. His Coat of Cloth of Gold without Sleeves, upon a fine Semian, as thin as Lawn. On his Feet a Pair of Buskins embroider'd with Pearl, the Toes sharp and turning up. Thus arm'd and accoutred he went to the Coach that attended him, with his new English Servant, who was cloth'd as rich as any Player, and more gaudy, and had broke four Horses, which were trap'd and harness'd in Gold Velvets. This was the first Coach he ever sat in, made by that sent out of England, so like that I knew it not but by the Cover, which was a Persian Gold Velvet. He sat at the end, and on each side went two Eunuchs, who carry'd small Maces of Gold set all over with Rubies, with a long Bunch of Horsetail to flap the Flies away. Before him went Drums, base Trumpets, and loud Musick, many Canopies, Umbrelloes, and other strange Ensigns of Majesty, made of Cloth of Gold set in many places with Rubies. Nine led Horses, the Furniture some garnish'd with Rubies, some with Pearls and Emeralds, some only with Studs enamel'd. The Persian Ambassador presented him a Horse. Next behind came three Palankines, the Carriages and Feet of one plated with Gold, set at the ends with Stones, and cover'd with Crimson Velvet embroider'd with Pearl, and a Fringe of great Pearl hanging in Ropes a foot deep, a Border about it set with Rubies and Emeralds. A Footman carry'd a Footstool of Gold set with Stones. The other two Palankines were cover'd and lin'd only with Cloth of Gold. Next follow'd the English Coach newly cover'd and richly adorn'd, which he had given to Queen Normahal, who sat in it. After them a third, in which sat his younger Sons. Then follow'd about twenty Elephants Royal, led for him to mount, so rich in Stones and Furniture, that they glitter'd like the Sun. Every Elephant had sundry Flags of Cloth of Silver, gilt Sattin and Taffety. His Noblemen he suffer'd to walk afoot, which I did to the Gate, and left him. His Wives on their Elephants were carry'd half a Mile behind him. When he came before the Door where his eldest Son is Prisoner, he stay'd the Coach, and call'd for him. He came and made Reverence, with a Sword and Buckler in his Hand, his Beard grown to his Middle, a sign of Disfavour. The King commanded him to mount one of the spare Elephants, and so rode next to him, with extraordinary Applause and Joy of all Men, who are now fill'd with new Hopes. The King gave him 1000 Roupies to cast to the People. His Jailor Asaph Chan, and all those Monsters were yet afoot. I took Horse to avoid the Croud and other Inconveniences, and cross'd out of the Askar before him, waiting till he came near his Tents. He pass'd all the way between a Guard of Elephants, having every one a Turret on his Back, and on the four Corners of each four Banners of yellow Taffety, and right before a piece of Cannon carrying a Bullet as big as a Tennis-Ball, the Gunner behind it. They were in all about 300. Other Elephants of State went before and behind, being about 600, all which were cover'd with Velvet, or Cloth of Gold, and had two or three gilded Banners. Several Footmen ran along the way with Skins of Water to lay the Dust before the King. No Horse or Man was suffer'd to come within two Furlongs of the Coach, except those that walk'd by afoot. So that I hastened to his Tents to attend his alighting. They were wall'd in about half an English Mile in Compass in form of a Fort, with several Angles and Bulwarks, and high Curtains of a coarse Stuff made like Arras, red on the Outside, and within Figures in Panes, with a handsom Gatehouse, every Post that bore these up headed with Brass. The Throng was great, I had a mind to go in; no Man was permitted, the Greatest in the Land sitting at the Door: However I made an Offer, and they admitted me, but refus'd the Persian Ambassador, and all the Noblemen. Here first the Persian Ambassador saluted me with a silent Compliment. In the midst of this Court was a Throne of Mother of Pearl born on two Pillars rais'd on Earth, cover'd over with a high Tent, the Pole headed with a Noble Gold; under that Canopies of Cloth of Gold, and under foot Carpets. When the King drew near the Door, some Noblemen came in, and the Persian Ambassador. We stood on both sides making a Line. The King entering cast his Eye on me ; I made him Reverence, and he lay'd his Hand on his Breast and bow'd, and turning to the other side nodded to the Persian. I follow'd at his Heels till he went up, and every Man cry'd, Joy and good Fortune, and so we took our Places. He call'd for Water, wash'd his Hands, and departed. His Women went in some other way to their Apartment, and his Son I saw not. Within this Inclosure were about thirty Divisions with Tents. All the Noblemen retir'd to theirs, which were in excellent Forms, some all white, some green, some mix'd, all inclos'd as orderly as any House, in the most magnificent manner I ever saw. The Vale show'd like a beautiful City, for the Baggage made no Confusion. I was ill provided with Carriage, and asham'd of my Equipage ; for five years Allowance would not have provided me an indifferent Sute answerable to others: and to add to the Grandeur every Man has two, so that one goes before to the next Ground, and is set up a Day before the King rises from the Place where he is. So I return'd to my poor House.

November the 5th I rode about five Miles to the Prince's Tents. I made his Highness my Compliments of Leave, wishing him Prosperity and Success; but he order'd me to return and take my leave two Days after, having presented him some Business about Debts due to the English, which he promis'd to examine and dispatch. He sat with the same Greatness and Magnificence I mention'd of his Father, his Throne being plated over with Silver, inlay'd with Flowers of Gold, and the Canopy over it square, born up on four Pillars cover'd with Silver; his Arms, Sword, Buckler, Bows, Arrows, and Lance on a Table before him. The Watch was set, for it was Evening when we came abroad. I observ'd him curiously now he was absolute, and took notice of his Behaviour and Actions. He receiv'd two Letters, and read them standing before he ascended his Throne. I never saw so settled a Countenance, or any Man keep so constant a Gravity, never smiling, nor by his Looks showing any Respect or Distinction of Persons, but an extreme Pride and Contempt of all. Yet I perceiv'd some inward Trouble now and then assail him, and a kind of Interruption and Distraction in his Thoughts; answering Suiters disorderly, or in Confusion, or not hearing them. If I can judg of it, he has left his Heart among his Father's Women, with whom he has the liberty of conversing. Normaball the day before went to visit him in the English Coach, and took leave of him. She gave him a Cloke all embroider'd with Pearl, Diamonds, and Rubies, and carry'd away, if I mistake not, all his Attention for Business. The 9th the Prince being to remove, sent one of his Guard in haste for me. I was not provided to go, but he press'd me; urging his Master stay'd for me; that he had order'd him not to return without me; that all the Court did talk of the Prince's Favour to me; that it was reported he had desir'd the King to let me accompany him to the Army; and that he had promis'd to use me so well, that I should confess his Favour to our Nation. This News made me take horse after Dinner; but I found him newly risen and marching, but met a Dutch Man his Jeweller, who confirm'd all the Soldier had said, and added so much more that I believ'd none of it. I sent word I was come, and he return'd Answer, that I should pass before to the Tents, and sit till he came, and he would speak with me. It was Night before he came; he only look'd on me, sat a little, and went in among his Women. As he pass'd he turn'd about, and sent a Servant to desire me to stay a while, and he would come into the Guzelcan, and take his leave of me. Within half an Hour he set out, but I could not get any Man to put him in mind of me, and he was fallen to play, and either forgot it, or put a Trick of State upon me; so that I stay'd an Hour. Being much troubled I went to the Door, and told the Waiters that the Prince had sent for me; that I came only to receive his Orders; that I had stay'd long, and must return to my House, it being late; and if his Highness had any business I desir'd him to send it after me, for I scorn'd such Usage; and so went away to take horse. Before I could mount, Messengers came running for me, and I went in. He excus'd himself, and blam'd his Officers, using me with much show of Civility; calling me to see his Cards, and asking me several Questions. The Eunuchs and Officers told me the Prince would make me a great Present, and if I fear'd to ride home late, I should have ten Horse to guard me. The Present came, and was a Cloke of Cloth of Gold which he had worn once or twice, and which they put upon my Back: I made Reverence for it very unwillingly; and it is here reputed the highest Favour to give a Garment that that has been worn by the Prince, or just lain on his Shoulders; yet this would have become an Actor that had represented his Ancestor Tamerlan. Then he bow'd, and I had my Discharge; yet first I urg'd some Business, and having my Answer, took my leave. Going out I was follow'd by his Porters and Waiters in such shameful manner, that I half paid for my Cloke before I got clear of them.

November the 10th almost all the Town being remov'd, I was left behind, having got neither Camels nor Carts, notwithstanding my Warrant; and the Persian Embassador was under the same Circumstances, who complain'd, and was soon redress'd: Whereupon I sent to Court, and on the 11th receiv'd two Warrants for Carts and Camels at the King's price; but it was not easy to get either, the Great Men having Soldiers every way to take all up; and indeed it was wonderful how the whole Town and two Leskars, or Camps, that is the King's and Prince's, could remove at once. The 16th the King gave Orders to fire all the Leskars, or Huts at Adsmere, to oblige the People to follow him; which was daily executed. The Persian Embassador and I were left in bad plight, in danger of Thieves, who came daily from the Camp to rob; and almost without Bread to eat. This made me think of buying Beasts and Carriages, which would prove as cheap as hiring; but first I sent again to Court to make one trial more. Having nothing material to speak of during my Solitude at Adsmere, I will here say something of the Condition of Sultan Corforone, of whose late Delivery into the Hands of his Enemies, before mention'd, every Man's Heart and Mouth was full. The King notwithstanding he had so far condescended to satisfy his proud Son at his Departure, yet it seems design'd not to wink at any wrong offer'd the Elder; and therefore partly to secure him in the Hands of Asaph Chan, and partly to satisfy the People who murmur'd, and fear'd some Treachery might be practis'd against him, took Occasion to declare his Mind in publick. Asaph Chan had visited his new Prisoner, and in his Behaviour did not acknowledg him as his Prince, but rudely prest upon him against his Will, and without Respect. Some are of opinion he pick'd a Quarrel, and knowing that the Prince's brave Nature would not bear an Affront, tempted him to draw his Sword, or to use some Violence, which the Guard should presently revenge, or else it should be represented to the King as an Attempt to kill his Keeper, and make his Escape. But the Prince was more patient, and only got a Friend to acquaint the King with his Sailor's Manners. The King call'd Asaph Chan at the Durbar, and ask'd when he saw his Charge. He answer'd, two days before. His Majesty reply'd, What did you with him? He said, only visit him. The King prest'd to know how he behav'd himself towards the Prince. Asaph Chan perceiving the King knew what had happen'd, said he went to see him, and to offer him his Service, but the Prince refus'd to admit him into his Chamber; which, he having charge of him, thought necessary for himself to do, and uncivil for the other to refuse, and therefore he prest in. The King presently reply'd, When you were in, what said you, what did you, what Duty show'd you towards my Son? Asaph was blank, and confess'd he did him no Reverence. Whereupon the King told him, he would make his proud Heart know him to be his eldest Son and beloved Heir, his Prince and Lord; and if he once heard of any the least want of Respect or Duty towards him, he would command his Son to set his feet on his Neck and trample on him: That he lov'd Sultan Corone well, but would make the World know, he did not intrust his Son among them for his Ruin.

The 20th of this Month I receiv'd a new Warrant for Carriages, which procur'd me eight Camels, but such poor ones as would not suffice me, and therefore I was forc'd to take order to buy the rest. The 22d I remov'd into my Tents. The 25th I remov'd six Cosses, but staid the following Days for the Caravan that was going from Agra to Surat to send my Papers with safety. December the first I remov'd four Cosses to Ramsor, where the King had left the Bodies of a hundred naked Men, executed in the Fields for robbing. The 2d seven Cosses, the 3d rested because of the Rain, the 4th five Cosses; in the way this Day I overtook a Camel laden with three hundred Mens Heads, sent from Candabar by the Governor as a Present to the King, these Men being in Rebellion. The 5th five Cosses, the 6th four, where I overtook the King at a wall'd Town call'd Todah, in the best Country I saw since my landing; being a fair Champain, at every Cosse a Village; the Soil fruitful in Corn, Cotton, and Cattle. The 7th the King only remov'd from one side to the other of the Town, which was one of the best bel. built I ever saw in India, for some Houses were two Stories high, and most of them such as a Pedlar might not scorn to keep shop in, all cover'd with Tile. It had been the Seat of a Raja Rasboote before the Conquest of Exbar Sha, and stood at the foot of a great Rock very strong, had many excellent Works of hew'd Stone about it, many Ponds arch'd, vaulted, and Descents to them large and deep: By it was a delicate Grove, two miles long and a quarter broad, planted on purpose with Mangoes, Tamarinds, and other Fruit-trees divided into Walks, and full of little Temples, and Altars of Pagodes, and Indian Idolatry, many Fountains, Wells and Summer-houses of carv'd Stone curiously arch'd; so that a banish'd English-man might have been content to live there. But it is a general Observation, that all goes to ruin and destruction; for since the Propriety of all is come to the King, no Man takes care of anything in particular, so that Devastation and the Spoils of War appear in every place without any Reparation. The 8th I was at the King's Guzelcan, and found him so near drunk that he made it up in half an hour, so that I could move no Business to him.

Mo-Camp
ib'd.
The 9th I took a view of the Leskar, or King's Camp, which is one of the Wonders I e'er beheld, and chiefly for that I saw it set up and finish'd in less than four hours, except some of the great Men, who have double Suites of Tents, it being no less than 20 English Miles in compass, the length some ways three Cosses including the Skirts: In the middle, where the Streets are orderly, and Tents join'd, there are all sorts of Shops, and so regularly dispos'd, that every Man knows whither to go directly for what he wants; each Man of Quality, and every Trade being appointed how far from the King's Tents they shall pitch, what ground they shall take up, and on what side, without ever altering. All which as it lies together is almost equal to any Town in Europe for Greatness; but no Man must approach the Royal Ataschanba, or Quarter, by a Musket-shot every way; which is now so strictly observ'd, that none are admitted but by Name, and the time of the Durbar in the Evening is omitted, and spent in hunting, or hawking on Pools by Boat, in which the King takes wonderful delight, and his Barges are remov'd on Cart with him. He sits on the sides of these Pools, which are often a Mile or two over. At the Jarruco in the Morning he is seen, but Business, or Speech prohibited, all being concluded at Night in the Guzelcan, and there very often the opportunity is mis'd, his Majesty being overcome by the Fumes of Bacchus. There was now a Whisper at Court about a new Affinity of Sultan Corforone and Asaph Chan, and great hope of the former's Liberty. I will find an opportunity to discourse of it, because the Particulars are worth observing, and the Wisdom and Goodness of the King appears above the Malice of others; and Normahall fulfils that Observation, that a Woman has always a great hand at Court and in Faction: She shows they are not incapable of managing Business. This will discover a noble Prince, an excellent Wife, a faithful Counsellor, a crafty Stepmother, an ambitious Son, a cunning Favourite, all reconcil'd by a patient King, whose Heart was not understood by any of all those. But this will require a peculiar place. The English at Surat complain'd of ill usage at this time, but their Drunkenness and other Exorbitances proceeding from it were so great in that place, that it was rather wonderful they were suffer'd to live.

fore him, desir'd me to take my choice of the Fowl and Fish, and then distributed the remainder to the Nobility. I found him sitting on his Throne, and a Beggar at his Feet, a poor silly old Man all ragged and patch'd, with a young Rogue attending him. The Country abounds in this sort of profess'd poor holy Men, and they are held in great Veneration; and in Works of Mortification, and voluntary Sufferings, they outdo all that ever has been pretended either by Hereticks or Idolaters. This miserable Wretch cloth'd in Rags, crown'd with Feathers, cover'd with Ashes, his Majesty talk'd with about an hour so familiarly, and with such seeming Kindness, that it must needs argue an Humility not found easily among Kings. The Beggar sat, which the King's Son dares not do; he gave the King a Present, a Cake mix'd with Ashes, burnt on the Coals, and made by himself of coarse Grain, which the King willingly accepted, broke a bit and eat it, which a nice Person could scarce have done; then he took the Clout and wrapt it up and put into the poor Man's Bosom, and sent for 100 Roupies, and with his own hand pour'd them into the poor Man's Lap, and gather'd up for him what fell beside. When his Collation, or Banquet and Drink came, whatsoever he took to eat

he broke and gave the Beggar half; and riling, after many strange Humiliations and Charities, the old Wretch not being nimble, he took him up in his Arms, tho no cleanly body durst have touch'd him, imbracing him, and three times laying his Hand on his Heart, and calling him Father, left him and all of us, and me in Admiration to see such Virtue in a Heathen Prince, which I mention with Emulation and Sorrow, that we having the true Vine should bring forth a bastard stock of Grapes; wishing either our Christian Princes had this Devotion, or that this Zeal were guided by a true Light of the Gospel.

The 23^d being about three Cosses short of a City call'd Rantepoor, where it was supposed the King would rest, and consult what way to take, he on a sudden turn'd towards Mandoo, but without declaring his Resolution. I am of opinion he took this way for fear of the Plague at Agra, rather than out of any design of being near the Army; for we march'd every other day about 4 Cosses, only with such a Train of Baggage as was almost impossible to be kept in order. The 26th we pass'd through Woods and over Mountains thick of Bushes, where many Camels perish'd, many People tir'd with the Difficulties of an impassable way, went away to Agra, and all complain'd. I lost my Tents and Carts, but by midnight we met again. The King resteth two days, for the Leskar could not in less time recover their order; many of the King's Women, and thousands of Coaches, Carts and Camels lying in the woody Mountains without Meat or Water: He himself got through on a small Elephant that will climb up Rocks, and pass such Straits, that no Horse or Beast I have seen can follow him. The 29th we lay by the River of Chambet.

January the first I complain'd to Asaph Chan of the Injuries offer'd to the English at Surat, tho at the same time I was perplex'd with several Relations which gave as bad an account of their Disorders and Ontrages. Asaph advised me not to make my Complaint to the King, which would incense the Prince, but to ask leave of the former to go visit the latter with a Letter from him, recommending the dispatch of my Business and good usage of our Nation. That carrying his Highness a Present with this Letter, I should please both Parties, and succeed in my Business. This was the same I had before propos'd to my self, and therefore pleas'd me the better; the King being now certainly design'd for Mandoo, which is but eight days journey from Brampore, where the Prince was, and I had as good ride over to him as lie idle in the Fields. This day at Noon I visited the Persian Embassador, being the first time we had leisure to do it, and he receiv'd me with much Respect and Courtesy. After our first Complements, I propos'd to him the settling of Trade in his Master's Dominions, which he undertook to forward as much as in him lay. He made me a Banquet of ill Fruit, but being a good Fellow it appear'd well. In his Courtesy he outdid all my Entertainment in India. He rail'd at the Court, at the King's Officers and Council, and us'd a strange liberty. He offer'd to be my Interpreter, desiring I would pitch my Tents by his, and he would propose whatever I would to the King. Much more pass'd between us, but at parting he press'd me to accept of a Horse with a good Furniture, which was brought to the door, but I refus'd him; and therefore he sent for nine pieces of Persian Silks, and nine Bottles of Wine, that I might not depart without some Testimony of his Love, which I also refus'd with all Expressions of Affection. He looking earnestly upon my Sword, I offer'd it, and he by my Example would not receive. At night I visited the King, who spent his time sadly with an old Man, after reading long Letters, and few spoke to him. At his rising he gave this Gentleman that sat by him, and was a Cripple for Age, 5000 Roupies, and with many Embraces took his leave. Here I met the Persian Embassador again, who after some Complements, repenting that he had refus'd my Sword, which he had a liking to, begg'd it, declaring that Liberty among Friends was good Manners in his Country. We continued removing every other day about four or five Cosses, and on the 7th came to the goodly River Shind. The 18th the King pass'd between two Mountains, having cut the way through the Woods, but with so much trouble and incumbrance to the Baggage, that it was left behind, without any Provision for Man or Beast. I found my Tents at midnight, having taken up my Lodging till then under a Tree. This Country is full of Thieves, and not perfectly under Obedience, but as it is keep by force. It belongs to a Raja, who desires not to see the King. The Exactor complain'd, and some few of the People that fled being taken and chain'd by the Necks, were presented to the

the rest kept the Mountains. At night the King fir'd the Town by which he lay, and appointed a new Governor of the Quarter to re-edify and re-people it, and to reduce it to more Civility. He left him some Horse to perform this. The 20th those that had fled into the Woods, in revenge for the burning of their Town, set upon a company of Stragglers left behind, killing many and robbing the rest. The 22^d having no news of the Presents I expected from Surat, I went to visit the King at night, to observe how he receiv'd me: I found him sitting after a new manner, so that I was to seek what place to chuse. Being loth to mix with his great Men, as was offer'd, and doubting to go into the Room where the King was, which was cut down the Bank of a River, and none near him but Etimon Doulet his Father-in-law, Asaph Chan, and three or four others, I went to the brink and stood alone. The King observ'd me and let me stay a while, and then smiling, call'd me in, and with his hand directed me to stand by him; a Favour so unusual that it pleas'd and honour'd me, and I soon found the Effects of it in the Behaviour of other Men. He provok'd me to talk, and I calling for an Interpreter, he refused it, pressing me to make use of what Persian words I had. Our Discourse had not much Sense or Coherence, but he was pleas'd with it, and show'd his Approbation in a very courteous manner.

The 24th News came to Court, that the Decans would not be frighted out of their Liberty at the hearing of the Mogul's approach, as Asaph Chan and Nor-mahall had pretended, to persuade this Expedition; but that they had sent their Baggage far into the Country, and lay on the Borders with 50000 Horse, resolving to give Battel. That Sultan Corone was as yet advanc'd no farther than Mandoa, being afraid both of the Enemy and Chan Channa. Hereupon these Counsellors alter'd their Advice, declaring to the Mogul, that they imagin'd the Decan would have yielded upon the dread of his approach, before he had pass'd the last Hills; but finding the contrary, they persuaded him to convert it into a hunting Journey, and to turn his Face towards Agra, for that the Decan was not an Enemy worth his exposing his Person. He reply'd, this Consideration came too late, for his Honour was engag'd, having advanc'd so far; and therefore he would follow their first Counsel, and his own Resolution. He daily sent away fresh Troops to his Son, both from his own Army, and from several Governments; they were reported to be 30000 Horse, but the Musters were not so high. Water was sometimes scarce in the Camp, and Provisions grew daily scarce, the Country being not well reduc'd. The King not feeling it took no care, and his Chans are follow'd by their Provisions, so that they did not inform him: the whole Burden lay upon Strangers, Soldiers and the Poor, who were worst able to bear it. Every other day the King remov'd three, four or five Cosses, yet the 29th we were sixty short of Mandoa.

February the 3^d, leaving the Road of the Leskar for my ease, and the benefit of the Shade, and resting under a Tree, Sultan Corforone on a sudden came upon me, seeking the same conveniency. This was the King's eldest Son before mention'd to have been confin'd by the Practices of his Brother Sultan Corone, and his Faction, and taken out of their hands by the King at his setting out from Adsmere, as was there observ'd. He was now mounted on an Elephant with no great Guard or Attendants. His People desir'd me to give him room, which I did, but staid to see him, who call'd for me; and having ask'd some civil and familiar Questions with much courtesy and affability, he departed. His Person is comely, his Countenance chearful, his Beard grown to his Girdle. This only I observ'd, that his Questions show'd Ignorance of all that was done at Court, in so much that he had never heard of any English, or their Embassador. The 4th and 5th we did not rest, and the 6th at night came to a little Tower newly repair'd, where the King pitch'd in a pleasant place upon the River Sepra, one Coss short of Ugen the chief City of Mulma. This place, call'd Calleada, was formerly a Seat of the Heathen Kings of Mandoa, one of whom was there drown'd in his Drink, who being once before fallen into the River, and taken up by the hair of the Head by a Slave that div'd, and come to himself, it was told him to procure a Reward. He call'd for his Deliverer, and asking how he durst put his Hands on his Sovereign's Heads, he caus'd them to be cut off. Not long after sitting alone with his Wife and drunk, he had the same fortune to slip into the Water, but so that she might easily have sav'd him, which she did not; and being ask'd why? reply'd, she knew not whether he might not cut off her Hands for her her Reward. The 10th we remov'd one Coffe beyond Ugen. The 11th the King rode to Ugen to speak with a Dervis, or Religious Man living on a Hill, who is reported to be 300 years old. I thought this Miracle not worth my examining. This Day I receiv'd Advice by a Foot Post that the Prince had stopt the Presents as they were coming to me, but not broken them open, hoping to compel the English to consent to it, which by my Orders they would not do. The Prince at the same time sent to the King to acquaint him with his stopping some Goods, without mentioning they were Presents, and to desire his leave to buy what he thought fit. This faithless proceeding of the Prince, contrary to his Word, and Orders under his Hand, oblig'd me to have recourse to the King for Redress, being now blameless in the Eyes of all the World for taking this Course. I was afraid to go to Asaph Chan to introduce me, lest if he knew of the wrong done he should prevent me; and yet I durst not well provoke him by using any other means. The Prophet Dervis, or Religious Man the King went to visit, offer'd me an opportunity of doing my Business; and my new Interpreter, a Greek I had sent for from Adsmere, was ready. I rode and met his Majesty on his Elephant, and alighted, making signs to speak. The King turn'd his Monster to me, and prevented me; saying, My Son has taken your Goods and my Presents, be not sad, he shall not touch nor open a Seal or Lock. At night I will send him a Command to free them. He graciously added, That he knew I came full of Complaint, and to ease me he began first. Upon the way I could do no more; but at night without further seeking to Asaph Chan, I went to the Guzelcan, resolving to prosecute the Complaint of forcing back our Goods, and all other Grievances. As soon as I came in, the King call'd my Interpreter, and declar'd by his own that he had written and sent his Command very effectually; that not a Hair should be diminish'd. I reply'd, the Injury was such, and the Charge and Abuses of our Liberty by the Prince's Officers, that I desir'd Redress, being no longer able to endure it. It was answer'd, that what was past I must remit to his Son; but by Asaph Chan's Mediation I could procure nothing but good Words, for he smooth'd on both sides. So I was forc'd to seem content, and to seek an opportunity in the Absence of my false Friend and Procurator. The good King fell to dispute of the Laws of Moses, Christ, and Mabomet, and in his Drink was so kind, that he turn'd to me, and said, If I am a King you shall be welcome, Christians, Moors, and Jews; he meddled not with their Faith, they came all in Love, and he would protect them from wrong; they liv'd under his Protection, and none should oppress them. This he often repeated, but being very drunk fell to weeping and into divers Passions, and so kept us till Midnight.

I was much concern'd to see the Factors had detain'd the Presents four Months at Surat, and by this Delay given occasion for them to fall into the Prince's Hands. It was a second wrong to us that we could receive no Redress of the first. Therefore considering that the Complaint I had already made against the Prince had sufficiently incens'd him, I thought since we must lose him quite, the best way was to use all my Interest with the King. I waited for an Opportunity of doing it effectually; and immediately sent back the Messenger that came to me from Mr. Terry, with Orders to stay wherever he met him and expect the King's Commands. During this time the King had caus'd the Chests to be privately brought to him, and had open'd them; which I resolv'd not to put up, and having obtain'd Audience, made my Complaint. He receiv'd me with much mean Flattery, more unworthy him than even the Action he had done. I suppose he did it to appease me, seeing by my Countenance I was highly provok'd. He told me he had found several things that pleas'd him extremely, and among them two embroider'd Sweet-bags, two glass Cabinets, and the Mastiff Dogs. That if I would not give him any of these things, he would restore them, for he would have me pleas'd. I answer'd, there was little but what was design'd for him; but that this was not a civil way of dealing with the King my Master, and I knew not how to give him to understand that his Presents had been seiz'd, and not deliver'd by me as he had appointed. That some of the Presents were for the Prince, and some for Queen Normahal; the rest to remain in my Hands, to make use of as occasion offer'd, to move his Majesty to protect us against the Wrongs offer'd us by Strangers. That there were some few for my Friends, and for my own use; the rest belong'd to the Merchants, and were not at my Disposal. He desir'd me not to take it ill that he had caus'd them to be brought to him; that those things had pleas'd him so well, he ne was not the Patience to stay till I presented them, and he thought he had done me no wrong, believing it was my Intention he should be first serv'd in the Distribution of the Presents. As for the King of England he would satisfy him, and make my Excuse. That the Prince, Queen Normahal and he were all one; and for the Presents to be kept to use as occasion offer'd, that was a needless Ceremony; for he would give me Audience at any time, and I should be well receiv'd, tho I came empty-handed, he being sensible it was not my fault that I came so. Then he began to talk of his Son, and told me he would restore part of what he had taken, and satisfy the Merchants for what belong'd to them. In conclusion, he desir'd me not to take what he had done in ill part, for he had no design to wrong me. I made no Answer to all this: Whereupon he press'd me to speak my mind; asking me several times whether I was satisfy'd. I reply'd, I was very well pleas'd to see his Majesty was so. Then he began to reckon up all the things he had taken, beginning with the Mastiffs, the Sweet-bags, and the Case for Combs and Razors; and smiling said, You would not have me restore those things, for I have a mind to them. Thus he proceeded, asking about the rest, and caus'd a Chest of Pictures to be brought, which were taken out; and there being among 'em one of a Venus leading a Satyr by the Nose, he show'd it to all about him, bidding them expound the Signification of it, observing the Satyr's Horns, the Blackness of his Skin, and other Particulars. Every Man spoke as he thought, but the King lik'd none of their Expositions, yet reserv'd his own Thoughts, and ask'd me what it meant, who told him it was only the Painter's Fancy, who often represented the Fables writ by Poets, which was all I could say of it. Then he put the same Question to Mr. Terry my Chaplain, who could give him no better Satisfaction. Whereupon he said, Why do you bring me what you do not understand? I reply'd, the Minister did not concern himself with such things, and only came with 'em to look to them on the Road. This I relate for the Information of the Gentlemen of the East-India Company, and of all that shall hereafter come in my place, and advise them for the future not to send into those Parts things that may be liable to an ill Construction, for those People are very jealous. For tho the King would not declare his Opinion, yet by what he said I had ground to believe he thought that Picture was made in derision of the People of Asia, whom he suppos'd to be represented by the Satyr, as being of their Complexion, and that the Venus leading him by the Nose denoted the great Power the Women in that Country have over the Men.

He was satisfy'd I had never seen the Picture, and therefore press'd no further for me to tell my Opinion of it, but believ'd me to be really ignorant, as I pretended. Yet this Suspicion remain'd in his Mind, and without expressing any Dislike, he told me he accepted of the Picture as a Present from me. As for the Saddle and other Trifles, he said he would have them sent to his Son for whom they were fit, promising to write to him so effectually that I should not stand in need of any Solicitor near him. After some more Discourse about other Trifles, he said I must needs help him to one of our large Horses, to a brace of Irish Greyhounds, Dog and Bitch, and other sorts of Dogs of all sorts for Game; which if I would procure him, he protest'd on the Word of a Prince he would gratify me, and grant me more Privileges than I should think of asking. I answer'd, I would order them to be put aboard the next Ships, but could not answer they would outlive so tedious a Voyage; but in case they dy'd, to convince him I had obey'd his Commands, the Skins and Bones should be brought him. Upon this Promise he bow'd to me several times, laid his Hand on his Breast, and show'd me so much Kindness, Favour, and Familiarity, that all there present protest'd he had never done the like to any Man. This was the Reward I had; but he said further he would make amends for the wrong he had done me, and send me home to my Country loaden with Favours worthy a Person of my Rank. Nevertheless perceiving I had only fair Words for the Merchandize, I again ask'd his Majesty for the Pieces of Velvet and Silks, as Commodities belonging to the Merchants, making him believe the Merchants had put them into those Chests, only to prevent their falling into the Hands of the Prince's Officers. He sent for Mr. Biddolfe to agree with and satisfy him. Then I presented a Memorial containing the Privileges and Franchises I desir'd, saying, if he would not grant them, I should have the Dissatisfaction of being useless in my Employment to my Prince, and consequently return home in Disgrace. I press'd the Payment of a Debt. He answer'd, I should have satisfaction in all things, and return home to my Prince with Honour; that that he would send him a noble Present by me, and with it a Letter certifying the good Service I had done. Then he press'd me to tell him what Present I thought would be most acceptable. I said, It would not look well in me to ask a Present; that it was not the Custom of our Country; that it was against my Master's Honour to do any such thing: but that I was sure his Majesty would receive any thing he sent with much Satisfaction, as coming from a Prince for whom he had a great Esteem. He was so earnest with me, and made such Protestations of Sincerity, that I was forc'd to tell him that the great Persian Carpets were proper to send, because my Master did not expect Presents of great Value. Whereupon he told me he would chuse a good Quantity of all sorts and sizes, and add what he thought most proper to convince the King of the Esteem he had for him. There was a Quantity of all sorts of Game laid before him. He gave me half a Buck, and told me at the same time he had kill'd it with his own Hand, and design'd the other half for his Women. That Half was accordingly cut in pieces of about four pounds weight each, and immediately the King's third Son and two Women came out of the Seraglio, took up those pieces of Flesh in their Hands, and carry'd them into the Seraglio, as if they had been Beggars that had receiv'd them for Charity. He then repeated his Expressions of Desire to satisfy me; and added, I have often admir'd, that your Master having sent you with the Character of Embassador, your Presents have been inferior to those a Merchant you have seen here has brought, which have gain'd him the Affection of all Men. I own you as an Embassador, your Behaviour speaks you a Man of Quality, and yet I cannot understand why you are kept here with so little of Grandeur. I am satisfy'd it is not yours nor your Prince's fault, and I will make you sensible I value you more than those that sent you. I will send you home with Honour, and give you a Present for your Master without regarding those I have receiv'd; and in return I desire but one thing of you, which I do not care to commit to the Merchants. It is to get me a Quiver made in your Country to carry my Arrows, a Case for my Bow, a Pattern whereof shall be given you, a Pillow after my manner to sleep on, a Pair of Buskins, which you shall cause to be embroider'd in England the richest that may be, and a Coat of Mail for my own wearing. I promis'd to send for them, and Asaph Chan was commanded to give Patterns. The Night being spent in this Discourse, the Prince rose up and dismiss'd me.

March the third I came to Mandoa: the King was expected to make his Entry there, but the Day was not yet fix'd; for he expected the Astrologers should assign an auspicious Hour for performing that Ceremony: so we staid without, waiting that happy Moment. The 6th I went into Mandoa. My Servants, whom I had sent to take up my Quarters, had taken possession of a large Inclosure shut in with good Walls, where there was a Temple and Tomb. Some Persons belonging to the Court had also taken up their Quarters there; but that did not hinder me from keeping possession, as being the best Quarter in the Town. It might have been made convenient in all respects with a very little Charge. The Air was wholesom, and the Prospect pleasant; for the House was on the Top of a rising Ground. This Inconveniency there was, that it was two Miles from the King's Palace. The 11th I set out to go meet the King, but was told, that a Lion having kill'd some Horses of his Train, he was gone out to hunt him. I spent some time in seeking Water; for tho the City was on a Hill, there were no Wells, nor Cisterns; such is the Forecast of those People. All that Multitude of People there was in danger of perishing with Thirst. The Great Men at Court had taken possession of those few Wells there were in the Country about, so that I could get no Water. All the poor People were forc'd to leave the Town; and an Order was set forth for all Beasts and Camels to be sent out. All that had not Favour, were forc'd to seek other Habitations three or four Leagues from thence. This produc'd much Confusion at Court, and made Provisions dear. For my own part I was sufficiently troubled to think what I should do, for my House was very good; and tho I was far from the Markets and Water, yet I thought I could live there more commodiously than in the open Country, where I must have gone to encamp. I mounted on Horseback to seek for Water my self, and found a Well that was guarded for a Chan, to whom the King had given it. I acquainted him how much I stood in need of his Favour, and he granted me four Loads of Water a day. I valued this Favour as it deserv'd, and return'd to my Quarters well pleas'd; and having the following Days sold some Goods and eas'd my self of part of my Carriages deliver'd my self from the publick Calamity. I cannot but declare, that in my Travels following the Mogul's Court, I endur'd all the Inconveniencies Men are subject to under an ill Government, and in an untemperate Climate.

The 12th of March I presented the King for a New-years Gift a couple of fine Knives and six Glasses, from the Company; and he took in good part the Excuse I made for the Smalness of the Present. He commanded one of his Officers to call Mr. Biddolfe immediately, and to pay him what he demanded. All our Creditors had Orders at the same time to pay what they ow'd the Company. Then the King order'd me to come up the Steps of his Throne, and draw near him. I obey'd, and found the Persian Ambassador on the one side of him, and the old King of Candabar on the other. As soon as I had taken my place near that Prince, he ask'd me for a Knife, which I sent him the next day. Then the King call'd the Persian Ambassador, and gave him some Stones and a young Elephant. He knelt and knock'd his Head against the Steps of the Throne to thank him. This was the same Throne that serv'd the Year before, and was then mention'd, having the same Ornaments about it. Over the Throne were the Pictures of the King my Master, the Queen, the Lady Elizabeth, Sir Tho. Smith, and some others. Under it were two very fine Persian Carpets. The Throne itself, as has been said, was of Gold set with Rubies, Emeralds, and Turky Stones. On one side upon a little Stage or Scaffold was a Company of Women Musicians. The 30th of this Month I sent Asaph Chan a Complement with a Present of a Pair of Gloves and a curious Night-cap. He sent back the Gloves, as of no use in that Country; but the Cap he receiv'd, and sent to beg some Spanish Wine of me, which I sent him the next day. The 21st I discover'd the Mogul was jealous that the English intended to steal away out of his Country, and that they had some Design of surprizing Surat; which the Prince had instill'd into him, that he might have an opportunity of fortifying that Place for his own use: but I satisfy'd his Majesty as to both points. The Complaints made at that Court of the Misdemeanours of Officers are so odious there, that they gain'd me the Ill Will of all the Men of Note; who made this their own Concern, as being the common Cause. For they farm all the Governments in the Kingdom, where they exercise all manner of Tyrannical Exactions upon those under their Jurisdiction, and will not suffer the Knowledge of the Wrongs they do to reach the King's Ear. The grind the People under their Government to get Money out of them, and are afraid the King should know it; and this made me be look'd upon, and hated in the Mogul's Court as an Informer.

The 30th of April the Persian Ambassador sent to excuse himself to me, for going away without paying his Respects to me. His Messenger told me he was not sick as he pretended; but that finding no Success in his Negotiations with the King, he had taken his leave, and at parting gave him thirty fine Horses. The King in return presented him 3000 Crowns, and the Ambassador testify'd his Dissatisfaction at that Gift. The King to justify himself, caus'd two Lists to be drawn; one of them of the Ambassador's Presents, with the Price set on every one, but lower much than what they were really worth. In the other were set down even the meanest things the King had given him, not omitting the Melons, Pine-Apples, and Spanish Wine sent him, with their Prices; but much above the real Value. These two Lists being laid before the Ambassador, they offer'd him the rest of the Money to make up the Ballance. This ill Usage made the Persian feign himself sick of a Fever to avoid visiting Asaph Chan, and Etimon Doulet. Therefore he said he could not cross the Town to see me without discovering the Counterfeit; but to make amends had sent to let me know the Truth, and would serve my Nation in his Country to the utmost of his Power. I presented him some Spanish Wine, and a few Knives.

May 12. a Lion and a Wolf by night broke into my Quarters, and fell upon some Sheep there were in the Court. I sent to ask leave to kill them; for in that Country none but the King may hunt a Lion. Leave being granted, I went out into the Court, the Lion quitted his Prey, and fell upon a little Irish Mastiff. One of my Servants kill'd the Wolf, and I sent it the King.

June the 14th there was brought to the King a Trunk, which the Jesuits had sent from Cambiya, in which there were Medicines and a Letter. It was betray'd into the King's Hands by him that was intrusted with the Carriage of it. The King open'd the Trunk, caus'd a Jesuit that was then at Court to be brought to read the Letter, and look'd into all the Boxes; but finding nothing for his turn, restor'd

Roe. restor'd all to the Jesuit. This I mention here as a Caution to those who deal in that Country to take care what they write or send; for it is that Prince's Humour to look into the meanest things, and the most inconsiderable Trifles are in danger when in his Hands.

The 30th of July I receiv'd Advice from Surat that two Dutch Ships were run aground on the Coast of Damam. They were loaded with Spice and China Silks, and bound for the Red Sea; but meeting with bad Weather, they had lost the Season for getting into that Sea. They try'd to recover Socotora, for some Port on the Coasts of Arabia; but failing, resolv'd to run as far as Surat, hoping to ride it out in that Road, as they had done other Years: but now they found all Years are not alike; for when they were come to an Anchor, they were oblig'd by Storms to cut down their Masts by the Board. After which their Cables failing, they were cast upon a Bank of Sand. The lesser Vessel of fifty Tun was beaten all to pieces; the other sav'd all the Men, and most of the Goods.

August the 21st, Marre Rustan King of Candahar came to visit me. I treated him with Wine and Fruit. He staid with me about half an hour, and concluded his Visit, begging a Cask of Wine. This day Prince Sultan Corforone went out of his Prison, and came to take the Air in a House near mine. The other Prince Sultan Corone had taken a Wife at Bram-pore against the King's Will, who had declar'd his Dislike of it; and at the same time there was a Discovery of some Practice of his against his Brother's Life. He was order'd to come to Court to clear himself. Queen Normahal and Asaph Chan, by the Advice of Etimon Doulet, propos'd an Alliance with Sultan Corforone. This News produc'd an universal Joy among the People, who now began to hope that good Prince would be restor'd to his full Liberty.

The first of September being the King's Birth-day, and of the Solemnity of weighing him, I was conducted into a fine Garden, where besides others there was a great square Pond with Trees set about it, and in the midst of it a Pavilion or Tent, under which were the Scales the King was to be weigh'd in. The Scales were of beaten Gold set with small Stones, Rubies, and Turkoises; they hung by Chains of Gold, and for more Surety there were Silk Ropes. The Beam was cover'd with Plates of Gold. The great Lords of the Nation

sat about the Throne on rich Carpets, expecting the King's coming out. At length he appear'd cover'd with Diamonds, Rubies, and Pearls. He had several Strings of them about his Neck, Arms, Wrists, and Turbant, and two or three Rings on every Finger. His Sword, Buckler, and Throne were also cover'd with precious Stones. Among the rest I saw Rubies as big as Walnuts, and Pearls of a prodigious Magnitude. He got into one of the Scales, sitting on his Legs like a Tailor. Into the other Scale to weigh against him were put several Parcel, which they chang'd six times. The Country People told me they were full of Silver, and that the King that day weigh'd 9000 Roupies. Then they put into the same Scale Gold and precious Stones; but being pack'd up, I saw them not. After that he was weigh'd against Cloth of Gold, Silks, Callicoes, Spices, and all other sorts of precious Commodities, if we may believe the Natives, for all those things were pack'd up. Lastly he was weigh'd against Honey, Butter, and Corn, and I was inform'd all that was to be distributed among the Banians; but I think that Distribution was not made, and all those things were carefully carry'd back. They told me all the Money was kept for the Poor, the King using to cause some to be brought at night, and to distribute that Money among them very charitably. Whilst the King was in one of the Scales, he look'd upon me and smil'd, but said never a Word, perhaps because he did not see my Interpreter, who could not get in with me. After being weigh'd he ascended the Throne. Before him there were Basons full of Almonds, Nuts, and all sorts of Fruit artificially made in Silver. He threw about a great part of them, the greatest Noblemen about him scrambled for them. I thought it not decent to do so; and the King observing it, took up one of those Basons which was almost full, and pour'd it out into my Cloke. His Courtiers had the Impudence to thrust in their Hands so greedily, that had I not prevented them, they had not left me one. Before I came in, they had told me those Fruits were of massive Gold; but I found by Experience they were only Silver, and so light, that a thousand of them do not weigh the Value of twenty pounds. I sav'd the Value of ten or twelve Crowns, and those would have fill'd a large Dish. I keep them to show the Vanity of those People. I do not believe the King that day threw away much above the Value of an hundred Pounds. After this Solemnity the King spent all the Night a drinking with his Nobles: I was invited, but desir'd to be excus'd, because there was no avoiding drinking, and their Liquors are so hot they will burn a Man's very Bowels. I was then ill of a Flux, and durst not venture such a Debauch.

September the 9th the King went to take the Air upon the Banks of the River Darbadat, and I took Horse to meet him. It is the Custom there that the Masters of all the Houses by whose Doors the King passes must make him some Present; which Gift is call'd Maubarech, signifying good News, or good Success. These Presents the King takes as a good Omen of the Success of what he has in hand. I had nothing to give, and it was a shame to appear before him empty handed; besides, it had been ill manners in me not to be at home upon that day: I resolv'd therefore to present him an Atlas neatly bound, and make him this Compliment, that my House affording nothing worthy the acceptance of so great a Prince, I presented him with all the World, he being Master of so considerable and so wealthy a part of it. He receiv'd my Present very courteously, often putting his hand to his Breast, and protesting that any thing from me was always very acceptable to him. After other courteous Expressions, he told me he had receiv'd some wthd Boats sent him from Goa extraordinary fat, and if I would eat any he would send me some. I made my profound Obedience, and answer'd, I should receive any thing that came from his Majesty with the utmost Satisfaction and Respect. He mounted his Elephant, and having made a little halt before my Lodging, liked it very well, for it was one of the best in the Camp, and I had built it out of the Ruins of a Temple and an antient Tomb. He took leave of me several times, and would needs have me return to my Lodging because the way was very bad. I took my leave, and obey'd him.

The 16th I went to pay the King of Candahar his Visit, who sent me word at his door, that he could not receive me without the King's leave, or acquainting Etimon Doulet, or Asaph Chan, which he would do at the Durbar. I sent him word he might spare his labour, for I would take care not to come a second time to a Person so ill bred. His Servants would have staid me to carry in my Answer; but I went away, and at night was at Court, where the King ask'd me several Questions about my Book of Maps.

The 25th tho I was very weak, I went again to Court to see whether there was any thing to be expected from the King in relation to our Debts. One of our Debtors had lately given me to understand, he could not pay without selling his House. I presented the Merchant's Petition to the King, who caus'd it to be read aloud, and would hear the Names of the Debtors, what Security they had given, and what Sums they ow'd. Asaph Chan read it: Then the King call'd Arader Chan the Lord Steward of his Household, and the Cutwall, and gave them some Directions which I understood not. As the Names were read he inquir'd into their Quality, and what Commodities had been sold them. It appear'd that some of them were dead, and others were not the King's Subjects. As for what concern'd Sulph, Asaph Chan undertook to speak to the Prince about it, and conclude that Affair when he came. Then my Interpreter was call'd in, and the King turning to me, told me our Merchants had trusted that Money according to their own fancies, and to whom they pleas'd: That they had not presented him an Inventory of their Goods, and therefore if their Debtors were not solvent it was their own fault, and they could not expect he should pay the Debts of private Persons. I thought he meant that of Ergon an Officer of his, who was lately dead, and all his Goods seiz'd for the King. His Majesty added, that this being the first time he would ease me of my trouble, and see me paid; but that if for the future the Merchants sold their Goods to his Officers without acquainting him, it should be at their own Peril; but if when the English Ships came they would deliver him an Inventory of all their Goods, he would take what was for his own turn, and distribute the rest among others; and if any of those prov'd insolvent, he would pay it out of his own Pocket. This is the Custom of the Merchants of Persia, who carry all they have to the King; and he having taken what he likes for himself, distributes the rest among his Nobility. His Notaries enter what every Man receives, and another Officer settles the Price. The Merchant has a Copy of this Entry given him, and he has nothing to do but to go to their Houses for his Money. If they happen to be backward, there is a proper Officer that makes them pay by force. Then my Interpreter was inform'd what order the King had given, which was, that Arad Chan should make the Creditors appear before him, and oblige them to pay. Our Merchants were not pleas'd with this Answer, but I thought it very just, and more favourable than could be expected by private Persons from so great a Prince.

A Rebel defeats the Loyal Party.

The 26th the King sent two Omrahs, who are great Commanders, with some Forces, to apprehend a Raja of the Rasboots, who had rebell'd, and was in the Mountains 20 Cosles from the Camp. That Rebel stood his ground, and in a Battel kill'd one of the Omrahs, and twelve Captains. This News being brought to the King, he thought it proper to send his Son to reduce the Raja.

Sultan Corone comes to Court.

October the 2d, Prince Sultan Corone made his Entry into the Town, attended by the chief Nobility in great Splendor. The King, contrary to our Expectation, receiv'd him as if he had been his only Son: All the great Men, and the King's Mother went five Cosles out of Town to meet him. I excus'd my self on account of my Weakness.

He refuses
Sir Tho.
Roe Audience.

The 5th I receiv'd Advice that our Admiral was not yet arriv'd at Surat, and that the Ships of the Company in their way thither had rescu'd a Ship of the Queen Mother's coming from the Red Sea, which was chas'd by two English Pirates. If this Ship had been taken, it would have been of very ill Consequence to us. The 6th I went to visit the Prince upon his arrival, having need of him for our business. I design'd to offer him the Service of our Nation, and present him with a Gold Chain made in China. When I sent to desire Audience, word was brought me I might come in the morning at break of Day, or stay till he went out to see the King, which I must have done at the door. I took this as an Affront, having never been refus'd Audience by his Father; and therefore show'd my Resentment, saying, I was none of his Slave, but free, and the Embassador of a King, and would take care not to visit, or make Court to him any more; and since he refus'd me Justice, I would for the future seek it elsewhere: Accordingly at night I went to the King, who receiv'd me with much Civility. I bow'd to the Prince, and he would not take notice he saw me. I gave the King an account of what he had requir'd of me, and told him, I had brought an Inventory of Goods in pursuance to his Commands. He ask'd several Questions, and seem'd well pleas'd at what was in the

Inventor, promising me all Favours and Privileges I could desire. He ask'd whether our Ships had brought any Pearls, or precious Stones; to which I answer'd, they were dearer in England than in his Dominions: which Answer seem'd to satisfy him. I durst not say there were Pearls, fearing that would set the Prince upon persecuting our People; besides, I thought those Pearls would be the more valu'd being the less expected, and hop'd to make a Friend with them: and therefore when Asaph Chan press'd me to tell him whether we had any Jewels, I declar'd to him, I would have him second the Answer I had given, that they were dearer in England than in India, and I had something to say to him in private: He took me at half a word, and said no more. The King seeming to me to be then in a good Disposition towards us, I thought it a proper season to mention our Debts; and having then the Petition ready drawn about me, took it out, and held it up to present it. The King having his Thoughts perhaps otherwise employ'd at that time, did not observe it; but his Courtiers presently imagin'd what it might be, and believing he would be very angry that his Orders were not obey'd, one of them slyly drew near, and pull'd down my hand, desiring me not to present that Petition to the King. I told him, Aradeth had refus'd to do me Justice. He hearing what I said, was very uneasy, and applying himself to Asaph Chan, desir'd him not to let me make my Complaint. I urg'd, our Ships being now come, we could suffer no longer delays and loss of time. They consulted what was to be done, and calling for the Cut-wall, told him he must execute the King's Orders. That same night our Debtors Tents were beset, others were ~~burn'd~~ so that I believe this time we shall have Justice done us. I had many Thanks return'd me for the Civility us'd by the English towards the Passengers that were aboard the Queen Mother's Ship, and for protecting that Vessel against the Pirates of our Nation. They represented the thing well to the King, and the great Men told me they had reason to love the English, that they would do us all Service in their Power; but that they wonder'd our King could not command his Subjects, and that any should presume to take Ships out of the Kingdom without his leave. Asaph Chan and I withdrew to translate the Inventory into Persian for the King: I somewhat increas'd the Article of the Mony, that he might have the better opinion

They did nothing but bring back the Goods you have at Mocca, and other Ports in that Sea, it would pay the Charge of the Voyage. Steele, Kerridge, and others are very fond of their Notions, insomuch that they do not pay me the Respect they ought, and are every day at Daggers-draw with my Parson. I have told Steele, his Wife cannot live in this Country, for she would draw many Inconveniences on us, and therefore he must send her back into England.

The 6th I went to Asaph Chan, and show'd him the Pearls according to promise. He told me they were not fit for that Country, which was afterwards confirm'd to me by others; yet he was so pleas'd I had kept my Word with him, that I believe I may say as Pharaoh did, The Land is before you, settle where you please. We spoke not of the Price of the great Pearl. He promis'd to keep the Secret, assuring me that for my sake, and because I had confided in him, he would give more for it than it was worth, and pay ready Mony; for he had a great deal, and would lend me some if I had occasion. I had all imaginable good Words from him, and some good Actions. He further told me there was little difference in that Country between giving and selling, which I found by Experience to be true. After this familiar Discourse in his Bed-chamber, he rose up to go to Dinner, and invited me and my Retinue. I din'd at a Table apart, because they make a Scruple of eating with us.

I mention'd before that the King had sent me three Criminals condemn'd to Death, offering them to me to buy them as Slaves, which is there look'd upon as a Favour, and what Answer I return'd. The King order'd the Prisoners to be sent to me, and expected I should send him the Mony; but I hearing no more of him, hop'd it was forgot, and took no care to pay it. One night the King's Officers brought the Prisoners to my Steward's House; and took his Word for sixty Roupies, which I paid, and set them at liberty. This Mony is pretended to satisfy those that have been wrong'd; but the King takes it himself, and makes his advantage of his Great Mens Charity, who look upon it as a Favour that he gives them this occasion to exercise it.

The 10th I visited Asaph Chan on account of a Complaint I receiv'd that we were not allow'd to lay our Ships ashore, the Prince having been inform'd we intended to build a Fort at Soali, and that our Ships were to that purpose loaded with Bricks and Lime. This Jealousy sprung from our Mens bringing their Ships ashore to careen them. The Report was so hot that I was forc'd to go to Court to clear my self, and had much ado to undeceive the King; this Conceit being more strongly fix'd in them, because I had not long before ask'd a Port of the King for that purpose. Yet this did not prevent his sending down a Body of Horse to demolish a Brick Fort that was at the Mouth of that River. They disarm'd our Men, but the Arms were put into the Custom-house, and only the Sailors had theirs taken away. I told Asaph Chan I could not live in Servitude; that there was no Honour in a Prince who granted a favourable Order one day, and recall'd it the next; and that I should be blam'd if I staid any longer after such Usage. He said he would that night acquaint the King before the Prince, and return me his Answer. The 30th he told me wonders of the Mogul's Kindness for the King my Master, my Nation, and for me in particular; adding, he had run the hazard of losing the Prince's Favour to serve us, but that he should soon be in a condition to do it effectually; for he was about being Governor of Surat, which the Prince must quit, having the Government of Amadabat and Cambaya confer'd on him: And to demonstrate he was real, desir'd me to be with the King at night, with the King my Master's Letter translated into Persian, advising me to complain and desire leave to be gone, and I should see how he would second me. In the Evening I attended the King, found a great Court, presented my Letter; and Etimon Doulet at the request of Asaph Chan read the Persian Translation. The King said he would take upon him to conclude a Peace between us and the Portugueses, answer his Majesty's Letter, and perform all he desir'd in it. However I ask'd leave to return to England. The King and Prince had some Contest about this matter, the latter saying he got nothing by our Stay at Surat, and was willing we should be gone. Here Asaph Chan stood up boldly, and said the Kingdom gain'd considerably by our Trade, and was in some measure secur'd by it; that the Prince's Officers us'd us ill, and it was impossible for us to stay without Redress; and therefore it were better for his Majesty to dismiss us, than keep us to suffer new Wrongs. The Prince in a Passion said he had never wrong'd us, but that on the contrary, at his Suit he had lately granted us an Order. It is true, reply'd ply'd Asaph Chan, you granted them the Order as they desir'd it, but ten days after you sent another to recal it: Adding, that his Honour suffer'd by this Breach of Faith; that he had no Interest in it, and only spoke with respect to the King's Justice and Reputation. For our Usage Asaph Chan refer'd it to me, who had often complain'd that our Goods were taken from us forcibly these two years last past; that we could never get Payment, and his Officers still us'd the same Violence every Fleet that came; that if the Prince was weary of us, it were better for him to turn us out, and he might be sure we would do our selves right upon the Sea. Does the Prince, or the King, said he, maintain this Ambassador? He is a Stranger that follows the Court at his own Expence; if his Goods are forcibly taken from him, and he can procure no Payment, how can he subsist? This was spoke with much Heat, and the King two or three times repeated, Violence, Violence, severely checking the Prince. This open Breach with the Prince succeeded as Asaph Chan had forecasted; for we were pay'd all that was due to us at Surat, and the Custom-house Officers had Orders to treat us better for the future. I am satisfy'd had I not fallen out with the Prince, I should never have made good of it. I told the Prince's Messenger before the English Merchants, that if he offer'd any Violence to me, or my Merchants, it would cost him some Blood; that I would ship my self aboard his own Vessels, taking them out of his Ports, and would carry them into England.

January the 30th the Dutch came to Court with a Present of several Rarities brought out of China. They were not permitted to come near the third Ascent. The Prince ask'd me who they were. I told him they were Dutch, and liv'd at Surat. He ask'd, whether they were our Friends. I answer'd, they were a Nation that depended on the King of England, and were not well receiv'd in all Parts; that I knew not what brought them thither. Since they are your Friends, said he, call them. I was forc'd to send for them to deliver their Presents. They were plac'd near our Merchants, without holding any Discourse with them.

Here ends all that is to be found of Sir Thomas Roe's Journal, the rest being lost; tho Purchas in his Extract says, there was nothing more material in it, but only what peculiarly related to Trade, and the Business of the Company. It will not be amiss to add what little matter could be found worth the Reader's Knowledge in two Volumes of Sir Thomas his Letters, which have been perus'd to take out all that might be of use.

An Extract of a Letter of Sir Thomas Roe's to the Company, dated at Adsmere, January the 25th 1615. Containing only what is remarkable, and not mention'd in the Journal.

AT my first Audience the Mogul prevented me in Speech, bidding me welcome as to the Brother of the King my Master; and after many Complements I deliver'd his Majesty's Letter, with a Copy of it in Persian: then I shew'd my Commission, and deliver'd your Presents, that is, the Coach, the Virginals, the Knives, a Scarf embroider'd, and a rich Sword of my own. He fitting in his State could not well see the Coach, but sent many to view it, and caus'd the Musician to play on the Virginals, which gave him content. At night, having staid the Coach-man and Musician, he came down into a Court, got into the Coach, and into every Corner of it, causing it to be drawn about. Then he sent to me, tho it was ten a clock at night, for a Servant to put on his Scarf and Sword after the English Fashion, which he was so proud of, that he walk'd up and down drawing and flourishing it, and has never since been seen without it. But after the English were come away, he ask'd the Jesuit, whether the King of England were a Great King, that sent Presents of so small Value, and that he look'd for some Jewels; yet Rarities please as well: and if you were yearly furnish'd from Frankfort, where there are all sorts of Knacks and new Devices, a hundred Pounds would go further than five hundred laid out in England, and be more acceptable here. This Country is spoil'd by the many Presents that have been given, and it will be chargeable to follow the Example. There is nothing more welcome here, nor did I ever see Men so fond of Drink, as the King and Prince are of Red Wine, whereof the Governor of Surat sent up some Bottles, and the Opinion of our Trade. I concluded, desiring his Majesty to allow us the liberty of selling the rest. That done, Asaph Chan put me in mind I had something to say to him in private. I told him it was true, I had some Rarities come, but I had far'd so ill the last year by having my Secret divulg'd, that now I durst trust none but him; and therefore on his word of Secrecy and Advice, I declar'd I had a Pearl of a great Value, and some other Rarities, and knew not whether I should tell the King, lest the Prince should become our utter Enemy. I gave him an account of what happen'd going to visit him in the morning, that I was still sensible we stood in need of his Favour, and had therefore kept that Pearl to make him our Friend, to which I desir'd his Advice. He imbrac'd me, and said I had done wisely, but must keep the Secret, or it would breed me trouble: That the Prince was a Tyrant, and mis-us'd all Strangers. All this I saw tended to get the Pearl out of my hands, advising me to send for it and trust no Man, telling me Instances of the ill usage of the Portugueses upon the like occasions: That if I would sell him the Pearl, he would depozite the Mony I should value it at in the hands of a third Person; and in return for the Confidence I repos'd in him, he would sollicite our Business, which could never be done without him. I said I would serve him, but fear'd he would reveal the Secret: He swore he would keep it, and to make the Oath the more solemn, we squeez'd one anothers Thumbs, as is the Custom of the Country. I promis'd on my part to rely wholly on him, and do all things according to his Direction. He said he would get me Orders that our Goods should not be touch'd, but left wholly at my disposal; that he would reconcile the Prince and me, and I should be better us'd than I had been, have a particular Judg assign'd that should take care of our business, and all the Satisfaction we could wish. He said it would be proper to make his Sister Queen Normahall a Present, and she would prevail with the King to give me Mony. To this I reply'd, I had rather his Majesty should bestow his Favours on our Nation in general. Then he carried me to the King, to whom I presented the Inventory translated: I had a favourable Reception. He ask'd me whether there was any Tapestry? I said some was sent me, if it were not seiz'd by the way by the Prince's order. He said he would take a good quantity of our Cloths, and other Commodities, directing me to have them brought, and Asaph Chan to draw up the Order for their free Passage. I was well pleas'd with this day's success; for the Experience had taught me, that there was no Faith among those Barbarians, yet I had no cause to mistrust Asaph Chan, when it was his Interest to be faithful to me, till he had got the Pearl, which he might otherwise have mis'd of; nor could I suspect him afterwards, because he could not betray my Secret without discovering his own Falshood to the Prince.

The 12th Asaph Chan according to Promise went with me to the Prince, who receiv'd me in his Chamber, where I presented him a small Gold Chain made in China, on a Salver of that Country. Asaph Chan persuaded him to deal more kindly with us than he had done, representing the Profit our Trade would yield him, and the loss it would be if we went away. The Prince immediately directed his Secretary to draw the Order to our Mind, and write a Letter to the Governor to see it executed; adding I should have any other Letter I desir'd. This made me sensible of the poor Spirits of those People. Asaph Chan was become so much our Friend in hopes to buy some Trifles, that he would have betray'd his own Son to serve us, and was my humble Servant. He would needs send one of his Servants aboard our Ships to this purpose, which I could not refuse him; besides, it is no loss to us, for he is a good Pay-master, bought by wholesale what we must have sold by retail, and sav'd us the charge of Carriage. He obtain'd an Order from the Prince to this effect, and writ a kind Letter to the Governor in our behalf. I now also obtain'd an Order from the Prince for Bengala, which before he would not hear me speak of. Afterwards I found he prosecuted our Debtors, as if they had been his own; and as he pass'd before the Cutwall's House, call'd him out to bid him be speedy in our business, which was an unparalleled Favour. The next day Asaph Chan sent one of his Servants in the Queen's Name to acquaint me she had obtain'd another Order from the Prince, that all our Goods for the future should be under her Protection; that this was done, and she was about sending one to see what else we wanted, and take care that no wrong was offer'd us. Asaph Chan sent word he had done this for fear of the Prince's passionate Temper, and his delays in those Affairs; but now we might be secure, since his Sister had undertook our Protection, for the Prince would meddle in it no more; and that he ingag'd on his Honour that all things directed for me should be deliver'd to me. That she had sent a positive Order, directing the Person that carry'd it to be assisting to our Factors, that they might have no cause to complain of the Officers of Surat. She further desir'd me to write to the Captain of the Ship and to the Factors, to be kind to her Messenger, and let him buy some of those Toys that had been laid aside. This I could not refuse, but gave her a List of them, upon condition she would show me a Copy of the Order, which was seal'd. This shows how easy it is to sell such Commodities here. Last year they did not regard us, now the List or Inventory is translated; yet without mentioning the Pearls I had given the King, every one runs to buy. Most of the Great Men at Court desir'd me to give them Letters to send their Servants to deal with our Factors; so that if I had been furnish'd with three times the Quantity of Goods, they had been fold aboard the Ships, and we had sav'd the Duties, Carriage, and the Seizures made before. I writ to our Factors to sell to Normahal's and her Brother's Servants what Goods they desir'd, even of those set apart, that I might be supported by their Interest at Court.

The 24th the King went 24 Cosses from Mandoa. He went from place to place on the Mountains; and no body knowing what he intended, we were at a loss what way to take. The 26th I got an Order for ten Camels at the King's Rates. The 29th I set out, being forc'd to quit my Quarters which were so inconvenient. The 31st I came to the King's Tents, who was gone a hunting for ten Days, none going with him, but such as he had nam'd. His Camp was dispers'd and scatter'd about the Country, the Water was bad, and Provisions dear, much Sickness, and other Inconveniences; but nothing diverts him from taking his pleasure, when he sets on it. I was inform'd he had not yet resolv'd whether he should go to Agra or Guzurat; the latter was most talk'd of, but the former seem'd more probable, because his Council thought, that a more commodious and pleasant Place than the other. To me either was indifferent, because I had no prospect but the compassing my Business. Therefore seeing he might stay there a Month, I concluded it was the best way to have my Presents brought thither, and endeavour to conclude my Business: hoping after that I might gain some Rest, which I needed; but very ill, and wanting Convenience, whilst I follow'd the Court, to recover my Health.

November the second, Steele and Jack English Projectors advance Trade India. came to me with the Pearls, and some other inconsiderable things they had brought ashore privately by my Order. These Men came with Projects of Water-works to me, made to advance the Sale of Lead, which I did not approve of for good reasons; but was satisfy'd they should make a trial to please them; and bid them bring their Workmen to Amadabat, where with the Assistance of Mocreb Chan, the only Man there that loves new Inventions, I would offer their Service to the King, and see what Conditions he would propose; tho I was of opinion it was Labour and Money lost. The Company should not so easily give ear to these Projectors, who generally mind their own Profit more than theirs that employ them. The other Project to oblige the Caravans and Merchants of Labor and Agra, who travel generally into Persia through Candahar, to change their Method, and send their Goods down the River Indus, to be put aboard our Ships, and so convey'd into the Gulph of Persia, is a mere Chimera never to be reduc'd to practice: For tho it is easy to run down the River, the Portugueses have a Residence at the Mouth of it; and then it is a matter of much Difficulty to return up the River, besides that they must ensure their Commodities. There are many other reasons against this Design too long to insert, and needless, because there is no probability the thing should ever be put in execution. The third Project of uniting the Trade of the Red Sea with this, is what I have always recommended, and has already begun to be practis'd. The Danger of Pirates in these Seas is great, and therefore I did not question but many Merchants would put their Goods aboard our Ships, which would make our Friendship necessary to these People; and I advis'd to employ one of our Ships this year in that Trade, which might return in September. This I earnestly recommended to the Captains and Factors; and if executed, the Company would find the Advantage. Were it my own Concern, most of the Ships being light by reason of the small Stowage the Goods here take up, I would send them to the Red Sea, tho they were empty, for there are many good Hits in that Sea; and tho the

The King has ever since solicited for more: I think four or five Casks of that Wine will be more welcome than the richest Jewel in Cheap-side; large Pictures on Cloth, the Frames in pieces, but they must be good, and for Variety some Story with many Faces. For the Queen, fine Needle-work Toys, Bone-laces, Cut-work, and some handsome wrought Waist-coat, Sweet-bags, and Cabinets will be most convenient. I would wish you to spare sending Scarlet, it is dear to you, and no better esteem'd here than Stammel. I must add that any fair China Bedsteads, or Cabinets, or Trunks of Japan, are here rich Presents.

Lately the King of Visapour sent his Embassador with thirty six Elephants, two of them with all their Chains of wrought beaten Gold, two of Silver, the rest of Brass, and four rich furnish'd Horses, with Jewels to the value of ten Lecks of Roupies. Yet withal he sent China Ware, and one Figure of Chrystal, which the King valu'd more than all that Mass of Wealth.

LAWS these People have none written; the King's Judgment binds, who sits and gives Sentence once a week, with much Patience, both in Civil and Criminal Causes, where sometimes he sees the Execution done by his Elephants, with too much Delight in Blood.

His Governors of Provinces rule by his Firmaes, which are his Letters, or Commissions authorizing them, and take Life and Goods at pleasure.

There are many Religions, and in them many Sects. Mohs or Mahometans following Hali; and such is the King. Banians or Pythagoreans, believing the Transmigration of Souls, and therefore will not kill the Vermin that bite them, for fear of dislodging the Soul. They often buy many days respite from killing any Flesh in a Province or City, merely out of Charity. Idolaters there are of several sorts, ~~and~~ Wives adorning the Funeral Piles, and casting themselves into the Flames with great Joy.

The Extent of this Dominion is on the West to Syndu, on the North-west to Candabar, on the North almost to the Mountain Taurus, on the East to the Borders of Ganges, and South-East all Bengala, the Land forming the Gulph down to Decan. It is much greater than the Persian Monarchy, almost, if not quite equal to the Turkish. Agra the ordinary Residence of the King is near a thousand Miles from any of the Borders, and farther from some. The right Issue of Porus is here a King in the midst of the Mogul's Dominions, never subdu'd till last year; and to say the Truth, he is rather bought than conquer'd, won to own a Superior by Gifts, and not by Arms. The Pillar erected by Alexander is yet standing at Delli, the antient Seat of the Ancestors of Rama the Successor of Porus.

The Buildings are all base of Mud, one Story high, except in Surat, where there are some of Stone. I know not by what Policy the King seeks the Ruin of all the antient Cities which were nobly built, and now lie desolate and in Rubbish. His own Houses are of Stone, handsom and uniform. His great Men build not, for want of Inheritance; but as far as I have yet seen, live in Tents, or Houses worse than our Cottages. Yet where the King likes, as at Agra, because it is a City erected by him, the Buildings, as is reported, are fair and of carv'd Stone.

Buildings.

In Revenue he doubtless exceeds either Turk, or Persian, or any Eastern Prince, the Sums I dare not name; but the Reason. All the Land is his, no Man has a Foot. He maintains all that are not Mechanicks by Revenues bestow'd on them reckoned by Horses, and the Allowance of many is greater than the Estates of German Princes. All Men rise to greater and greater Lordships as they advance in Favour, which is got by frequent Presents rich and rare. The Mogul is Heir to all that die, as well those that gain'd it by their Industry, as Merchants, &c. as those that live by him. He takes all their Money, only leaving the Widow and Daughters what he pleases. To the Sons of those that die worth two or three Millions, he gives some small Lordship to begin the World anew.

The King sits out in three several Places at three times of the Day, except something extraordinary hinder him. An hour at noon to see his Elephants fight; from four till five to entertain all Comers, to be seen and worshipp'd; from nine till Midnight amidst his principal Men in more familiarity, being below among them.

All the Policy of his State is to keep the greatest Men about him, or to pay them as far off liberally. There is no Council, but every Officer gives the King his Opinion apart.

He (meaning Jehan Guire) is of Countenance cheerful, and not proud in Nature, but only by Habit and Custom; for at night he is very affable, and full of gentle Conversation.

There is an Account in this Letter of Sir Tho. Roe's Audience, but that is to be seen before in the Journal.

*An Extract of a Letter of Sir Tho. Roe to the Arch-Bishop of Canterbury.
Dated at Adsmere the 30th of October 1616.*

Mahometanism introduced in India.

BEFORE the Inundation of Temer the Great, that is Tamerlan, the ninth Ancestor of this King, these Countries were govern'd by divers Heathen petty Princes, worshipping all sorts of Creatures after their several manners. Tamerlan's Off-spring brought in the Knowledge of Mahomet, but impos'd it on none by the Law of Conquest, leaving Consciences at liberty. So that the Natives from the Circumcision brought in by the Mahometans, call'd them Moguls, or chief of the Circumcis'd. Among the Moguls there are many strict Mahometans, many that follow Hali his Son in Law, and other later Prophets, who have their Xerifes, Mulhaes, and Priests, their Mosques, Religious Votaries, Washings, Praying, and Ceremonies without end. And as for Penitents, no Sect in the World can show such strange Examples, nor boast of such voluntary Poverty, Punishments, Sufferings, and Chastisements as these, who are all esteem'd Holy Men, but of a mixt Religion, not upright with their Prophet. Sir Thomas Roe should have excepted the Idolaters in India, who far outdo the Mahometans in this Particular. The Gentiles are of more sorts, some valiant good Soldiers, drinking Wine, eating Hogs Flesh, but worshipping the Figure of a Beast. Some who will not touch the Flesh that is not holy by Imputation; others that will not eat any thing that ever had Life, nor kill the Vermin that bites them, nor drink in the same Cup with those that do, superstitious in washing, and most zealous in their Profession; but all of them ascribe a sort of Divinity to their River Ganges, at which once a year 40 or 50000 meet, and cast in Gold and Silver for an Oblation. In like manner they reverence a Pig's Head in a Pagod near this City, and all living Cows, and some other Beasts and Creatures. These have their Pagods, and Holy Men, Prophets, Witches, Soothsayers, and all other Impostures of the Devil. The Mahometan Mulhaes know somewhat in Philosophy and the Mathematicks, are great Astrologers, and can talk of Aristotle, Euclid, Averroes, and other Authors. The learned Tongue is the Arabian. In this Confusion they continu'd till the Time of Ezbar Sha, Father to this King, without any Knowledge of Christianity. This is another Mistake in Sir Tho. Roe, for they had always heard of Christianity, and there were many Christians both in Persia and some parts of India. Ezbar Sha being a Prince by Nature just and good, inquisitive after Novelties, curious of new Opinions, and excelling in many Virtues, especially in Piety and Reverence towards his Parents, call'd in three Jesuits from Goa, the chief of whom was Jerom Xaverius, a Navarrois. After their Arrival he heard them discourse with much satisfaction, and dispute of Religion, and caus'd F. Xaverius to write a Book in defence of his Religion against both Moors and Gentiles, which when finish'd he read in every Night, and had some part discuss'd. Finally he granted them his Letters Patents to build, preach, teach, convert, and to use all their Rites and Ceremonies as freely as in Rome, bestowing on them Means to erect their Churches and Places of Devotion. In this Grant he gave liberty to all sorts of Men to become Christians, even to his own Court and Blood, professing it should be no Cause of Disfavour. Ezbar Sha himself continu'd a Mahometan, yet he began to make a Breach into the Law; for considering that Mahomet was but a Man, and a King, as he was, and therefore reverenc'd, he thought he might prove as good good a Prophet himself. This Detection of the King spread not far, a certain outward Awe with-held him, and so he dy'd in the formal Profession of his Sect. Jehan Gaire Sha, his Son, the present King, being the Issue of this new Fancy, and never circumcis'd, bred up without any Religion at all, continues so to this Hour, and is an Atheist. Sometimes he will profess himself a Mahometan, but always observes the Holy Days, and does all Ceremonies with the Gentiles. He is pleas'd with all Religions, but loves none that changes; and falling into his Father's Conceit, has dar'd to proceed farther in it, and to profess himself for the main of his Religion to be a greater Prophet than Mahomet, and has form'd to himself a new one, being a Mixture of all others, which many have receiv'd with such Superstition, that they will not eat till they have saluted him in the Morning; for which purpose he comes at Sun-rising to a Window open to a great Plain before his House, where Multitudes attend him. When the Moors about him talk of Mahomet, he will sooth them; but is glad when any one will lash out against him. Of Christ he never utters any disrespectful Words, nor do any of all these Sects; which is a wonderful secret working of God's Truth, and worth observing.

As for the new-planted Christian Church, he confirm'd and enlarg'd its Privileges, spending two Hours every Night for a year in hearing Disputes; often dropping Words of his Conversion, but to a wicked purpose. To give the more hope he deliver'd many Youths into the hands of F. Francisco Corsi still Resident here, to teach them to read and write Portuguese, and to instruct them in Human Learning, and in the Law of Christ. To that purpose the Father kept a School some years, to which the King sent two Princes his Brothers Sons, who being brought up in the Knowledge of God, and his Son our blessed Saviour, were solemnly baptiz'd in the Church of Agra, with great Pomp; being first carry'd up and down all the City on Elephants in Triumph: and this by the King's express Order, who would often examine them to see what progress they made, and seem'd well pleas'd with them. This made many bend towards the same way, being ignorant of his Majesty's Intention; others that knew him better, suppos'd he suffer'd this in Policy to render those Children odious to the Moors for their Conversion, the Strength of his Estate consisting in them: but all Men mistook his Design, which was thus discover'd. When these and some other Children were settled, as was thought, in the Christian Religion, and had learnt the Principles thereof, as to marry but one Wife, not to be coupled with Infidels, &c. the King set the Boys to demand Portuguese Wives of the Jesuits; who thinking it only an idle Motion of their own, chid them, and suspected no more: But that being the end of their Conversion to get a Woman for the King, and no care being taken in it, the two Princes came to the Jesuits, and deliver'd up their Crosses, and all other Tokens of Religion, declaring they would be no longer Christians, because the King of Portugal sent them no Presents nor Wives, as they expected. The Fathers seeing this, began to doubt there was more in it than the Boys discover'd; especially seeing their Confidence that had cast off the Awe of Pupils: and examining the matter, they confess'd the King commanded them. The Jesuits refus'd to receive the Crosses, answering they had been given by his Majesty's Order, and they would not take notice of any such Surrender from Boys, but bid them desire the King to send one of those who are, according to order, to deliver all his Majesty's Commands, whose Words are by Privilege a sufficient Warrant, and then they would accept of them; hoping the King would not discover himself to any of his Officers in this poor Plot. The Boys return'd with this Message, which intrag'd the King; but being desirous to break up the School, and withdraw the Youth without noise, he bid them call the Jesuits to the Womens Door, where by a Lady he gave the Order, and without ever taking any notice since of any thing, his Kinsmen were recall'd, and are now absolute Moors, without any taste of their first Faith: and here have ended the Conversions of these Infidels.

I will add one or two more pleasant Relations, and so conclude. Not long since the Jesuits House and Church being burnt, the Crucifix remain'd untouch'd, which was given out for a Miracle, and much talk'd of. The King, who never lets slip any opportunity of new Talk, or Novelties, hearing of this Accident, calls the Jesuit, and questions him about it. He answers ambiguously; whereupon his Majesty ask'd, whether he did not desire to convert him? And being answer'd in the Affirmative, reply'd, You speak of your great Miracles, and of many done in the Name of your Prophet. If you will cast the Crucifix and Picture of Christ into a Fire before me, if it burn not I will become a Christian. The Jesuit refus'd the Trial, as unjust, answering, That God was not ty'd to the Call of Man, that it was a Sin to tempt him, and that he wrought Miracles according to his own Will; yet he offer'd to cast himself into the Fire for a Proof of his Faith, which the King would not allow of. Here arose a great Dispute, began by the Prince, a most stiff Mabomeidan, and hater of all Christians, urging, that it was reasonable to try our Religion after this manner; but withal, that if the Crucifix did burn, then the Jesuit should be oblig'd to turn Moor. He urg'd Examples of Miracles said to be wrought for less purposes than the Conversion of so mighty a King, and spoke scornfully of Christ Jesus. The King took up the Argument, and defended our Saviour to be a Prophet, comparing his Works with those of their absurd Saints, instancing the raising of the dead, which never any of theirs did. The Prince reply'd, that to give sight to one born blind was as great a Miracle. This being hotly debated on both sides, a third Man interpos'd to end the Controversy, saying, that both the Father and the Son were in the right as to their Opinions; for to raise a dead Body to Life must be own'd to be the greatest Miracle ever done, but that to give sight to an Eye naturally blind was the same work, because a blind Eye was dead, Sight being the Life of it; therefore he that gave sight to a blind Eye, did as it were raise it from Death. Thus this Discourse ended.

The Miracul like Herod would see a Miracle.

Roe.

The other Story is this. A Juggler of A Strange story of an Bengala, of which Craft there are many, Ape.

and very notable at it, brought before the King a great Ape, which as he said could divine and prophesy; and to this Beast some of the Indian Sects attribute a sort of Divinity. The King took a Ring off his Finger, and caus'd it to be hid under a Boy's Girdle, there being a dozen present; then bid the Ape divine, who went to the right Child, and took it out. His Majesty being somewhat more curious, caus'd the Names of twelve Lawgivers, as Christ, Moses, Mahomet, Haly, and others to be writ on twelve Papers in the Persian Tongue; and shuffling them in a Bag, bid the Beast divine which was the true Law, who putting in his Paw took out that inscribed with the Name of Christ. This amaz'd the King, who suspecting the Ape's Master could read Persian, and might assist him, wrote them anew in Court Characters, and presented them the second time. The Ape found the right, and kiss'd it. At this a great Officer grew angry, telling the King it was some Imposture, and desiring he might have leave to make the Scrolls anew, offering to undergo any Punishment if the Ape could deceive him. He writ the Names, putting only eleven in a Bag, and kept the other in his hand. The Monkey search'd, but refus'd all; the King commanding it to bring one, it tore them in a fury, and made signs the true Lawgiver's Name was not among them. The King ask'd where it was, and the Ape ran to the Nobleman and caught him by the hand, in which was the Paper inscrib'd with the Name of Christ Jesus. The King was concern'd, and keeps the Ape. This was done in publick before thousands, and no doubt is to be made of the truth of the matter of Fact.

Part of a Letter to the East-India Company, dated at Adsmere, Nov. 24. 1616.

My Honour'd Friends;

I Receiv'd your Letter, &c. (the first part omitted, as nothing material.)

Concerning the aiding the Mogul, or wadding his Subjects into the Red Sea, it is now useless; yet I made offer of your Affections; but when they need not a Courtesy, they regard it, as a Dog does dry Bread when his Belly is full. The King has Peace with the Portugueses, and will never make a constant War, except first we displant them; then his Greatness will step in for a share of the Benefit, which dares not partake of the Peril. When they have Peace, they scorn our Assistance, and speak as loud as our Cannon; if War oppresses them, they dare not put out under any Protection, nor will they pay for it. You must remove all thoughts of trading to their Port, any otherwise than defending your selves, and leaving them to their fortune: You can never oblige them by any Benefits, and they will sooner fear than love you. Your Residence you need not doubt, as long as you tame the Portugueses, therefore avoid all other Charge as unnecessary. At my first arrival I understood a Fort was very necessary, but Experience teaches me we are refus'd it to our own Advan

Advantage. If he would offer me ten, I would not accept of one. First, where the River is commodious the Country is barren, and has no Trade; the Passages to better parts so full of Thieves, that the King's Authority avails not, and the strength of the Hills secures them in that Life. If it had been fit for Trade, the Natives would have chosen it, for they feel the Inconveniency of a bar'd Haven; and it is Argument enough of some secret Inconveniency, that they make not use of it: but if it were safe without the Walls, yet it is not an easy work to divert the course of Trade, and draw the resort of Merchants from their accustomed Mart, especially for our Commodity, which is bought by Parcels, and cannot be call'd staple. Secondly, The Charge is greater than the Trade can bear, for to maintain a Garison will eat out the Profit: An hundred Men will not keep it, for if once the Portugueses see you take that course, they will use all their Endeavours to supplant you. A War and Traffick are incompatible. By my consent you shall never ingage your selves but at Sea, where you are like to gain as often as to lose. The Portugueses, notwithstanding their many rich Residences, are beggar'd by keeping of Soldiers, and yet their Garisons are but mean. They never made advantage of the Indies since they defended them. Observe this well. It has been alio the Error of the Dutch, who seek Plantations here by the Sword; they turn a wonderful Stock, they prole in all places, they possess some of the best, yet their dead Pays consume all the Gain. Let this be receiv'd as a Rule, that if you will profit, seek it at Sea, and in quiet trade; for without controversy it is an Error to affect Garisons and Land-Wars in India. If you made it only against the Natives, I should agree to it; but to make it for them they do not deserve it, and you should be very wary how you ingage your Reputation in it. You cannot so easily make a fair Retreat as an Onset. One Disaster would either discredit you, or ingage you in a War of extreme Danger, and doubtful Event: besides, an Action so subject to chance as a War, is most unfitly undertaken, and with most hazard, when the remoteness of the place for Supplies, Succours and Counsell, subjects it to irrecoverable loss; for where there is most Uncertainty, Remedies should be so much the nearer upon all occasions. At Sea you may take and leave, your Designs are not publish'd. The Road of Soali, and the Port of Su- rat are the fittest for you in all the Mogul's Territories. I have weigh'd it well, and deliver to you that which shall never be disprov'd. You need no more. It is not a number of Ports, Residences and Factories that will profit you; they will increase Charge, but not recompense it. The conveniency of one with respect to your Sails, and to the Commodity of Investments, and the well employing of your Servants, is all you need. A Port to secure your Ships, and a fit place to unlade will not be found together. The Road at Soali, during the season, is as safe as a Pond. Surat, Cambaya, Baroche, and Amudabat, are better traded than all India, and seated commodiously. The Inconveniences are, the Portugueses at Sea, and the landing of Goods. To obviate the first, you must bring to pass that your Lading be ready by the end of September at the Port, which may be effected by a Stock before hand, or by taking up Mony for three Months; and so you may discharge and lade at once, and depart in excellent season for England; and the Enemy will not have time to offend you, being newly arriv'd: and if the Preparation be of longer date, we shall know it. For the second, to land Goods without danger of Frigats, and to save the Carriage over Land, you must send a Pinnace of 60 Tuns with ten Guns, that draws but 7 or 8 foot Water, to pass up the River between Soali and Surat, and so your Goods will be safe and in your own Command, to the Customhouse-key, and it will a little awe the Town; she may afterwards proceed according to your appointment. The Commodities you sell pass best in that Quarter, the Goods you seek being Indigo and Cloth; no one place is so fit for both, and the less Inconveniences are be chosen. Syndu is possess'd by the Portugueses; or, if free, were no fitter than Surat, nor safer; as it is, will be more subject to peril.

For the settling your Traffick here, I doubt not to effect any reasonable desire, my Credit is sufficient with the King, and your Force will always bind him to Constancy. It will not need so much help at Court as you suppose, a little Countenance, and the Discretion of your Factors will with easy Charge return you most Profit, but you must alter your Stock. Let not your Servants deceive you; Cloth, Lead, Teeth, Quicksilver, are dead Commodities, and will never drive this Trade; you must succour it by Change. Articles of Treaty on equal Terms I cannot obtain, want of Presents has disgrac'd me, and yet by piecemeals I have got as much as I desir'd at once. I have recover'd all Bribes, Extortions, and Debts made and contracted before my time till this day, or at least an honourable Composition.

Presents to be made to succeed at Court. The Presents sent are too few to follow—

Examples, they will scarce serve the first day. The Rule is, at every arrival of a Fleet, the Mogul, and the Prince, during his Government of our Port, will expect a formal Present and some Letter from the King, our Solicitor from you, which need not be dear if well chosen. Your Agent must be furnish'd with a China Shop to serve small turns; for often giving of Trifles is the way of Preferment: it cannot be avoided, and I have been scorn'd for my Poverty in that kind. At my delivery of the first sent by me, Contentment outwardly appear'd; but I will acquaint you with the Cabinet Council's Opinion, by which you may judg three Exceptions were taken and argu'd by the King and his Great ones. First it was censur'd to name Presents in a King's Letter, to be sent by a principal Man his Ambassador; and such poor ones deliver'd, meaner and fewer than when they came with less Ostentation. That if they had not been nam'd as from a Monarch, they had been less despicable; for such is their Pride, that tho the Coach for its form, and as a Model, gave much Content, yet the matter was scorn'd, and it was never us'd till two others of rich Stuff were made by it, and that cover'd with Cloth of Gold, Harness and Furniture, and all the Tin Nails headed with Silver, or hatch'd: so that it was nine Months repairing, and when I saw it I knew it not.

2. Exception was taken that his Majesty did write his Name before the Mogul, but it matters not for that dull Pride.
3. That his Majesty in his Letter intimated, that Honour and Profit should arise to this Prince by the English and their Trade, which he so much scorns to hear of, that he would willingly be rid of it and us if he durst. The forgetting to send me Letters diminishes my Credit, which is to be maintain'd by all Ceremonies, and Sultan Corone expected one as an Honour to him.

The Mogul's Exceptions against the Embassy.

Voluntiers not to be sent into India.

The suffering of Voluntiers to pass in your Fleets is an extreme Incommodity. How to dispose of one here honestly, I know not. Assure your selves they are either some unruly Youths that want Ground to sow their Humours, and are expos'd to be tam'd, and may do you and me much prejudice in Reputation. I have had a bitter Experience of some taken by my self in good Nature. Here is Subject to practise all Vice upon, and no Virtue to be learn'd: Or else they are sent at your Charge to learn to discover the Straits and fittest places of Interception of Indian Goods for a future Voyage, and to enable them by Experience to do you a Mischief who bred them to it. I know many envy you this Trade, and would be extreme glad to rob you of it; you cannot do better than keep all Men in ignorance but your selves, or at least as many as Necessity does not oblige you to use.

The Dutch are arriv'd at Surat from the Red Sea with some Money and Southern Commodities. I have done my best to disgrace them, but could not turn them out without further danger. They come on the same ground we stand on, fear of their Ships, against which I suppose you will not warrant the Subjects of this King. Your Comfort is, here are Goods enough for both.

Practise against the Dutch.

Concerning Persia, the Factors do not understand what they have undertaken. Jasques is no Port or place for sale of Goods, and those they have sent not saleable. In order to secure your Safety and the Portugueses, there are but two ways, Peace or Compulsion. The first I have undertaken by means of a Jesuit, but despair of success. The next is Force, which is always us'd to disadvantage when you are only upon the defensive. My opinion is, that you give Orders to all your Fleets to make Prize of them, and that as you now ride at Soati Road to protect one Ship, you would send that Guard the next year to ride before Goa, to brave or burn them, or at least to stop them that they may not put to Sea in December; so you will make them lose their Seasons, and one or two returns stopt would undo them. On my word they are weak in India, and able to do your Fleet no harm, but by Supplies from Lisbon, where you must endeavour to have Intelligence, and apply your Strength accordingly. Thus you will add much Reputation to your Cause, and force them to that which their Pride will never suffer them to see they want more than you, which is a quiet Trade. For your Traffick into the Red Sea, it is more important than all other Projects: my Counsel is, that one of your smallest Ships with the fittest English Goods, and such others as this Country affords, go yearly in company of the Guzarats, and trade for themselves for Money, which is taken in

How to deal with the Portuguese, Gujarats, and India.

abun-

abundance, and return in September with them to supply this place. The Profit exceeds all the Trades of India, and will drive this alone. The danger is rather a jealousy than substantial. When the Turks betray'd Sir Henry Middleton, our Factories and Courses in those parts were unknown to them; and doubtless we being Strangers in that Sea, were mistrusted for Pirates. Experience has made us better known, and in company of the Guzarats, for their sake whom they cannot spare, we shall be admitted. The King would write to the Admiral to entertain our Confort-Ship, and they would be glad of it, and it were one of the best Securities of our Friendship. The Dutch have practis'd it this year to great advantage, and were all well receiv'd. Our own Wariness might secure us. They must ride six Months for Winds, time enough to send all the Goods ashore by parcels, and never trust above one or two Factors, and a small quantity of Goods at once. They will not declare their Treachery for Trifles, and I doubt not you may procure the Grand Signior's Command to meet them. If I have any Judgment, there is not any matter for your Profit of such importance. Port Pequenbo in Bengala you are misinform'd in, there is no Mart, or resort of Merchants; it is traded to by the Portugueses from Pegu with Rubies, Topazes and Saphires, and returns Cloth which is fine, but you may be furnish'd nearer hand.

I will settle your Trade here secure with the King, and reduce it to order, if I may be heard; when I have so done, I must plead against my self, that an Embassador lives not in fit Honour here. I could sooner die than be subject to the Slavery the Persian is content with.

A meaner Agent would among these proud Moors better effect your business. My Quality often for Ceremonies either begets you Enemies, or suffers unworthily. The King has often demanded an Embassador from Spain, but could never obtain one, for two reasons; first, because they would not give Presents unworthy their King's Greatness; next, they knew his Reception should not answer his Quality. I have moderated according to my Discretion, but with a swollen Heart. Half my Charge shall corrupt all this Court to be your Slaves.

The best way to do your business in this Court is to find some Mogul that you may entertain for 1000 Roupies a year, as your Solicitor at Court. He must be authoriz'd by the King, and then he will serve you better than ten Embassadors. Under him you must allow 500 Roupies for another at your Port to follow the Governour, and Customers, and to advertise his Chief at Court. These two will effect all, for your other smaller Residences are not subject to much Inconveniency.

Concerning private Trade, my opinion is, that you absolutely prohibit it, and execute Forfeitures; for your business will be the better done. All your loss is not in the Goods brought home, I see here the Inconveniences you think not of. I know this is harsh to all Men, and seems hard; Men profess they come not for bare Wages: but you will take away this Plea, if you give great Wages to their Content; and then you know what you part from, but then you must make good choice of your Servants, and use fewer.

No private trading to the East-Indies to be allow'd.

F I N I S.

The several Kingdoms and Provinces subject to the Great Mogul, SHA-SËLIM JEHAN-GUIRE: with the Principal Cities and Rivers, their Situation, Borders and Extent in length and breadth, as near as I could gather by common Computation. The Names I took out of the King's Register, and begin at the North-West.

- 1 Candabar. THE chief City and Kingdom both of the same Name, it lies N. W. from the heart of the Mogul's Territories, and was formerly a Province of Persia, on which it borders.
- 2 Tatta. A Kingdom and chief City so call'd, is divided by the River Indus, which falls into the Sea at Syndu. It lies South of Candabar, and West somewhat Southerly from Agra.
- 3 Buckor. The chief City call'd Buckorsuckar, lies upon the River of Syndu or Indus to the Northward, somewhat Easterly of Tatta; and on the West borders on the Baloaches, a kind of rude Warlike People.
- 4 Multan. The chief City call'd by the same Name, lying also upon Indus, South-East from Candabar, Northerly from Backar.
- 5 Hajacan. The Kingdom of the Baloaches, North of Tatta and Backar, and on the West borders on the Kingdom of Lar, subject to the King of Persia; Indus winds it self along the East-side of it, and it has no City of Note.
- 6 Cabul. The City has the same Name: It is a great Kingdom, the most Northerly of this Empire, and runs up to the Confines of the great Tartary.
- 7 Kyshmier, or Cachimir. The chief City of it is call'd Sirinakra, the River Ebat passes through it, and falls into Ganges, tho others say it runs into the Sea in the North part of the Bay of Bengala: the Kingdom of Cabul is border'd by it on the East, Southerly it is all Mountains.
- 8 Bankish. The chief City of it is call'd Beishar, it lies East of Cachimir.
- 9 Atack, or Attock. The chief City of the same Name, it lies on one side of the River Nilob, which runs on the North-West into the River Indus.
- 10 The Kingdom of the Kakares. Lies at the foot of the Mountains. Its principal Cities are Dankely and Purchola, and borders on the North-East side of the Kingdom of Cachimir.
- 11 Penjab. Which signifies five Waters, because it is seated within five Rivers. The chief City is call'd Labor. It is a great Kingdom, and very fruitful. The City is the Mart of India for Traffick, it borders on the East-side of Multan.
- 12 Jenba, or Jamba. The chief City of the same Name, it lies East of Benjab, and is very Mountainous.
- 13 Peitan, or Pitan. The chief City so call'd lies North-East of Jenba, and North of Patna, and is full of Mountains.
- 14 Nawgracut. The chief City of the same Name, it lies North between Benjab and Jamba, and is very Mountainous.
- 15 Siba. The chief City of the same Name, North of Jamba, and the Bay of Bengala, and very Mountainous.
- 16 Jesval. The chief City is call'd Rajapore, it reaches down to the Kingdom of Bengale, and lies North of it, and East of Patna, full of Mountains.

- 17 Delli. The chief City of the same Name: It lies on both sides of the River Gemmi, which falls into Ganges, and runs through Agra. It is an antient City, and the Seat of the Mogul's Ancestors, but ruin'd. Some affirm it to have been the Seat of Porus conquer'd by Alexander the Great, and that there still stands a Pillar with a Greek Inscription. Kor.
- 18 Mayat. The chief City call'd Narval, it lies on the East of Ganges and Gemna, to the North-East of their meeting.
- 19 Sambal. The chief City bears the same Name: It lies betwixt the Rivers Ganges and Gemna, North of their meeting.
- 20 Bakar. The chief City is call'd Bikaner, Ganges borders it on the East, and the Province of Delli on the West.
- 21 Agra. A principal and great Kingdom, the chief City of the same Name, the heart of the Mogul's Dominions, in about 28 degrees and a half of North Latitude: It lies most on the South-West side of the River Gemna, the City upon the River where one of the Emperor's Treasuries is kept. From Agra to Labor there are 320 Cosses, which is no less than 700 Miles, all a Plain, and the High-way planted on both sides with Trees, like a delicate Wall. It is one of the great Works and Wonders of the World.
- 22 Jenupar. The City of the same Name upon the River Kaul, which I suppose to be one of the five Rivers inclosing Labor; and the Country lies between it and Agra, North-West from the one, and South-East from the other.
- 23 Banda. The chief City is so call'd: It borders on Agra on the East, and Jesselmere on the West.
- 24 Patna. The chief City has the same Name: It is inclosed by four great Rivers, Ganges, Jemna, Serseli and Kanda, and lies North-East from Agra, and North of the Bay of Bengala, where all these Rivers pay Tribute.
- 25 Gor. The chief City is also so call'd: It lies in the Northern part of the Mogul's Dominions, and towards the heads of the Rivers Ganges and Kanda.
- 26 Bengala. A mighty Kingdom enclosing the East and North side of the Bay of that Name; whence winding towards the South, it borders on Coromandel, or rather Golconda. The chief Cities are Ragmehal and Dekaka: There are many Havens, as Port Grande, Port Pequenho, resorted to by Portugueses; Piliptan, Saligam, &c. It contains divers Provinces, as that of Prurop, Patan, &c.
- 27 Udeza. The chief City call'd Jakanat. It is the utmost Extent Eastward of the Mogul's Dominions, North of the Bay, and borders on the Kingdom of Maug, a Savage People lying between Udeza and Pegu.
- 28 Kanduana. The chief City is call'd Karakatanka. This and Gor are the North-East Bounds of this Monarchy, on the West of it is Pitan.
- 29 Gualcor. The chief City bears the same Name, where the Mogul has one of his great Treasuries, with an exceeding strong Castle, where Prisoners are kept. It lies South of Agra.
- 30 Candis. The chief City here is Brampore. It is a great Kingdom, and the City one of the antient Seats of the Kings of Decan, taken from them: It lies East of Guzarat, South of Chitor, West of Golconda, and North of Decan. It is water'd by the River Tabeti, which runs Westward into the Bay of Cambaya.
- 31 Malua. The chief Cities here are Ugen, Nar and Seringe: It lies North-East of Chandis, and South-East of the Country of Rama, and West of the Province of Prurop of the Kingdom of Bengala.
- 32 Berar. The chief City is call'd Shakpur: It is enclos'd by the Provinces of Malua, Candis, Golconda and Prurop.
- 33 Guzarat. A noble Kingdom, enclosing the Bay of Cambaya, the chief City is Amadavat. Within it is contain'd the City and Government of Cambaya, the Beauty of India. The Territory and City of Surat, and that of Baroche: It is water'd by many goodly Rivers, as that of Cambaya, once falsely suppos'd to be Indus; the River of Narbada falling into the Sea at Baroche, that of Surat, and divers others. It trades into the Red Sea, to Achem, and many other places.

- Ros.* 34 Saret. The chief City call'd Gunagur: It lies to the North-West of Guzarat.
- 35 Naruar. The chief City of Ghebud, lies East of Gualcor, and South of Sambal.
- 36 Chitor. The antient great Kingdom: The City of the same Name, wall'd, and about 10 English Miles in compass, on a mighty Hill. There are still above 100 Churches standing, the King's Palace, and many fine Pillars of carv'd Stone. There is but one Ascent to it cut out of the Rock, on which are four magnificent Gates. The Ruins of above 100000 Houses all of Stone are still to be seen, but it is not inhabited. It was doubtless one of the Seats of Porus, and taken from his Successor Rama by Exbar-Sha, Father to Jehan Guire the Mogul. Rama flying into the Strength of his Kingdom, among the Mountains, seated himself at Odepore, and was brought to acknowledge the Mogul for his Sovereign Lord by Soltan Corone third Son to the present Emperor, in the year 1614. This Kingdom lies North-West from Candis, and North-East from Guzarat, in the way between Agra and Surat. Rama himself keeps the Hills to the West nearer Amadavar.

The Length of the Mogul's Dominions, North-West and South-East.

From Candabar to Labor 350 Cosses, being about 800 Miles.

From Labor to Agra 320 Cosses, about 750 Miles.

From Agra to Hagipore Patna 300 Cosses, 680 Miles.

From Hagipore Patna to Kirafnad 300 Cosses, about 670 Miles.

The whole Length 1270 Cosses, about 2872 Miles.

The Breadth in all North-East and South-West from Harduar to Duarsa 630 Cosses, about 1500 Miles.

The Length North and South about 1400 Miles.

A Note of such things as Sir Thomas Roe would have had sent him to bestow as Presents, inserted for the Reader's Satisfaction, to show what Curiosities were acceptable in India to give or sell.

K N I V E S large and fair, wrought with Amber, Coral, Gold or Silver, or inlaid with Glafs.

The Figures of the Lion, the Buck, the Greyhound, the Bull, the Horse, the Talbot, provided they be well form'd, and good Shapes, such Toys will please well for ordinary turns.
